Or peradventure, sceing their maner is to consecrate unto every god one kinde of birde or other, they reputed this Woodpecker facted unto Mars, because it is a couragious and hardy bird, having abill so strong, that he is able to overthrow an oke therewith, after he hath jobbed and pecked into it as farre as to the very marrow and heart thereof.

How is it that they magine Janus to have had two faces, in which maner they use both to pains and also to cast him in mold.

Sit for that he being a Græcian borne, came from Perrhæbia, as we finde written in histo-I ries; and paffing forward into Italy, dwelt in that countrey among the Barbarous people, who there lived, whose language and maner of life he changed?

Or rather because he taught and perswaded them to live together after a civil and honest fort, in husbandry and tilling the ground; whereas before time their manners were rude, and their fashions savage without law or justice altogether.

What is the cause that shey use to sell at Rome all things perteining to the furniture of Funerals, within the temple of the goddesse Libitina, supposing her to be Venus.

His may feeme to be one of the fage and philosophicall inventions of king Numa, to the end that men should learne not to abhorre such things, nor to slie from them, as if they did pollute and defile them? Or else this reason may be rendred, that it serveth for a good record and memoriall, to put us in minde, that what loever had a beginning by generation, shall likewife come to an end by death; as if one and the same goddesie were superintendent and governesse of nativitie and death: for even in the city of Delphos there is a pretic image of Venus, furnamed Epitymbia; that is to say sepulchrall: before which they use to raise and call foorth the ghosts of such as are 50 departed, for to receive the libaments and facred liquors powred foorth unto them.

Why have the Romans in every moneth three beginnings as it were, to wit certaine principall and prefixed or preordeined * dates, and regard not the same intervall or space of dates be fay, Kalends,

S it because as Juba writest in his chronicles, that the chiefe magistrates were wont upon the A first day of the moneth to call and summon the people; whereupon it tooke the name of Ca-lends; and then to denounce unto them that the 20 ones should be the fift day after; and as for the Ides they held it to be an holy and facred day?

Or for that they measuring and determining the time according to the differences of the moone, they observed in her every moneth three principall changes and diversities: the first, when the is altogether hidden, namely during her conjunction with the funne; the fecond when the is fomewhat remooved from the beames of the funne, & beginneth to thew herfelfe croissant in the evening toward the West whereas the sunne setteth; the third, when she is at the full: now that occultation and hiding of hers in the first place, they named Calends, for that in their tongue whatfoever is secret & hidden, they fay it is [Clam] and to hide or keepe close, they expresse by this word [Celare;] and the first day of the moones illumination, which wee 10 heere in Greece tearme Noumenia, that is to fay, the new-moone, they called by a most just name Nona, for that which is new and young, they teatme Novum, in manner as wee doe PAN. As for the Ides, they tooke their name of this word dobs, that fignifieth beautie; for that the moone being then at the full, is in the very perfection of her beautie: or haply they derived this denomination of Dios, as attributing it to Jupiter: but in this we are not to fearch out exactly the just number of daies, nor upon a small default to flander and condemne this maner of reckoning, seeing that even at this day, when the science of Astrologie is growen to so great an increment, the inequalitie of the motion, and course of the moone surpasseth all experience of Mathematicians, and cannot be reduced to any certeine rule of reason, 20

What is the cause that they repute the morrowes after Calends, Nones, and Ides, disasterous or dismall dates, either for to set forward upon any journey or voiage, or to march with an army into the field?

Sit because as many thinke, and as Titus Livius hath recorded in his storie; the Tribunes 1 militarie, at what time as they had confular and foveraigne authoritie, went into the field with the Romane armie the morrow after the Ides of the moneth Quintilis, which was the same that July nowis, and were discomfitted in a battell by the Gaules, neere unto the river Allia: and colequently upon that overthrow, loft the very city it felfe of Rome: by which occasion the morrowafter the Ides, being held and reputed for a finister and unluckie day; superstition entring 20 into mens heads, proceeded farther, (as the loveth alwaies to to doe) and brought in the cuftome for to hold the morrow after the Mones yea, and the morrow after the Calends, as unfortimate, and to be as religiously observed in semblable cases.

But against this there may be opposed many objections: for first and formost, they lost that battell upon another day, and calling it Alliensis, by the name of the river Allia, where it was strucken, they have it in abomination for that cause. Againe, whereas there be many daies reputed difmall and unfortunate, they doe not observe so precisely and with so religious seare, other daies of like denomination in every moneth, but ech day apart onely in that moneth wherein fuch and fuch a difafter, hapned; and that the infortunitie of one day should draw a superflitious feare fimply upon all the morrowes after Calends, Nones, and Ides, carieth no con- 40 gruitie at all, nor apparence of reason.

Confider moreover and see, whether, as of moneths they used to consecrate the first to the gods celeftiall, the second to the terrestriall, or infernall, wherein they performe certeine expiatoric ceremonies and facrifices of purification, and prefenting offrings and fervices to the dead : fo of the daies in the moneth, those which are chiefe and principall, as hath beene said, they would not have to be kept as facted and festivall holidaies; but such as follow after, as being dedicated unto the spirits, called Damons, and those that are departed , they also have estecmed colequently as unhappy, & altogether unmeet either for to execute or to take in hand any businesses for the Greeks adoring and serving the gods upon their new moones and first daies of the moneth, have attributed the second daies unto the demi-gods and Damons: like as at 50 their fealts also they drinke the second cup unto their demi-gods, and demi-goddesses. In fumme, Time is a kinde of number, and the beginning of number is (I wot not what,) fome divine thing, for it is Unitie: and that which commeth next after it is Deuz or two, cleane opposite unto the said beginning, and is the first of all even numbers: as for the even numberit is delective, unperfect, and indefinit, whereas contrariwife, the uneven or oddenumber it felfe is finite, complet, and absolute: and for this cause like as the Nones succeed the Calends five daies after; fo the Ides follow the Nones nine daies after them; for the uneven and odde numbers doe determine those beginnings, or principall daies; but those which prefently enfue after the faid principall daies being even, are neither ranged in any order, nor have power and puissance: and therefore men doe not enterprise any great worke, nor set foorth voiage or journey upon such daies: and heereto wee may to good purpose annex that prese speech of Themislocles: For when the morrow (quoth he) upon a time quarrelled with the festivall day which went next before it, faying, that herfelfe was bufied and tooke a great deale of pains, preparing & providing with much travel those goods which the feast enjoied at her case, with all repose, rest, and leifure: the Festivallday made this answer: Thou saidst true indeed; but if I were not, where wouldst thoube? This tale Them flotles devised, and delivered unto the 10 Athenian captaines, who came after him; giving them thereby to understand, that neither they nor any acts of theirs would ever have been efeene, unleffe hee before them had faved the citie of Athens. For a funch then, as every enterprise and voiage of importance hath need of provision, and some preparatives; and for that the Romans in old time upon their festivall daies, dispensed nothing, nor tooke care for any provision; being wholy given and devoted at fuch times to the fervice & worship of God, doing that, & nothing else, like as even yet at this day, when the priefts begin to facrifice, they pronounce with a loud voice before all the companie there affembled Hoc AGE, that is to fay, Minde this, and doe no other thing: verie like it is, and standeth to great reason, that they used not to put themselves upon the way for any Jong voiage, nor tooke in hand any great affaire or businesse presently after a sestivall day, but 20 kept within house all the morrow after, to thinke upon their occasions, and to provide all things necessarie for journey or exploit: or we may conjecture, that as at this very day the Romans after they have adored the gods, and made their praiers unto them within their temples, are woont to flay there a time, and fit them downe ; even fo they thought it not reasonable to cast their great affaires fo, as that they should immediately follow upon any of their festivall daies; but they allowed some respit and time betweene, as knowing full well, that businesses carie with them alwaies many troubles and hinderances, beyond the opinion, expectation, and will of those who take them in hand.

What is the cause that women at Rome, when they mourne for the dead, put on white robes, and likewise weare white camles, coifes and kerchiefs upon their heads.

Or doe they it not rather for this: that like as they clad and burie the dead corps in white clothes, they suppose, that those who are next of kin, and come neerest about them, ought also to weare their liverie? Now the bodie they doe in this wife decke, because they cannot adorne the foule fo; and it they are willing to accompanie as lightforme, pure and net, as being now at the last delivered and set free, and which hath performed a great a variable combat.

Or rather, we may gueffe thus much thereby: that in fuch cases, that which is most simple 40 and least costly, is best beseeming; whereas clothes of any other colour died, do commonly bewray either superfluitie or curiositie: for we may fay even aswell of blacke, as of purple: These robes are deceitfull; these colours also are counterfeit. And as touching that which is of it selfe blacke, if it have not that tincture by diers art, furely it is so coloured by nature, as being mixed and compounded with obscuritie: and therefore there is no colour els but white, which is pure, unmixt, and not stained and fullied with any tincture, and that which is inimitable; in which regard, more meet and agreeable unto those who are interred, considering that the dead is now become fimple, pure, exempt from all mixtion, and in very truth, nothing els but delivered from the bodie, as a staine and infection hardly scowred out and rid away. Semblably, in the citie of Argos, when soever they mourned, the maner was to weare white garments, washed 50 (as Socrates faid) in faire and cleere water.

What is the reason that they esteeme all the walles of the citie sacred and inviolable, but not the

Sit (as Varro faith) because we ought to thinke the walles holie, to the end that we may fight I valiantly, and die generously in the defence of them? for it seemeth that this was the cause, why Romulus killed his owne brother Romu, for that he prefumed to leape over an holy and inviolable place: whereas contrariwife, it was not possible to confecrate and hallow the gates, thorow which there must needs be transported many things necessary, and namely, the bodies of the dead. And therefore, they who begin to found a citie, environ and compaffe first with a plough all that pourprise and precinct wherein they meant to build, drawing the said plough with an oxe and a cow coupled together in one yoke: afterwards, when they have traced out all the faid place where the walles should stand, they measure out as much ground as will ferve for the gates, but take out the plough-share, and so passe over that space with the bare plough, as if they meant thereby, that all the furrow which they cast up and cared, should be facred and inviolable.

What is thereason, that when their children are to sweare by Hercules, they will not let them to dost within doores, but cause them to go forth of the house, and take their oath abroad?

TS it because (as some would have it) that they thinke Hercules is not delighted with keeping Lclose within house and litting idlely, but taketh pleasure to live abroad and lie without?

Or rather, for that of all the gods, Hercules is not (as one would fay) home-bred, but a stranger, come amongst them from a farre? For even so they would not sweare by Bacchus, under the roofe of the house, but went forth to do it; because he also is but a stranger among the gods.

Or haply, this is no more but a word in game and sport, given unto children: and besides (to fay attueth) it may be a meanes to withholde and restraine them from swearing so readily and rashly, as Phavorinus saith: for this device causeth a certeine premeditate preparation, and gi- 20 verh them (whiles they goe out of the house) leasure and time to consider better of the matter, And a man may conjecture also with Phavorinus, and say with him: That this fashion was not common to other gods, but proper to Hercules: for that we finde it written, that he was foreligious, so respective and precise in his oath, that in all his life time he never sware but once, and that was onely to Phileus the sonne of Augius. And therefore, the prophetissicat Delphos, named Pythia, answered thus upon a time to the Lacedæmonians:

When all these oaths you once for fend, Your state (be sure) shall dayly mend.

What should be thereason, that they would not permit the new wedded bride to passe of herselfe over the doore-fill or threshold, when she is brought home to her husbands house, but they that accompanie her, must lift her up bet weene them from the ground, and so convey her in.

TS it in remembrance of those first wives whom they ravished perforce from the Sabines, who Lentred not into their houses of themselves with their good will, but were carried in by them, in

Or is it perhaps, because they would be thought to goe against their willes into that place where they were to lose their maidenhead?

Or haply it may be, that a wedded wife ought not to goe foorth of her doores, and abandon 40 her house, but perforce, like as she went first into it by force. For in our countrey of Baotia, the maner is, to burne before the doore where a new married wife is to dwell, the axel tree of that chariot or coatch in which the rode when the was brought to her husbands house. By which ceremonie, thus much the is given to understand, that will she nill she, there she must now tarrie, considering that it which brought her thither, is now gone quite and consumed.

Wherefore do they at Rome, when they bring a new espoused bride home to the house of her hus-band, force her to say these words wnto her spouse: Whete you are Cajus, I will be Cajus?

S it to tellifie by these words, that the entreth immediately to communicate with him in 1 all goods, and to be a governeffe and commaunder in the house as well as he? for it implieth as much, as if the should say; where you are lord and master, I will be lady and mistres. Now these names they used as being common, and such as came first to hand, and for no other reafon else : like as the Civill lawiers use ordinarily these names, Cajus, Seius, Lucius, and Tittus: the Philosophers in their schooles, Dion and Theon.

Orperadventure it is in regard of Caia Cacilia a beautifull and vertuous lady, who intimes past espoused one of the sonnes of king Tarquinim: of which dame there is yet to be seene even at this day one image of braffe, within the temple of the god Santtus: and there likewife in old time, her slippers, her distaffe and spindels laid up for to bee scene: the one to signific that the kept the house well, and went not ordinarily abroad; the other to shew how she busied her felfe at home.

3 I How commeth it, that they use to chaunt or dinarily at weddings, this word so much divulged,

S it not of Talafia, the Greeke word, which fignifieth yarne : for the basket wherein women use to put in their rolles of carded wooll, they name Talasos in Greeke, and Calathus in Latine? Certes they that lead the bride home, cause her to sit upon a sliece of wooll, then bringeth the foorth a diftaffe and a spindle, and with wooll all to hangeth and decketh the dore of her husbands house.

Or rather, if it be true which historians report: There was fometime a certeine young gentleman, very valiant and active in feats of armes, and otherwife of excellent parts and fingular wel conditioned, whose name was Talasius: and when they ravished and carried away the daughters of the Sabines who were come to Rome, for to behold the folemnitie of their festivall 20 games and plaies: certaine meane persons, such yet as belonged to the traine & retinue of Tala fine aforefaid, had chosen foorth & were carying away, one damosel above the rest most beautiful of vifage, and for their fafety and securitie as they passed along the streets, cried out aloud Talasio, Talasio, that is to say, for Talasion, for Talasion; to the end that no man should be so hardy as to approch neere unto them, nor attempt to have away the maiden from them, giving it out, that they caried her for to be the wife of Talafius; and others meeting them upon the way, joined with them in company for the honour of Talasius, and as they followed after, highly praifed their good choice which they had made, praying the gods to give both him and her joy of their marriage, and contentment to their hearts delire. Now for that this marriage prooved happy and bleffed, they were woont ever after in their wedding fongs to rechant and refound 30 this name, Talasius, like as the maner is among the Greeks to sing in such carrols, Hymenaus.

What is the reason that in the moneth of May, they use at Rome to cast over their woodden bridge into the river certaine images of men, which they call Argeos?

IS it in memoriall of the Barbarians who fometimes inhabited these parts, and did so by the Greeks, murdering them in that maner as many of them as they could take? But Hercules who was highly effeemed among them for his vertue, abolished this cruell fashion of killing of strangers, and taught them this custome to counterfet their auncient superstitions, and to sling 40 these images in stead of them: now in old time our ancestors used to name all Greeks of what countrey foever they were, Argeos: unlesse haply a man would say, that the Arcadians reputing the Argives to be their enemies, for that they were their neighbour borderers, fuch as fled with Evander out of Areadia, and came to inhabit these quarters, reteined still the old hatred and ranckor, which time out of minde had taken root, and beene fetled in their hearts against the said Argives.

What is the cause that the Romans in old time never went foorth out of their houses to supper, but they carried with them their young fonnes, even when they were but in their very infancie and childhood.

As not this for the very fame reason that Lycurgus instituted and ordeined, that yoong children should ordinarily be brought into their halles where they used to eat in publicke, called Phidina, to the end that they might be inured and acquainted betimes, not to use the pleasures of eating and drinking immoderately, as brutish and ravenous beasts are wont to doe; confidering that they had their elders to overfee them, yea, and to controll their demeanour: and in this regard haply also, that their fathers themselves should in their cariage be more fober, honeft, and frugall, in the prefence of their children: for looke where old folke are shamelesse, there it can not chuse but (as Plato faith) children and youth will be most gracelesse and impudent.

What might the reason be, that whereas all other Romans made their offrings, ceremonies, and facrifices for the dead, in the moneth of February: Decimus Brutus as Cicero faith, was went to doe the same in the moneth of December: now this Brutus was he who first invadeathe country of Pottugall, and with an armie passed over the river of Lethe, that is to

Ay it not be, that as the most part of men used not to performe any such services for the 10 Ay it not be, that as the more hand a little before the flutting in of the evening; dead, but toward the end of the moneth, and a little before the flutting in of the evening; even so it seemeth to catie good reason, to honour the dead at the end of the yeere; and you wot well that December was the the last moneth of all the yeere.

Or rather, it is because this was an honour exhibited to the deities terrestriall; and it seemeth that the proper season to reverence and worship these earthly gods, is when the fruits of the earth be fully gathered and laid up.

Or haply, for that the husband men began at this time to breake up their grounds against their feednesse: it was meet and requisite to have in remembrance those gods which are un-

Or haply, because this moneth is dedicate and consecrated by the Romans to Sasurne; for 20 der the ground. they counted Saturne one of the gods beneath, and none of them above : and withall, considering the greatest and most solemne feast, which they call Saturnalia, is holden in this moneth, at what time as they feeme to have their most frequent meeting, and make best cheere, he thought it meet and reasonable that the dead also should enjoy some little portion thereof.

Or it may be faid, that it is altogether untrue that Desimus Erutus alone facrificed for the dead in this moneth: for certeine it is that there was a certeine divine fervice performed to Acea Larenia, and folemne effusions and libaments of wine and milke were powred upon her sepulchrein the moneth of December.

Why honoured the Romans this Acca Latentia fo highly, confidering shew as no better than a strumpet or courtifan?

Or you must thinke, that the histories make mention of another Acca Larentia, the nurse of Romulus, unto whom they do honour in the moneth of Aprill. As for this courtizan Lareneta, the was (as men fay) furnamed Fabula, and came to be fo famous and renowmed by fuch an occasion as this. A certeine sexton of Hereules his temple, having littleels to doe, and living at ease (as commonly such fellowes doe) used for the most part to spend all the day in playing at dice and with cokall bones: and one day above the rest, it fortuned, that meeting with none of his mates and play-fellowes who were woont to beare him company at fuch games, and not 40 knowing what to do nor how to paffe the time away, he thought with himfelfe to challenge the god whose servant he was , to play at dice with him , upon these conditions : That if himselse woon the game, Hereules should be a meanes for him of some good lucke and happy fortune; but in case he lost the game, he should provide for Hercules a good supper, and withall, a pretie wench and a faire, to be his bedfellow: these conditions being agreed upon and set downe, he call the dice, one chance for himselfe, and another for the god; but his hap was to be the loser: whereupon minding to stand unto his challenge, and to accomplish that which he had promised, he prepared a rich supper for Hercules his god, and withall, sent for this Acca Larentia, a profelled courtifan and common harlot, whom he feafted also with him, and after supper beltowed her in a bed within the very temple, shut the doores fast upon, and so went his way. Now the 50 tale goes forfooth, that in the night, Hereules companied with her, not after the maner of men, but charged her, that the next morning betimes the should go into the market place, and looke what man the first met withall, him the should enterteine in all kindnesse, and make her friend especially. Then Larentia gat up betimes in the morning accordingly, and chanced to encounter a certeine rich man and a stale bacheler, who was now pass his middle age, and his name was Taruntim; with him the became to familiarly acquainted, that to long as he lived, the had the command of his whole house; and at his death, was by his last will and testament instituted inheritresse of all that he had. This Larentia likewise afterward departed this life, and left all her riches unto the citie of Rome; whereupon this honour abovefaid was done unto her.

What is the cause, that they name one gate of the citie Fenestra, which is as much to say, as window; neere unto which adjoineth the bed-chamber of Fortune?

TS it for that king Servine a most fortunate prince, was thought & named to lie with Fortune, I who was woont to come unto him by the window? or is this but a devised tale? But in trueth, 10 after that king Tarquinius Priscus was deceased, his wife Tanaquillis being a wife ladie, and enduedwith a rotall mind, putting forth her head, and bending forward her bodie out of her chamber window, made a speech unto the people, perswading them to elect Servins for their king. And this is the reason that afterwards the place reteined this name, Fenestra.

whole to the state of all the feshings which be dedicated and conferred to the gods, the cuflome is at Rome, that onely the foiles of enemies conquered in the warres, are negletted and suffered to runto decay in processe of time: neither uthere any reverence done unto them, nor repaired be they at any time, when they wax olde?

1.231 Hether is it, because they (supposing their glory to sade and passe away together with these first society seeks evermore new meaners to winne some fresh marks and reasons. these first spoiles) seeke evermore new meanes to winne some fresh marks and monuments of their vertue, and to leave them fame behinde them, applied to the second of their vertue.

Or rather, for that feeing time doth waste and consume the fefigues and tokens of the enmity which they had with their enemies; it were an odious thing for them, and very invidious, if they should refresh and renew the remembrance thereof: for even those among the Greeksy who first erected their trophes or pillars of braffe and stone, were not commended for so doing besteild.

What is the reason that Quintus Metellus the high priest, and reputed besides a wife man and a politike forbad to observe auspices, or to take presages by flight of birds, after the moneth Sextilis, now called August.

I Sit for that, as we are woont to attend upon such observations about noone or in the begin-ling of the day, at the entrance also and toward the middle of the moneth: but we take heed and beware of the daies declination, as inaufpicate and unmeet for fuch purposes; even so Metellus supposed, that the time after eight moneths was (as it were) the evening of the yeere, and the latter end of it, declining now and wearing toward an end.

Or haply, because we are to make use of these birds, and to observe their slight for presage, 40 whiles they are entire, perfect and nothing defective, such as they are before Summer time. But about Autumne some of them moult, grow to be fickly and weake; others are over young and too small; and some againe appeare not at all, but like passengers are gone at such a time into another countrey.

What is the cause, that it was not lawfull for them who were not prest soldiors by oth and enrolled, although upon some other occasions they conversed in the campe, to strike or wound an enemie? And verely Cato himselfe the elder of that name signified thus much in a letter missive which he wrote unto his some: wherein he straitly charged him, that if he had accomplished the full time of his Service, and that his captain had given him his conge and discharge, he should imme diatly returne: or in case he hadleifer stay still in the campe, that he should obtaine of his captaine permission and licence to hart and kill his enemie.

TS it because there is nothing else but necessitie alone, doeth warrantize it a killing of a Iman: and he who unlawfully and without expressed commaundement of a superiour (unconftrained)doth it, is a moere homicide and manflaier. And therefore Cyrus commended Chry-Jantas, for that being upon the verie point of killing his enemie, as having lifted up his cemiter for to give him adeadly wound, presently upon the found of the retreat by the trumper, let the man go, and would not finite him, as if he had beene forbidden fo to do. Or may it not be, for that he who presenteth himselfe to fight with his enemie, in case he firink, and make not good his ground, ought not to go away electe withal, but to be held faulty and to fuffer punishment: for he doth nothing so good service that hath either killed our wounan enemie, as harme and domage, who reculeth backe or flieth away : now he who is discharged from warfare, and hath leave to depart, is no more obliged and bound to militarie lawes: but he that hath demanded permiffion to do that fervice which fworne and enrolled fouldiers performe, putteth himfelle againe under the subjection of the law and his owner captaine and it

How isst, that the priest of Jupitet, is not permitted to annount himselfe abroadinable open aire?

TS it for that in old time it was not held honest and lawfull for children to do off their clothes before their fathers; nor the fonne in law in the presence of his wives father; neither used they the flouph or Buth together : now is Jupiter reputed the priefts of Flamines father; and that which is done in the openaire, seemeth especially to be in the verice eie and sight of Supiter?

Or rather, like as it was thought a great finne and exceeding irrevetence, for a manto turne himfelie out of his apparrell naked, in any church, chappell, or religious and facted place; even fo they carried a great respect unto the aire and open skie, as being full of gods, denti-gods, and 20 faints. And this is the verie caule, why we do many of our necessarie businesses within dostor, enclosed and covered with the roofe of our houses, and so remooved from the cies as it were of the deitie. Moreover, some things there be that by law are commaunded and enjoined unto the priest onely; and others agains into all men, by the priest: as for example, heete with us in Bæotias to be crowned with chaplets of flowers upon the head; to let the haire grow long; to weare a fword, and not to let foot within the limits of Phoeis, pertaine all to the office and dutie of the captaine generall and chiefe ruler : but to tail of no new fruits before the Autumnall Aequinox be pall; nor to cut and prune a vine but before the Acquinox of the Spring, be intimated and declared unto all by the faid ruler or captaine generall: for those be the verie seasons to do both the one & the other. In like case, it should seeme in my judgement that among the Romans 30 it properly belonged to the prieft; not to mount on horseback; not to be above three nights out of the citic; not to put off his cap, wherupon he was called in the Roman language, Flamen. But there be many other offices and duties, notified and declared unto all men by the priest, among which this is one, not to be enhuiled or anointed abroad in the open aire: For this inaner of anointing drie without the bath, the Romans mightily suspected and were afraid of and even at this day they are of opinion, that there was no fuch cause in the world that brought the Greeks under the yoke of fervitude and bondage, and made them fo tender and effeminate; as their halles and publike places where their yong men wrestled & exercised their bodies naked: as being the meanes that brought into their cities, much losse of time, engendred idlenesses, bred lazie flouth, and ministred occasion & opportunity of lewdnesse and vilany; as namely, to make 40 love unto faire boies, and to spoile and marre the bodies of young men with sleeping, with walking at a certaine measure, with stirring according to motions, keeping artificiall compasse, and with observing rules of exquitit dier. Through which fashions, they see not, how (erethey beawate) they be fallen from exercifes of armes, and have cleane forgotten all militarie difcipline: loving rather to be held and efteemed good wreftlers, fine dauncers, conceited pleafants, and faire minions, than hardie footmen, or valiant men of armes. And verely it is an hard matter to avoid and decline these inconveniences, for them that use to discover their bodies naked before all the world in the broad aire : but those who annoint themselves closely within doores, and looke to their bodies at home are neither faultie nor offenfive.

What is the reason that the auntient coine and mony in old time, caried the stampe of one side of Ianus with two faces: and on the other fide the prower the poope of a boat engraved therein.

As it not as many men do fay, for to honour the memorie of Saturne, who passed into Italy by water in fuch a veffell? But a man may fay thus much as well of many ciners; for Janus, Evander, and Meneus, came thither likewife by fea; and therefore a man may peradventure gesse with better reason; that whereas some things serve as goodly ornaments for cities, others as necessarie implements: among those which are decent and seemely ornaments. the principall is good government and discipline, and among such as be necessary, is reckoned, plentic and abundance of victuals: now for that Janus instituted good government, inordeining hollome lawes, and reducing their manner of life to civilitie, which before was rude and brutilh, and for that the river being navigable, furnished them with store of all necessary commodities, whereby some were brought thither by sea, others from the land; the coine caried for the marke of a law-giver, the head with two faces, like as we have alteady faid, because of that change of life which he brought in; and of the river, a ferrie boate or barge: and yet to there was another kinde of money currant among them, which had the figure portraied upon it, of a beefe, of a sheepe, and of a swine; for that their riches they raised especially from such cattle, and all their wealth and substance confisted in them. And heereupon it comment, that many of their auncient names, were Ovily, Bubulci and Pore ; that is to fay, Sheepe-reeves, and Neat-herds, and Swineherds according as Fenestella doth report.

What is the cause that they make the temple of Saturne, the chamber of the cive, for to keepe therein the publicke treasure of gold and silver: as also their arches, for the custodic of all their writings, rolles, contracts and evidences what soever.

S it by occasion of that opinion so commonly received, and the speech so universally cur-I rantin every mans mouth, that during the raigne of Saturne, there was no avarice nor injuflicein the world; but loialtie, truth, faith, and righteoufneffe caried the whole fway among

Or for that he was the god who found out fruits, brought in agriculture, and taught husbandry first; for the hooke or fickle in his hand fignifieth so much, and not as Antimachus wrote, following therein and beleeving Hesiodus:

Rough Saturne with his hairy skinne, against all law and right, of Aemons fonne, fir Ouranus, or Coelus sometime hight, Those privy members which him gat, with booke a-flant off-cut. And then anon in fathers place of reigne, himselfe did put. Now the abundance of the fruits which the earth yeeldeth, and the vent or disposition of them, is the very mother that bringeth foorth plentie of monie: and therefore it is that this same god they make the author and mainteiner of their felicitie: in testimonic whereof, those affemblies which are holden every minth day in the comon place of the city, called Nundine, that is to fay, 40 Faires or markets, they efteeme confecrated to Saturne : for the store & foilon of fruits is that which openeth the trade & comerce of buying and felling. Or, because these reasons seeme to be very antique; what and if we fay that the first man who made (of Saturns temple at Rome) the treasurie or chamber of the citie, was Valerius Poplicola, after that the kings were driven out of Rome, and it feemeth to stand to good reason that he made choise thereof, because he thought it a fafe and secure place, eminent and conspicuous in all menseies, and by consequence hard to be furprised and forced.

43 What is the cause that those who come as embassadours to Rome, from any parts what seever, go first into the temple of Saturne, and there before the Questors or Treasurers of the citie, enter their names in their registers.

S it for that Saturne himfelfe was a stranger in Italy, and therefore all strangers are welcome 1 unto him?

Or may not this question be solved by the reading of histories? for in old time these Queflors or publick Treasurers, were wont to fend onto embassadors certeine presents, which were called Lautia: and if it fortuned that fuch embaffadors were ficke, they tooke the charge of them for their cure; and if they chanced to die, they enterred them likewife at the cities char-Dddd

ges. But now in respect of the great resort of embassadors from out of all countries, they have cut off this expense: howbeit the auncient custome yet remaineth, namely, to present themselves to the said officers of the treasure, and to be registred in their booke.

44 Why it is not lawfull for Jupiters priest to sureare?

S it because an oth ministred unto free borne men, is as it were the racke and torture tendred unto them? for certeine it is, that the foule as well as the bodie of the prieft, ought to continue free, and not be forced by any torture what foever.

Or, for that it is not meet to distrust or discredit him in small matters, who is beleeved in great and divine things?

Or rather because every oth endeth with the detestation and malediction of perjurie: and confidering that all maledictions be odious and abominable; therefore it is not thought good that any other priefts whatfoever, should curfe or pronounce any malediction: and in this respect was the priestresse of Minerva in Athens highly commended, for that she would never curse Aleibiades, notwithstanding the people commanded her so to doe: For I am (quoth the) ordeined a priestresse to pray formen, and not to curse them.

Or last of all, was it because the perill of perjurie would reach in common to the whole common wealth, if a wicked, godleffe and for fworne person, should have the charge and super- 20 intendance of the praiers, vowes, and factifices made in the behalfe of the citie.

45 What uthereason that upon the festivall day in the honour of Venus, which solemnitie they call Veneralia, they use to power foorth a great quantitie of wine out of the temple of Venus.

Sit as some say upon this occasion, that Mezentius sometime captaine generall of the Tuscans, sent certeine embassadors unto Aeneas, with commission to offer peace unto him, upon this condition, that he might receive all the wine of that * yeeres vintage. But when Acreas refused so to doe, Mezentius (for to encourage his souldiers the Tuskans to fight man- 30 fully) promifed to bestow wine upon them when he had woon the field : but Aene as understanding of this promife of his, confectated and dedicated all the faid wine unto the gods: and in tructh, when he had obteined the victorie, all the wine of that yeere, when it was gotten and gathered together, he powred forth before the temple of Venus.

Or, what if one should say, that this doth symbolize thus much: That men ought to be sober upon festivall daies, and not to celebrate such solemnities with drunkennesse; as if the gods take more pleasure to see them shed wine upon the ground, than to powre overmuch thereof downe their throats?

What is the cause that in ancient time they keps the temple of the goddesse Hotta, open alwaies. 40

Whether was it (as Intiffim Labeo hath left in writing) for that, feeing Hortars in the Latine tongue fignifieth to incite and exhort, they thought that the goddeffe called Horta, which stirreth and provoketh men unto the enterprise and execution of good exploits, ought to be evermore in action, not to make delaies, nor to be shut up and locked within dores, neyet to fit still and do nothing?

Or rather, because as they name her now a daies Hora, with the former syllable long, who is a certeine industrious, vigilant and busic goddesse, carefull in many things: therefore being as the is, to circumfpect and to watchfull, they thought the thould be never idle, nor rechleffe of

Or els, this name Hora (as many others belides) is a meere Greeke word, and fignifieth a deimens affaires. tie or divine power, that hath an eie to overlooke, to view and controll all things; and therefore fince the never fleepeth, nor laieth her eies together, but is alwaies broad awake, thererfore her church or chapel was alwaies standing open. But if it be fo as Labeo faith, that this word Hora is rightly derived of the Greeke verbe span or meenum, which figuifieth to incite or provoke; confider better, whether this word Orator also, that is to say, one who stirrith up, exhorteth, encourageth, and adviseth the people, as a prompt and ready counseller, be not derived likewise in the same fort, and not of according that is to fay, praier and supplication, as some would have it.

Wherefore founded Romulus the temple of Vulcane without the citie of Rome?

TS it for the jealousie (which as fables do report) Vulcane had of Mars, because of his wife Venus: and so Romulus being reputed the sonne of Mars, would not youch safe him to inhabit and dwell in the fame citie with him? or is this a meere foolerie and fenfeleffe conceit?

But this temple was built at the first, to be a chamber and parlour of privile counsell for him and Tatim who reigned with him; to the end that meeting and fitting there in confultation together with the Senatours, in a place remote from all troubles and hinderances, they might deliberate as touching the affaires of State with case and quietnesse.

Or rather, because Rome from the very first foundation was subject to fire by casualtie, hee thought good to honour this god of fire in some fort, but yet to place him without the walles of

What is the reason, that upon their festivall day called Consualia, they adorned with garlands of slowers as well their assessments as horses, and gave them rest and repose for the time?

TS it for that this folemnitie was holden in the honour of Neptune furnamed Equastris, that is Lto fay, the horfeman? and the affe hath his part of this joyfull feaft, for the horfes fake?

Or, because that after navigation and transporting of commodities by sea was now found out and showed to the world, there grew by that meanes (in some fort) better rest and more case to poore labouring beafts of draught and carriage.

How commethit to paffe, that those who stood for any office and magistracie, were woont by an old custome (as Cato hath written) to present themselves unto the people in a single robe or loose gowne, without any coat at allunder it?

As it for feare left they should carrie under their robes any money in their bosomes, for to corrupt, bribe, and buy (as it were) the voices and suffrages of the people?

Or was it because they deemed men woorthy to be are publicke office and to governe, not by their birth and parentage, by their wealth and riches, ne yet by their flew and outward reputation, burby their wounds and searces to be seene upon their bodies. To the end therefore, that fuch scarres might be better exposed to their fight whom they met or talked withall, they went in this maner downe to the place of election, without inward coats in their plaine gownes.

Or haply, because they would seeme by this nuditie and nakednesse of theirs, in humilitie to 40 debase themselves, the sooner thereby to curry favor, and win the good grace of the commons, even aswell as by taking them by the right hand, by suppliant craving, and by humble submission on their very knees.

What is the cause that the Flamen or priest of Jupiter, when his wife was once dead, used to give up his Priesthood or Sacerdatall dignitie, according as Accius hathrecorded in his historie.

As it for that he who once had wedded a wife, and afterwards buried her, was more infortunate, than he who never had any? for the house of him who hath maried a wise, is entire and perfect, but his house who once had one, and now hath none, is not onely unper-50 feet, but also maimed and lame?

Or might it nother that the priests wife was confectated also to divine service together with her husband; for many rites and ceremonies there were, which he alone could not performe, if his wife were not prefent : and to espoule a new wife immediately upon the decease of the other, were not peradventure possible, nor otherwise would well stand with decent and civill honesty: wherupon neither in times past was it lawful for him, nor at this day as it should seem, is he permitted to pur away his wife: and yet in our age Domitian at the request of one, gave licence so to doe: arthis dissolution and breach of wedlocke, other priests were present and

But haply a man would leffe wonder at this, if ever he knew and understood before, that when one of the Censors died, the other of necessity must likewise quit & resigne up his office. Howbeit, when Livius Drussus was departed this life, his companion in office Aemylius Seasus, would not give over and renounce his place, untill such time as certeine Tribunes of the people, for his contumacie commanded, that he should be had away to prison.

Vhat was thereason that the idols Lares, which otherwise properly be called Præstices, had to the images of a dogge standing hard by them, and the Lares themselves were portrased cladin dogges skinnes?

I S it because this word Presides signifies has much as a person, that is to say, Presidents, or standing before as keepers: and verily such Presidents ought to be good house-keepers, and terrible unto all stangers, like as a dogge is; but gentle and loving to those of the house.

Or rather, that which some of the Romans write is true, like as Chryspppus also the philosopher is of opinion; namely, that there be certeine evill spirits which goe about walking up and downe in the world; and these be the butchers and tormentors that the gods imploy to punish unjust and wicked men: and even so these Larges are held to be maligne spirits, & no better than unjust and wicked men: and even so these Larges are held to be maligne spirits, & no better than unjust and wicked men: and even so these Larges are held to be maligne spirits, & no better than unjust and wirely spirits into ments lives, and prying into their families; which is the cause that they now divels, spiring into ments lives, and a logge they have sitting hard by them, whereby thus much in effect is given to understand, that quicke sented they are; and of great power both to huntout, and also to chastice leud persons.

What is the cause that the Romans sacrifice a dogge unto the goddesse called Genita-Mana, and withall make one praier unto her, that none borne in the house might ever come to good?

I Sit for that this Genita-Mana is counted a Damon or goddeffe that hath the procuration and charge both of the generation and also of the birth of things corruptible? for furely the 30 word implies has much, as a certeine fluxion and generation, or rather a generation fluent or fluxible: and like as the Greeks facrificed unto Proferpina, adog, fo do the Romans unto that Genita, for those who are borne in the house. Secrates also faith, that the Argives facrificed a doggeunto Ilinhya, for the more easie and safe deliverance of child-birth. Furthermore, as toudoggeunto that Praier, that nothing borne within the house might ever proove good, it is not haply ching that Praier, that nothing borne within the house might ever proove good, it is not haply ching that Praier, that nothing borne within the house might ever whelped there; which ought to be, not kinde and gentle, but curst and terrible.

Or peradventure, for that they * that die (after an elegant maner of speech) be named Good or quiet: under these words they covertly pray, that none borne in the house might die. And this need not to seeme a strange kinde of speech; for Arisforle writeth, that in a certeine treatie of peace betweene the Arcadians & Lacedemonians, this stricte was comprised in the capitulations: That they should make none of the Tegeates, Good, for the aid they sent, or favour that they bare unto the Lacedamonians; by which was meant, that they should put none of them to death.

What is the reason, that in a solemne procession exhibited at the Capitoline plaies, they proclame (even at this day) by the woice of an herald, port-sale of the Sardians t and before all this solemnisse and pompe, there is by way of mockeric and to make a langthing slocke an oldeman led in a shew, with a sewell or brooch pendant about his necke; such as noble mens children are woont to weare, and

Is it for that the Veientians, who in times past being a puissant State in Tuscane, made ware a long time with Romalus: whose citie being the last that he woonne by force, he made sale of many prisoners and captives, together with their king, mocking him for his supplicate and groff-follie. Now for that the Tuscans in ancient time were descended from the Lydians, and the capitall citie of Lydia is Sardis, therefore they proclamed the sale of the Veientian prisoners the capitall citie of Lydia is Sardis, therefore they proclamed the sale of the Veientian prisoners under the name of the Sardians; and even to this day in scorne and mockerie, they reteine still the same custome.

54 Whence came it, that they call the shambles or buscherie at Rome where slesh is to be solde, Macellum?

Sit for that this word Macellum, by corruption of language is derived of Majoress, that in the Greeke tongue fignifieth a cooke? like as many other words by usage and custome are come to be received; for the letter C. hash great affinitie with G. in the Romane tongue: and long it was set they had the use of G. which letter Sparius Carbillus first invented. Moreover, they that masse and tammer in their speech, pronounce ordinarily L. in stead of R.

Or this question may be resolved better by the knowledge of the Romane historie: for we reade therein, that there was sometime a violent person and a notorious thiese at Rome, named Macellus, who after he had committed many outrages and robberies, was with much ado in the end taken and punished: and of his goods which were sorfeit to the State, there was built a publike shambles or market place to sell sless means in, which of his name was called Macellum.

$5 Why upon the Ides of Januarie, the minstress at Rome who plaied upon the hautboies, were permitted to goe up and downethe city disguised in womens apparell?

Rose this fashion upon that occasion which is reported? namely, that king Numa had A granted unto them many immunities and honorable priviledges in his time, for the great devotion that hee had in the service of the gods? and for that afterwards, the Tribunes militarie who governed the citie in Confular authority, tooke the same from them, they went their way discontented, and departed quite from the citie of Rome: but soone after, the people had a miffe of them, and befides, the priefts made it a matter of confcience, for that in all the facrifices thorowout the citie, there was no found of flute or hauthoies. Now when they would not returne againe (being fent for) but made their abode in the citie Tibur; there was a certeine afranchifed bondflave who fecretly undertooke unto the magistrates, to finde some meanes for to fetch them home. So he cauled a fumptuous feaft to be made, as if he meant to celebrate fome 30 folemne facrifice, and invited to it the pipers and plaiers of the hauthoies aforefaid; and at this feafthe tooke order there should be divers women also; and all night long there was nothing but piping, playing, finging and dancing : but all of a fudden this matter of the feast caused a rumor to be raifed, that his lord and mafter was come to take him in the maner; whereupon making femblant that he was much troubled and affrighted, he perswaded the minstrels to mount with all speed into close coatches, covered all over with skinnes, and so to be carried to Tibur. But this was a deceitfull practife of his; for he caused the coatches to be turned about another way, and unawares to them; who partly for the darkenesse of the night, and in part because they were drowlie and the wine in their heads, tooke no heed of the way, he brought all to Rome betimes in the morning by the breake of day, difguifed as they were, many of them in light co-40 loured gownes like women, which (for that they had over-watched and over-drunke themselves) they had put on, and knew not therof. Then being (by the magistrates) overcome with faire words, and reconciled agains to the citie, they held ever after this cultome every yeere upon fuch a day: To go up and downe the citie thus foolifhly difguifed.

56 What is the reason, that is is commonly received, that certein matrons of the city at the first sounded and built the temple of Casmenta, and to this day honour it highly with great reverence?

For it is faid, that upon a time the Senathad forbidden the dames and wives of the city to to define coatches: whereupon they tooke fuch a flomacke and were fodefpighteous, that to be revenged of their husbands, they confpired altogether not to conceive or be with child by them, nor to bring them any more babes: and in this minde they perfifted fill, untill their husbands began to bethinke them felves better of the matter, and let them have their will to ride in their coatches againe as before time: and then they began to breed and beare children afresh: and those who foonest conceived and bare most and with greatest ease, founded then the temple of Carmenta. And as I suppose this Carmenta was the mother of Evander, who came with him into Italy; whose right name indeed was Themis, or as some say N isostrata: now for that Dddd g

she rendred propheticall answeres and oracles in verse, the Latins surnamed her Carmenta; for verses in their tongue they call Carmina. Others are of opinion; that Carmenta was one of the Destinies, which is the cause that such matrons and mothers sacrifice unto her. And the Etymologic of this name Carmenta, is as much as Carens mente, that is to say, besside her right wits or bestraught, by teason that her senses were so ravished and transported: so that her verses gave her not the name Carmenta, but contrativise; her verses were called Carmina of her, because when she was thus ravished and caried beside herselfe, she chanted certeine oracles and prophesies in verse.

What is the cause that the women who sacrifice unto the goddesse Rumina, doe power and cast store 10 of milke upon their sacrifice, but no wine at all do they bring thisher for to be drunke?

Is it, for that the Latins in their tongue call a pap, Ruma? And well it may fobe, for that the wilde figge tree neere unto which the she wolfegave such with her teats unto Romulus, was in that respect called Ficus Ruminalis. Like as therefore we name in our Greeke language those milch nourfes that suckleyoong infants at their brests, Thelona, being a word derived of 1 hele, which fignifieth a pap; even so this goddesse Rumina, which is as much to say, as Nurse, and one that taketh the care and charge of nourithing and rearing up of infants, admitted hor in her sacrifices any wine; for that it is hursfull to the nouriture of little babes and sucklings.

What is thereason that of the Romane Senatours , some are called simply, Patres; others with an addition. Patres conscripti?

Sit for that they first, who were instituted and ordeined by Romulus, were named Patres & Patriti, that is to say, Gentlemen or Nobly borne, such as we in Greece, tearme Eupatrides?

Or rather they were so called, because they could avouch and shew their fathers; but such as were adjoined afterwards by way of supply, and enrolled out of the Commoners houses, were Patres conscripti, thereupon?

Wherefore was there one altar common to Hercules and the Muses?

Ay it not be, for that Hercules taught Evander the letters, according as Juba writeth? Certes, in those daies it was accounted an honourable office for men to teach their kindefolke and friends to spell letters, and to reade. For a long time after it, and but of late daies it was, that they began to teach for hire and for money: and the first that ever was knowen to keepea publicke schoole for reading, was one named Sparius Carbilius, the freed servant of that Carbilius who first put away his wife.

What is the reason, that there being two aliars dedicated unto Hercules, women are not partakers of the greater, nor task one whit of that which is offered or sacrificed thereupon? 4

Is it, because as the report goes Carmenta came not soone enough to be affishant unto the sacrifice: no more did the samily of the Pinarÿ, whereupon they tooke that name? for in regard that they came tardie, admitted they were not to the seast with others who made good cheere; and therefore got the name Pinarÿ, as if one would say, pined or samished?

Or rather it may allude unto the tale that goeth of the Thirt empoisoned with the blood of Neffus the Centaure, which ladie Deianira gave unto Hercules.

How commeth it to pssse, that it is expressly forbudden at Rome, either to name or to demaund 50 ought as touching the Tutelar god, who hath in parsicular recommendation and patronage, the safetie and preservation of the citie of Rome: nor so much as to enquire whether the said dettie be male or semale? And verely this prohibition proceedes by from a superstitious seare that they have; for that they say that Valerius Soranus died an ill death, because he presumed to utter and publish so much.

Is it in regard of a certaine reason that some latin historians do alledge; namely, that there becertaine evocations and enchantings of the gods by spels and charmes, through the power whereof wherof they are of opinion, that they might be able to call forth and draw away the Tutelar gods of their enemies, and to cause them to come and dwell with them: and therefore the Romans be assaud they may do as much for them? For, like as in times past the Tyrians, as we find upon record, when their citie was besieged, enchained the images of their gods to their shrines, for seare they would abandon their citieand be gone; and as others demanded pledges and surfices that they should come againe to their place, whensoever they sent them to any bath to be washed, or let them go to any expiation to be clensed; even so the Romans thought, that to be altogether unknowen and not once named, was the best meanes, and surest way to keepe with their Tutelar god.

Theearth to men all, is common great and small:

That thereby men should worship all the gods, and honour the earth; seeing she is common to them all: even so the ancient Romans have concealed and suppresse the god or angell which hath the particular gard of their citie, to the end that their citizens should adore, not him alone but all others likewise.

What is the cause that among those priests whom shey name Faciales, signifying an much as in gecke eighwording that is to say, Officers going between to make treatic of peaces or and aboven, that is to say, Agents for truce and leagues, he whom they call Pater Patratus is the swhose this spill Patra Patratus is he, whose father is yet living, who hath children of his owne: and in truth this chiefe Facial or Herault has still at this day acertain prevocative, or speciall readis above the rest. For the emperous shemselves, and general captains, if they have any persons about them who in regard of the prime of youth, or of their beautifull bodies had need of a faithfull, diligent, and trustic guard, commit them ordinarily into the hands of such as these, for safe custodie.

IS it not, for that these Patres Patrais, for reverent searce of their fathers of one side, and for modes of seandalize or offend their children on the other side, are ensorted to be wise and distress?

Or may it not be, in regard of that cause which their verie denomination doth minister and declare: for this word PATRATUS signifieth as much as compleat, entire and accomplished, as if he were one more perfect and absolute every way than the rest, as being so happie, as to have his ownefather living, and be a father also himselfe.

Or is it not, for that the man who hath the superintendance of treaties of peace, and of othes, ought to see as Homer saith, the superintendance of treaties of peace, and of othes, ought to see as Homer saith, that is to say, before and behind. And in all reason such an one is he like to be, who hath a child for whom, and a father with whom he may consult.

What is the reason, that the officer at Rome called Rex factorum, that is to say, the king of factifices, is debarted both from exercising any magistracie, and also to make a speech unto the people in publike place?

Is it for that in old time, the kings themselves in person personmed the most part of sacred rites, and those that were greater, yea and together with the priests offered sacrifices; but by reason that they grew insolent, proud, and atrogant, so as they became intollerable, most of the Greeke nations, deprived them of this authoritie, and left unto them the preheminence onely to offer publike facrifice unto the gods: but the Romans having cleane chased and expelled their so kings, established in their stead another under officer whom they called King, unto whom they granted the oversight and charge of facrifices onely, but permitted him not to exercise or execute any office of State, not to intermedle in publick affaires; to the end it should be knowen to the whole world, that they would not suffer any person to raigne at Rome, but onely over the ceremonies of facrifices, nor endure the veriename of Roialtie, but in respect of the gods. And to this purpose upon the verie common place neere unto Comition; they use to have a solemn facrifice for the good estate of the citie; which so so one as ever this king hath personned, he taketh his legs and runnes out of the place, as fast as ever he can.

Why suffer not they the table to be taken cleane away, and woided quite, but will have somewhat alwaies remaining upon it?

Nee they not hecreby covertly to understand, that wee ought of that which is present to I referve evermore fomething for the time to come, and on this day to remember the

Or thought they it not a point of civill honesty and elegance, to represse and keepe downe their appetite when they have before them enough still to content and satisfie it to the full; for leffe will they defire that which they have not, when they accustome themselves to absteine from that which they have.

Or is not this a custome of courtesie and humanitie to their domesticall servants, who are not fo well pleafed to take their victuals fimply, as to partake the fame, supposing that by this meanes in some fort they doe participate with their masters at the table.

Or rather is it not, because we ought to fuffer no facred thing to be emptie; and the boord you wot well is held facred.

What is thereason that the Bridegrome comment the first time to lie with his new wedded bride, not with any light but in the darke?

S it because he is yet abashed, as taking her to be a stranger and not his owne, before he hath companied carnally with her?

Or for that he would then acquaint himselfe, to come even unto his owne espoused wife with

Thamefacednesse and modestie? Or rather, like as Solon in his Statutes ordeined, that the new maried wife should eat of a quince before the enter into the bride bed-chamber, to the end that this first encounter and embracing, should not be odious or unpleasant to her husband? even so the Romane lawgiver would hide in the obscuritie of darkenesse, the deformities and imperfections in the person of the bride, if there were any. Or haply this was inflituted to flew how finfull and damnable all unlawfull companie of man and woman together is seeing that which is lawfull and allowed, is not without some ble-30

Why is one of the races where horses use to runne, called the Cirque or Flaminius.

IS it for that in old time an ancient Romane named Flaminius gave unto the citie, a certeine piece of ground, they emploied the rent and revenues thereof in runnings of horses, and chariots: and for that there was a furpluffage remaining of the faid lands, they bestowed the same in paying that high way or causey, called Via Flaminia, that is to say, Flaminia streets

67 Why are the Sergeants or officers who carie the knitches of rods before the magistrates of 40 Rome, called Lictores.

Sit because these were they who bound malefactors, and who followed after Romulus, as his I guard, with cords and leather thongs about them in their bosomes? And verily the common people of Rome when they would fay to binde or tie fast, use the word Alligare, and such as speake more pure and proper Latin, Ligare.

Or is it, for that now the letter C is interjected within this word, which before time was Literes, as one would say Activity, that is to say, officers of publike charge; for no man there is in a maner, ignorant, that even at this day in many cities of Greece, the common-wealth or publicke flate is written in their lawes by the name of Affron.

Wherefore doe the Luperci at Rome facrifice a Dogge? Now these Luperci arecerteine persons who upon a festivall day called Lupercalia, runne through the citie all naked, Saveshat they have apronsonely before their privy parts, earying leather whippes in their hands, wherewith they flappe and scourge whom soever they meet in the streets.

S all this ceremoniall action of theirs a purification of the citie? whereupon they call the I moneth wherein this is done Februarius, yea, and the very day it felfe Febraten, like as the maner of squitching with a leather scourge Februare, which verbe signifieth as much as to purge or purifie?

And verily the Greeks, in maner all, were wont in times past, and so they continue even at this day, in all their expiations, to kill a dogge for facrifice. Unto Heeate also they bring foorth among other expiatorie oblations, certeine little dogges or whelpes: fuch also as have neede of clenting and purifying, they wipe and scoure all over with whelpes skinnes, which maner of purification they tearme Perifeplacismos.

Or rather is it for that Lupius lignifieth a woolfe, & Luperealia, or Lyceal is the fealt of wolves: now a dogge naturally, being an enemie to woolves, therefore at fuch feafts they facrificed a 10 dogge. Or peradventure, because dogges barke and bay at these Luperci, troubling and disquieting them as they runne up and downe the city in maner aforefaid.

Or elic last of all, for that this feast and facrifice is solemnized in the honor of god Pan; who as you wot well is pleased well enough with a dogge, in regard of his flocks of goates.

What is the cause that in auncient time, at the feast called Septimontium, they observed precise ly not so use any coaches drawen with seeds, normore than those doe at this day, who are observant of old institutions and doe not despise them. Now this Septimontium is a festivall solemnity, relebrated in memorial of a seventh mountaine, that was adjoined and taken into the pourprise of Rome citie, which by this meanes came to have seven hilles enclosed within the precinct thereof?

Hether was it as some Romans doe imagine, for that the city was not as yet conjunct and composed of all her parts? Or if this may seeme an impertinent conjecture, and nothing to the purpose: may it not be in this respect, that they thought they had atchieved a great piece of worke, when they had thus amplified and enlarged the compaffe of the citic, thinking that now it needed not to proceed any further in greatnesse and capacitie: in consideration whereof, they reposed themselves, and caused likewife their labouring beasts of draught 30 and cariage to reft, whose helpe they had used in finishing of the said enclosure, willing that they also should enjoy in common with them, the benefit of that solemne feast.

Or else we may suppose by this, how desirous they were that their citizens should solemnize and honour with their personall presence all seasts of the citie, but especially that which was ordained and inflituted for the peopling and augmenting thereof: for which cause they were not permitted upon the day of the dedication, and festival memorial of it, to put any horses in geeres or harneffe for to draw; for that they were not at fuch a time to ride forth of the citie.

Why call they those who are deprehended or taken in thest, pilserie or such like servile trespasses, Furciferos, as one would fay, Fork bearers.

ITS not this also an evident argument of the great diligence and carefull regard that was in their Ancients? For when the mailter of the family had furprifed one of his fervants or flaves, committing a lewd and wicked pranck, he commaunded him to take up and carrie upon his necke betweene his shoulders a forked piece of wood, such as they use to put under the spire of a chatiot or waine, and so to go withall in the open view of the world throughout the street, yea and the parish where he dwelt, to the end that every man from thence forth should take heed of him, This piece of wood wein Greeke call signer, and the Romanes in the Latin tongue Furca, that is so fay, a forked prop or supporter : and therefore he that is forced to carie such an one, is by 50 reproch termed Fureifer.

has I Wherefore, use the Romans to tie a wift of her unto the bornes of kine, and other beefes, that are woont to book and be curst with cheir beads, that by the meanes thereof folke might take heed of them, and looke better to themselves when they come in their way?

Sitnot for that beefes, horles, affes, yea and men become fierce, infolent, and dangerous. Lifthey behighly kept and pampered to the full? according as Sophoeles faid:

Like

Like as the colt or jade doth winse and kick, In case he find his provender to prick: Even so doss thou: for lothy paunch is full Thy cheeks be pust, like to some greedie gull.

And thereupon the Romans gave out, that Marem Crassim caried hey on his horne: for howfoever they would feeme to let flie and carpe at others, who dealt in the affaires of State, and government, yet beware they would how they commersed with him as being a daungerous man, and one who caried a revenging mind to as many as medled with him. Howbeit it was said atterwards againe on the other side, that Casar had plucked the hey from Crassim his horne: for he was the first man that opposed himselse, and made head against him in the management of the Id State, and in one word fet not a straw by him.

11 but was the cause that they thought those priests who observed bird-slight, such as in old sime they called Aruspices, and now a daies Augures, ought to have their lanterns and lamps alwaies open, and not to put any lidor cover over them?

May it not be, that like as the old Pythagorean Philosophers by small matters signified and implied things of great consequence, as namely, when they forbad their disciples to sit upon the measure Chænix; and to stirre fire, or rake the hearth with a sword; seuen so the analysis and to stirre fire, or rake the hearth with a sword; seuen so the analysis of the lampe or lanterne, which symbolizeth in some fort the bodie that containeth our soule. For the soule within resembleth the light, and it behooveth that the intelligent and reasonable part thereof should be alwaies open, evermore intentive and seeing, and at no time enclosed and shut up, norblowen upon by wind. For looke when the winds be alost, sowless in their slight keepe no certaintie, neither can they yeeld affured presages, by reason of their variable and wandering instabilitie; and therefore by this ceremoniall custome they teach those who do divine and foretell by the slight of birds, not to get forth for to take their suspices and observations when the wind is up, but when the aire is still, and so calme, that a man may carie a lanteme 30 open and uncovered.

Why were these Southsaiers or Augures forbiddento go abroad for to observe the flight of birds, in case they had any sore or user upon their bodies?

VV As not this also a figuificant token to put them in minde; that they ought not to deale in the divine service of the gods, nor meddle with holy and sacred things if there were any secret matter that gnawed their minds, or so long as any private ulcer or passion setled in their hearts; slut to be void of sadnesse and griese, to be sound and sincere, and not distracted by any standard private over a second sound and sincere.

Or, because it standeth to good reason; that if it be not lawfull nor allowable for them to offer unto the gods for an oast or facrifice any beast that is scabbed, or hath a fore upon it, nor to take presage by the slight of such birds as are maungic, they ought more strictly and precisely to looke into their owne persons in this behalfe, and not to presume for to observe celestiall prognostications and signes from the gods, unlesse they be themselves pure and stoly, undefield, and not defective in their owne selves: for surely an ulcer seemeth to be in maner of a mutilation and pollution of the bodic.

Why did king Servius Tullus found and build a temple of little Fortune which they called in Latine Brevis fortune, that is to fay, of Short fortune?

As it not thinke you in respect of his owne selfe, who being at the first of assmall and base condition, as being borne of a captive woman, by the favour of Portune grew to so great an estate that he was king of Rome?

Or for that this change in him fleweth rather the might and greatnesse, than the debilitie and smallesse of Fortune. We are to say, that this king Servine desired Fortune; & attributed that the more divine power than any other, as having entituded and imposed her name almost moon upon every action: for not onely he erected temples unto Fortune, by the name of Puiffant, of Diverting ill lucke, of Sweet, Favourable to the first borne and masculine; but also there is one temple besides, of private or proper Fortune; another of Fortune returned; a third of confident Fortune and hoping well; and a fourth of Fortune the virgine. And what should a man reckon up other furnames of hers, seeing there is a temple dedicated (for footh) to glewing Fortune, whom they called pricas; as if we were given thereby to understand, that we are caught by her afarre off, and even tied (as it were) with bird-lime to businesse and affaires.

But confider this moreover, that he having knowen by experience what great power she hath in humane things, how little soever she seeme to be, and how often a small matter in happing 10 or not happing hath given occasion to some, either to misse of great exploits, or to archeive as great enterprishes, whether in this respect, he built not a temple to little Fortune, teaching men thereby to be alwaies studious, carefull and diligent, and not to despise any occurrences how small soever they be.

Il locker they be.

What with eaufethat they never put foorth the light of a lampe, but suffered it to goe out of the owne accord?

As it not (thinke you) uppon a certeine reverent devotion that they bare unto that fire, as being either cousen germaine, or brother unto that inextinguible and immortall fire.

Orrather, was it not for some other secret advertissment, to teach us not to violate or kill any thing whatsoever that hath life, if it hurt not us first; as if fire were a living creature: for need it hath of nourishment and moveth of it selfe: and if a man doe squench it, furely it uttereth a kinde of voice and scricke, as if a man killed it.

Or certeinly this fashion and custome received so usually, sheweth us that we ought not to marre or spoile, either fire or water or any other thing necessarie, after we our selves have done withit, and have had sufficient use thereof, but to suffer it to serve other mens turnes who have need, after that we our selves have no imploiment for it.

Mow commeth it to passe that those who are desended of the most noble and auncient houses of Rome, caried little moones upon their shoes.

Is this (as Caffor faith) a figne of the habitation which is reported to be within the bodic of the moone?

Or for that after death, our spirits and ghosts shall have the moone under them?

Or rather, because this was a marke or badge proper unto those who were reputed most ancient, as were the Arcadians descended from Evander, who upon this occasion were called Proseleni, as one would say, borne before the moone?

Or, because this custome as many others, admonishesh those who are listed up too high, and 40 take so great pride in themselves, of the incertitude and instabilitie of this life, and of humane affaires, even by the example of the moone,

Who at the first doth new and young appeere, Where as before she made no shew at all: And so her light unerasteth faire and elecre, until her face be round and sull wishall: But shen anon she doth begin to fall, And backward wane from all this beautie gay, until ne sine she vanish cleane away.

Or was not this an holfome leffon and influction of obedience, to teach and advife men to 50 obey their superiors, & not to thinke much for to be under others: but like as the moone is willing to give eare (as it were) and apply her selfeto her better, content to be ranged in a second place, and as Parmenides saith,

Having aneie and due regard Alwaies the bright Sun beames toward;

even fo they ought to reft in a fecond degree, to follow after, and be under the conduct and direction of another, who fitteth in the first place, and of his power, authority and honor, in forme measure to enjoy a part.

77 Why think they the yeeres dedicated to Jupicer, and the moneths to Juno?

Ay it not be for that of Gods invisible and who are no otherwise seene but by the eies of Mour understanding : those that reigne as princes be Jupiter and Juno; but of the visible, the Sun and Moone? Now the Sun is he who causeth the yeere, and the Moone maketh the moneth. Neither are we to thinke, that these be onely and simply the figures and images of them: but beleeve we must, that the materiall Sun which we behold, is Jupiter, and this materiall Moone, Juno. And the reason why they call her Juno, (which word is as much to say as yoong or new) is in regarde of the course of the Moone : and otherwhiles they surname her also June-Lucina, that is to fay; light or thining : being of opinion that the helpeth women in travel of child-birth, bike as the Moone doth, according to these verses:

By starres that turne full round in Azur skie: By Moone who helps child births right speedily.

For it seemeth that women at the full of the moone be most easily delivered of childbirth.

78 What is the cause that in observing bird flight, that which is presented on the *left hand is reputed lucky and prosperous?

 $oldsymbol{\mathsf{T}}$ S not this altogether untrue, and are not many men in an errour by ignorance of the equivocation of the word Similtrum, & their maner of Dialect; for that which we in Greeke call 20 detrees, that is to fay, on the auke or left hand, they fay in Latin, Simflrum; and that which figurfieth to permit, or let be, they expresse by the verbe Sinere, and when they will aman to let a thing alone, they say unto him, Sine; whereupon it may feeme that this word Sinistrum is detived. That presigning bird then, which permitteth and suffreth an action to be done, being as it were Simiferion; the vulgar fort suppose (though not aright) to be simifrum, that is to say, on the left hand, and so they tearme it.

Or may it not be rather as Dionysus saith, for that when Assails the sonne of Aeness wanne a field against Mezentus as the two armies stood arranged one affronting the other in battel ray, it thundred on his left hand; and because thereupon he obteined the victory, they deemed even then, that this thunder was a token prefaging good, and for that cause observed it, 30 everafter to to fall out. Others thinke that this prefage and foretoken of good lucke hapned unto Aenera: and verily at the battell of Lendres, the Thebanes began to breake the ranks of their enemies, and to discomfit them with the left wing of their battel, and thereby in the end atchieved a brave victorie; whereupon ever after in all their conflicts, they gave preference and the honour of leading and giving the first charge, to the left wing.

Or rather, is it not as Juba writeth, because that when we looke toward the sunne rising, the North fide is on our left hand, and some will say, that the North is the right side and upper part

But confider I pray you, whether the left hand being the weaker of the twaine, the prefages of the whole world. comming on that fide, doe not fortifie and support the defect of puissance which it hath, and 40 fo make it as it were even and equall to the other? Or rather confidering that earthly and mortall things they supposing to be opposite unto those that be heavenly and immortall, did not imagine consequently, that whatsoever was on the left in regard of us, the gods fent from their right fide.

Wherefore was it lawfull as Rome, when a nobleperforage who sometime hadentred triumphant into the city, was dead, and his corps burnt (as the maner was)in a funerall fire to take pnans mother ery, was ucau, and the property of the city, and thereto strew them, according up the reliques of his bones, to care the same into the city, and there to strew them, according 50 as Pyrrho the Lyparean hath left in writing.

As not this to honour the memorie of the dead? for the like honourable priviledge they had oranged into other inleases. they had graunted unto other valiant warriors and brave captaines; namely, that not onely themselves, but also their posteritie descending lineally from them, might be enterred in their common market place of the city, as for example unto Valerius and Fabricius: and it is faid, that for to continue this prerogative inforce, when any of their posteritie afterwards were departed this life; and their bodies brought into the market place accordingly, the maner was, to put a burning torch under them, and doe no more but presently to take it away againe; by which ceremonie, they reteined still the due honour without envie, and confirmed it onely to be lawfull if they would take the benefit thereof.

What is the cause that when they feasted at the common charges, any generall captaine who made his entrie into the citie with triumph, they never admitted the Confuls to the feast; but that which more in fent unto them before hand meffengers of pur pofe requesting them not to come unto the supper?

As it for that they shought it interest and convenient to yeeld unto the triumpher, both the highest place to fix in and the most could your to drinke out of, as also the honour to be attended upon with a traine home to his houleafter supper? which prerogatives no other might enjoy but the Confuls onely, if they had beene present in the place.

8 r. Why is it that the Tribune of the commons onely, we are th no embrodered purple robe, considering that all other magistrates besides doe weare the same.

S it not, for that they (to speak properly) are no magistrates? for in truth they have no ushers 20 Lor vergers to carie before them the knitches of rods, which are the enfignes of magistracie; neither fit they in the chaire of estate called Sella turulis, to determine causes judicially, or give audience unto the people; norenter into the administration of their office at the beginning of the yeere, as all other magistrates doe: neither are they put downe and deposed after the election of a Dictatour: but whereas the full power and authoritie of all other magistrates of State, he transferreth from them upon himselse: the Tribunes onely of the people continue still, and furcease norto execute their function, as having another place & degree by themselves in the common-weale: and like as forme or atours and lawiers doe hold, that exception in law is no action, confidering it doth cleane contrary to action; for that action intendeth, commenceth, and beginneth a proceffe or fute; but exception or inhibition, diffolveth, undooeth, and abo-30 lisheth the same : semblably, they thinke also, that the Tribunate was an empeachment, inhibition, and restraint of a magistracie, rather than a magistracie it selfe: for all the authority and power of the Tribune, lay in opposing himselfe, and croffing the jurisdiction of other magistrates, and in diminishing or repressing their excessive and licentious power.

Or haply all these reasons and such like, are but words, and devised imaginations to mainteine discourse: but to say a trueth, this Tribuneship having taken originally the first beginning from the common people, is great and mighty in regard that it is popular; and that the Tribunes themselves are not proud nor highly conceited of themselves above others, but equall in apparell, in port, fare, and maner of life, to any other citizens of the common fort: for the dignity of pompe and outward shew, apperteineth to a Confull or a Prætour: as for the 40 Tribune of the people, he ought to be humble and lowly, and as M. Curio was woont to fay; ready to put his hand under every mans foot; not to carie a loftie, grave, and stately countenance, nor to bee hard of accesse, nor strange to be spoken with, or dealt withall by the multitude; but how foever he behave himselfe to others, he ought to the simple and common people, above the rest, for to be affable, gentle, and tractable: and heereupon the maner is, that the dore of his house should never be kept shut, but stand open both day and night, as a safe harbour, fure haven, and place of refuge, for all those who are distressed and in need: and verilie the more submisse that he is in outward appearance, the more groweth hee and encreaseth in puissance; for they repute him as a strong hold for common recourse and retrait, unto al commers, no leffe than an altar or priviledged fanctuarie. Moreover, as touching the honour that

50 he holdeth by his place, they count him holy, facred, and inviolable, infomuch as if he doe but goe foorth of his house abroad into the citie, and walke in the street, * the maner was of all, to * Isospect clense and sanctifie the body, as if it were steined and polluted.

What is thereason that before the Prators, generall Captaines and head Magistrates, there be in the original. caried bundels of roddes, together with batchets or axes fastned unto them?

Sit to fignifie, that the anger of the magistrate ought not to be prompt to execution, nor Lloofe and at libertie?

Or, because that to undoe and unbinde the faid bundels, yeeldeth some time and space for choler to coole, and ire to affwage, which is the cause otherwhiles that they change their mindes, and doe not proceed to punishment?

Now for a fmuch as among the faults that men commit, fome are curable, others remedileffe: the roddes are to reforme those who may be amended; but the hatchets to cut them off who are incorrigible.

What is the cause that the Romanes having intelligence given outo them, that the Bletonesians, a barbarous nation, had facrificed unto their goods; a man; fent for the magifirates peremptority, as intending to pumify them: but after the force under flood, that they had so done 10 according to an ancient law of their countrey, they les them go againe without any hurt done unto them ; charging them onely; that from thence foorth they should not obey fuch a law; and yet they themselves, not many yeeres before had caused for so be buried quicke in the place, called the Beatt Market, two men and two women, that is to fay, two Greekes, and two Gallo-Greekes or Galatians? For this seemeth to be verie absurd, that they themselves should do those things, which they reprodued in others as damnable.

Ay it not be that they judged it an exectable superstition, to factifice a man or woman unto the gods, marie unto divels they held it necessarie?

Or was it not for that they thought those people, who did it by a law or custome, offended 20 highly : but they themselves were directed thereto by expresse commaundement out of the bookes of Sibylla. For reported it is, that one of their votaries or Vestall nunnes named Helbia, riding on horse-backe, was fmitten by a thunderbolt or blast of lightning; and that the horse was found lying along allbare bellied, and her felfelikewise naked, with her smocke and petticote turned up above her privie parts, as if the had done it of purpole: her shooes, her rings, her coife and head attire cast here and there apart from other things, and withall lilling the toong out of her head. This strange occurrent, the soothsayers out of their learning interpreted to fignific, that some great shame did betide the facted virgins, that should be divulged and notorioully knowen; yea, and that the same infame should reach also as far, as unto some of the degree of gentlemen or knights of Rome. Upon this there was a fervant belonging unto a cer- 30 taine Barbarian horseman, who detected three Vestal virgins to have at one time forseited their honor, & been naught of their bodies, to wit, Aemilia, Latinia, & Martia; and that they had companied too familiarly with men a long time; and one of their names was Buretiun, a Barbarian knight, and master to the said enformer. So these vestall Votaties were punished after they had beene convicted by order of law, and found guiltie: but after that this feenied a fearfull and horrible accident; ordeined it was by the Senate, that the priefts should peruse over the bookes of Stbyllacs propheties, wherein were found (by report) those very oracles which denounced and foretold this strange occurrent, and that it portended some great losse and calamitie unto the common wealth: for the avoiding and diverting whereof, they gave commaundement to a bandon unto (I wot not what) maligne and divelifth strange spirits, two Greekes, and two Ga-40 latians likewise; and so by burying them quicke in that verie place, to procure propination at Gods hands.

84. Why began they their day at midnight?

As it not, for that all policie at the first had the beginning of militarie discipline? and in war, and all expeditions the most part of woorthy exploits are enterprised ordinarily in the night before the day appeare?

Or because the execution of desseignes, howsoever it begin at the sunnerising; yet the preparation thereto is made before day-light for there had need to be some preparatives, before a 50 worke betaken in hand; and not at the verie time of execution, according as Asylon (by report) answered unto Chilo, one of the seven sages, when as in the winter time he was making of a van.

Or haply, for that like as we fee, that many men at noone make an end of their bufinesse of great importance, and of State affaires; even fo, they supposed that they were to begin the same at mid night. For better proofe whereof a man may frame an argument hereupon, that the Roman chiefe ruler never made league, nor concluded any capitulations and covenants of peace after mid-day.

Or rather this may be, because it is not possible to set downe determinately, the beginning and end of the day, by the rifing and fetting of the funne: for if we do as the vulgar fort, who diffinguish day and night by the fight and view of eie, taking the day then to begin when the funne arifeth; and the night likewife to begin when the funne is gone downe, and hidden under our horizon, we shall never have the just Acquinox, that is to say, the day and night equal ! for even that verie night which we finall effeeme most equall to the day, will proove shorter than the day, by as much as the body or bigneffe of the funne containeth. Againe, if we doe as the Mathematicians, who to remedie this abfurditie and inconvenience, fet downe the confines and limits of day and night, at the verie inftant point when the funne feemeth to touch the circle of 10 the horizon with his center; this were to overthrow all evidence : for fall our it will, that while there is a great part of the funnes light yet under the earth(although the funne do fhine upon us) we will not confesse that it is day, but fay, that it is night still. Seeing then it is so hard a matter to make the beginning of day and night, at the riting or going downe of the funne, for the abfurdities abovefaid, it remaineth that of necessitie we take the beginning of the day to be, when the funne is in the mids of the heaven above head, or under our feet, that is to fay, either noon-tide or mid-night. But of twaine, better it is to begin when he is in the middle point under us, which is just midnight, for that he returneth then toward us into the East; whereas contrariwise after mid day he goeth from us Westward.

What was the cause that in times past they would not suffer their wives, either to grinde corne, or to lay their hands to dreffe meat in the kitchin?

VAs it in memoriall of that accord and league which they made with the Sabines? for after that they had ravished & carried away their daughters, there arose sharpe warres betweene them: but peace enfued thereupon in the end; in the capitulations whereof, this one article was expresly fet downe, that the Roman husband might not force his wife, either to turne the querne for to grinde corne, nor to exercise any point of cookerie.

Why did not the Romans marie in the moneth of May?

IS it for that it commeth betweene Aprill and June? wherereof the one is confecrated unto Lenus, and the other to Juno, who are both of them the goddesses which have the care and charge of wedding and marriages, and therefore thinke it good either to go somewhat before, or elie to flay a while after.

Or it may be that in this moneth they celebrate the greatest expiatorie facrifice of all others in the yeere? for even at this day they fling from off the bridge into the river, the images and pourtraitures of men, whereas in old time they threw downe men themselves alive? And this is the reason of the custome now a daies, that the priestresse of June named Flamma, should be al-40 waies fad and heavie, as it were a mourner, and never wash nor dresse and trim her selfe.

Or what and if we say, it is because many of the Latine nations offered oblations unto the dead in this moneth: and peradventure they do fo, because in this verie moneth they worship

Mercurie: and in truth it beareth the name of Maja, Mercuries mother.

But may it not be rather, for that as some do say, this moneth taketh that name of Majores, that isto fay, ancients: like as June is termed fo of Juniores, that is to fay yonkers. Now this is certaine that youth is much meeter for to contract marriage than old age : like as Euripides faith

As for old age it Venus bids farewell, and with old folke, Venus is not pleased well.

The Romans therefore maried not in May, but stated for June which immediatly followeth after May.

What is the reason that they divide and part the haire of the new brides bead, with the point of

S not this a verie figne, that the first wives whom the Romans espoused, were compelled to Amariage, and conquered by force and armes.

Or are not their wives hereby given to understand, that they are espoused to husbands, martiall men and foldiers; and therefore they should lay away all delicate, wanton, and costly imbelishment of the bodie, and acquaint themselves with simple and plaine attire; like as Lycurgus for the same reason would that the dores, windowes, and roofes of houses should be framed with the faw and the axe onely, without use of any other toole or instrument, intending thereby to chase out of the common-weale all curiositie and wastfull superfluitie.

Or doth not this parting of the haires, give covertly to understand, a division and separation, as if mariage & the bond of wedlock, were not to be broken but by the sword and warlike force?

Or may not this fignific thus much, that they referred the most part of ceremonies concerning mariage unto Juno, now it is plaine that the javelin is confecrated unto Juno, infomuch as 10 most part of her images and statues are portraied resting and leaning upon a launce or javelin, And for this cause the goddesse is surnamed Quiritis, for they called in old time a speare Quiris, upon which occasion Mars also (as they say) is named Quiru. v Salidoja

What is the reason that the monie emploied upon plaies and publike shewes is called among them,

Ay it not well be that there were many groves about the citie confectated unto the gods, Mwhich they named Lucos: the revenues whereof they bestowed upon the setting forthof 20 fuch folemnities?

Why call they Quirinalia, the Feast of fooles?

Hether is it because (as Juba writeth) they attribute this day unto those who knew not Hetner is it because as Juve mitted, in the last have not facrificed, as others have done ac-their ownellinage and tribe? or unto fuch as have not facrificed, as others have done according to their tribes, at the feast called Fornacalia. Were it that they were hindred by other affaires, or had occasion to be forth of the citie, or were altogether ignorant, and therefore this day was affigned for them, to performe the faid feaft.

What is the cause, that when they sacrifice unto Hercules, they name no other Godbut him, nor suffer a dog to be seene, within the purprise and present of the place where the sacrifice is 30 celebrated, according as Varro hath left in writing ?

IS not this the reason of naming no god in their factifice, for that they esteeme him but a demigod; and fome there be who hold, that whiles he lived heere upon the earth, Evander crected an altar unto him, and offered sacrifice thereupon. Now of all other beafts he could worst abide a dog, and hated him most: for this creature put him to more trouble all his life time, than any other: witnesse hereof, the three headed dog Cerberus, and above all others, when Oconus the fonne of Licymmus was flaine * by a dog, he was enforced by the Hippocoontides to give the battell, in which heloftmany of his friends, and among the rest his owne brother

Ight it not be in regard of M. Manlius, who dwelling there attempted and plotted to Capitoll? Mbeking of Rome, and to usurpe tyrannie; in hatred and detestation of whom, it is faid, that everafter those of the house of Manly, might not have Marcus for their fore-name?

Or rather was not this an old feare that the Romans had (time out of mind)? For albeit Palerius Poplicola was a personage verie popular and well affected unto the common people; yet never ceased the great and mightie men of the citie to suspect and traduce him, nor the meane commoners and multitude to feare him, untill fuch time as himfelfe caufed his owne house to be de-50 molithed and pulled down, because it seemed to overlooke and commaund the common market place of the citie.

Or rather, because this maner of garland is dedicated unto Jupiter and Juno, who are reputed protectors of cities?

Or might not this be an ancient custome proceeding from the Arcadians, who have a kind of confanguinitie with oakes, for that they report of themselves, that they were the first men that iffued out of the earth, like as the oake of all other trees.

Why observe they the Vultures or Geirs, most of any other fowles, intaking of presages by

S it not because at the foundation of Rome, there appeared twelve of them unto Romulus? Or because, this is no ordinarie bird nor familiar; for it is not so easie a matter to meete with an airie of Vultures; but all on a fudden they come out of some strange countrey, and therefore the fight of them doth prognosticke and presage much.

Orelie haply the Romains learned this of Hercules, if that betrue which Herodotsus reporteth: namely, that Hereules tooke great contentment, when in the enterprise of any exploit of his, there appeared Vultures unto him: for that he was of opinion, that the Vulture of all birds of prey was the justest: for first and formost never toucheth he ought that hath life, neither killeth hee any living creature, like as eagles, falcons, hauks, and other fowles do, that prey by 20 night, but feedeth upon dead carrions: over and besides, he forbeareth to set upon his owne kind: for never was there man yet who faw a Vulture eat the flesh of any fowle, like as eagles and other birds of prey do, which chase, pursue and plucke in pieces those especially of the same kind, to wit, other fowle. And verily as Aefchylus the poet writeth:

How can that bird, which bird doth eat,

Be counted cleanly, pure and neat. And as for men, it is the most innocent bird, and doth least hurt unto them of all other; for it destroieth no fruit nor plant what soever, neither doth it harme to any tame creature. And if the tale betrue that the Aegyptians doe tell, that all the kinde of these birds be semales; that they conceive and be with yoong, by receiving the East-wind blowing upon them, like as some trees 30 by the Western wind, it is verie profitable that the fignes and prognosticks drawen from them. be more fure and certaine, than from any others, confidering that of all, befides their violence in treading and breeding time; their eagernefle in flight when they purfue their prey; their flying away from some, and chasing of others, must needs cause much trouble and uncertaintie in their prognostications.

Why stands the temple of Aesculapius without the citie of Rome?

TS it because they thought the abode without the citie more holesome, than that within ? For Lin this regard the Greekes ordinarily built the temples of Aefculapius upon high ground, 40 wherein the aire is more pure and cleere.

Or in this respect s that this god Aesculapium was sent for out of the citie Epidaurus. And true it is that the Epidaurians founded his temple; not within the walles of their city, but a good

Or lastly, for that the serpent when it was landed out of the galley in the Isle, and then vanifhed out of fight, feeined thereby to tell them where he would that they should build the place of his abode.

95 Why doth the law forbid them that are to live chaste, the eating of pulse?

As Stouching beanes, is it not in respect of those very reasons for which it is said: That the Pythagoreans counted them abominable? And as for the richling and rich pease, whereof the one in Greeke is called Address, and the other in sursor, which words feeme to be derived of Erebue, that fignifieth the darkneffe of hell, and of Lethe, which is as much as oblivion, and one befides of the rivers infernall, it carieth some reason that they should be abhorred therfore. Or it may be, for that the folemne suppers and bankets at funerals for the dead, were usually ferved with pulfe above all other viands. Occather, for that those who are desirous to be chaste, and to live an holy life, ought to keepo their bodies pure and flender; but foit is that pulse be flateous and windy, breeding superfluous excrements in the body, which had need of great purging and evacuation.

Or lastly, because they pricke and provoke the fleshly lust, for that they be full of ventosities.

96 What is the reason that the Romans panish the boly Pestall virgins (who have suffered their bodies to be abused and desiled) by no other meanes, than by interring them quicke under the ground?

S this the cause, for that the maner is to burne the bodies of them that be dead: and to burie (by the meanes of fire) their bodies who have not devoutly and religiously kept or preserved to the divine fire, seemed not just nor reasonable?

Or haply, because they thought it was not lawfull to kill any person who had bene consecrated with the most holy and religious ceremonies in the world; not to lay violent hands upon a woman consecrated: and therefore they devised this invention of suffering them to die of their owne selves; namely, to let them downe into a little vaulted chamber under the earth, where they lest with them a lampe burning, and some bread, with a little water and milke: and having so done, cast earth and covered them alost. And yet for all this, can they not be exempt from a superstitutious seare of them thus interred: for even to this day, the priests going over this place, personne (I wot not what) anniversary services and rites, for to appease and pacific their ghosts,

What is the cause that upon the thirteenth day of December, which in Latine shey call the Ides of December, there is exhibited a game of chariots running for the prize, and the horse drawing on the right hand that winnet he wistorie, is sacrificed and consecrated unto Mars, and at the time thereof, there comes one behinds, that culteth off his taile, which he carrieth immediatly into the temple called Rogia, and therewish imbrueth the alter with blood: and for the head of the said horse, one troupe there is comming out of the street called Via sacra, and another from that which they name Suburta, who encounter and trie out by sight who shall have it?

Ay not the reason be (as some doe alledge) that they have an opinion, how the citie of 30 Troy was sometime woon by the meanes of a woodden horse; and therfore in the memorial thereof, they thus punished a poore horse?

As men from blood of noble Troy defeended, And by the way with Latins iffue blended.

Or because an horse is a couragious, martiall and warlike beast; and ordinarily, menuse to present unto the gods those facrifices which are most agreeable unto them; and fort best with them; and in that respect, they facrifice that horse which wan the prize, unto Mars, because strength and victorie are well besteming him.

This beafet there to ere is punished for running so swift, as if celeratie were the maintenance of cowardise it of give us thereby coversly to understand, that there is no hope of safetie for them who seeke to estape by slight.

What is the reason that the first worke which the Censors go in hand with, when they been falled in the posse shown of their magestracie, is to take order upon a certaine price for the keeping and feeding of the sacred geese, and to cause the painted statues and images of the gods to be refreshed?

Hether is it because they would begin at the smallest things, and those which are of 50 least dispense and difficultie?

Or in commemoration of an ancient benefit received by the meanes of thefecreatures; in the time of the Gaules warre: for that the geefe were they who in the the night feafon deferted the Barbarians as the skaled and mounted the wall that environed the Capitol fort (where as the dogs flept) and with their gagling raifed the watch?

or because, the Cenfors being guardians of the greatest affaires, and having that charge and office which enjoyneth to be vigilant and carefull to preserve religion; to keepe temples and publicke edifices; to looke into the manners and behaviour of men in their order of life; they fet in the first place the consideration and regard of the most watchfull creature that is: and in shewing what care they take of these geese, they incite and provoke by that example their citizens, not to be negligent and retchlesse of holy things. Moreover, for refreshing the colour of those images and statues, it is a necessary piece of worke; for the lively red vermilion; wherewith they were woont in times past to colour the said images, soone sadeth and passet have.

What is the case that among other priests, when one is condemned and banished, they degrade and deprive him of his priesthood, and choose another in his place; onely an Augur, though he be convicted and condemned for the greatest crimes in the world, yet they never deprive in that sort so long as he liveth? Now those priests they call Augurs, who observe the slights of birds, and foreshowed things thereby.

Is it as fome do fay, because they would not have one that is no prices, to know the secret myliteries of their religion and their facted rites?

Or because the Augur being obliged and bound by great oaths, never to reveale the secrets pertaining to religiou, they would not seeme to free and absolve him from his oath by degrading him, and making him a private person.

Or rather, for that this word Augur, is not fo much a name of honor and magistracie, as of are and knowledge. And all one it were, as if they should seeme to disable a musician for being any more a musician; or a physician, that he should bee a physician no longer; or prohibit a prophet or soothsayer; to be a prophet or soothsayer; for even so they, not able to deprive him of his sufficiency, norto take away his skill, although they because him of his name and title, do not subordaine another in his place: and by good reason, because they would keepe the just number of the ancient institution.

What is the reason that upon the thirteenth day of August, which now is called the Ides of August, and before time the Ides of Sextilis, all servants as well maids, as men make holy day and women that are wives love then especially so wash and cleanse their heads?

Ight not this be a cause, for that king Servius upon such a day was borne of a captive woman, and therefore slaves and bond-servants on that day have libertie to play and disport themselves? And as for washing the head; haply at the first the wenches began to to do in regard of that selftivall day, and so the custome passed also unto their mistresses and other women free borne?

40 PEradventure to honor the memorie of those first wives of theirs, whom they ravished: in favour of whom they ordained many other prerogatives for the children which they had by them, and namely this among the rest?

Or it may be for to grade the proweffe of Tarquinius? For reported it is that being but a verie child, in a great battell which was fought against the Latines and Tuskanes together, hee rode into the verie throng of his enemies, and engaged himselfe so farre, that being dismounted and unhoried; yet notwithstanding he mansfully withstood those who hotly charged upon him, and encouraged the Romanes to stand to it; in such fort as the enemies by them were put to plaine slight, with the losse of 6000, men whom they lest dead in the place: and for a reward of this vertue and valour, received such a jewell to hang about his necke, which was given unto 50 him by the king his father.

Or cile, because in old time it was not reputed a shamfull and villanous thing, to love yoong boyes wantonly, for their beauty in the flowre of their age, if they were slaves borne, as the Comedies even at this day do teltifier but they forbate most precisely, to touch any of them who were free-borne or of gentleblood descended. To the end therefore man might not pretend ignorance in such a cale, as if they knew not of what condition any boyes were, if they mette with them naked, they caused them to weare this badge and marke of nobilitie about their necks.

Or peradventure, this might be also as a preservative unto them of their honor, continence and chastitie, as one would lay, a bridle to restraine wantonnesse and incontinencie, as being put in mind thereby to be abathed to play mensparts, before they had laid off the marks and fignes of childhood. For there is no apparance or probabilitie, of that which Paro alledgeth, faying: That because the Acolians in their Dialect do call gon, that is to say, Counsell, gone, therefore fuch children for a figne and prefage of wifedome and good counfell, carried this jewell, which they named Bulla.

But see whether it might not be in regard of the moone that they weare this device? for the figure of the moone when thee is at the full, is not round as a bal or boule, but rather flat in maner of a lentill or refembling a dish or plate; not onely on that side which appeareth unto us, 10 but also (as Empedocles faith) on that part which is under it.

Wherefore gave they fore-names to little infants, if they were boies upon the ninth day after their birth, but if they were girls, when they were eight daies olde?

My there not be a natural reason rendred hereof, that they should impose the names sooner upon daughters than sonnes; for that semales grow apace, are quickly ripe, and come betimes unto their perfection in comparison of males; but as touching those precise daies, they take them that immediatly follow the feventh: for that the feventh day after chil-20 dren be borne is very dangerous, as well for other occasions, as in regard of the navill-string: for that in many it will unknit and be loofe againe upon the seventh day, and so long as it continueth forefolved and open, an infant refembleth a plant rather than any animall creature?

Or like as the Pythagoreans were of opinion, that of numbers the even was female and the odde, male; for that it is generative, and is more strong than the even number, because it is compound : and if a man divide these numbers into unities, the even number sheweth a void place betweene, whereas the odde, hath the middle alwaies fulfilled with one part thereof: even to in this respect they are of opinion, that the even number eight, resembleth rather the semale and the even number nine, the male. Or rather it is because of all numbers, nine is the first square comming of three, which is an 30 odde and perfect number: and eight the first cubick, to wit foure square on every side like a die proceeding from two, an even number: now a man ought to be quadrat odde (as we say) and singular, yea and perfect : and a woman (no leffe than a die) fure and stedfast, a keeper of home, and not casily removed. Hecreunto we must adjoyne thus much more also, that eight is a number cubick, arifing from two as the bale and foot: and nine is a square quadrangle having three for the base: and therefore it seemeth, that where women have two names, men have three.

40.05 3 What is the reason, that those children who have no certeine father, they were woont to tearme

Or we may not thinke as the Greeks holde, and as oratours give out in their pleas, that this word Spurius, is derived of Spora, that is to fay, naturall feed, for that fuch children are begotten by the feed of many men mingled and confounded together. But furely this Spurius, is one of the ordinary fore-names that the Romans take, fisch as Sextw., Decimus, and Caiss. Now these fore-names they never use to write out at full with all their letters, but marke them fometime with one letter alone, as for example, Titus, Lucius, and Marcius, with T, L, M; or with twaine, as Spurius and Cneus, with Sp, and Cn, or at most with three as Sextus & Servius, with Sex. and Ser. Spurius then is one of their fore-names which is noted with two letters S. and P. which fignific almuch, as Sine Patre, that is to fay, without a father; 50 for S. standeth for Sine, that is to lay, without; and P. for patre, that is to say a father. And hecreupon growthe error, for that Sine patre, and Spurisus be written both with the fame letters fhort, Sp. And yet I will not flicke to give you another reason, though it be formwhat fabulous, and carteth a greater abfurdity with it: for footh they fay that the Sabines in olde time named in their language the natute or privities of a woman, Spories: and thereupon afterwards as it were by way of reproch, they called him Sparissa, who had to his mother a woman unmaried and not lawfully espoused. Why

Why is Bacchus called with them, Liber Pater?

Sit for that he is the authour and father of all liberty unto them who have taken their wine well; for most men become audacious and are full of bolde and franke broad speech, when they be drunke or cup-shotten?

Or because heir is that ministred libations first, that is to fay, those effusions and offrings of wine that are given to the gods?

Or rather (as Alexander faid) because the Greeks called Bacchus, Dionysos Eleuthereus, that is 10 to fay, Bacehus the Deliverer: and they might call him fo, of a city in Baotia, named Eleuther a.

Wherefore was it not the custome among the Romans, that maidens should be wedded upon any daies of their publicke feafts; but widdowes might be remarried upon those daies?

As it for that (as Parro faith) virgins be*ill-apaid and heavie when they be first wedded; "Or, feete but such as were wives before, "be glad and joyfull when they marrie againe? And up ding haply on a festivall holiday there should be nothing done with an ill will or upon constraint.

Orrather, because it is for the credit and honour of yong damosels, to be maried in the view Hymenic.
Ortake de 20 of the whole world; but for widowes it is a dishonour and shame unto them, to be seene of mallight & pleany for to be wedded a fecond time: for the first marriage is lovely and defireable; the fecond, fire. odious and abominable: for women, if they proceed to marrie with other men whiles their former husbands be living, are ashamed thereof; and if they be dead, they are in mourning flate of widowhood: and therefore they chuse rather to be married closely and secretly in all filence, than to be accompanied with a long traine and folemnity, and to have much adoe and great stirring at their marriage. Now it is well known that festivall holidaies divert and di-have no leafure to go and fee weddings. Or last of all, because it was a day of publicke solemnitie, when they first ravished the Sabines 30 daughters: an attempt that drew upon them, bloudy warre, and therefore they thought it ominous and prefaging evill, to fuffer their virgins to wed upon fuch holidaies.

ftract the multitude divers waies, fome to this game and pastime, others to that; so as they

Why doe the Romans honour and worship Fortune, by the name of Primigenia, which a man may interpret First begotten or first borne?

Sit for that (as some say) Servine being by chance borne of a maid-servant and a captive, I had Fortune fo favourable unto him, that he reigned nobly and glorioufly, king at Rome? For most Romans are of this opinion.

40 Or rather, because Fortune gave unto the city of Rome her first originall and beginning of so mightie an empire.

Or lieth not herein some deeper cause, which we are to setch out of the secrets of Nature and Philosophie; namely, that Fortune is the principle of all things, infomuch, as Nature confifteth by Fortune; namely, when to some things concurring casually and by chance, there is some order and dispose adjoined.

What is the reason that the Romans call those who act comedies and other theatricall plaies, Hiftriones?

50 TS it for that cause, which as Claudius Rufus hath left in writing ? for he reporteth that many Lyceres ago, and namely, in those daies when Cajus Sulpitius and Licinius Stolo were Confuls; there raigned a great peftilence at Rome, fuch a mortalitie as confumed all the stage plaiers indifferently one with another. Whereupon at their instant praier and request, there repaired out of Tuscane to Rome, many excellent and singular actours in this kinde: among whom, he who was of greatest reputation, and had caried the name longest in all theaters, for his rate gift and dexteritie that way, was called Hiller; of whose name all other afterwards were tearmed Histriones.

Why espoused not the Romans in mariage those women who were neere of kin unto them?

As it because they were desirous to amplific and encrease their alliances, and acquire more kinsfolke, by giving their daughters in mariage to others, and by taking to wife others than their owne kinred?

Or for that they feared in such wedlock the jarres and quarrels of those who be of kin, which are able to extinguish and abolish even the verie lawes and rights of nature?

Or elfe, feeing as they did, how women by reason of their weaknesseand infirmitie stand in need of many helpers, they would not have men to contract marriage, nor dwell in one house to with those who were neere in blood to them, to the end, that if the husband should offer wrong and injurie to his wife, her kinsfolke might fuccour and affift her.

Why is it not tawfull for Jupicers priest, whom they name Flamen Dialisto handleor once

 Γ Ormeale, is it not be because it is an unperfect and raw kind of nourishment? for neither continueth it the same that it was, to wit, wheat, &c. nor is that yet which it should be, namely bread: but hath loft that nature which it had before of feed, and withall hath not gotten 20 the use of food and nourishment. And hereupon it is, that the poet calleth meale(by a Metaphot or borrowed speech) Mylephaton, which is as much to say, as killed and marred by the mill in grinding: and as for leaven, both it felfe is engendred of accreaine corruption of meale, and also corrupteth (in a maner) the whole lumpe of dough, wherin it is mixed: for the faid dough becommeth leffe firme and fast than it was before, it hangeth not together; and in one word the leaven of the passe seemeth to be a verie putrifaction and rottennesse thereof. And verely if there be too much of the leaven put to the dough, it maketh it fo sharpe and source that it cannot be caten, and in verietruth spoileth the meale quite.

S it by this custome to withdraw him farre from eating of raw things? Or is it for the same cause that he abhorresh and detesteth meale? for neither is it any more a living animall, nor come yet to be meat: for by boiling and rofting it groweth to fuch an alteration, as changeth the verie forme thereof: whereas raw flesh and newly killed is neither pure and impolluted to the cie, but hideous to fee to; and befides, it hath(I wot not what) refemblance to an ougly fore or filthic ulcer.

What isthereason that the Romans have expressy commaunded the same priest or Flamen of 40 Jupiter, not onely to touch a dogge or a goat, but not fo much as to name either of them?

O speake of the Goat first, is it not for detestation of his excessive lust and lecherie; and be-I fides for his ranke and filthie favour? or because they are afraid of him, as of a diseased creature and subject to maladies? for furely, there feemeth not to be a beaft in the world so much given to the falling fickneffe, as it is 3 nor infecteth fo foone those that either eate of the flesh or once touch it, when it is surprised with this evill. The cause whereof some say to be the streightnesse of those conduits and passages by which the spirits go and come, which oftentimes happen to be intercepted and stopped. And this they conjecture by the small and slender voice that this beaft hath, & the better to confirme the fame, we do fee ordinarily, that men likewife who be fubject to this malady, grow in the end to have fuch a voice as in some fort resembleth the bledting of goats. Now, for the Dog, true it is haply that he is not so lecherous, nor smelleth altogether fo strong and so ranke as doth the Goat; and yet some there be who say, that a Dog might not be permitted to come within the castle of Ashens, nor to enter into the Isle of Delos because for footh he lineth bitches openly in the fight of everie man, as if bulls, boares, and stalions had their fecret chambers, to do their kind with females, and did not leape and cover them in the broad field and open yard, without being abathed at the matter.

Bur Ignorant they are of the true cause indeed : which is, for that a Dog is by nature fell, and quareflorie, given to arre and warte upon a verie small occasion: in which respect men banish them from fanctuaries, holy churches, and priviledged places, giving thereby unto poore afflicted suppliants free accesse unto them for their safe and sure refuge. And even so verie prohable it is sthat this Flamen or pricht of Jupiter whom they would have to be as an holy, facred, and living image for to flie unto, should be accessible and easie to be approched unto by humble futers, and fuch as stand in need of him, without any thing in the way to empeach, to put backe, or to affright them; which was the cause that he had a little bed or pallet made for him, in the verie perch or entrie of his house; and that servant or slave, who could find meanes to come to and fall downe at his feet, and lay hold on his knees was for that day freed from the whip, and past danger of all other punishment -: say he were a prisoner with irons, and bolts at his feet that could make shift to approach neere unto this priest, he was let loose, and his gives and setters were throwen out of the house, not at the doore, but flung over the verie roofe thereof.

But to what purpose served all this, and what good would this have done, that he should they himselfe so gentle, so affable, and humane, if he had a curst dog about him to keepe his doore, and to affright, chafe and featre all those away who had recourse unto him for succour. And yet fo it is that our ancients reputed not adog to be altogether a clean creature : for first and formost we do not find that he is consecrated or dedicated unto any of the celestial gods; but being fent unto terrestrial & infernall Professiona into the quarrefires and crosse high waies to make 20 her a supper, he seemeth to serve for an expiatorie facrifice to divert and turne away some calamitie, or to cleanfe fome filthie ordere, rather than otherwife: to fay nothing, that in Lacedamon, they cut and flit dogs down along the mids, and so facrifice them to Mars the most bloody god of all others. And the Romanes themselves upon the feast Lupercalia, which they celebrate in the luftrall moneth of Purification, called February, offer up a dog for a facrifice: and therefore it is no abfurditie to thinke, that those who have taken upon them to serve the most soveraigne and pureft god of all others, were not without good cause forbidden to have a dog with them in the hould, nor to be acquainted and familiar with him.

For what cause was not the same priest of Jupiter permitted, either to touch an ivie tree, or to passe thorow a way covered over head with a vine growing to a tree, and freading her branches from it?

Snot this like unto these precepts of Pythagoras: Eat not your meat from a chaire: Sit not upon a measure called Chanix : Neither step thou over a broome or * besoome. For surely * dep. none of the Pythagoreans feared any of these things, or made scruple to doe, as these words in outward thew, and in their litterall sense do preterid but under such speeches they did covertly and figuratively forbid fornewhat else: even so this precept: Go not under a vine, is to be referred unto wine, and implieth this much; that it is not lawfull for the faid Prieft to be drunke; for 40 fuch as over drinke themselves, have the wine above their heads, and under it they are depressed and weighed downe, whereas men and priefts especially ought to be evermore superiors and commanders of this pleasure, and in no wife to be subject unto it. And thus much of the vine.

As for the ivie, is it not for that it is a plant that beareth no fruit, nor any thing good for mans use: and moreover is so weake, as by reason of that feeblenesse it is not able to sustaine it felfe, but had need of other trees to support and beare it up : and besides, with the coole shadow that it yeelds, and the greene leaves alwaies to be feene, it dazeleth, and as it were bewitcheth the eies of many that looke upon it: for which causes, men thought that they ought not to nourish or entertaine it about an house, because it bringeth no profit; nor suffer it to claspe about any thing, confidering it is so hurtfull unto plants that admit it to creepe upon them, 50 whiles it sticketh fast in the ground: and therefore banished it is from the temples and sacrifices of the celestiall gods, and their priests are debarred from using it: neither shall a man ever see in the facrifices or divine worthip of June at Athens, nor of Venus at Thebes, any wilde ivic brought out of the woods. Mary at the facrifices and services of Bacchus, which are performed in the night and darkneffe, it is used.

Or may not this be a covert and figurative prohibition, of fuch blind dances and fooleries in thonight, as these be, which are practised by the priests of Bacchus? for those women which are transported with these furious motions of Bacebus, runne immediately upon the ivie, and catching it in their hands, plucke it in pieces, or elfe chew it betweene their teeth; in somuch as they speake not altogether absurdly, who say, that this ivie hath in it a certaine spirit that stirreth and mooveth to madnesse; turneth mens mindes to furie; driveth them to extasses; troubleth and tormenteth them; and in one word maketh them drunke without wine, and doth great pleafure unto them, who are otherwife disposed and enclined of shemselves to such tanas ticall ravifhments of their wit and understanding.

What is thereason that these Priests and Flamins of Jupiter were not allowed, either to take upon them, or to fue for any government of State? but inregard that they be not sapable of fuch dienities, for honour fake and in some sort to make some recompense for that defeet, they have an 10 wher or verger before them carrying a knitch of rods yea and a curall chaire of estate to sumport

S it for the same cause, that as in some cities of Greece, the sacerdotall dignitic was equiva-I lent to the royall majestic of a king, so they would not chuse for their priests, meane persons and fuch as came next to hand.

Or rather, because Priests having their functions determinate and certaine, and the kings, undeterminate and uncertaine, it was not possible, that when the occasions and times of both concurred together at one instant, one and the same person should be sufficient for both: for it could not otherwife be, but many times when both charges preffed upon him and urged him at ones, he should pretermit the one or the other, and by that meanes one while offend and fault 20 in religion toward God, and anotherwhile do hurt unto citizens and subjects.

THAT IS TO SAY,

A Collection of the maners, and of divers customes and fashions of certaine persons and nations of Greece: which may serve their turne verie well, who reading old Authors, are desirous to know the particularities of Antiquitie.

Who are they that in the citie Epidaurus be called Conipodes and Artyni?

Here were an hundred and fourescore men, who had the managing and whole government of the Common weale: out of which number they chose Senatours, whom they named Artymi: but the most part of the people abode and dwelt in the countrey, and such were tearmed Conipodes, which is as much to fay, as Dufty-feet; for that when they came downe to the citie (as a man may conjecture) they were knowen by their dustie feet, What

What was she, who in the citie of Cumes they named Onobatis?

When there was any woman taken in adultery, they brought her in to the publick marketplace, where they fet her upon an eminent stone to the end that she might be seene of all the people : and after the had flood there a good while, they mounted her upon an affe, and foled her round about the city: which done, they brought her backe againe into the marketplace, where the must stand as shedid before upon the same stone : and so from that time forward the led an infamous and reprochfull life, called of every one by the name of Onobatis that 10 isto fay, the that hath ridden upon the affe backe. But when they had fo done, they reputed that stone polluted, and detested it as accursed and abominable.

There was likewise in the same city a certeine office of a gaoler, whom they called Phylattes: and looke who bare this office, had the charge of keeping the prison at all other times: onely at acerteine affembly and fession of the counsell in the night season, he went into the Senar, and brought forth the kings, leading them by the hands, and three held them still, during the time that the Senat had made inquifition and decreed whether they had deserved ill and ruled unjustly or no: giving thus their fuffrages and voices privily in the darke.

What is the whom they name in the city of Soli, Hypeccaustria?

O call they the priestresse of Minerva, by reason of certeine sacrifices (which she celebra-Dteth) and other divine ceremonies and fervices, to put by and divert threwd turnes, which other wife might happen: the word fignifieth as much as a chaufeure.

Who be they in the city Gnidos, whom they call Amnemones ? as also who is Aphelter among

Here are threescore elect men out of the better fort and principall citizens, whom they imploid as overfeers of mens lives and behaviour, who also were consulted first, and gave 30 their fentence as touching affaires of greatest importance: and Amnemones they were named, for that they were not, (as a man may very well conjecture) called to any account, nor urged to make answer for any thing that they did: unleffe haply they were so named, quasi Polymnemones, because they remembred many things and had so good a memorie. As for Aphester, he it was who in their scrutinies, demanded their opinions and gathered their voices.

Who be they, whom the Areadians and Lacedemonians tearme, Chrestos?

"He Lacedemonians having concluded a peace with the Tegeates, did fet downe exprelly 1 the articles of agreement in writing, which they caused to be ingraven upon a square columne, common to them both, the which was erected upon the river Alphane: in which among other covenants this was written: That they might chale the Messenians out of their countries; * Pide Subra howbeit, lawfull it should not be to make them Chrestos, which Aristotle expoundeth thus and in queft. Rem. faith; That they might kill none of the Tegeates who during the warrehad taken part with is somewhat the Lacedæmonians.

What is he whom the Opuntians call, Crithologos.

He greatest part of the Greeks in their most auncient sacrifices use certeine barley, which 1 the citizens of their first fruits did contribute: that officer therefore who had the rule and 50 charge of these facrifices, and the gathering and bringing in of these first fruits of barley, they named Crithologos, as one would fay the collectour of the barley. Moreover, two priefts they had befides, one finerintendent over the facrifices and ceremonies for the gods; another for the divels.

Whom doe the Beestians meane by this word, Platychætas?

Hose whose houses joine one to another, or whose lands doe border and confine together, in the Acolique language they called fo, as if they would fay, being neere neigh- 10 bours: to which purpose one example among many I will alledge out of our law Thesmophy.

What is he who among the Delphians is called Hosioter, and why name they one of the moneths,

They name Hosioter that factificer who offretha factifice when he is declated Hosios, that is to fay, holy; and five there be who are all their life time accounted Hosios, and those doe and execute many things together with their prophets, and joine with them in divers ceremonies of divine fervice, and gods worthip, inafmuch as they are thought to be descended from 20 Deucalion. And for the moneth called Byfis, many have thought it to be as much as Phyfius: that is to fay, the fpringing or growing moneth; for that then, the fpring beginneth, and many plants at that time do arise out of grownd and budde. But the truth is not so: for the Delphians never use B. in stead of Ph. like as the Macedonians do, who for Philippus, Phalaeros, and Pheronice, fay, Bilippus Balacros, and Beronice: indeed they put B. for P. and it as ordinarie with them, to fay Batein, for Patein, Bieron, for Pieron: and fo Bysius, is all one with Pyfiu, that is to fay, the moneth in which they confult with their god Apollo, and demand of hun answeres and resolutions of their doubts: for this is the custome of the countrey, because in this monetisthey propounded their demands unto the Oracle of Apollo, and they supposed the seventh day of the same to be his birth-day, which they surnamed also, Polypthon, not as 20 many do imagine, because they then do bake many cakes, which are called Phihou, but for that it is a day wherein divers do refort unto the Oracle for to be refolved, and many answeres are delivered: for it is but of late daies that folke were permitted to confult with the Oracle when they list in everie moneth; but before time the religious priestresse of Apollo, named Pythia; opened not the Oracle, nor gave answere but at one time in the yeere, according as Callistenes and Alexandredes have recorded in writing.

What signifieth Phyximelon?

Ittle plants there be, which when they burgeon and shoot out first, the beasts love passing well 40 their first buds and sprouts which they put forth; but in brouzing and cropping them, great injurie they do unto the plants and hinder their grouth: when as therefore they are growen up to that height that beafts grafing thereabout, can do them no more harme, they be called Physimeda, that is as much to fay, as having escaped the danget of cattell, as witnesseth deschylus.

Who be they that are named Aposphendoneti?

N times past the Erettians held the Island Corcyra, untill Charier ates arrived there with a fleet I from Corinth and vanquished them: whereupon the Eretrians tooke sea againe, and retur- 50 ned toward their naturall countrey: whereof their fellow-citizens being advertised, such I say as flirred not but remained quiet, repelled them, and kept them off from landing upon their ground by charging them with shot from slings. Now when they saw they could not win them by any faire language, nor yet compel them by force of armes, being as they were inexorable, and befides many more than they in number, they made faile to the coasts of Thracia, where they poffessed themselves of a place: wherein they report, Methon, one of the predecessors and progenitors of Orpheus Cometime dwelt: and there having built a citie, they named it Methone; but them felves

What is that which the Delphians call, Charila?

"He citizens of Delphos do celebrate continually three Enneaterides, that is to fay, feafts celebrated every ninth yeere, one after another fucceffively. Of which, the first they name, Septerion; the second, Herois; and the third, Charila. As touching the first, it seemeth to be amemorial representing the fight or combat that Phabus had against Python; and his flight after the 10 conflict, and pursuit after him into the valley of Tempe. For as some do report he fled by occasion of a certaine manslaughter and murder that he had committed, for which he sought to be purged: others fay that when Python was wounded, and fled by the way which we call, Holy, Phabus made hot pursuit after him, infomuch as he went within alittle of overtaking him, and finding him at the point of death: (for at his first comming he found that he was newly dead of the wounds which he had received in the forefaid fight) also, that he was enterred and buried by his fonne, (who as they fay) was named dix: this novenarie feaft therefore, called Septerion, is a representation of this historie, or else of some other like unto it. The second named Herois, containeth (I wot not what) hidden ceremonies and fabulous fecrets, which the profeffed priefts (in the divine fervice of Bacehin called Thyades) know well enough: but by fuch things 20 as are openly done and practifed, a man may conjecture, that it should be a certaine exaltation or affumption of Semele up into heaven. Moreover, as concerning Charila, there goeth fuch a tale as this. It fortuned upon a time, that after much drougth, there followed great famine in the citic of Delphos, infomuch as all the inhabitants came with their wives and children to the court gates, crying out unto their king, for the extreame hunger that they endured. The king thereupon caused to be distributed among the better fort of them, a dole of meale, and certaine pulse, for that he had not fufficient to give indifferently to them all: and when there came a little yong wench, a fiely orphane, father leffe and mother leffe, who instantly befought him to give her also fome reliefe; the king finote her with his shoe, and flung it at her face. The girle (poore though the was, forlorne and destitute of all worldly succour; howbeit carying no base mind with her; 30 but of a noble spirit) departed from his presence, and made no more a doe, but undid her girdle from her wast and hanged her selfe therewith. Well, the famine daily encreased more and more, and diseases grew thereupon: by occasion whereof, theking went in person to the Oracle of Apollo, supposing to finde there some meede and remedie: unto whom Pythia the prophetesse made this answere: That the ghost of Charata should be appealed and pacified, who had died a voluntarie death. So after long fearch and diligent enquirie, hardly found in the end it was, that the young maiden whom he had so beaten with his shoe, was named Charda: whereupon they offered a certaine facrifice mixed with expiatoric oblations, which they celebrate and performe from nine yeers to nine, even to this day. For arthis folemnity, the king fitting in his chaire, dealeth certaine meale and pulle among all commers, as well strangers as citizens: and the image 40 of this Charila is thither brought, refembling a young girle: now after that everie one hath received part of the dole, the king beateth the faid image about the eares with his shoe: and the chiefe governesse of the religious women called, Thyades, taketh up the image, and carieth it into a certaine place ful of deepe caves, where after they have hung an halter about the necke of it, they enterre it under the ground in that verie place where they buried the corps of Charila, when the had strangled her selfe.

What is the meaning of that which they call among the Aeneians, Begged-flesh.

HE Acneians in times past had many transinigrations from place to place: for first they inhabited the countrey about the Plaine called Dotion: out of which they were driven by the Lapithæ, and went to the Aethicæ; and from thence into a quarter of the province Melofii, called Arava, which they beld, and thereof called they were Paravæ. After all this they feized the citie Cirrha: wherein after that they had stoned to death their king Onoelus, by warrant and commandement from Apollo; they went downe into that tract that lieth along by the river Inashus, a countrey inhabited then by the Inachiens and Acharans. Now they had the answere of an oracle on both fides, to wit, the Inachiens and Achæans, that if they yeelded and gave away part part of their countrey, they should lose all: and the Aeneians, that if they could get once any thing at their hands with their good wils, they should for ever possesse and hold all. Things standing in these tearmes, there was a notable personage among the Aeneians, named Temon, who putting on ragged clothes, and taking a wallet about his necke, difguifed himfelfe like unto a begger, and in this habite went to the Inachiens to crave their almes. The king of the Inachiens scorned and laughed at him, and by way of disdaine and mockerie, tooke up a clod of earth and gave it him; the other tooke it right willingly and put it up into his budget: but he made no semblance, neither was he seene to embrace this gift, and to joy therein; but went his way immediately without begging any thing elfe, as being verie well content with that which he had gotten already. The elders of the people woondring hereat, called to mind the faid oracle, and 10 presenting themselves before the king, advertised him not to neglect this occurrent, nor to let this man thus to escape out of his hands. But Temen having an inckling of their desseigne, made hafte and fled apace, infomuch as he faved himfelfe, by the meanes of a great factifice, even of an hundred oxen which he vowed unto Apollo. This done, both kings, to wit, of the Inachiens and the Aeneians sent desiance one to the other, and chalenged combat to fight hand to hand. The king of the Aeneians Phemius, seeing Hyperochus king of the Inachiens comming upon him with his dog, cried out and faid: That he dealt not like a just and righteous man, thus to bring an affiftant and helper with him: whereat as Hyperochus turned his head about, and looked backe for to chase away his dog, Phemius raught him such a rap with a stone upon the side of his head, that he felled him to the ground and killed him outright therewith in the verie place. Thus the 20 Aenians having conquered the countrey, and expelled the Inachiens and the Achæans, adored ever after that ftone as a facred thing, and facrificed unto it, and within the fat of the beaft facrificed, enwrap it verie charily. Afterwards, whenfoever they have according to their vow offered a magnificent facrifice of an hundred oxen to Apollo, and killed likewife an oxe unto Jupiter; the fend the best and most daintiest piece of the said factifice, unto those that are lineally descended from Temon, which at this day is called among them, The Begged flesh, or the Beg-

What is the woodden * dog among the Locrians?

Ocrus was the fonne of Phyleius, who had to his father Amphyttion. This Locrus had by Caby a a fonne named likewife Locrus; with him his father was at fome variance; who having gathered a number of citizens to him, confulted with the oracle about a place where he should build a new cirie, and people it in the nature of a colonie. The oracle returned unto him this answere: That in what place a dog of wood did bite him, there he should found a citie. And so when he had passed over to the other side of the sea, and was landed, he chanced to tread as hea walked along upon a brier, which in Greeke is called Kurros barn, and was so pricked therewith, Questions as touching Greeke affaires.

that he was constrained there to sojourne certainedaies: during which time, after he had well viewed and confidered the countrey, he founded these townes, to wit, Physics and Hyanthia, and all those besides, which were afterwards inhabited by the Locrians, surnamed Ozole, that is to fay, Stinking: which furname fome fay was given unto these Locrians, in regard of Nelling; others in respect of the great dragon Python, which being cast up a land by the sea, putified upon the coast of the Locrians: others report, that by occasion of certaine sheepes fels and goats skins, which the men of that countrey used to weare; and because that for the most part they converfed among the flockes of fuch cattell, and smelled ranke, and carried a strong stinking favour about them, thereupon they were cleped Ozola. And some there be who hold the To cleane contrarie, and fay that the countrey being ful of fweet flowers, had that name of the good fmell; among whom is Architas of Amphiffa, for thus he writeth:

What is it which the Megarians call Aphabroma?

T I fau, of whom the city Nifea tooke the name being king of Megaria, espouled a wife out Beotia named Abrota, the daughter of Oncheftus, and fifter to Megareus, a dame of fingu-20 lar wildome, and for chaftity and vertue incomparable: when the was dead the Megarians for their part willingly and of their owne accord mourned : and Nifus her husband defirous to eternize her name and remembrance by fome memoriall, caused her bones to be set together, and the same to be clad with the very same appartell that she was wont to weare in her life time: and of her name he called that habit and vefture Aphabroma. And verily it feemeth that even god Apollo himselfe did favourize the glorie of this ladie: for when the wives of Megara were minded many times to change these robes and habillements, they were alwaies forbiden and and debarred by this oracle.

Who is Doryxenus samong the Megarians

THe province Megaria was in olde time inhabited by certeine townes and villages; and the citizens or inhabitants being devided into five parts, were called Heraens, Pyraens, Megarians, Cynosuriens, and Tripodissans: now the Corinthians their next neighbours, and who spied out all occasions, and sought meanes to reduce the proovince Megarica under their obedience, practifed to fet them together by the eares, and wrought it fo, that they warred one upon another sbutthey caried fuch a moderate hand, and were so respective in their warres, that they remembred evermore they were kinsfolke and of a bloud: and therefore warred after a milde and gentle manner; for no man offred any injury or violence to the husbandmen that tilled the ground on either fide: and looke who foever chanced to be taken prifoners, 40 were to paie for their ransome a certeine piece of money, set downe betweene them: which fumme of money was received ever after they were delivered, and not before, because no man would demaund it: for looke who had taken a captive in the warre, he would bring him home with him into his house, and make him good cheere at his owne table, consult together, and then fend him home in peace: and the party thus fer free, when he came duely and brought his raunsome aforesaid with him, was commended and thanked for it, yea, and continued ever after unto his dying day, friend unto him who received the money: and thus in stead of Doryalotos, which fignifieth a prisoner taken in warre, he was called Doryxenus, that is to say, a friend made by water; for he who kept backethe faide money, and defrauded the right mafter thereof; became all his lifetime infamous, not onely among enemies, but also among his owne 50 felow-citizens, as being reputed a wicked, perfidious, and false wretch. าร และและเลงได้เล้า เพราะสากล้า ถูกเกล้า

What is Palintocia emong the Megarians?

He Megarians when they had expelled their tyrant Theagenes, for a pretie while after, used good and moderate government in their common-wealth: but when as their flattering oratours and clawbacks of the people began unto them once (as Plato very well faid) in a cup of i.a pillar, as the Latin interpreteth it.

the meere and undelaied wine of libertie, that is to fay, commended unto them excessive licentiousnesse, they came to be exceeding faucie and malepart, and were utterly corrupt and marred, infomuch as they committed all infolent outrages that could be devifed against the substantiall and wealthy burgesses: and among other bold parts, the poore and needy would prefume to goe into their houses, and commaund them for to enterteine them with great cheere, & to feast them sumptuously: if they refused so to do, they would make no more adoe, but take away perforce whatfoever they could lay hands on in the house, & in one word, abuse them all most vilanously. In conclusion, they made a statute and ordinance, by vertue whereof it might be lawfull for them to demaund backe againe at the hands of those usurers, who had let them have money before time, all the interest and consideration for use which they had paied before, 10 and this they called Palintocia.

What city or countrey is that Anthodon, whereof the propheteffe Pythia spake in these verses. Drinke out thy wine, the lees the dregges and all; Anthedon thou thy countrey canst not call.

Or that Anthedon which is in Baotia, is not for lentifull of good wines; Calauria indeed as fables make report, was sometime called Irene, by the name of a lady so cleped, the daughter of Neptune and Melanthia, who was the daughter of Alphew; but afterwards being held and inhabited by Anthes and Hyperes, furnamed it was, Anthedonia and Hyperia: for the answer 20 of the oracle, as Aristotle testifieth, went in this maner:

Drinke out thy wine, with lees, with dregges and all, Anthedon thou thy countrey canst not call; Wer Hypera that facred ifle, for there

Thoumight'st it drinke without dreg ges pure and cleere. Thus (I fay) writteth Ariftotle : but Anafigiton faith, that Anthos being brother of Hyperes, was loft when he was but a very childe; and when his brother Hyperes for to fearch him out, travelled and wandered to and fro all about, he came at length to Pheres, unto Acastu or Adrafine, where by good fortune Ambes served in place of cup-bearer, and had the charge of the wine cellar: now as they fat feafting at the table, the boy Author when he offred a cup of wine 20 unto his brother, tooke knowledge of him, and faid foftly in his care:

Drinke now your wine, with lees, with dregges and all; Anthedon you can not your countrey call.

What is the meaning of this by-word in Priene: Darknesse about the oake?

THe Samians and Prienians warred one against the other, doing and suffring harme reciprocally, but fo, as the domages and losses were tollerable, untill such time as in one great battell fought betweene them, those of Priene put to the sword in one day, a thousand Samians: 40 but seven yeeres after in another conflict which the Prienians had against the Milesians neere unto a place called spus, that is to fay, Oake, they loft the most valiant & principall citizens they had; which hapned at the very time when fage Byas being fent embaffador unto Samos, wan great honour and reputation: this was a wofull day and a pittifull, and heavie calamitie to all the dames of Priene in generall; for there was not one of them but this common loffe in some measure touched; infomuch as this by-word was taken up amongst them afterwards, in forme of a cursed malediction or solemne oth, in their greatest affaires to binde them withall, By that Darkneffe at the oake; for that eitheir their fathers, brethren, husbands, or children, were then and there flaine.

ill spoken of by the naturall inhabitants, so that they were forced to abandon Laconia, and to returne againe into Candy under the conduct of Pollis and his brother Crataidas: where, warring upon them that held the countrey, they left many of their bodies who died in fundrie skittingthes lying upon the land neglected and unburied : at the first because they had no time and leafure to interrethem, by reason of the sore warre which they maintained continually, & the danger that would have infued, in case they had gon to take up their bodies: but afterwards because they abhorred to touch those dead carcales that lay stinking and putrifying with the heat of the fun, for that they had continued fo long above ground: Pollis therefore one of their leaders devised certein honors, priviledges, exemptions, & immunities, to bestow partly upon the priests 10 of the gods, and in part upon those who buried the dead; and consecrated solemnly these prerogatives unto some terestriall deities, to the end they might be more durable and remaine inviolate: afterwards he parted with his brother by lot. Now the one fort were named Sacrificers, and the other Catacanta; who governed a part, with their owne lawes and particular discipline: by vertue whereof among other good orders and civill customes, they were not subject to certeine crimes and enormities, whereunto other Candiots are commonly given; namely to rob, pill and spoile one another secretly: for these did no wrong one to another; they neither did steale, nor pilfer, nor carrie away other mens goods.

What meaneth the Sepulcher of children among thy Chalcidians?

Othm and Acclusthe fonnes of Xuthm arrived at Euboca, to feeke them a place of habiatation; the which Isle was for the most part possessed and occupied by the Acolians, Now Cothus had a promise by oracle, that he should prosper in the world, and have the upper hand of hisenemies, in case he bought or purchased that land: wherefore being come a shore with fome few of his men, he found certaine young children playing by the fea fide; with whom he joyned, disported with them, made much of them, shewing unto them many prettie gauds and toies that had not beene before time feene in those parts: and when he perceived that the children were in love thereof, and defirous to have them; he faid that he would not give them any 30 of his fine things, unleffe by way of exchange he might receive of them some of their land : the children therefore taking up a little of the mould with both hands, gave the fame unto him, and having received from him the forefaid gauds, went their waies. The Acolians hearing of this, and withall discovering their enemies under faile directing their course thither, and ready to invade them, taking counfell of anger and forrowtogether, killed those children: who were entombed along that great high way, by which men go from the citie to the streight or frith called Euripus. Thus you fee wherefore that place was called the Childrens sepulcher.

What is he whom in Argos they call Mixarchagenas? and who be they that are named

What is that which the Argives call Enenisma?

Hose who have lost any of their necre kinsfolkes in blood, or a familiar friend, were woont presently after their mourning was past, to facrifice unto Apollo, and thirtie daies after unto Mercurie: for this they thought, that like as the earth receiveth the bodies of the dead. fo doth Mercurie the foules. To the minister of Apollo they give barley, and receive of him againe in lieu thereof, a piece of flesh of the beast killed for facrifice. Now after that they have quenched the former fire as polluted and defiled, they goe to feeke for others elsewhere, which after they have kindled they roste the said slesh with it, and then they call that flesh, Enenifma.

Who is Alastor, Aliterios and Palamnæus?

* άλκγτας. He faith otherwife in cerning Curi-

Or we must not believe it is, as some beare us in hand, that they be Alitery, who in time of I famine, goe prying and fpying those who * grind corne in their houses, and then carrie it away by violence: but we are to thinke that Alastor is he who hath committed acts that be Alathe end of his sta, that is to say, not to be forgotten, and the remembrance whereof will continue a long time treatite con- after. And Aliterine is he who for his wickednesse descreth answay, that is to say, to be shunned and avoided of all men; and fuch an one is otherwise called Palamnaus: and thus much faith Socrates, was written in tables of braffe.

What should the meaning of this be, that the Virgins who accompanied themen that drive the beefe from Acnus, soward the citie Cassiopea, go all the wayeven unto the verie borders chanting this dittie:

Would God, returne another day,

To native foile you never may?

"He Acnians being driven out of their owne countrie by the Lapithe, inhabited first about Meshacia; and afterwards in the province of Molossis necre unto Cassiopaa. But seeing by experience little good or none growing unto them out of that countrey, and withall finding 20 the people adjoining to be ill neighbours unto them; they went into the plaine of Cirrha, under the leading of their king Oneclus: but being furprifed there, with a wonderfull drought, they fent unto the oracle of Apollo; who commanded them to stone their king Oncelus to death, which they did: and after that put themselves in their voiage againe, to seeke out a land where they might fettle and make their abode; and fo long travelled they until at the last they came into those parts which they inhabit at this day, where the ground is good and fertill, and bringing forth all fruitfull commodities. Reason they had therefore you see to wish and pray unto the gods, that they might never returne againe unto their ancient countrey, but remaine therefor ever in all prosperitie.

What is the reason that it is not permitted at Rhodes for the herault or publicke crier, to enter into the temple of Occidion?

S it for that Ochimus in times past affianced his daughter Cydippe unto Occidion, but Cereaphus the brother of Ochimus being enamoured of his nicce Cydippe, perswaded the herault (for in those daies the maner was to demand their brides in mariage, by the meanes of heraults, and to receive them at their hands) that when he had Cydsppe once delivered unto him, he should bring her unto him: which was effected accordingly. And this Cercaphus being possesfed of the maiden fled away with her: but in processe of time when Ochimus was verie aged, Cercaphus returned home. upon which occasion the Rhodians enacted a law, that from thence 40 forth, there should never any herault set foot within the temple of Octidion, in regard of this injurie done unto him.

What is the cause that among the Tenedians, it is not lawfull for a piper or plaier of the sluit to come within the temple of Tenes: neither isit permitted to make any mention there of Achilles?

YS it not because when the stepmother of Tenes had accused him, for that he would have laien $oldsymbol{1}$ with her, \mathcal{M} alpus the minstrell avouched it to be true, and most falfely bare witnesse against him: whereupon he was forced to flie with his fifter unto Tenedos?

Furthermore it is faid, that Thetis the mother of Achilles, gave expresse commandement un- 50 to her fonne, and charged him in any wife not to kill Tenes; for that he was highly beloved of Apollo. Whereupon the commanded one of his fervants to have a carefull eie unto him, and effloones to put him in mind of this charge that he had from her; left haply he might forget himselfe, and at unwares take away his life : but as he overran. Tenedos, he had a sight of Tenes fifter, a faire and beautifull ladie and purfued her: but Tenes pur himfelfe betweene, for to defend and fave the honour of his fifter; during which conflict the escaped and got away: but her brothers fortune was to be flaine: but Achilles perceiving that it was Tenes, when he lay dead upon the ground, killed his fervant outright, for that being prefent in place during the fray, he did not admonish him according as he was commanded : but Tenes he buried in that verie place where now his temple standeth. Lo, what was the cause that neither a piper is allowed to go into his temple, nor Achilles may be once named there.

Who is that, whom the Fpidamnians call Polletes?

"He Epidamnians being next neighbours unto the Illyrians, perceived that their citizens who converfed, commerced, and traded in trafficke with them, became nought, and fearing besides some practise for the alteration of state: they chose everie yeere one of the best approved men of their citie, who went to and fro for to make all contracts, bargains, and exchanges, that those of Epidamnus might have with the Barbarians, and likewise dealt reciprocally in these affaires and negotiacions, that the Illyrians had with them: now this factour that thus bought and folde in their name, was called Poletes.

30 What is that, which in Thracia they call Aræni Acta, that is to say, the Shore of Arænus?

THe Andrians and Chalcidians having made a voiage into Thrace, for to chuse out a place to inhabit: furprised jointly together the citie Sana, which was betraied and delivered into their hands. And being advertised that the Barbarians had abandoned the towne Achantus, they fent forth two spies to know the truth thereof: these spies approached the towne so neere, that they knew for certaine, that the enemies had quit the place and were gone. The partie who was for the Chalcidians ran before to take the first possession of it in the name of the Chalcidians: but the other, who was for the Andrians, seeing that he could not with good footmanship overtake his fellow; flang his dart or javelin from him which he had in his hand: and when the head thereof stucke in the citie gate, he cried out aloud, that he had taken possession thereof in the behalfe of the Andrians, with his javelin head. Hereupon arose some variance and contro-30 verfiebetweene these two nations, but it brake not out to open warre: for they agreed friendly together, that the Erythræans, Samians, and Parians should be the indifferent judges to arbitrate and determine all their debates and futes depending betweene them. But for that the Erythraansand Samiansawarded on the Andrians fide, and the Parians for the Chalcidians: the Andrians in that verie place tooke a folemne oth, and bound the fame with inprecations, curses, and maledictions, that they would never either take the daughters of the Parians in mariage, or affiance their owne unto them: and for this cause they gave this name unto the place, and called it the Shore or banke of Aranus, where as before it was called, the Port of the Dragon.

30 Why do the wives of the Eretrians at the solemne feast of Ceres, vost their stells meat not at the stree, but against the Sunne, and never call upon her by the name of Calligenia?

T is for that the dames of Troy whom the king led away captive, were celebrating this feaft in Lthis place: but because the time served to make saile, they were enforced to haste away and leave their facrifice unperfect and unfinished?

34. Who be they whom the Mile Mans call Ainautæ?

Frer that the tyrants Thom and Damafener, had beene defaited, there arose within the city A Free that the tyrants Thom and Damajener, and Deene detailed, increased within the city two factions that mainteined their feveral fides: the one named Plant is 8 the other Cheiromacha. In the end, that of Plania (who were indeed the richest & mightiest persons in the city)prevailed, and having gotten the upper hand, feifed the fovereigne authority & government: and because when they minded to fit in consultation of their waightiest affaires, they went a thip-boord, and launched into the deepe a good way off from the land, and after they had refolved and decreed what to doe, returned backe againe into the haven, therefore they were furnamed Amanta, which is as much to fay, as alway failing.

What

. What is the cause that the Chalcidians name one place about Pyrsophion; The assembly of lusty gallants?

Aupline (as the report goeth) being chased and pursued by the Achæans, fledde for refuge like an humble suppliant to the Chalcidians; where partly hee answered to such imputations which were laide against him, and in part by way of recrimination, recharged them with other misdemeanors and outrages: whereupon the Chalcidians being not purposed to deliver him into their hands, and yet, seating less by: treachery and privy practise hee should be made away and murdred, allowed him forthe guard of his person, the very flower of 10 the lustified yoong gallants in all their citie, whom they lodged in that quarter where they might alwaies converse and meet together, and so keepe Naupline out of danger.

What was he who facrificed an oxunto his benefactour?

There hovered sometime a shippe of certeine men of warre, or rovers, and ankered about the coast of Ithaeestia, within which there was an old man who had the charge of a number of earthen pots, conteining Amphors a piece, with pitch in them: now it fortuned that a poore mariner or barge-man named Pyrrhias, who got his living by serving and transporting 20 passengers, approached the said shippe, and delivered the old man out of the rovers hands, and saved his life, not for any gaine that hee looked for, but onely a this earnest request, and for very pure pitic and compassion: now in recompence heereof, albeit hee expected none, the old man pressed instantly upon him to receive some of those pots or pitchers aforesaid: the rovers were not so some retired and departed out of the way, but the old man seeing him at libertic, and scure of danger; brought Pyrrhias to these earthen vessels, and shewed unto him a great quantitie of gold and silver mingled with the pitch: Pyrrhas heerby growing of a student to be rich and full of money, entreated the old man very kindly in all respects, otherwise and besides sacrificed unto him a beefe: and heereupon as they say atose this common proverb:

No man ever sacrificed an ox unto his benefactour but Pyrrhias.

What is the cause that it was a custome among the maidens of the Botticans in their dauncing, to sing as it were the faburden of a song: Goweso Athens.

He Candiots by report upon a vow that they had made, fent the first borne of their men unto Delphos; but they that were thus sent, seeing they could not finde sufficient meanes there to live in plentie, departed from thence to seeke out some convenient place for a colonic to inhabite: and first they seeled themselves in Jappeia, but afterwards arrived to this verie place of Thracia, where now they are, having cetteine Athenians mingled among them: for a tis not like that Minos had caused those young men to be put to death whom the Athenian had sent unto him by way of tribute, but kept them for to doe him service: some therefore of their issue, & descended from them, being reputed natural Candiots, were with them sent unto the citie of Delphos; which is the reason that the young daughters of the Bottiæans in remembrance of this their original descent, went singing in their selftivall daunces: Go we to Athens.

What should be the reason that the Eliens wive es; when they chaum himnes to the honour of Bacchus, pray him to come unto them, betwo man, that is to say, with his bull soote; for the hymne runneth in this sorme: Pleaseth is theerighs, woorthy lord Bacchus to come unto this holy maritime tem-50 ple of thine, accompanied with the Graces of the same unto this temple with an ox or beefel soot: then for the fabir den of the song, they redouble 30 woorthy bull?

Why have the Tunagrams a place before their eity called Achilleum? for it is faid, that Achilles in his life time have more hatred than love unto this ciey, as who ravified and flote away Stratonicon the masher of Poemander, and killed Acettor the lonne of Ephippus.

OEmander the father of Ephippus, at what time as the province of Tanagra, was peopled and inhabited by tenures and villages onely, being by the Achæans befiedged in a place called Stephon, for that he would not go foorth with them to warre, abandoneth the faid fort in the night time, and went to build the citie Pæmandria, which he walled about. The architect or mafter builder Polycrithus was there, who dispraised all his worke, and derided it, in so much as in a mockerie he leapt over the trench; whereat Pamander tooke fuch displeasure, and was so highly offended, that he meant to fling at his head a great stone, which lay there hidden of olde upon the nightly facrifices of Bacehus. But Pamander notknowing so much, pulled it up by force, and threw it at him; and miffing Polyerithus, hit his fon Leucippus, and killed him outright. Here-20 upon according to the law and cultom then observed, there was no remedie but needs he must depart out of Baotia, in manner of an exiled man; and fo as a poore suppliant and stranger to converse, wandring abroad in another countrey, which was neither fafe nor easie for him to doe at that time, confidering that the Achæans were up in armes and entred into the countrey of Tanagra. He sent therefore his sonne Ephippus unto Achilles, for to request his favour; who by earnest supplications and praiers prevailed so much, that he entreated both him, and also Tlepolemus the fonne of Hercules; yea and Penelem the fonne of Hippalemus, who were all of their kindred: by whose meanes Pamander had safe conduct, and was accompanied as farre as the citie of Chalcis, where he was affoiled, abfolved and purged by Elpenor, for the murder which he had committed. In remembrance of which good turne by those princes received, he ever 30 after honoured them, and to them all erected temples; of which that of Achilles continueth unto this day, and according to his name is called Achilleum.

38 Who be they, whom the Bæotians call Psoloes, and who be Acolics.

THE report goeth that Leucippe, Ar since and Alcathie, the daughters of Minyas, being enraged and beltraight of their right wits, longed exceedingly to carmans flesh, and call lots among themselves, which of them should kill their owne children for that purpose. So the lot falling upon Leucippe, she yeelded her some Hippasus to be dismembred and cut in pieces; by 40 occasion whereof, their husbands simply arraied, and in mourning weeds for forrow and griefe were called Pfoloes, as one would fay, foule and smokie; and the women dionica, that is to fay, diftracted and troubled in their minds, or Oconolow: fo as even at this day the Orchomenians, call those women who are descended from them by those names: and everie second yeere during the festivall daies called Agricoia, the priest of Bacches runneth after them with a sword drawen in his hand, courfing and chafing them: yea and lawfull it is for him to kill any one of them that he can reach and overtake. And verily in our daies Zoilus the priest killed one; but such never come to any good after: for both this Zoilus himfelfe upon a certaine little ulcer or fore that he had, fell ficke; and after he had a long time pined away and confumed therewith, in the end died thereof: and also the Orchomenians being fallen into publicke calamities, and held in generall 50 for condemned persons, translated the priesthood from that race and linage, and conferred it upon the best and most approoved person they could chuse.

What is the cause that the Arcadians stone them so death, who willingly and of purpose enter within the power prise and presincts of Lycæum: but if any come into is of ignorance and unawares, then they send to Eleuther &?

A Sfor these, may it not be that they are held free and absolved who do it upon ignorance: and by reason of this their absolution, this maner of speech arose, to send them to Eleu-

there, which fignifieth Deliverance: much like as when we fay thus, we disting to fay, into the region of the secure; or thus, here it edicates to fay, into the region of the secure; or thus, here it edicates to fay, that is to fay, thou shalt go to the Mannour of the Pleasant. Or haply it alludesh to the tale that goeth in this wise; that of Lyzaans somes there were but two onely, to wit, Eleuther and Lebadau, who were not partake; to the horrible crime, that their father committed in the sight of Jupiter, but sled into Baotia; in to ken whereof, the Lebadians enjoy still their burgeosse in commune with the Arcadians: and therefore to Eleuther a they send those, who against their willes or unawares are entred within that pour prise consecutions.

Or rather, as Architemus writeth in his Chronicles of Arcadia, for that there were fome who being ignorantly entred into the faid place, were delivered and yielded unto the Phliafians, who put them over to the Megarians, and from the Megarians they were carried to Thebes: but as they were transported and conveyed thither, they were flaied about Eleuthers, by meanes of violent raine, terrible thunder, and other prodigious tokens; by occasion whereof, some would have the citie to take the name Eleuther a.

Moreover, whereas it is faid that the shadow of him who commeth within this precinct of Lyeaum, never falleth upon the ground: it is not true, howbeit it goeth generally currant, and is constantly beleeved for an undoubted truth. But is it not thinke you, for that the aire turneth presently into darke cloudes, and looketh obscure and heavie (as it were) when any enter into it or because, that who soever commeth into it incontinently, suffereth death. And you know what the Pythagoreans say, namely, that the soules of the dead, cast no shadow nor winke at all.

Or rather, for that it is the fun that maketh shadowes, and the law of the countrey bereaveth him that entreth into it, of the fight of the sunne; which covertly and ænigmatically they would give us to understand under these words: For even he who commeth into this place is called Elaphos, that is to say a Stag; and therefore Canthurion the Arcadian, who sled unto the Elians of his owne accord to side with them, at what time as they warred upon the Arcadians; and as he passed with his bootie that he had gotten, went through this sacred place: when after the warre was ended, he returned to Lacedamon; was by the Lacedamonians delivered up to the Arcadians, by direction and commandement of the oracle, which enjoined them to render the Stag.

What is that Demi-god in Tanagra, knowen by the name of Eunostus? And what is the reason 30 that women may not enter within the groave dedicated unto him?

His Euroftus was the fonne of Elieus, the fonne of Cephifus and Scias; fo named of Eurosta A a certaine nymph that nourished and brought him up: who being faire and just withall, was also chast, continent and of an austere life. Howbeit the report goeth, that one of the daughters of Collonus named Ochna, being his coufin germane became enamoured upon him: but when the had tempted him and affaied to win his love; Eunost us repulsed and rejected her with reprochfull tearmes, and went his way intending to accuse her unto her brethren: which the maiden suspecting and fearing, prevented him and flandered him first before her brethren 0-40 chemus, Leon, and Bucolus, whom the incenfed against Eurostus, that they would kill him, as one who by force had defloured their fifter. These brethren then having lien in ambush for the young man, murthered him trecheroufly: for which fact Elieus cast them in prison; and Ochma her selfe repenting of that which she had done, was much troubled and tormented in mind therefore, being desirous besides to deliver her selfe from the griefe and agonie which she endured by reason of her love, and withall pitying her brethren imprisoned for her sake, difcovered the whole truth unto Elieus; and Elieus againe unto Collonus: by whose accordand judgement, these brethren of Ochna fled their countrey and were banished; but she cast her selfe voluntarily downe headlong from an high rocke, according as Myrruthe poetreffe hath left in verse. And this is the cause, that both the temple of Eunostius, and also the grave about it remained ever after, inacceffible, and not to be appoched by women: infomuch as many times when 50 there happen any great earthquakes, extraordinarie droughts, and other fearefull and prodigious tokens from heaven, the Tanagrians make diligent fearch and inquisition, whether there have not been fome one woman or other, who fecretly hath prefumed to come neere unto the faid place. And some have reported (among whom was one Clidamus a noble and honourable personage) that they met with Eurostus upon the way, going to wash and cleanse himselse in the fea, for that there was one woman who had beene fo bold as to enter into his fanctuarie

And verely Diocles himselse in a treatise that he made of Demi-gods, or such worthy men as hadbeene deissed, maketh mention of a certaine edict, or decree of the Tanagrians, touching shole things which Clidamus had related unto them.

How commeth it that in the countrey of Boxotia, the river that runneth by Elcon, is called Scamander?

Eimachus the fonne of Eleon, being a familiar companion with Hercules, was with him at the Trojan warre: during the time whereof, continuing as it did verie long, he entertain ned the love of Glineia the daughter of Scamander, who was first enumoured of him, and so well they agreed together, that in the end the was with child by him. Atterwards it fortuned, so that in a skirmith with the Trojans he loft his life; and Glaucia fearing that her belly would tell tales andbewray what the had done, fled for fuccour unto Hercules, and of her owne accord declared unto him, how the had beene furprifed with love, and what familiar acquaintance there had passed between eher and Deimachus late deceased. Hercules as well in pitte of the poore woman, as for his owne joy and contentment of mind, that there was like to remaine some iffue of fo valiant a man, and his familiar friend befide, had Glaucta with him to his ships: and when the was delivered of a faire fonne, caried her into the countrey of Beotia, where he delivered her and 20 her fonne into the hands of Eleon. The child then was named Scamander, and became afterwards king of that countrey; who furnamed the river Inachus after his owne name Scamander, and a little riveret running thereby, Glaucia, by the name of his mother: as for the fountaine deidusait was so cleped according to his wives name; by whom he had three daughters, who are even unto this day honoured in that countrey, and called by the name of the virgins.

42 Wherevoon arose thin proverbiall speech, Livranusia, that is to say, these things shall stand or prevaile?

30 Into the captaine generall of the Tarentines, being a right valiant and hardie warriour, when as the citizens by their voices and fuffrages denied a fentence which he had delivered as the herault or crier proclaimed and published with a loud voice that opinion which prevailed, lifting up his owne right hand himselfte: Yeabut this (quoth he) shal carie it away when all is done. Thus Theophrassus reported this narration: but Apolliderus relates the moreover in his Rhytimus that when the herault had proclaimed thus a trait a tast is to say, these be more in number, meaning the voices of the people: Yeabut (quoth he) a via a sharies, that is to say, these better; and in so doing, confirmed the resolution of those who were in number the sewer.

43 40 Upon what occasion was the citie of the Ithacesians, named Alakcomenæ?

MOst writers have recorded, that Antielia being yet a virgin, was forced by Sifphus, and conceived Ulyses. But Hister of Alexandria hath written moreover in his Commentaties, that she being given in mariage unto Laerees, and brought into the citie Alalomenium in Baetla, was delivered there of Ulysses, and therefore he (to renew the memorie of that citie where he was borne and which was the head citie standing in the heart of that countrey) called that in Ithaca by the name thereof.

Who bethey in the citie Acgina, which are called Monophagi?

F those Aeginets, who served in the Trojane warre many died in fight, howbeit more were drowned by meanes of a tempest in their voyage at sea. But those sew who returned were welcomed home, and joifully received by their kinsfolke and friends: who perceiving all their other sellow-citizens to mourne and be in heavinesse, thought this with themselves, they ought not to rejoice nor offer facrisice unto the gods openly, but in secret: and so, everie man apart in his privat house, entertained those who were escaped and came home safe with seasts and banquets: and served at the table in their owne persons, who their sathers, their brethren, cousens and friends, without admitting any stranger whatsoever: in imitation whereof they do yet every yeere sacrifice unto Neptune in secret assemblies, which sacrifices they call Thyasis during which solemnitie they doe seast one another privatly for the space of sixteene daies together with silence, and there is not a servant or slave there present to wait at the boord: but asterwards for to make an end of their seasting, they celebrate one solemness considered unto Venue. And thus you may see why they be called Monophasy, that is to say, Eating alone, or by them-

(What is the cause that in the countrey of Caria, the image of jupiter Labradeus is made, holding aloss in his hand an axe, and neither a scepter nor a thunderbolt, or lightning?

Por that Hercules having flaine Hippolite the Amazon, and among other armes of hers won her battell axe, and gave it as a prefent unto Omphale: this axe, all the kings that raigned in Lydia after Omphale, caried as an holy and facted monument; which they received fucceffively from hand to hand of their next progenitors, untill fuch time as Candaules diffaining to beare it himselfe, gave it unto one of his friends to carie. Afterwards, it chanced that Gyges put himselfe in armes againt Candaules, and with the helpe of Areelis, who brought a power of men to felfe in armes againt Candaules, and with the helpe of Areelis, who brought a power of men to tooke away the said axe, and put the sane into the image of Jupiters hand, which he had made. In which respect he surnamed Jupiter, Labradeus, for that the Lydians in their language 20 call an axe Labra.

46 Wherefore do the Trallians call the pulse Ervil Cathattet, that is to say, the purger: and use to more than any other in their expiatoric sacrifices of Purification?

Is it for that the Minyans and Lelegians, having in old time diffeized the faid Trallians of their cities and territories, inhabited and occupied the fame themselves? but the Trallians made head afterwards, and prevailed against them, infomuch as those Lelegians who were neithershaine in battell, nor escaped by slight, but either for feebleness, or want of meanes otherwise to live, remained still, they made no reckoning of, whether they died or lived; enacting 30 alaw, that what Trallian soever killed either a Lelegian or Minyan, he should be absolved and held quit, in case he paied unto the next kinssolke of the dead partie; a measure called Medimnii, of the state Ervill.

What is the reason that it goeth for an ordinarie by word among the Elians to say thus; To suffer more miseries and calamities than Sambicus?

There was one Sambiess of the citie Elis, who by report having under him many mates and complices at command, brake and defaced fundrie images and statues of brasse within the citie Olympia, and when he had so done, sold the brasse and made money of it: in the end he proceeded so farre as to rob the temple of Dians surnamed Episepos, that is to say, a vigilant pattoness. After this notorious facriledge he was immediatly apprehended, and just to totture a whole yeere together to make him for to bewray and reveale all his companions and confederats: so as in the end he died in these torments, and thereupon arose the said common proverbe-

If that is the reason that as Lacedaemon the monument of Ulysses, standeth close to the temple of the Leucippidae?

Legieus one of the tace descended from Diomedes, by the notionan linstigation of Temenus induced, tobbed out of Argos the renowmed image of Amerva, called Palladium, and that with the privitie and affistance of Leager in this facriledge: now this Leager was one of the familiars and inward companions of Temenus: who being tallen out afterwards with Temenus, in a fit of anger, departed to Lacedamon with the said Palladium: which the kings there received at his hands right joifully and placed it neere unto the temple of the Leucippides: but afterwards they sent to the oracle at Delphos, to know by what meanes they might keepe and prefere ferve the faid image in fafety: the oracle made this answer, that they should commit the keeping of it unto one of them who had stollen it away: whereupon they built in that verie place a monument in memoriall of utysses, where they shrined Palladium; and besides, they had the more reason so to do, because in some fort utysses was allied to their citie; by his wives side ladie Penelope.

What is the the reason that the Chalcedonian dames have a custome among them, that whensoever they meet with any men that be strangers unto them, but especially if they be vulers or magistrates, to cover and hide one of their checks.

"He men of Chalcedon warred formime against their neighbours the Bithynians, provoked thereto by all light injuries, and wrought that might minister matter and occasion therof: informuch as in the daies of king Zeipætus who raigned over the Bithynians, they affembled all their forces, and with a puilfant power (befide of the Thracians, who joyned to aid them) they invaded their countrey with fire and fword, spoiling all before them; untill in the end king Zeipatus gave them battell neere unto a place named Phaliam, where they loft the day, as well in regard of their prefumptuous boldnesse, as of the disorder among them, insomuch as there died of them in fight 8000. men. Howbeit utterly they were not deteated, for that Zeipætus in favour of the Bizantines, was contented to grow unto some agreement & composition. Now for 20 that their citie was by this meanes verie much dispeopled and naked of men, many women there were among them, who were constrained to be remarried unto their enfranchised servants, others to aliens and straungers comming from other cities: but some againe, chusing rather to continue widowes still and never to have husbands, than to yeeld to such mariages, followed their owne causes themselves what matter soever they had to be tried or dispatched in open court before the judges or publike magistrates; onely they withdrew one part of their veile, and opened their face on one fide: the other wives also who were maried againe, for modestie and womanhood, following them as better women than themselves, used the same fashion also, and brought it to be an ordinarie custome.

30 Wherefore do the Argives drive their ewes unto the facred grove of Agenor, when they would have the rammes to leape them?

Is it not for that Agenor whiles he lived, was verie expert and skilfull about sheepe; and of all the kings that ever were among them, had the most and fairest slockes of them?

Why do the Argives children, at a certaine festivall time that they keepe, call one another in plaie and sport Ballachrades?

Is it because, the first of that nation, who were by Inachus brought out of the mountaines into the plaine and champian country, made their chiefe food (by report) of wilde hedge-peares 40 Now these chok-peares, some say, were found in Pelopone su, before they were seen in any other part of Greece, even whiles that region was called Apia. And hereupon also it came that these wild peares commonly called Achiades, changed their name into Apia.

What is the cause that she Eliens, when their mares be hot after the horse, leade them, out of their owne confines to be covered by the stalions?

Is it for that Oenomaus was a prince, who of all others loved beft a good race of horses, & took greatest pleasure in these kind of beasts; & cursed with all maner of exectations, those stallings which covered his mares in Elis? And therefore they fearing to fall into any of these maledictions, avoid them by this maner.

$3 What was the reason of this custom among the Gnosians, that those who tooke up any money at any interest, snatched it and ran away with all ?

AS it to this end, that if they should denie the debt, and seeme to defraud the usurers, they might lay an action of selonie, and violent wrong upon them: and the other by this meanes might be more punished?

54 What is the cause that in the citie of Samos they invocate Venus of Dexicreon?

I S it for that, that when in times paft the women of Samos were exceedingly given to enormious wantoneffe & lechery, so that the brake out into many lewd acts: there was one Dexisteen, a mounte-banke or consening jugler, who by (I wor not what) ceremonies and expiatorie facrifices, cuted them of their unbridled lust?

Or because this, Dexireon being a merchant-wenturer who did traffike and trade by sea, went Or because this, Dexireon being a merchant-wenturer who did traffike and trade by sea, went into the sile of Coprus; & when he was ready to load or charge his ship with merchandize, Venus into the sile of Coprus; & when he was ready to load or charge his ship with merchandize, Venus commanded him to fraight it with nothing else but water, and then immediately to hoise up to saile according to which he did, and having put a great quantic of water within his vessell, he set saile and departed. Now by that time they were in the maine sea, they were verie much becalfaile and departed. Now by that time they were in the maine sea, they were verie much becalfaile and of or want of a gale of winde many daies together, the rest of the mariners and merchants a ship boord, shought verily they should all die for verie thirt: whereupon he sold unto chants a ship boord, shought verily they should all die for verie thirt: whereupon he sold unto them his water which he had aboord, and thereby gat a great quantitie of silver; of which after-wards he caused to be made an image of Venus, which he called after his owne name, Dexireon his Venus. Now if this be true, it seemeth that the goddesse purposed thereby, not onely to enrich one man, but to save also the lives of many.

How commeth it to passe, that in the 1ste of Samos, when they sacrifice unto Mercurie surnamed Charidotes, it is lawfull for who seever will, to rob and riske all passengers?

Because in times past according to the commandement and direction of a certaine oracle, the ancient inhabitants departed out of Samos and went into Mycale, where they lived and maintained themselves for ten yeeres space by pyracie and depredation at sea; and afterwards being returned againe into Samos, obtained a brave victoric against their enemies.

56 Why is there one place within the Isle Samoscalled Panæma?

Is it for that the Amazones to avoid the furie of Bacchus, fled out of the Ephesians countery into Samos and there saved themselves? But he having caused ships to be built and rigged, gathered together a great sleet, and gave them battell, where he had the killing of a great number of them about this verie place, which for the carnage and quantitie of blood-shed there, they who saw it, marvelled thereat, and called it Panama. But of them who were flained this consider, there were by the report of some, many that died about Phlaon, for their bones are there to be seene. And there be that say, that Phlaon also clave in sunder, and became broken by that occasion; their crie was so loud, and there voice so piercing and forcible.

57 How commeth it i hat there is a publike hall at Samos, called Pedetes?

Fter that Damoteles was murdered, and his monarchie overthrowen, fo that the nobles or Senators Geomori, had the whole government of the State in their hands; the Megarians tooke armes, and made warre upon the Perinthians (a colonie drawen and defeended from Samos) carying with them into the field, serters and other irons, to hang upon the feet of their captive prisoners: the said Geomori having intelligence thereof, sent them aide with all speed, having chosen ten captaines, manned also and surnished thirtie ships of warres whereof twaine readie to saile, caught fire by lightning, and so consumed in the verie mouth of the haven: howbeighte for saile, caught ship with sail so with the rest, vanquished the Megarians in battell, and tooke sixe hundred prisoners: upon which victorie, being pussed up with pride, they intended to ruinate the Oligarchie of those noble men at home, called Geomori, and to depose them from their government: and verily those rulers themselves ministred unto them occasion, forto set in hand with this their desseigne; namely by writing unto them, that they should leade those Megarians prisoners, settered with the same gives which they themselves had brought: for no sooner had they received these letters, but they did impart and shew them secrets

fecretly unto the faid Megarians, perswading them to band & combine with them, for to reflore their citie unto libertie. And when they devised and consulted together about the execution of this complotted conspiracie: agreed it was betweene them to knocke the rings off, or lockers of the setters open, and so to hang them about the Megarians legs, that with leather thongs they might be fastened also to their girdles about the waste, for feare that being slacke, as they were, they thould fall off and be readie to drop from their legs as they went. Having in this wise let foorth and dressed these many is where being arrived and set aland, they led the Megarians through the market place to the Senate house, where all the nobles called Geomori were assembled and fat in consultation: hereupon was the signal given, and the Megarians sell upon the Senators, and massaced them eyerie one. Thus having received the freedome of the crite, they gave unto as many of the Megarians as would accept thereof, the right of free burgeostie; and after that built assire towne-hall, about which they hung and fastened the said bolts and letters of irons, calling it upon this occasion Pedetes, that is to say, the Hall of Fetters.

What is thereason that in the Isle of Coos, within the citie Autimachia, the priest of Hercules being arrated in the habit of a woman, with a miter on his head, beginnesh to celebrate the sacrifice?

Tercules, when he was departed from Troy with fixe ships, was overtaken with a mightic tempest, and with one ship alone (for that all the other was lost) was cast by the windes upon the Isle of Coos, and landed at a place called Laceter: having faved nothing else but his armor and the men that were with him in the ship; where finding a flocke of sheepe, hee defired the shepherd who tended them, to give him a ram. The shepherds name was Antagoras; who being a luftic, tall and strong man, would needs chalenge Hercules to wrestle with him, upon this condition, that if Hercules could overthrow him and lay him along on the ground, the ram thould be his. Hercules accepted the offer; and when they were close at hand gripes, the Meropians, certaine inhabitants of the Isle came in to succour Amagoras, and the Greekes likewise to aide 30 Hercules, in such fort, as there ensued a sharp and cruell fight: wherein Hercules finding himselfe to be overlaid and preffed with the multitude of his enemies, retired and fled (as they fay) unto a Thracian woman, where for to hide and fave his life, he difguifed himfelfe in womans apparell, But afterwards having gotten the upper hand of those Meropians, and being purged, he espoufed the daughter of Alciopus, and put on a fairerobe and goodly stoale. Thus you may see whereupon his priest facrificeth in that verie place where the battell was fought; and why new married spoules being arraied in the habit of women, receive their brides?

Whereof commethit, that in the citie of Mcgara, there is a linage or family named Hamaxocylysta?

YN the time that the diffolute and infolent popular State of government, called Democratic $oldsymbol{1}$ (which ordained that it might be lawfull to recover and arreft all monies paid for interest and in confideration of use, out of the usurers hands, & which permitted facriledge) bare sway in the citie: it hapned there were certaine pilgrims, named Theori of Peloponesus, fent in commission to the oracle of Apollo at Delphos, who passed thorow the province of Megaris, and about the citie Aegiri, neere unto the lake there, lay and tumbled themselves upon their chariots here and there, together with their wives and children, one with another as it fell out: where certaine Megarians, fuch as were more audacious than the rest, as being thorowly drunke, full of infolent 50 wantonnesse and cruel pride, were so lustie as to overturne the faid chariots, and thrust them into the lake; fo as, many of the faid Theori or commissioners were drowned therein. Now the Megarians (fuch was the confusion and disorder in their government in those daies) made no reckoning at all to punish this injurie and outrage : but the counsell of the Amphyctiones, because the pilgrimage of these Theori was religious and facred, tooke knowledge thereof and fate upon an inquisition about it; yea and chastised those who were found culpable in this impieties some with death, others with banishment; and hereupon the whole race descending from them, were called afterwards Hamaxocylysta.

THE PARALLELS, OR A BRIEFE COLLATION OF

ROMANE NARRATIONS, WITH THE SEMBLABLE REPOR-TED OF THE GREEKS.

In the margin of anold manuscript copie, these wirds were found written in Greeke:
This booke was never of Plutarchs making, who was an excellent and most learned Author; but penned by some odde vulgar writer, altogetherignorant both of *Poetric, and also of Grammar.

or Learning.

Any doe thinke, that ancient histories be but fables and tales devivised for pleasure. For mine owne part having found many accidents in our daies, semblable unto those occurrents which in times past sell out among the Romans in their age: I have collected fome of them together; and to everie one of those ancient Narrations, annexed another like unto it, of later time, and therewith alledged the Authors who have put them downe in writing.

I Daiys lieutenant generall under the king of Persia, being come downe into the plaine of Marathon within the countrey of Attica, with a puissant power of three hundred thousand figh- 30

ting men, there pitched his campe, and proclaimed warre upon the inhabitants of those patts. The Athenians making small account of this so great a multitude of Barbarians, sent out nine those and men, under the conduct of these source captains, namely, Cymegynus, Pollizelus, Callismachus, and Alliinades. So they strucke a battell, during which conflict, Polyzelus chanced fee the vision of one represented unto him surpassing mans nature, and thereupon lost his sight and became blind; Callimachus wounded through divers parts of his bodie with many pikes and juvelins, dead though he was, stood upon his seet; and Cymegynus, as he staied a Persian ship which was about to reture backe, had both his hands smitten off.

Afaruball the king being possessed of Sieity, denounced warre againg the Romans: and Metellus being choicn lord generall by the Senate, obtained a victorie in a certaine battell against 40 him; in which battell lord Glauco a noble man of Rome, as he held the admirall-ship of Astrophyllological ball lost both his hands: as Artstides the Milesian writeth in the first booke of the annales of Sicily, of whom Diodorus Siculus hath learned the matter and subject argument of his historie.

2 Xerxes being come to lie at anchor necrethe cape Artemsium with five hundred thousand fighting men, proclaimed warre upon the people of that country: whereat the Athenians being much altonical, fent as a spic (for to view & furvey his forces) Age silaw the brother of Themistocles; albeit his father Newles had a dreame in the night, and thought that he saw his fonne different being about the same of the Earbarians in habit of a Persian, siew Mardonium one of the captains of the kings eorps de guard, supposing he had beene Xerxes himselfer and being apprehended by them that were about him, was brought tied and bound so before the king, who was then even readie to offer facisfice upon the altar of the Sunne: into the fire of which altar, Age silaws thrust his right hand, and endured the force of the torment, without crying or groning at all; whereupon the king commanded himsto be unbound: and then said age silaus unto him: We Athenians be all of the like mind and resolution, and if you will not believe me, I will put my less than also into the fire: whereat Xerxes being mightily a fraid, canted him to be kept safely with a good guard about him. This writeth Agathar sides the Samian, in his second booke of the Persian Chronicles.

Porfera king of the Tuscans, having encamped on the further side of the river Tyber, warred upon the Romans, and by cutting off the victuals and all provision that was wont to be brought to Rome, distressed the said Romans with famine: and when the Senat hereupon was wonderfully troubled; Mucius a noble man of the citic (taking with him foure hendred other brave gentlemen of his owne age, by commission from the Confuls, in poore and simple array) passed over the river: and casting his cic upon the captaine of the kings guard, dealing among other captains, victuals and other necessaries, supposing he had beene Porsen, killed him: whereupon he was presently taken and brought before the king, who put his right hand likewise into the sire, and induring the paines thereof whiles it burned, most stoutly seemed to smile thereo arandsaid: Thou barbarous king, so how I am loode and at hibertic even against thy will; but note well this besides, that we are soure hundred of us within thy campe that have understaken to take away thy life: with which words Porsena was so affrighted, that he made peace with the Romans: according as Artistides the Milesian writtes, in the third booke of his storie.

3 The Argives and the Lacedæmonians, being at war one with another about the possession of the country Thyreatis, the Imphicityones gave some with another about the possession of the country Thyreatis, the Imphicityones gave some sent they should put it to a battelly and looke whether side wan the field, to them should the land in question appertaine. The Lacedæmonians therefore chose for their capraine Othryades, and the Argives, Thersander: when the battell was done, there remained two onely alive of the Argives, to wit, Agener and Chramius, who caried tidings to the citie, of victorie, Meane while, when all was quiet, Othryades of sully dead but having some little life remaining in him, bearing himselfe, and leaning upon the trunchions of broken lances, caught up the targets and shields of the dead, and gathered them together, and having erected atrophee, he wrote thereupon with his owne blood: To Jupiter Victor and guardian of Trophees. Now when as both those parties maintained still the controversic about the land, the Amphistyones went in person to the place to be cie-judges of the thing, and a djudged the victorie on the Lacedæmonians side: this writest Chrysermus in the third booke of the Peloponnesiack historie.

The Romans levying warre against the Samnites chose for their chiefe commander Position mins Albimus, who being surprised by an ambush within a streight betweene two mountains, called Furce Caudines, a verie narrow passe, lost three of his Legions, and being himselfe deadly wounded, fell and lay for dead; howbeit about midnight, taking breath, was quick againe, and somewhat revived, he arose, tooke the targets from his enemies bodies that lay dead in the place, and crected a trophee, and dienching his hand in their blood, wrote in this manner. The Romans, to Jupiter Victor, guardian of Trophees, against the Samnites: but Marius surmaned Gurges, that is to say, the glutton, being sent thither as generall captaine, and viewing upon the verieplace, the slad trophee so crected: I take this gladly (quothhe) for a signe and presage of good forrune; and thereupon gave battell unto his enemies and won the victorie, tooke their king prisoner, and sent him to Rome, according as Arislides writeth in his third booke of the Italian historie.

nidas was sent by the Lacedæmonians with a band of three hundred, to guard the streights of Thermophyle, and impeach his passage: in which place as they were merie at their meat, and taking their refection, the whole maine power of the Barbarians came upon them. Leandan seeing his dnemies advancing forwards spake onto his owne men and said: Sit still firs and make an end of your dinner hardly, so as you may take your suppers in another worlds so he charged upon the Barbarians, and notwithstanding he had many a dart sticking in his bodie, yet he made a lane through the presse of the enemies until he came to the verie person of Xerxes, from whom be tooke the diademe that was upon his head; and so died in the place. The Barbarians king caused his bodie to be opened when he was dead, and his heart to be taken forth, which was found to be all over-growne with haire; as written Aristides in the sirst booke of the Persian historie.

The Romans warring against the Cathaginians, sent a companie of three hundred men under the leading of a captaine named Fabine Maximus, who had his enemies battell, and lost all his men; himselfe being wounded to death, charged upon Anniball with such violence, that he tooke from him the regall diademe or frontall that he had about his head, and so died upon it, as writteth Aristides the Milestan.

5 In the citie of Celana in Phrygia, the earth opened and clave a funder, so as there remained a mightie chinke, with a huge quantitie of water isluing thereout, which caried away and drew into the bottomlesse pit thereof a number of houses with all the persons great and small within them. Now Mids the king was advertifed by an oracle, that if he cast within the said pit the most precious thing that he had, both sides would close up againe, and the earth meet and be firme ground. So he caused to be throwen into it a great quantitie of gold and silver; but all would do no good. Then Archurus his son, thinking with himselfe, that there was nothing so pretious as the life & soule of man, after he had lovingly embraced his father, and bid him stawel, and with all taken his leave of his wise Timothea, mounted on horseback, and cast himselfe horse and all into the said chinke. And behold, the earth immediatly closed up: whereupon Mids and all into the said chinke. And behold, the earth immediatly closed up: whereupon mids when as the said breach or chink of earth was, became a stone; but after a certaine prefixed time when as the said breach or chink of earth was, became a stone; but after a certaine prefixed time passed in the said breach or chink of earth was, became a stone; but after a certaine prefixed time passed in the said breach or chink of earth was, became a stone; but after a certain eprefixed time passed in the said breach or chink of earth was, became a stone; but after a certain eprefixed time passed in the said breach or chink of earth was, became a stone; but after a certain eprefixed time.

The river Tybris running through the mids of the market place at Rome, for the anger of Jufiter Tuffus, caufed an exceeding great chinke within the ground, which fwallowed up many dwelling houses. Now the oracle rendred this answere unto the Romans, that this should ceale in case they stang into the breach some costly and precious thing: and when they had cast into it both gold and filver, but all in vaine: Curtius a right noble young gentleman of the citic, pondering well the words of the oracle, and considering with himselfe that the life of man was more pretious than gold, cast himselfe on horseback into the said chinke, and so delivered his citizens and countrimen from their calamitie: this hath Aristides recorded in fortieth booke of Ita-

6 Ampharaus was one of the princes and leaders that accompanied Pollymees: and when one 20 day they were feafting merily together, an eagle foaring over his head, chanced to catch up his javelin and carrie it up aloft in the aire, which afterwards when the had let fall againe, flucke faft in the ground and became a lawrell. The morrow after, as they joined battell, in that verie place, Ampharaus with his chariot was swallowed up within the earth: and there flandeth now the citie Harma so called of the chariot: as Trisimachus reporteth in the thirdbooke of his Foundations.

During the warres which the Romans, waged against Pyrrhus king of the Epirotes, Paulus

Aemylus was promifed by the oracle that he should have the victorie, if he would set up an alter in that were place where he should see one gentleman of qualitie and good marke, to be that in that were place where he should see one gentleman of qualitie and good marke, to be so that we will be a site of the special see that the same in the same in the carth, together with his chariot. Three daies after Valerius * Conatus, 28 when in a dreame he thought that he saw himselfe adorned with his priestly vestments (for skilfull, he was in the art of divination) led forth the armie, and after he had slaine many of his entires, was devoured quick within the ground. Then Paulus Aemylus cansed an altar to be rearied and wan the battell, wherein he tooke alive an hundred and threescore elephants carying turred and wan the battell, wherein he tooke alive an hundred and threescore elephants carying turrets upon their backs, whom he sent to Rome. This altar useth to give answer as an oracle about that time that Pyrthus was descated: according as Critolaus writeth in the third booke of the Epirotick historic.

7 Pyratchnes king of the Eubecans, whom Hercules being yet but a young man vanquished, and tying him betweene two horses, caused his bodie to be plucked and torne in pieces; which done, he cast it forth for to lie unburied: now the place where this execution was performed, is called at this day, Pyratchnes his horses, situate upon the trivet Heraclius: and whensoever there he any horses wattered there, a man shall sensibly heare a noice as if horses neighed: thus we find written in the third booke entituled, Of rivers.

Tallius Hossilius king of the Romans, made warre upon the Albanes, who had for their king Metius Sustetus: and many times he seemed to retire and lie off, as both to incounter and joine battell; informuch as the enemies supposing him to be discomsited, betooke themselves to mith and good cheere; but when they had taken their wine well, he set upon them with so hot a charge that he descated them: and having taken their king prisoner, he set him saft tied between two steeds and dissume that he will be without the same with the sound of the Italian histories.

8 Philip intending to force and facke the cities of Methone and Olynthus as he laboured 50 with much a foe to paffe over the river Sandanus, chanced to be shot into the eie with an arrow by an Olynthian, whose name was After, and in it was this verse written:

Philip beware, have at thine eie: After thu deadly shaft lets flie.

Whereupon Philip perceiving himselfe to be overmatched, swam back againe unto his owne companie, and with the lesse of one eie escaped with life, according as Callishbenes reporteth in the third booke of the Macedonian Annales.

Parallels of Romans and Greekes.

Porfenaking of the Tuskans lying encamped on the other fide of Tybia, warred upon the Romans and intercepted their victuals, which were wont to be conveighed to Rome, whereby he put the citie to great diffteffe in regard of famine: but Horasime Goeles being by the common voice of the deople chosen captaine, planted himselfe upon the woodden bridge, which the Barbarians were defireurs to gaine; and for a good while made the place good, and put backet the whole multitude of them prefling upon him to passe over it; in the end finding himselse overcharged with the enemies, he commaunded those who were ranged in battell-ray behind him, to cut downe the bridge; meane while he received the violent charge of them all, and impeached the intercance, untill such time as he was wounded in the cie with adart; whereupon he leapt into the river, and swam over unto his fellowes: thus Theotinus reported this narration in the third booke of Italian histories.

9 There is a tale told of Icarius, by whom Baechus was lodged and intertained, as Eratoft benes in Erigone hath related in this wife. Saturne upon a time was lodged by an husbandman of the countrey, who had a faire daughter named Entoria: her hee deflowred and begat of her foure sonnes, Janus, Hymnus, Faustus and Falix ; whom hee having taught the manner of drinking wine, and of planting the vine, enjoyned them also to empart that knowledge unto their neighbours, which they did accordingly: but they on the other fide: having taken upon a time more of this drinke than their ufuall manner was, fell a fleepe, and flept more than ordinarie : when they were awake, imagining that they had drunke fome poylon, floned Icarius the husbandman 20 to death: whereat his nephewes or daughters children tooke fuch a thought and conceit, that for verie griefe of heart, they knit their neckes in halters, and strangled themselves. Now when there was a great pestilence that raigned among the Romanes, the oracle of Apollo gave answers that the mortality would flay, in case they had once appealed the ire of Saturne; and likewise pacified their ghofts, who unjustly lost their lives. Then Lutatius Catulus, a noble man of Rome, built a temple unto Saturne, which standeth neere unto the mount Tarpeius, and crected an altar with foure faces; either in remembrance of those foure nephewes above faid, or respective to the foure feafons and quarters of the yeere; and withall inflituted the moneth Ianuarie. But Saturne turned them all foure into starres, which be called the forerunners of the Vintage: among which that of Janua arifeth before others, and appeareth at the feet of Virgo, as Critolaus tellificth in his 30 fourth booke of Phanomena, or Apparitions in the heaven.

10 At what time as the Persians overranne Greece, and wastedall the countrey before them: Pausanias generall captaine of the Lacedamonians, having received of Xerxes five hundred talents of gold, promised to bernay Sparta: but his treason being discovered, Agesslams his father pursued him into the temple of Minerus called Chalciness, whither he sled for fanctuarie; where he caused the doors of the temple to be mured up with brick, & so famished him to death. His mother tooke his corps, and cast it foorth to dogs, not suffering it to be buried: according to Chrysermus in the second booke of his storie.

The Romanes warring against the Latines, chose for their captaine Publius Decius. Now there was a certaine gentleman of a noble house, howbeit poore, named Coffius Brutus, who for a 40 certaine summe of money which the enemies should pay unto him, intended in the night seafont of set the gates of the citie wide open for them to enter in. This treacherie being detected, he she she fact for successful the time to the temple of Minerva, surramed Auxiliaria; where Cassus his sather, named also Signifer, shut him up and kept him so long, that he died for verie famine; and when he was dead, threw his bodie foorth, and would not allowit any sepulture: as writeth Clitonymus in his Italian histories.

11 Darius king of Persia having fought a field with Alexander the Great, and in that conflict lost seven of his great lieutenants & governours of Provinces, besides sive hundred and two war chariots armed with trenchant fithes, would notwithstanding bid him battell againe: but Ariobarzanes his sonne, upon a pitifull affection that he carried to Alexander, promised to betray his 50 father into his hands; whereat his father tooke such displeasure and indignation, that he caused his head to be smitten off. Thus reporteth Aretades the Gnidian in his third booke of Macedonian histories.

Brutus being chosen Consult of Rome by the generall voice of the whole people, chased out of the citie, Tarquimius Superbus who raigned tyrannically; but he retyring himselfe unto the Tuskanes, levied warre upon the Romanes. The sonnes of the said Brutus conspiring to betray their father, were discovered, and so he commanded them to be beheaded: as Aristides the Milesian written in his Annals of Italie.

12 Epaminondas captaine of the Thebanes, warred against the Lacedæmonians: and when the time was come that magistrates should be elected at Thebes, himselfe in person repaired this ther, having given order and commandement in the meane while unto his fonne Stefimbrotus. in no wife to fight with the enemie. The Lacedamonians having intelligence given them, that the father was absent, reproched and reviled this yoong gentleman, and called him coward. wherewith he was so galled, that he fell into a great fit of choler, and forgetting the charge that his father had laid upon him, gave the enemies battell, and atchieved the victorie. His father upon his returne, was highly offended with his fonne, for transgressing his will and commandement : and after he had fet a victorious crown upon his head, caused it to be strooken off, as Cresiphon recordeth in the third booke of the Boeotian histories.

The Romanes during the time that they maintained warreagainst the Samnites, chosefor their general captain, Manlius furnamed Imperious; who returning upon a time from the camp to Rome, for to be present at the election of Confuls, straightly charged his son not to fight with the enemies in his absence. The Samnites hereof advertised, provoked the yoong gentleman with most spitefull and villanous tearmes, reproching him likewise with cowardise: which he not able to endure, was fo farre mooved in the end, that he gave them battel and defeated them: but Manlius his father when he was returned, cut him shorter by the head for it: as testifieth Ariti-

13 Hercules being denied marriage with the Ladie Iole, tooke the repulse so neere to heart, that he forced and facked the citie Oechalia. But Iole flung herselfe headlong downe from the 20 wall into the trench under it : howbeit so it fortuned that the winde taking hold of her garments as she fell, bare her up so, as in the fall shee caught no harme, as witnesseth Nickas of

The Romans whiles they warred upon the Tuskans, chose for their commander Valerius Torquatus; who having a fight of Cluss their kings daughter, fancied her, and demanded her of him in marriage : but being denied and rejected, he wan the citie, and put it to the faccage. The ladie Cluffit flung herfelfe downe from an high tower; but through the providence of Venus, her habillements were so heaved up with the winde, that they brake the fall, and albeit shee light upon the ground, thee escaped alive. Then the captaine before named, forced her and abused her bodie: in regard of which dishonour and vilanie offered unto her, by a generall decree of all 20 the Romanes, confined he was into the Isle of Corfica, which lieth against Italy: as witnesseth

Theophilus in the third booke of his Italian historie.

14 The Carthaginians and Sicilians, being entred into league, banded themselves against the Romanes, and prepared with their joint forces towarre upon them: whereupon Maellus was chosen captaine, who having offered facrifice unto all other gods and goddeffes, left out onely the goddesse Vesta; who thereupon raised a contrarie winde to blow against him in his voiage. Then Caius Julius the foothfayer faid unto him, that the winde would lie, in cafe before he embarked and fet faile, he offered in facrifice his owne daughter unto Vesta. Metellus being driven to this hard exigent, was costrained to bring foorth his daughter to be facrificed: but the goddesse taking pitie of him & her, in stead of the maiden substituted a yoong heyfer, and carried 40 the virgin to Lavinium, where the made her a religious priestresse of the Dragon, which they worship and have in great reverence within that citie: as writeth Pythocles in his third booke of Italian affaires.

In like manner is the case of Iphigenia which hapned in Aulis acitie of Baotia: reported by Meryllus in the third booke of Bootian chronicles.

15 Brennus a king of the Galatians or Gallo-Greekes, as he fortaied and spoiled Afa, came at length to Ephefus, where he fell in love with a yoong damofell, a commoners daughter ; who promifed to lie with him, yea and to betray the citie unto him, upon condition that he would give unto her carquanets, bracelets, and other jewels of gold, wherewith ladies are woont to adorne and fet out themselves. Then Brennus requested those about his person to cast into the lap of this covetous wench, all the golden jewels which they had; which they did in such quantitie, that the maiden was overwhelmed under them quick, & pressed to death with their waight: as Clitipho writeth in the first booke of the Galatian historie.

Tarpeia a virgin, and yoong gentlewoman of a good house, having the keeping of the Capitoll, during the time that the Romanes warred against the Albanes, promised unto their king Tains, for to give him entrance into the castle of mount Tarpeius, if in recompence of her good service, he would bestow upon her such bracelets, rings, and carquanets, as the Sabine dames used to weare when they trimmed up themselves in best manner: which when the Sabines understood, they heaped upon her so many, that they buried her quick underneath them: according as Arifides the Milesian reporteth in his Italian historic.

16 The inhabitants of Teges and Phenestwo cities, maintained a lingting warre one against the other to long, until they concluded in the end to determine all quarrels and controverties by the combat of three brethren, twinnes of either fide. And the men of Tegea put foorth into the field for their part, the fonnes of one of their citizens, named Reximachus: and those of Phines for themfelves, the fonnes of Damostratus. When these champions were advanced foorth into the plaine, to performe their devoir, it fortuned that two of Revinachus leis fonnes were killed to outright in the place; and the third whole name was Critolans, wrought fuch a stratagem with his three concurrents that he overcame them all: for making femblance as though he fled, he turned fuddenly back, & flew them one after another, as he espiced his advatage, when they were simgled and fevered afunder in their chase after him. At his returne home with this glorious victorie; all his citizens did congratulate and rejoice with him, onely his owne fifter named Deniediee, was nothing glad therefore, because one of the brethren whom he had flaine, was espoused untoher, whose name was Demoticus Critolaus taking great indignation hereat, killed her out of hand. The mother to them both fued him for this murder, and required juffice; howbeit hee was acquit of all actions and enditements framed against him: as writeth Demaratus in the second booke of Arcadian acts.

The Romans and the Albanes having warred a long time together, chofe for their champions to decide all quarrels, three brethren twinnes, both of the one fide and the other. For the Albanes were three Curiatii, and for the Romans as many Harain. The combate was no fooner begun, but those of Alba laid two of their adversaries dead in the dust; the third helping himfelle with a feigned flight, killed the other three one after the other, as they were divided afunder in pursuit after him: for which victorie, all other Romanes made great joy; only his owne fifter Horatia shewed herselfe nothing well pleased herewith, for that to one of the other side she was betrothed in marriage: for which he made no more ado, but stabbed his fifter to the heart: this is reported by Ariftides the Milefian, in his Annales of Italy.

17 In the citie Ilium, when the fire had taken the temple of Minerva, one of the inhabi-30 tants named Ilm ranne thither, and caught the little image of Minerva named Palladium, which was supposed to have fallen from heaven, and therewith lost his fight, because it was not lawfull that the faid image should be seene by any man: howbeit afterwards when he had appealed the wrath of the faid goddeffe, he recovered his eie fight againe: as writeth Dercyllus in the first book of Foundations.

Metellus a noble man of Rome, as he went toward a certaine house of pleasure that hee had necreunto the citie, was flaied in the way by certaine ravens that flapped and beat him with their wings: at which ominous accident being aftonied, and prefaging fome evill to be toward him, he returned to Rome: and feeing the temple of the goddeffe Vesta on fire, he ran thither and tooke away the petic image of Pallas, named Palladium, and so likewise suddenly sell blind: 40 howbeit afterwards being reconciled unto her, he got his fight againe: this is the report of 1 ristides in his Chronicles.

18 The Thracians warring against the Athenians, were directed by an oracle which promifed them victorie, in case they saved the person of Codrus king of Athens: but he disguising himfelfe in the habit of a poore labourer, and carrying a bill in his hand, went into the campe of the enemies, and killed one, where likewise he was killed by another, and so the Athenians obtained victorie: as Socrates writeth in the fecond booke of Thracian affaires.

Publius Decius a Romane, making watre against the Albanes, dreamed in the night, and faw a vision which promised him, that if himselfe died, he should adde much to the puissance of the Romans: whereuponhe charged upon his enemies where they were thickeft arranged; and 50 when he had killed a number of them, was himselfe slaine. Decimals of his sonne, in the warre against the Gaules, by that meanes faved the Romans: as faith Aristides the Milesian.

19 Cyamtpus a Stracustan borne, facrificed upon a time unto all other gods, but unto Baechas; whereas the god being offended, haunted him with drunckennesse; so as in a darke corner he deflowed forcibly his owne daughter, named Cyane: but in the time that he dealt with her, the tooke away the ring of his finger, and gave it unto her nourfe to keepe, for to tellifie another day who it was that thus abuted her. Afterwards the pethlence raigned fore in those parts: and A-Pollogave answere by oracle, that they were to offer in facrifice unto the gods that turned away calamities, a godlesse and incessuous person: all others wist not whom the oracle meant; but Cyane knowing full well the will of Apollo, tooke her father by the haire, and drew him perforce to the altar, and when she had caused him to be killed, sacrificed her selse after upon him: as writeth Dossibeus in the third booke of the Chronicles of Cicily.

Whiles the feaft of Buchus called Buchus liawas celebrated at Rome, there was one Aruntus who never in all his life had drunke wine but water onely, and alwaies despifed the power of god Buchus: who to be revenged of him, caused him one time be so drunke that he forced his owne daughter Medulins, & abused her bodie carnally; who having knowledge by his ring who it was that did the deed, and taking to her a greater heart than one of her age, made her father one day drunke, and after the had adorned his head with garlands & chaplets of slowers, led him to aplace to called the asteroid Thunder, where with many teares she facrificed him who had surprised her, & take away her virginity, as writeth Aristides the Milestania his third booke of Italian Chronicles.

20 Frech: heis warring upon Eumolpus, was advertifed that he should win the victorie, if before he went into the field he facrificed his owne daughter unto the gods: who when he had imparted this mater unto his wife Praxishes, he offered his daughter in facrifice before the battelly hercof Euripides maketh mention in his tragoedie Erechtheus.

Marius maintaining ware against the Cimbrians, and finding himselfe too weake, saw avifion in his sleepe, that promised him victory, if before he went to battell, he did facrifice his daughter named Caspumia: who setting the good of the weale publicke, and the regard of his countrimen, before the natural affection to his owne blood, did accordingly and wan the field: 10 and even at this day, two altars there be in Germanie, which at the verie time and hower that this facrifice was offered, yeeld the found of trumpets: as Dorotheus reporteth in the third booke of the Annales of Italy.

21 Cyumppus a Tueffalian borne, used ordinarily to go on hunting; his wife a young gentlewoman intertained this fancie of jealousse in her head, that the reason why he went forth so often, and staicd so long in the forrest, was because he had the companie of some other woman whom he loved: whereupon she determined with her selfe to lie in espiall: one day therefore the followed and traced Cyamippus, and at length lay close within a certaine thicket of the forrest, waiting and expecting what would fall out and come of it. It chanced that the leaves and branches of the thrubs about her stirred: the hounds imagining that there was some wild beast with 30 in, selfed upon her, and so tare in pieces this young dame (that loved her husband so well) as if the had beene a savage beast. Cyamippus then seeing before his eies, that which he never would have imagined or thought in his mind, for verie griefe of heart killed himselse as Parthenius the Poet hat helt in writing.

In Sybaris a citie of Italy, there was fometime a young gentleman named Aemilius, who being abcautifull person, and one who loved passing well the game of hunting, his wife who was young also, thought him to be enamoured of another ladie: and therefore got her selfe close within a thicket, and chanced to stirre the boughes of the shrubs and bushes about her. The hounds thereupon that ranged and hunted thereabout, light upon her and tare her body in pieces: which when her husband saw, he killed himselfe upon her, as Clytonimus reportethin his 40

2.2 Smyrna the daughter of Cimpras having displeased and angred Venum, became enamored of her owne father, and declared the vehement heat of her love unto her nourie. She therefore by a wily device went to worke with her master, and bare him in hand that there was a faire damosella neighbours daughter, that was in love with him, but abashed and assmalled to come unto him openly, or to be scene at all with him: the master believed this & lay with her: but one time above the rest, destrous to know who she was with whom he companied, called for a light; and so some as he knew it was his owne daughter, he drew his sword, and sollowed after this most vilanous and and incestious filth, intending to kill her: but by the providence of Venum, transformed the was into a tree, bearing her name, to wit, Myrtle, as Theodorus reporteth in his Me-50 tamorphoses or transmutations.

Waleria Tufculanaria, having incurred the displeasure of Venus; became amorous of her owne father, and communicated this love of hersunto her nourse: who likewise went cunningly about her master, and made him believe that there was a young maiden a neighbous child, who was infuncie with him, but would not in regard of modeltie be knowen unto him of it not be seen when the should frequent his companie. Howbeither sather, one night being drunk called for a candle: but the nourse prevented him, and in great hast wakened her: who see the same upon into the countrey great with child: where she cast her selfedowne from the pitch of a steep place, yet the fruit of her wombe lived; for not with standing that fall she did not miscarie, but continued still with her great belly: and when her time was come, delivered she was of a sonne, such an one as in the Roman language is named Sylvanus, and in Greeke Aegipanes. Valerius the stather tooke such a thought thereupon, that for verie anguish of mind he threw himselse downe headlong from a steepe rocke: as recordeth Aristides the Milesian in the third booke of Italian histories.

23 After the destruction of Trop, Diamedes by a tempest was cast upo the coast of Libya, where raigned a king named Lyans: whose maner and custome was so sacrifice unto his owne father 10 god Mars, all those strangers that arrived and were fer aland in his countrey. But Callirabbe his daughter catting an affection unto Diamedes, betraied her father, and saved Diamedes by delivering him out of prison. And he again enor regarding her accordingly, who had done him so good a turne, departed from her and sailed away: which indignite she tooke so neere to the heart, that she hanged her selse, and so ended her daies: this writesth Juba in the third booke of the Libyan historie.

Calpurnius Crassus a noble man of Rome, being abroad at the warres together with Regulus, was by him sent against the Massilians, forto seize a stronge castle, and hard to be won, named Garaton; but in this service being taken prisoner and destined to be killed in facrifice unto Saturne, it fortuned that Bysatia the kings daughter sans the fast be betraied her sather, and 20 putthe victory into her lovers hand; but when this yoong knight was retired and gone, the damfell for fortow of heart cut her owne throat: as written Hessaus in the third booke of the Libian historie.

24. Priamus king of Troy, fearing that the city would be lost, sent his yoong sonne Polydorus into Thrace, to his sonne in law Polymester who married his daughter, with a great quantity of golde: Polymester for very coverous liefte, after the destruction of the city, murdered the childe, because he might gaine the gold: but Heenbabeing come into those parts, under a colour and pretence that the should bestow that goldeupon him, together with the helpe of other dames prisoners with her, plucked with her owne hands both eies out of his head: witnesse Euripides the tragedian poet.

In the time that Hanniball overran and wasted the countrey of Campania in Italy; Lucius

*Janber bestowed his sonne Rustius for safetie, in the hands of a sonne in law whom he had, *Oe, Thryminamed Valerius Gestius, and left with him a good summe of money. But when this Campanian imbed had Anniball had wonne a great victorie, for very avarice he brake all lawes of nature, and murdered the childe. The father Thymbris as he travelled in the countrey lighting upon the dead corps of his owne fonne, fent for his fonne in law aforefaid, as if he meant to thew him fome great treafure: who was no fooner come, but he plucked out both his eies, and afterwards crucified him: as Ariftides testifieth in the third booke of his Italian histories.

25 Aeasew begat of Pfamatha one fonne named Phoese, whom he loved very tenderly: but Telamon his brother not well content therewith, trained him foorth one day into the forch a 40 hunting, where having rouzed a wilde bore, he launced his javelin or bore-speare against the childewhom he hated, and so killed him: for which fact, his father banished him: as Dorothews telleth the tale, in the first booke of his Metamorphoses.

Cajus Maximus had two fonnes, Similius and Rhefus: of which two, Rhefus he begat upon Ameria, who upon a time as he hunted in the chafe, killed his brother, and being come home againe, he would have perfuaded his father that it was by changee, and not upon a propenfed malice that he flew him: but his father when he knew the truth exiled him: as driftoeles hath recorded in the third booke of Italian Chronicles.

26 Mars had the company of Althea, by whom she was conceived and delivered of Meleager: as witnesseth Euripides in his tragoedie Meleager.

Septimus Mareellus, having maried Sylvia, was much given to hunting, and ordinarily went to the chafe: then Mars taking his advantage, difguifing himlelfe in habit of a shepherd; forced this new wedded wife, and gar her withchilde; which done, he bewraied unto her who he was, and gave her a launce or speare, faying unto her: That the generositie and descent of that issue which the should have by him, constitution that launce: now it happed that Septimus slew Tusquinus: and Mamereus when he facrificed unto the gods for the good encrease of the sinus upon the earth, neglected Ceres onely; whereupon she taking displeasure for this contempt, fent a great wilde bore into his countrey: then he affembled a number of hunters to chase the faid beast and killed him; which done, the head and the skinne he sent unto his espoused wise:

Scimbrates and Muthias her unckles by the mother-side, offended heereat, would have taken all away from the damosell: but hee tooke such displeasure thereat, that hee slew his kinsmen: and his mother for to be revenged of her brethrens death, buried that cursed speare: as Menglus reporteth in the third booke of the Italian histories.

27 Telamon the sonne of Acasus and Endeis, fledde by night from his father, and arrived in the sile of Eubea, * * The sather perceiving it, and supposing him to be one of his subjects, gave his daughter to one of his guard, for to be cast into the sea; but he for very commiferation and pitty, sould her to certaine merchants; and when the shippe was arrived at Sala.

mis, Telamon chaunced to buy her at their hands, and she bare unto him Ajax: witnesse Areta- 10

dos the Gnidian, in the second booke of his Insular affaires.

Lucius Trocius hadby his wife Patris, a daughter named Florentia: her Calpharnius a Romane deslowred: whereupon he commaunded the yoong maid-childe which she bare, to be cast into the sea; but the souldiour who had the charge so to doe, tooke compassion of her, and chose rather to sell her unto a merchant; and it fortuned so, that the ship of a certeine merchant arrived in Italy, where Calphurinus bought her, and of her body begat Contruscus.

28 Acolus king of Tuskan, had by his wife Amphithea fix daughters, and as many fonnes; of whom Macareus the yoongest, for very love defloured one of his sisters, who when the time came brought foorth a child: when this came once to light, her father sent unto her a sword, and she acknowledging the fault which she had committed, killed her-selfe therewith, and so 20 did afterwards her brother Macareus: as Sostratus reporteth in the second booke of the Tuscan

Papyrius Polucer, having espoused Julia Pulchra, had by her fix daughters, and as many fonnes; the eldest of whom named Papyrius Romanus, was enamoused of Canulia, one of his fifters to as she was by him with childe: which when the father understood, hee fent unto her likewise a sword, wherewith she made away her-selfe; and Romanus also did as much: thus Christian in the state of the state of fippus relateth in the first booke of the Italian Chronicles.

29 Aristorymus the Ephesian, sonne of Demostratus, hated women, but most unnaturally he had to doe with a she asse; which when time came, brought foorth a most beautifull maide childe, surnamed Onoseelis: as Aristotle written in the second booke of his Paradoxes or strange 30 accidents.

Fulvius Stellus was at warre with all women, but yet he dealt most beastly with a mare, and she bare unto him after a time, a faire daughter, named Hippona: and this is the goddesse for sooth that hath the charge and overseeing of horses and mares: as Agestlaus hath set downe in the third booke of Italian affaires,

30 The Sardians watted upon a time against the Smyrneans, & encamped before the walles of their city; giving them to understand by their embassadors, that raise their siege they would not, unless they sentent them their wives to lie withall: the Smyrneans being driven to this extremity, were at the point to doe that which the enemies demanded of them: but a certeine extremity, were at the point to doe that which the enemies demanded of them: but a certeine waiting maiden there was, a faire and welfavoured damosell, who ranne unto her master Phi-40 larkhus and said unto him, that he must not faile but in any case chuse out the fairest wenches that were maide-servants in all the citie, to dresse them like unto citizens wives, and free borne women, and so to send them unto their enemies in stead of their mistresses, which was effected accordingly; and when the Sardians were wearied with dealing with these wenches, the Smyrneans issued foorth, surprized and spoiled them: whereupon it commeth that even at this day in the citie of Smyrnes there is a soldenne seast named Eleutheria: upon which day, the maideservants weare the apparell of their mistresses which befree women: as saith Dossabus in the third booke of Lydian chronicles.

Antepomarus king of the Gaules, when he made warre upon the Romans, gave it out flatly and faid, that he would never diflodge and breake up his campe before they fent unto them their so wives, for to have their pleasure of them: but they by the counsell of a certeine chamber maide, sent unto them their maid-servants: the Barbarians medled so long with them, that they were tired, and sell sound assept in the end: then Rhetana (for that was her name who gave the said counsell) tooke a branch of a wilde sigge tree; and mounting up to the toppe of a rampier wall, gave a signall thereby to the Consuls, who sallied foorth and deteated them; whereupon there is a seasitivall day of chambermaids: for so sait Aristides the Milesian, in the first booke of the

31 When the Athenians made warre upon Eumalpus, and were at some default of victuals, pyrander who had the charge of the munition & was treasurer of the State (for to make spare of the provision) diminished the ordinary measure, and cut men short of their allowances: the inhabitants, suspecting him to be a traitor to his country in so dooing, stoned him to death as Callistratus testificieth in the third booke of the Thracian history.

The Romans warring upon the Gaules, and having not sufficient store of victuals, cinnal abridged the people of their ordinary measure of corne: the Romans suspecting the rupon that he made way thereby to be king, stoned him likewise to death: witnesse Aristides in his third booke of Italian histories.

32 During the Peloponnefiack warre, Pififratur the Orchomenian hated the nobles and affected men of base and low degree; whereupon the Senators complotted and resolved among them selves to kill him in the Counsell house, where they cut him in pieces, and every one put a gobbet of him in his bosome, and when they had so done they scraped and elensed the short where his blood was shed. The common people having some suspicion of the matter rushed into the Senat house; but Tiesmachur the kings youngest some, who was privy to the foresaid conspiracie, withdrew the multitude from the common place of affembly; and affured them that he saw his sather Pisitratur carying a more stately majesty in his countenance than any mortal man, ascending sup with great celerity the top of mount Pisaus, as Theophilus recordeth in the second of his. Peloponnessackes.

In regard of the warrs forecre unto the city of Rome, the Roman Senat cut the people fhortof their allowances in corne: whereat Romailus being not well pleafed, allowed it them a gaine, rebuked, yea and chaftifed many of the great men: who thereupon banded againft him and in the middeft of the Senat house made him away among them, cut him in pieces, and beflowed on every man a flice of him in his bosome. Whereupon, the people ran immediately with fire in their hands to the Senat house minding to burne them all within; but Proculus a noble man of the city assured them, that he saw Romains upon a certeine high mountaine, and that he was bigger than any man living and become a very god. The Romans beleeved his words, (such authority the man carted with him) and so retired back, as Arislobulus writeth in the third booke of his Italian Chronicles.

33 Pelops the fonne of Tantalus and Eurianassa, wedded Hippodamia who bare unto him Atreus and Thressess that of the Nimph Danais a concubine, he begat Chrysspass, whom he loved better than any of his legitimate sonness him Lains the Theban being inamoured stole away by force; and being attached and intercepted by Atreus and Thresses, obtained the good grace and savour of Pelops to enjoy him, for his love, sake. Howbeit Hippodamia perswaded her two sonnes Atreus and Thresses to kill him, as if she knewthat he aspired to the kingdome of their stater: which they resulting to doe, she her selfe imploied her owne hands to perpetrate this detectable saction one night as Layus lay found asseep, the drew forth his sword, and when she had wounded the sings of the selfert, she sleept, she sisten with being now halfe dead, discharged and acquit him and revealed the whole truth of the matter: whereupon Pelops caused the dead body to be enterred, but Hippodamia he banished: as Dositheus recordethin his booke Pelopida.

Hebius Tolleix having espoused a wise named A neeria, had by her two children: but of an infranchised bond woman he begat a son named Phemius Firmus a childe of excellent beauty, whom he loved more deerely than the children by his lawfull wise. X neeria detesting this base son of his, solicited her own children to murder him; which when they (having the seare of God before there eyes) resused to do, the enterprised to execute the deed her selfe. And in truth she drew forth the sword of one of the squires of the body in the night season, and with it gave him a deadly wound as he lay fast assessed the forestald squire was suspected and called in question for this act, for that his sword was there sound; but the childe himselse discovered the truth: his so fasher then commanded his body to be buried; but his wife he banished: as Dosabens recordeth in the third booke of the Italian Chronicles.

34 These being in very truth the naturall sonne of Nepraue, had a sonne by Hippolite aprincesse of the Amazones whose name was Hippolites: but afterwards maried againe, and brought into the house a stepmorter named Phadra, the daughter of Minos: who falling in love with her sonne-inlaw Hippolites, sent her nourse for to sollicite him: but he giving no eare unto her, lest Athens and went to Troezen, where he gave his minde to hunting. But the wicked and unchaste woman seeing her selse studies and disapointed of her will, wrot shrewd letters unto her husband against this honest and chaste yong gentleman, informing him of many lies, and when the had to done, strangled her felfe with an halter, and to ended her daies. The few giving credit unto her letters, befought his father Neptune of the three requelts, whereof he had the choife, this one; namely, to worke the death of Hippolytus. Neptune to fatisfie his mind, fent out unto Hippolytus as he rode along the feafide, a monstrous bull, who so affrighted his coatch horses, that they overthrew Hippolyrus, and so he was crushed to death.

Comminius Super the Laurentine, having a fonne by the nimph Aegeria, named Comminius, efpoused afterwards Gidisa, and brought into his house a stepmother, who became likewise amorous of her fon-in law; and when the faw that the could not speed of her defire, the hanged her felfe, and left behind her certaine letters devised against him containing many untruths. Com- 10 minius the father having read these slanderous imputations within the faid letters, and beleeving that which his jealous head had once conceived, called upon Neptune, who prefented unto Comminus his fonce as he rode in his chariot, a hideous bull: which fet his feeds in fuch a fright, that they fell a flinging, and so haled the young main that they diffmembred and killed him : as Do. fitheus reported in the third booke of the Italian historie.

35 When the pestilence raigned in Lacedamon; the oracle of Apollo delivered this answer: That the mortalitie would cease, in case they sacrificed yearly, a young virgin of noble blood. Now whe it fortuned that the lot one yeere fell upo Helena, so that she was led forth all prepared and fet out readie to be killed; there was an eagle came flying downe, caught up the sword which lay there, and caried it to cerraine droves of beafts, where the laid it upon an heyfer: whereupon 20 ever after they forbare to facrifice any more virgins; as Ariftodemus reporteth in the third Col

The plague was fore in Falery, the contagion thereof being verie great, there was given out an oracle, That the faid affliction would stay and give over, if they factificed yeerly a yong maiden unto Juno: and this superstition continuing alwaies still Faleria Luperca was by lot called to this facrifice: now when the fword was readie drawen, there was an eagle came downe out of the aire and caried it away : and upon the altar where the fire was burning laid a wand, having at one end in maner of a little mallet: as for the lword, the laid upon a young heyfer, feeding by the temple fide; which when the young damfell perceived, after the had factificed the faid heyfer, and taken up the mallet, the went from house to house, and gently knocking therewith all those 30 that lay ficke, raifed them up and faid to everie one : Be whole and receive health : whereupon it commeth that even at this day this mysterie is still performed and observed : as Aristides hath reported in the 919. book of his Italian histories.

36 Phylonome the daughter of Nyclimus and Arcadia, hunted with Diana; whom Mars difguifed like a thepherd, got with child. She having brought foorth two twinnes, for feare of her father threw them into the river Erymanthus: but they by the providece of the gods, were caried downe the streame without harme or danger, and at length the current of the water cast themupon an hollow oake, growing up on the banke fide, whereas a fine woolfe having newly kennelled had her den. This woolfe turned out her whelps into the river, and gave fucke unto the two twins above faid: which when a shepherd named Tyliphus, once perceived and had a fight of, he tooke 40 up the little infants, and caused them to be nourished as his owne children, calling the one Lyca-flus, and the other Parrhasius, who successively reigned in the realme of Areadia.

Amulius bearing himselse insolently and violently like a tyrant, to his brother Numitor; first killed his fonne Aenitus as they were hunting; then his daughter Sylvia he cloifted up as a religious nunne to serve Juno. She conceived by Mars; and when shee was delivered of two twins, confessed the truth unto the tyrant: who standing in feare of them, caused them both to be cast into the river Tybria; where they were carried downe the water unto one place, whereas a shee woolfe had newly kennelled with her yoong ones: and verily her owne whelps flee abandoned and cast into the river; but the babes shee suckled. Then Faust we the shepherd chauncing to espie them, tooke them up and nourished as his owne; calling the one Remue, and the other Ro-50 mulus : and these were the sounders of Rome citie: according to Artstides the Milesian in his lta-

37 After the destruction of Troy, Agamemnon together with Cassanara was murdred : but Orestes who had beene reared and brought up with Strophius, was revenged of those murderers of his father: as Pyrander faith in his fourth booke of the Peloponnefian historie.

Fabius Fabricianus, descended lineally from that great Fabius Maximus, after he had wonne and facked Tuvium, the capitall citie of the Samnites, fent unto Rome the image of Pense Victor refle, which was so highly honoured and worthipped among the Samnites. His wife Fabir had committed adulterie, with a faire and well favoured yoong man, named Petronius Valentinis, and afterwards treacheroufly killed her husband. Now had Fabia his daughter faved her brother Fibriciana, being a verie little one, out of danger, and fent him away fecretly to be nourished and brought up. This youth when he came to age killed both his mother and the adulterer alfo; for which act of his acquit he was by the doome of the Senate: as Dofabetal delivereth the ftorie in the third booke of the Italian Chronicles.

38 Busiris the sonne of N eptune, and Anippe daughter of Nilus, under the colour of pretendedhofpitalitie, and courteous receiving of thrangers, used to farrifice all pallengers : but divine To justice met with him in the end, and revenged their death for Hercules set upon him and killed him with his club : as Agathon the Samian hath written.

Hercules as he drave before him thorow Italy, Geryons kine, was lodged by king Faunus the fonne of Mercurie, who used to facrifice all strangers and guests to his father: but when hee meant to do fo unto Hercules, was himfelfe by him flaine: as writeth Dercyllus in the third booke of the Italian histories.

39 Phalaris the tyrant of the Agrigentines (amercilesse prince) was wont to corment & put to exquifite paine fuch as paffed by or came unto him : and Perillus (who by his profession) was askilfull braffe-founder, had framed an heyfer of braffe, which he gave unto this king, that hee might burne quicke in it the faid ftrangers. And verily in this one thing did this tyrant frew 30 himselfe just for that he caused the artificer himself to be put into it : and the faid lieyser seemed to low, whiles he was burning within: as it is written in the third booke of Causes.

In Aegesta a citie of Sicilie, there was sometime a cruell tyrant, named Aemilius Censorime, whose manner was to reward with rich gifts those who could invent new kinds of engines to put men to torture: fo there was one named Aruntius Paterculus, who had devited and forged a brasen horse, and presented it unto the foresaid tyrant, that he might put into it whom he would And in truth the first act of justice that ever he did was this, that the partie himselfe, even the maker of it gave the first hansell thereof; that he might make triall of that torment himselfe, which he had devised for others. Him also hee apprehended afterwards; and caused to bee throwen downe headlong from the hill Tarpeius. It should seeme also that such princes as reigned with 30 violence, were called of him Aemylii: for fo Ariftides reporteth in the fourth booke of Italian Chronicles.

40 Euenus the fon of Alars & Sterope, tooke to wife Alcippe daughter of Oenomaus, who bare unto him a daughter, named Marpiffa, whom he minded to keepe a virgin still: but Aphareus feeing her, carried her away from a daunce, and fled upon it. The father made fuee after, but not able to recover her: for verie anguith of mind, he cast himselfe into the river of Eyeormas, and thereby was immortalized: as faith Dosithens in the fourth booke of his Italian historie.

Anius king of the Tuskans, having a faire daughter, named Salia; looked straightly unto her that she should continue a maiden: but Cathetus one of his nobles, seeing this damosell upon a time as the disported herselfe was enamoured of her, and not able to suppresse the furious passi-40 on of his love, ravished her and brought her to Rome. The father pursued after; but seeing that he could not overtake them, threw himfelfe into the river, called in those daies Pareissus, and afterwards of his name Anio. Now the faid Catherus lay with Salta, and of her bodic begat Salius and Latinus; from whom are discended the noblest families of that countrey: as Ariftides, the Milefian, and Alexander Polyhistor, write in the third booke of the Italian historie.

41. Egestratus an Ephelianborne, having murdered one of his kinsmen, sled into the citie Delphi, and demaunded of Apollo in what place he should dwell & who made him this answere, that he was to inhabit there, whereas he faw the peafants of the countrey dauncing, and crowned with chaplets of olive branches. Being arrived therefore at a certaine place in Afia, where he found the rurall people crowned with garlands of olive leaves, and dauncing; even there hee 50 founded a citie, which he called Elaus: as Pythooles the Samian writeth in the third booke of his Georgicks.

Telegonus the some of Visifes by Circe, being sent for to seeke his father, was advised by the oracle to build a citie there, where he should find the rusticall people and husbandmen of the countrey, crowned with chaplets and dauncing together: when he was arrived therefore at a certaine coast of Italie, seeing the peasants adorned with boughes & branches of the wild olive tree, passing the time merily, and dauncing together; he built a citie, which upon that occurrent Hhhh 3

tion of cretaine or asours, how it hathengen ared much confusion, ruined the most part of such personages them(elves: and finally overthrowen the publick estate: which he seemeth express to have noted and observed, to the end that every one might see show dangerous (in the managemes of State affaires) he is who hath no good parts in him but onely a fine and nimble tongue. His meaning therefore is, that lively vertue indeed hould be joined unto eloquence: meane while, we observe also the lightnesse, vanitie, and ingratitude of the Athenian people in many places : and in the divers complexions of these ten men here depainted; evident it is, how much availeth in any person, good instruction from his infancie, and how powerfull good teachers be, for to frame and fashion tender minds unto high matters, and important to the weale publicke. In perufing and passing through this treatise, a man may take knowledge of many points of the ancient popular government, which serve verie well to the bester under 30 flanding of the Greeke historie, and namely, of that which concerneth Athens: As also by the recompenfes both demanded, and also decreed in the behalfe of vertuous men, we may perceive and see amone the imperfections of a people which had the soveraigntie in their hands, some moderation from time to time: which ought to make us magnific the wisedome and providence of God, who amid so great darkneffe, hathmaintained so long as his good pleasure was, so many States and governours in Greece, which afterwards fell away and came to nothing, so as at this present that goodly countrey is become subject, and made thrall to the most violent, wicked and wretched nation under heaven.

ANTIPHON. I.

N tipho the fonne of Saphilus, and borne in the borough and corporation of Karannum, was brought up as a scholar under his owne father, who kept a Rhetorick schoole, whereunto Alcibiades also (by report) was wont to go and refort when he was 2 young boy, who having gotten sufficiencie of speech and eloquence, as some thinke, himselfe, (such was the quicknesse of his wit, and inclination of of his nature) he betooke himselfe to affaires of State: and yet he held a schoole neverthelesse, where he was at some difference with Socrates the Philosopher in matter of learning and oratorie, not by way of contention and æmulation, but in maner of reprehension

& finding fault with some points, as Xenophon testifieth in the first booke of his Commentaries, as touching the deeds and fayings of Socrates. He penned orations for forne citizens at their request for to be pleaded and pronounced in judiciall courts : and as it is given out by some was the first who gave himselfe to this course, and professed so to do : for there is not extant one oration written in maner of a plea, by any oratours who lived before his time, no more by those that flourished in his daies (for it was not the maner yet and custome to compose oraions for others) Themistocles (I meane) Pericles, and Aristides; notwithstanding that the time presented unto them many occasions, yea and meere necessities so to do : neither was it upon their infusficiencie; that they thus abstained, as it may appeare by that which Historians have written of everieone of these men above mentioned. Moreover if we looke into the most ancient oratours whom we can cal to mind, to wit, Alcibiades, Critias, Ly lines and Architochus, who have writ-10 ten one & the fame stile, and exercised the same forme & maner of pleading; it wilbe found that they all conversed and conferred with Antiphon, being now very aged and farre stept in vecres: for being a man of an excellent quicke and readie wit, he was the first that made and put forth the Institutions of oratorie; so as, for his profound knowledge he was surnamed Nessor. And Cetilius in a certaine treatife which he compiled of him, conjectureth, that he had beene fometime schoolemaster to Thueydides the Historiographer; for that Antipho is so highly commended by him. In his speeches and orations he is verie exquisite and ful of perswassion, quicke and fubillin his inventions: in difficult matters verie artificiall; affailing his adversarie after a covere maner; turning his words and fayings respective to the lawes, and to move affections withal, aiming alwaies to that which is decent & feemely, and carying the best apparance & shew with it. Melived about the time of the Persian warre, when Gorgias Leoninus the great professor in Rhetoricke flourished, being somewhat yonger than he was: and he continued to the subversion of the popular state and government, which was wrought by the 400 conspirators, wherin himfelfe feemed to have had a principall hand, for that he had the charge and command of two great gallies at fea, and was befides a captaine and had the leading of certaine forces: during which time he wan the victorie in divers battels, and procured unto them the aide of many allies : also he moved the young and luftie able man of warre to take armes; he rigged, manned, and fer our fixtie gallies, and in all their occasions was fent embassadour to the Lacedæmonians, when as the citie Eetionia was fortified with a wall: but after that those 400 before said were put downe and overthrowen, he was together with Archiptolemus one of the 400, accused for the conspi-30 racie, condemned and adjudged to the punishment which is due unto traitours. His corps was cast forth without sepulture; himselfe and all his posteritie registred for infamous persons upon record: and yet some there be who report, that he was put to death by the 30 tyrants, and namely among the rest, Lyfus testifieth as much in an oration which he made for Antiphoes daughter; for a little daughter he had, unto whom Callesehrus made claime in right for his wife: and that the thirtie tyrants wee they who put him to death, Theopompus beareth witnesse in the fifteenth of his Philippickes. But more moderne furely was this man, and of a later time, yea and the sonne of one * Lystdonides, of whom Cratinas maketh mention, as of no wicked man in his * or Simonides, commedie called Pytine. For how should he who before was executed by shole 400 returne to life againe in the time of the thirtie usurpers or tyrants: but his death is reported otherwise;

40 namely, that being verie aged he failed into Cicily, when as the tyrannic of the former Denys was at the highest: and when the question was proposed at the table, which was the best brasse? as fome faid this, and others that : he answered, that for his part he thought that braffe was best, whereof the statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton were made : which when Denys heard, he imagining that the speech imported thus much covertly, as to set on the Syracusians, for to attempt some violence upon his person, commanded him to be put to death. Others report, that the faid tyrant gave order that he should be made away, upon indignation that he skoffed at his

There be extant in this oratours name three score orations; whereof as Cecilius saith 25 are untruly reported to be his. Noted he is and taxed by Plato the comicall poet, together with 10 Pylander, for avarice & love of money. It is faid moreover, that he compoled certain etragoedies alone, and others with Diany fins the tyrant, who joined with him. At the fame time also when he gave his mind unto Poetrie, he devised the art of curing the griefes and maladies of the minde, like as physicians pretend skill for to heale the diseases and paines of the bodie. Certes, having built a little house at Corumb in the market place, hee set up a bill on the gate, wherein hee made profession: That he had the skill to remedie by words, those who were vexed and grieved in spirit: and he would demaund of thosewho were amisse, the causes of their sorrow, and according thereto, apply his comforts and confolations. Howbeit afterwards supposing this arrand profession to be too base and meane for him, he turned his studie to Rhetoricke, and raught it. Some there be who attribute unto Antipho the booke of Glaucus the Rhegine as touching poets: but principally is that treatife commended which he made unto Herodotus; as also that which is dedicated to Erafistratus touching the Ideaes; and the oration of Message which he penned for his owne felfe; & another against Demostheres the captaine, which he named Paranomon, for that he charged him to have broken the lawes. Also another oration he wrote against Hippoerates the general commander, & caused him to be condemned for his contumacy, in that he failed to answer at the day affigued for his triall, that verie yeere when Theopompus was Provost of the citie, under whom the foure hundred confpiratours and usurpers of the common-weale were put downe and overthrowen. Now the decree of the Senate by vertue whereof ordained it was: That Amiphon 10 should be judicially tried and condemned, Cecilius hathput downe in these tearmes. The one and twentish day of Prytancia, when Demonicus of Alopece, was feeretarie or publike notarie, Phis tostratus of Pellene chiefe commander, upon the proposition or bill-preferred of Andron the Senate, hath ordained as touching these persons; namely Archiptolemus, Onomacles and Antiphon, whom the captaines have declared againft; that they went in emballage unto Lacedamon, to the losse and detriment of the citie of Athens, and departed from the camp, first in an enemies ship, and so passed by land by Decelia; that their bodies should be attached and cast into prison, for to abide justice and punishment according to law. Item, that the captaines themfelves, with certaine of the Senate, to the number of ten, fuch as it pleafed them to chuse and nominate, should make presentment and give in evidence, that upon the points alledged and 20 prooved, judgement might paffe according. Item that the Thefmothetes (hould eall for the faid persons judicially, the verse next morow after they were committed, and convent them before the judges, after that they be chosen by lot: when and where they should accuse the captaines with the orators abovefaid, of treason ; yea & who soever els would come in, he should be heard. Item, when fentence is concluded and pronounced against them, then the judgement of condemnation shall be executed according to the forme and tenure of the law established, in case of traitors. Vnder the instrument of this decree, was subscribed the condemnation of treason in this manner: Condemned there were of treason, Archiptolemus the sonne of Hippodamus of Agryle,present; Antiphon the sonne of Sophilus, of Rhamus, likewise present: and awardedit was by the court, that these two should be delivered over into the hands of the eleven executors 30 of justice; their goods to be conficate; the difine whereof to be confectate unto the goddeffe Minerva; their houses to be demolished and pulled downe to the very ground; and upon the borders of the plots wherein they flood, this superscription to be written: Here flood the houses of Archiptolemus and of Antiphon, two traitours of the State * * * Alfo, that it might not bee lawfull to enter or burie the bodie of Archiptolemus and of Antiphon within the citie of Athens, nor in any part belonging to their domain on territorie. That their memorie should be infamous, and all their posteritie after them, as well hastards as legitimate: and that who so ever adopted any one of Archiptolemus or Antiphons children for his sonne, himselfe should be held intamous. Finally, that all this should be engrossed and engraven in a columne of brasse, wherein alto thould be fet downe the fentence and decree which passed as concerning Physichus.

ANDOCIDES. II.

A Mocides was the some of that Leagoras, who somatime made a peace betweenethe Athenians and the Lacedemonians; borne in the tribe of Cydathene or Thurie, descended from a noble house, and as Hellanicus saith, even from Mercurie; for the race of the Ceryces, that is, Heraults pertaineth unto him: and therefore chosen he was upon a time with Glaucon, for to go with a sleet of twentie saile, to aide the Coreyreans, who warred upon the Corinthians. But after all this, accused he was of impietie and irreligion; for that hee with others had mangled and defaced the images of Mercurie; that stood within the citie: also for that he had tref 50 passed against the holy mysteries and facred ceremonies of Ceres; in as much as being before time a wild youth and loosely given, he went in a maske one night, and brake certaine images of the god Mercurie; whereupon (Iay) he was judicially convented. And because he would not deliver and bring foorth to be examined upon torture, that servant of his, whom his accusers called for, he was held attaint & couviét of that crime which was laid to his charge; yea & for the second imputation charged upon him verie deeply suspected: for which also he was called into question, not long after the setting foorth of the great Armada at sea which went into Sicily, when when the Corinthians had fent certaine Aegefians and Leontines, into the citie of Athens, unto whom the Athenians privately were to yeeld aid & fuccour, in the night feafon they brake all the images of Mercury which flood about the market place, as Cratippus faith. Well, being in pected for offending againft the facred myfteries of Ceres, & thereupon judicially called to his answer, he escaped judgement of condemnation, and was acquit; so that he would discover and declare the delinquents and offenders indeed. Now having emploied his whole studie & endever thereabout, he wrought so, that he found out those who were faultie as touching the facred mysteries aforesaid, among whom was his owne sathers. As for all the rest when they were convicted, the caused them to be put to death: only his fathers life he faved, although he was already in prison; so promising withall that he would done much good service unto the common-weale, wherein he failed not of his word. For Leagons accused many who had robbed and embezilled the cities treasure, and committed other wicked parts, by the meanes whereof he was absolved.

Now albeit Andocides was in great name and reputation for mannaging the affaires of common-weale; yet neverthelesse he fet his mind to trafficke and merchandize at sea; whereby hee got amitie, and entred into league of hospitalitie, which many princes and great potentates, but principally with the king of Cyprus: and it was than, that he stole and carried away a citizens child, the daughter of Aristides and his owne niece, without the privitie and consent of her friends, and sent her closely for a presente one said king of Cyprus: but when he was upon the point to be called in question judicially for this sact, he stole her privily away againe out of Cy20 prus, and brought her home to Athens. Hereupon the king of Cyprus caused hands to be laid upon him, where he was kept in prison; but he brake loose and escaped to Athens, at the verie rime when the foure hundred conspirations and usurpers governed the State: and being by them cast into prison, he got away againe when the said Olygarchie was dissolved. Howbeit he was drawen out of the citie, when the thirtie tyrants ruled all and usurped their government. During which time of his extle, he abode in the citie of Elu: but when Thrassus and his adherents returned into the city, healso repaired this her, and was sent in an embassing to Lacedamon; where being taken againe in a trip, he was for his ill demeanour banished.

All thele premiles appeare evidently by his orations which he hath written; for in fome of them we find how he answere tho those imputations which were charged upon him for violating of the foresid holy mysteries; in others, he generally craveth for the favour of the judges and standeth upon the tearness of mercie; there is an oration also of his extant, as touching the appeaching or discoverie of those, who were faultie for those sacred extermonies; as also his Agologie or defence against Pheans, and cocerning peace. He slourished at the very same time that Socrates the Philosopher was in so great name. But borne he was in the *78 Olympias *Ortoday that yeere wherein Theagemides was provost or chiefe ruler of Athens; so that by this computation he must need be more ancient that Dessays of Andocides, for that this image being dedicated by the tribe or sinage. LYSIAS. III.

L'ssia the sonne of Cephalus, the sonne of Lysanias, who had likewise for his sather Cephalus, borne in Syracuse, but he went to dwell at Athens, partly for the affection that he bare to the citie, and in part through the persuasion of Persules the son of Xantippus, who being his striend so & guest, persuaded him thereto, and the rather for that he was a mightie man there, and exceeding rich: or as some think, he came to Athens by occasion that he was banished out of Syracuse, at what time as the citie was tyrannically oppressed by Gelon: so he arrived at Athens that yeere, wherin Philoseles was provois next after Phrasseles, in the second yeere of the 32 Olympias: at his sufficoming brought up he was, & taught with the noblest Athenians; but after that the citie sent out the colonie of Sybaris, which afterwards was named Thury, he were with his eldest brother Polemarchus: for he had besides him 2, other brethre, Eudemus & Brachillus their sather being now departed this life) to have his part set out & allotted unto him out of his sathers lands, being not fifteene yeeres old, that verie yeere when as Praxiteles was provost: where he remained, and was instructed by Nicias, & Tistas, two Syracusans. Now having bought him an house, with the portion of land which fell unto his share, he lived there, in state of a citizen, and was called to government of common weale, when his lot came, for the space of 63 yeeres, untill the time that Clearchus was provost of Athens: but the yeere next following when Callias was provost: namely, in the 92 Olympias, when as the Sicilians and Athenians fought a field, by reason whereof many of their allies stirred and revolted, and especially those who dwelt in Italy and coasted thereupon, accused he was to have favoured the Athenians and sided with them, and thereupon was banished with three other. Now being arrived at Ashens in the yeere wherein Callias was provost next after Cleoeritus, while the foure hundred usurpers were possessed of to the State, hee there rested: but after the navall battell was stricken neere to a place called the Goats rivers, when as the thirtie tyrants had the administration of the common weale in their hands, banished he was from thence for the space of seven yeeres; lost his goods and his brother Polemarchus; himfelfe escaped with life narrowly out of the house at a posterne gate or backe. doore; in which house he had beene befet with a full purpose that he should end his life there: and then he retired himselfe to the citie Megara, where he abode. When as those of Phila had made a reentric into the citie, and chased out the tyrants; for that he shewed himselfe (above all others) most forward in this enterprise, as having contributed (for the exploiting of this service) two thousand dragmes weight in filver, and two hundred targuets: and being fent besides with Herman, waged three hundred and two fouldiers, and wrought fo effectually with Thraftlem the 20 Elian, his friend and old hoft, that he helped him unto certeine talents of filver; in regard wherof, Thrasibulus (upon his returne and reentry into the city) proposed unto the people: That for and in confideration of these good services, the right of free burgeosie should be granted unto him. This hapned in the yeere of the Anarchie, when there was no provost elected, next before the provoftlhip of Euclides. This was granted and ratified by the people : onely there was one Archinus flood up, and impeached the proceeding thereof, as being against the law, because it was proposed unto the people, before it was consulted upon in the Sonate: so the forefaid decree was anulled and revoked. Thus being difappointed of his right of burgeofie, he remained nevertheleffe (during his life) as a citizen, and enjoyed the fame rights, franchifes and priviledges that other burgeffes did; & fo died in the end, when he had lived the space of source 30 fcore and three yeeres, or as fome fay, three fcore and fixteene; and as others write, foure fcore: fo that he lived to fee Demosthenes achilde. It is faid, that he was borne the yeere that Philoeles was provoft. There goe in his name foure hundred orations; of which number (according to Diony fins and Cecilius) two hundred and thirtie be of his owne making in deed: in the pronouncing of all which, he failed but twice, and had the foile. There is extant also, that very oration which he made against Archinus, in the maintenance and defence of the faid decree; by vertue whereof, the right of burgeofie was given unto him: also another, against the thirtie tyrants. Apt he was to perswade; and in those orations which he gave out to others, very briefe and succinct. There be found likewise of his making, certain eintroductions to Rhetoricke, and speeches delivered publickly before the people; letters missive; solemne praises; funerall orations; 40 discourses of love; and one defence of Socrates, which directly seemed to touch the judges to the quicke. His stile was thought to be plaine and easie, howbeit, inimitable. Demosthenes in one oration which he made against A eara, faith: That he was enamoured of one Mesaneira, a fervant with Neara; but afterwards he espoused and tooke to wife the daughter of his brother Brachyllus. Plato himselse maketh mention of him in his booke entituled Phadrus, as of an oratour passing eloquent, and more ancient than Isocrates. Philifeus who was familiar with Isocrates, and the companion of Lysias, made an Epigram upon him, wherby it appeareth, that he was more ancient, (as also it is evident by that which Plate hath faid) & the Epigram is to this effect:

Now shew Callippes daughter, thou that art so eloquent; If ought of witte spirit thou hast, and what it excellent:
For meet it is that thou should it bring, some little Lysias foorth:
To blaze bis fathers name abroad, for vertuous deeds of woorth.
Who (now transform d, and having caught a bodie strange to see In other worlds for Sapience should now immortall bee)

My loving heart to freed now dead, likewise to not site;
Andto delare his vertuous life unto posseritie.

Hecomposed likewise an oration for Iphicrates, which he pronounced against Harmodius as alfo another wherein he accused Timotheus of treason, and both the one and the other he overto thew: but afterwards when Iphicrates tooke upon him againe to enquire into the dooings of Timotheus, calling him to account for the revenues of the State which he had mannaged, and fer in hand againe with this accusation of treason, hee was brought into question judicially, and made answere in his owne defence by an oration that Lysus penned for him. And as for himselfe he was acquit of the crime and absolved; but Timotheus was condemned and fined to pay a great summe of money. Moreover, he rehearsed in the great affembly and solemnity at the Olympick games, a long oration, wherein he perswaded the Greekes, that they should be reconciled one to another, and joine together for to put downe the tyrant Dionysius.

ISOCRATES. IIII.

Socrates was the fonne of one Theodorus, an Erechthian, aman reckoned in the number of I meane citizens, one who kept a fort of fervants under him, who made flutes and hautboies; by whose workmanship he became so rich, that he was able to bring up and set out his children in worshipfull manner. For other sonnes he had besides, to wit, Telesippus and Diomnessus; and also a little daughter unto them. Hereupon it is that he was twitted and flouted by the comicall poets Aristophanes and Stratus, in regard of those flutes. He lived about the 86. Olympias elder than Lysmachus the Myrthinusian by two and twentic yeeres, and before Pluo some seven yeeres. During his childhood, he had as good bringing up as any Athenian whatfoever, as being the disciple & scholar of Prodicus the Chian, of Gorgias the Leontine, of Tysias the Syracu-30 stan, & Theramenes the prosessed Rhetorician: who being at the point to be apprehended & taken by the 30 tyrants, & flying for refuge to the altar of Minerva the Counfeller, when all other friendswere affrighted and amazed: onely Iserates arose and shewed himselfe for to affish and fuccor him, and at the first continued a long time filent. But Theramenes himselfe began and prayed him to defift; faying, that it would be more dolorous and grievous unto him, than his ownecalamitie, in case he should see any of his friends to be troubled and endangered for the love of him. And it is faid, that he helped him to compile certaine Institutions of Rhetoricke, at what time as he was maliciously and fallely flandered before the judges in open court : which Inflitutions are gon under the name and title of Boton.

When he was growen to mans estate, he fortare to meddle in State matters, and in the af-40 faires of common-weale; as well for that he hadby nature a small and feeble voice, as because naturally he was featfull and timorous: and befides, his state was much impaired, by reason that he lost his patrimonie in the warre against the Lacedamonians. It appeared that to other men he had beene affiltant in counfell, and giving testimonie for them in places of judgement: but it is not knewen that he pronounced above one onely oration, to wit, see air motores, that is to fay, concerning counterchange of goods. And having fet up a publicke schoole, he gave himselse to the studie of philosophie, and to write; where he composed his Panegyrique oration, and certaine others of the Deliberative kind: and those that he wrote himselfe, some he read, some he penned for others; thinking thereby to exhort and stirre up the Greekes to devise and performe such duties as beseemed them to doe. But seeing that he missed of his purpose and inten-50 tion, hee gave over that course, and betooke himselse to keepe a schoole: first, as some say, in Chies, having nine scholars that came unto him : where when he saw that his scholars paid him downe in money his Minervals for their schooling, hee wept and said: I see well now that I am fold unto these youthes. He would conferre willingly with those that came to devise and talke with him, being the first that put a difference betweene wrangling pleas or contentious orations, and ferious politike discourses of common-weale, in which herather employed himselfe. He ordained magistrates in Chios, erecting the same forme of government there, which was in his ownecountrey. He gathered more filver together by teaching schoole, than ever any professor in Rhetoricke or schoole-master was knowen to have done; so that he was well able to destray the charges of a galley at fea. Of scholars he had to the number of one hundred: and among manv others, Timotheus the sonne of Conon; with whom he travelled abroad, and visited many cities: he penned all those letters which Timotheus sent unto the Athenians; in regard whereof he beflowed upon him a talent of filver, the remainder of that money due by composition from Samos. There were besides of his scholars Theopompus the Chian, and Ephorus of Cumes; Aslepiades allo who composed tragical matters and arguments; and Theodectes, who afterwards wrote tragoedies (whose tombe or sepulcher is as men go toward Cyamite, even in the sacred way or ftreet that leadeth to Eleufis, now altogether ruinate and demolished: in which place he caused to be erected and fet up the statues of famous poets together with him, of all whom there remai- 10 neth none at this day but Homer alone;) also Leodamus the Athenian; Lacritus the law-giver unto the Athenians, and as some say, Hyperides and If eus. And it is said that Demosthenes also came unto him whiles he yet taught a Rhetoricke schoole, with an earnest purpose to learne of him, using this speech: that he was not able to pay him a thousand drachms of silver, which was the onely price that he made and demaunded of everie scholar; but meanes he would make to give him two hundred drachms, so he might learne of him but the fift part of his skill, which was aproportionable rate for the whole; unto whom I forrates made this answere: We use not, Demostbenes, to do our businesse by piece-meale; but like as men are woont to sell faire fishesall whole; even fo will I, if you purpose to be my scholar, teach and deliver you mine art full and entier, and not by halfes or parcels.

He departed this life the verie yeere that Charonides was Provost of Athens; even when the newes came of the discomfiture at Charonea, which he heard being in the place of Hippocrates publicke exercises: and voluntarily he procured his owne death, in abstaining from all food and fuftenance the space of source daies, having pronounced before this abstinence of his, these three first verses which begin three tragedies of Euripides:

1 King Danaus, who fiftie daughters had.

2 Pelopsthe sonne of Tantalus, when he to Pisa came.

3 Cadmus whilom, the citie Sidon left.

He lived 98 yeeres, or as some say, a full hundred, & could not endure for to see Greece sower times brought into servitude : the yeere before he died, or as some write , sower yeeres before 30 he wrote his Panathenaick oration: as for his Panegyrik oration, he was in penning it tenne yeeres, and by the report, of some, fifteene, which he is thought to have translated and borrowed out of Gorgias the Leontine and Lysias: and the oration concerning the counterchange of goods, he wrote when he was fourescore yeeres old & twaine: but his Philippike oration he set downe a little before his death: when he was farre stepped in yeeres, he adopted for his sonne, Aphareus, the yoongest of the three children of Plathane his wife, the daughter of Hippias the oratour, and professed Rhetorician. He was of good wealth, as well for that he called duely for money of his scholars, as also because he received of Nicocles king of Cypres, who was the some of Euggoras, the fumme of twenty talents of filver for one oration which hee dedicated unto him: by occasion of this riches, he became envied, and was thrice chosen and enjoined to be 40 the captaine of a galley, and to defray the charges thereof: for the two first times he feigning himselfe to be sicke, was excused by the meanes of his sonne; but at the third time he rose up and tooke the charge, wherein he spent no small summe of money. There was a father, who talking with him about his fonne whom he kept at schoole, said: That he sent with him no other to be his guide and governour, but a flave of his owne: unto whom I forrates answered: Goe your waies then, for one flave you shall have twaine. Hee entred into contention for the prize at the folemne games which queene Artemifia exhibited at the funerals and tombe of her hufband Maufelus: but this enchomiasticall oration of his which he made in the praise of him, is not extant: another oration he penned in the praise of Helena; as also a third in the commendation of the counfell Areopagus. Some write, that he died by absteining nine daies together 50 from all meat: others report but fower; even at the time that the publike obsequies were solemnized for them who loft their lives in the battell at Cheronea. His adopted fonne Apharens composed likewise certeine orations: enterred hee was together with all his linage and those of his bloud, necre unto a place called Cynofarges, upon a banke or knap of a little hill on the left hand, where were bestowed, the sonne, and father Theodorus; their mother also and her sister Anace, aunt unto the oratour; his adopted fonne likewise Aphareus, together with his cousen germain Socrates, sonne to the a foresaid aunt Anaco Isocrates mothers fifter: his brother Theodorus who bate the name of his father, his nephewes, or children of his adopted some Aphareus, and his naturall Theodorus; moreover, his wise Plathane mother to his adopted some Aphareus: upon all these bodies there were fix tables or tombs erected of stone, which are not to be seen at this day: but there stood upon the tombe of Isoraes himselse, a mightie great ramue engraven, to the height of thirtie cubits, upon which there was afren or mere-maid sevencubits high, to signifie under a figure his milde nature and eloquent stille: there was be sides necre unto him, a table conteining certaine poets and his owne schole-masters: among whom was Gorguas looking upon an astrological sphare, and signification in sturthermore, there is erected a brasen image of his in Eleusin, before the entrie of the gallery Stoa, which Timotheus the sonne of Caron caused to be made, bearing this epigram or inscription:

Timotheus upon a loving minde, And for to honour mutuall kindnesses, This image of stoctates his friende, Eretted hath unto the goddesses.

This statue was the handi-worke of Leochares. There goe under his name threescore orations; of which five and twentie are his indeed, according to the judgement of Diony fius: but as Cecili-#faith, eight and twentie; all the rest are falfly attributed unto him. So farre was he off from oftentation, and so little regard had hee to put foorth himselfe and shew his sufficiencie, that when upon a time there came three unto him, of purpose to heare him declame and discourse, hekept two of them with him, and the third he sentaway, willing him to returne the next morrow: For now (quoth he) I have a full theater in mine auditoric. He was wont to fay also unto his scholars and familiars: That himselfe taught his art for ten pounds of silver; but hee would give unto him that could put into him audacity, and teach him good utterance, ten thousand. When one demanded of him how it was possible that he should make other men sufficient orators, seeing himselse was nothing eloquent: Why not (quoth he) seeing that whet stones which can not cut at all, make iron and fteele sharpe enough and able to cut. Some fay, that he composed certeine books as touching the art of rhetorick; but others are of opinion, that it was not by any method, but exercise onely, that he made his scholars good oratours: this is certaine, 30 that he never demanded any mony of naturall citizens borne, for their teaching. His maner was to bid his scholars to be present at the great affemblies of the citie, and to relate unto him what they heard there spoken and delivered. He was wonderfull heavy and forrowfull out of measure for the death of Socrates, so as the morrow after he mourned & put on blacke for him. Againe, unto one who asked him what was Rhetorick? he answered: It is the art of making great matters of small, & small things of great. Being invited one day to Nicocreen the tyrant of Cypres; as he fat at the table, those that were present, requested him to discourse of some theame; but he answered thus: For such matters wherein I have skill the time will not now serve; and in those things that fit the time, I am nothing skilfull. Seeing upon a time Sophocles the tragicall poet, following wantonly and hunting with his eic, a yoong faire boy; he faid: O Sophocles an ho-40 nest man ought to conteine not his hands onely, but his cies also. When Ephorus of Cunes went from his schoole non proficiens, and able to doe nothing, by reason whereof his father Demophilus sent him againe with a second salary or minervall; Isocrates smiled thereat, and merily called him Diphoros, that is to fay, bringing his money twice: fo hee tooke great paines with the man, and would himfelfe prompt him, and give him matter and invention for his declamatorie exercife.

Inclined he was and naturally given unto the pleasures of wanton love; in regard whereof he used to lie upon a thinne and hard short mattresse, and to have the pillow and bolster under his head perfumed, and wet with the water of saffron. So long as he was in his youth he matted not; but being now striken in age and growen old, he kept a queane or harlot in his house, whose so name was Lagisca, by whom he had a little daughter, who died before she was matted, when she was about twelve yeeres old. After that, he espoused Plathane, the wife of the rhetoritian * Gor* * Mirrian gias, who had three children before, of whom he adopted Aphareus for his owne sonne, as hath beene said before, who caused his statue to be cast in brasse, and erected it neere unto the image of Jupiter Olympius, as it were upon a columne, with this Epigram:

This portraict of Mocrates in braffe, His fonne adopted, Aphaccus, who was, Eretted hath to Jupiter, in view Of all the world thereby to make a shew, That unto gods he is religious,

And honoureth his father vertuous. It is faid, that whiles he was but a youg boy, he ran a course on horsebacke; for he is to be seene all in braffe in the caftle or citadell of the city, fitting and riding his horfe, in forme and proportion of a boy within the tenife court of those priests of Minerva, which attend there, to tarie the facred fecrets, not to be revealed, as some have reported. In all his life time there were two only futes commenfed against him: the former, for the exchange of his goods, being challenged and provoked by Megaclides; for the triall whereof, he appeared not personally at his day, by reason of ficknesse: the second action was framed against him by Lysimachus, for the exchange of his to goods, with charge to defray the expenses of mainteining a galley at sea: in which processe he was call, and forced to fet out a galley. There was also a painted image of his in the place called Pompeisum. And Aphareus composed verily orations, though not many, both judiciall and also deliberative. He made also tragoedies, to the number of seven and thirtie; whereof there be two which were contradicted. And he began to have his works openly heard in publicke place, from the yeere wherein Lyfiftratus was provolt, unto that yeere wherein Sofieles was in place; to eight and twentie yeeres in which time he caufed fix civill plaies to be acted, and twice gained the prize of victorie, having fet them forth by a principall actour or plaier, named Dionysus: and by other actours he exhibited two more, of the Lenaick kind, that is to fay, full of mitth, and

There were the statues also to be seene within the citadell, of the mother of Isocrates and of Theodorus, as also of Anaco her fifter; of which, that of his mother is yet excant; and it standeth necre unto the image of Hygia, that is to fay Health; onely the inscription is changed; but the the other of Anaco is not to be found. This Anaco had two fonces, Alexander by Canes, and

Is AE us. V.

Neus was borne in Chalcis: and being come to Athens, he fludied the works of Lysius, whom he did so neerely imitate, aswell in the apt couching of his words, as in the witty device & subtiltie of his inventions; that if a man were not very well practifed & perfect in the flile and ma- 20 ner of witting of these two orators, hardly he should be able to discerne many of their orations, and diffinguish one from another. He was in greatest name, about the time of the Peloponnefracke warre, as may be conjectured by his orations; and continued unto the reigne of king Philip. He give over his publicke schoole, and went to teach Demosthenes privatly at home, for the fum of ten thousand drachmes of filver; whereby he became very famous : and as some say, he it was that composed for Demostheres certeine exhortatory orations. He left behind him three fcore and foure orations going in his name; whereof fiftie are his indeed; also some particular introductions of his owne, and rules of Rhetoricke. He was the first who began both to forme and to turne the fenfe of his stile unto the politicke management of affaires; a thing that Demost benes doch most of all imitate. Of this oratour, Theopompus the comicall poet maketh men-40 tion in his Thefem.

AESCHINES. VI.

Eschines was the some of Atrometus, (a man who being banished in the time of the thirtie Atyrants, was a meanes to aide the people, and to fet up the popular state againe) and his methers name was Glaucothea. He was of the burrough or tribe Cothocis: fo that his parents were neither for nobilitie of race, nor yet for wealth and riches renowmed in the citie: but being yoong, and of a luftie and able conflitution, he fortified and confirmed the fame more by bodily exercife; and finding himfelfe to have a firong breft and cleere voice; thereupon afterwards he made profession to act tragodies; but (as Demosthenes faid of him by way of reproch) hee 50 went after others, and could never proceed higher than to act the third and last parts in the soleunities of the Bacchanale plaies under one Ariftodemus. When he was but a boy, he taught petties the letters; namely, to fpel and reade together with his father and being of some growth, he ferved as a common fouldier in the warres. The scholar and auditor he was (as some thinke) of Hoerates & Plato; but according to Cecilius, of Leodamas. Being entred into the managing of State affaires, and that not without credit & reputation; because he made head & sided against the faction of Demostheres, emploied he was in many embassinges; and namely unto K. Philip, for to treat of peace: for which, accused he was by Demosthenes, and charged to have beene the cause that the nation of the Phocæans was rooted out, and for that he kindled warre between the Amphyctions and the Amphiffians, what time as he was chosen one of the deputies to be present in the affembly or diet of the Amphyctions, who made also an haven, whereby it hapned withall, that the Amphy ctions put themselves into the protection of Philip, who being wrought by Aelehines, tooke the matter in hand, and conquered all the territorie of Phocis: howbeit, through the port and favourable countenance of Eubulus the sonne of Spintharus a Proballusian, who was of great credit and reputation among the people, and spake in his behalfe, he escaped, and was found unguiltie, and caried it by thirtie voices; although others fay, that the orato tours had penned their orations, and were at the point to plead; but upon the newes of the overthrow at Cheronea, which impeached the proceeding of law, the matter was not called for, nor

The lives of the ten Oratours.

A certeine time after, when king Philip was dead, and his fonne Alexander gone forward in his expedition into Asia, he accused Ctestiphon judicially, for that he had passed a decree contrary unto the lawes, in the honour of Demosthenes; but having on his side not the fift part of the fuffrages and the voices of the people, he was banished out of Athens, and fled to Rhodes, because he would not pay the fine of a thousand drachines, in which he was condemned, upon his overthrow at the barre. Others fay, that over & befide, he was noted with infamie, because he would not depart out of the citie; and that he retired himselfe to Epheson unto Alexander. But upon 20 the decease of Alexander, when there was great troubles towards, he returned to Khodes, where hekept a schoole, and beganne to teach the art of Rhetoricke. He read other-whiles unto the Rhodians (and that with action and gefture) the oration which he had pronounced against Cteliphon; whereat, when all the hearers marvelled, and namely, how possibly he could be cast, if he acted tuch an oration: You would never wonder at the matter (quoth he) my mafters of Rhodes, if you had beene in place and heard Demosthenes impleading against it. He left behinde him a schoole at Rhodes, which afterwards was called the Rhodian schoole. From thence he failed to Samos, and when he had stated a time in the Isle, within a while after, he died. A pleasant and fweet voice he had, as may appeare both by that which Demosthenes hath delivered of him, and alfo by an oration of Demochires.

There be found foure orations under his name; one against Timarchus; another as touching falleembaffage; and a third a gainst Ctesphon, which in truth be all three his: for the fourth entituled Deliaca, was never penned by Aslobines. True it is indeed, that appointed and commanded he was to plead judicially the causes of the temple of Delos: but he pronounced no such oration; for that Hyperides was chosen in stead of him, as faith Demosthenes. And by his owne saying two brethren he had, Aphobus and Demochares. He brought unto the Athenians the first tidings of the second victorie which they obtained at Tamme, for which he was rewarded with a crowne. Some give it out that Aeschines was scholar to none, and never learned his Rhetoricke of any mafter; but being brought up to writing, and a good pen-man, he became a clarke or notarie; and fo grew up to knowledge of himtelfe by his owne industrie, for that he ordinarly conversed 40 in judiciall courts, and places of judgement. The first time that ever he made publike speech before the people, was against king Philip: and having then audience with with great applause and commendation, he was prefently choicn embaffadour, and fent to the Arcadians; whither when he was come, he raifed a power of ten thousand men against Philip. He presented and indited Timarchus for maintaining a brothell house; who fearing to appeare judicially, and to have the cause heard, hung himselfe, as after a fort Demosthenes in some place saith. Afterwards elected he was to go in embassage unto Philip with Cteliphon & Demosthenes, about a treatie of peace, wherein he carried himselfe better than Demosthenes. A second time was hee chosen the tenth maninan embassage, for to goe and conclude a peace upon certaine capitulations and covenants; for which service he was judicially called to his answere and acquit, as hath beene faid 50 before.

Lycurous, VII.

Trangus was the fonne of Lycophron, the fonne of Lycurgus; him I meane whom the thirties Lyrants did to death, by the procurement & instigation of one Aristodemus that came from Bata; who having beene treasurer generall of Greece, was banished during the popular government. Of the borrough or tribe he was named Buta, and of the family or house of the Eteobutades. At the beginning, the scholar he was of Plato the philosopher, and made profession of philotophie: but alterwards being entred into familiar acquaintance with Iforrates, hee became his scholar, and dealt in affaires of State where he wan great credit, as well by his deeds, as words; and so put in trust he was with the mannagement of the cities revenues: for treasurour general he was the space of fifteene yeeres; during which time, there went thorow his hands fortie millions of talents, or as fome Lay, four fore millions fix hundred and fiftie talents. And it was the orator Stratecles who preferred him to this honor, by propounding him unto the people. Thus I fay at the first was he himselfe chosen treasurour in his own name; but afterwards he nominated some one of his friends; and yet neverthelesse mannaged all, and had the whole administration of it in his owne hands; for that there was a Statute enacted and published, that none might be chosen to to have the charge of the publicke treasure above five yeeres. He continued alwaies an overfeer of the citie workes both winter and fummer: and having the office and charge committed unto him for provition of all necessaries for the warres, he reformed many things that were amisse in common-wealth. He caused to be built for the citie source hundred gallies. He made the common hall or place for publicke exercises in Lyceum, and planted the same round about with trees: He reared also the wrettling hall, and finished the theater which is at the temple of Buchus, being himselfe in person to oversee and direct the workmen. He was reputed a man of such sidelitie and so good a conscience, that there was committed upon trust into his hands, to the summe of two hundred and fiftie talents of filver, by divers and fundric private perfons to be kept for their use. He caused to be made many faire vessels of gold and silver to adorne and beautifie the 20 citie: as also fundrie images of Victoric in gold. And finding many publicke workes unperfect and halfe done, he accomplished and made an end of them all; as namely the Artenals, the common hals for armour and other utenfiles and implements, ferving for the cities uses. He founded a wall round about the spatious cloifture, called Panathenaike, which he finished up to the verie cape and batilments; yea and laid levell and even, the great pit or chinke in the ground; for that one Dinim, whose plot of ground it was, gave away the proprietie which he had in it unto the citie, in favour especially of Lycurgues, and for his sake. He had the charge and custodie of the citie, and commission to attache and apprehend malefactours, whom he drave all quit out of the citie; infomuch that fome of the oratours and fubtle fophisters would fay, that Lyeurgue dipt not his pen in blacke inke, but in deadly blood, when he drew his writs against male factours: In 30 regatd of which benefit unto the common weale, so well beloved he was of the people, that when king Alexander demanded to had him delivered into his hands, the people would not forgo him. But when asking Philip made warre upon the Athenians the second time, he went in embaffage with Polycuttus and Domofthenes, as well into Peloponnessus, as to other States and cities. All his time he lived in good estimation among the Athenians, reputed evermore for a just and upright man, in such fort that in all courts of justice, if Lyeurgus said the word, it was held for a great prejudice & good foredoome in his behalfe, for whom he spake. He proposed & brought in certaine lawes; the one to this effect, that there should be exhibited a solemnitie of plates or comedies at the feath Chypro, wherein the poets should do their best, and strive a vie within the the atte for the prife; and who foever obtained victorie, should therewith have the right and free. 40 dome of burgcotte, a thing that before was not lawfull not graunted unto poets; and thus hee brought unto nie and practife againe, a solemne game which he had discontinued. Another, that there should be made at the publike charges of the citie, statues of braffe for the poets Aefchylus, Sophoeles and Euripides; that their tragoodies should be exemplified and engrossed faire, for to be kept in the chamber of the citie; and that the publicke notarie of the citie thould reade them unto the plaiers, for otherwise unlawfull it was to act them. A third there was, that no citizen, nor any other person resiant and inhabitant within the citic of Athens, should be permitted to buy any prisoners taken in warre, such as were of free condition before, to make them slaves, without the confent of their first masters. Item, that within the haven Pyreeum, there should be exhibited a folemne play or game unto Neptune, confifting of round daunces, no fewerthan 50 three: and that unto those who woon the first prise, there should be given for a reward no sewer than ten pound of filver; to the fecond, eight at the least; and to the third, not under fix, according as they should be adjudged by the timpiers. Item, that no dame of Athens might be allowed to ride in a coatch to Eleusin; for feare that the poore might be debased by the rich, and herein reputed their inferiours: but in case any of them were so taken riding in a coatch, she should be fined and pay fix thousanddrachms: now when his owne wife obeied not his law, but was furprized in the manner by the fycophants and promoters, he himselfe gave unto them a whole talent, with which afterwards when he was charged, and accused before the people: You see yet (quoth he) my masters of athens that I am overtaken for giving, and not for taking filter.

He mette one day as he went in the street, a publicane or farmer of the forrain taxes and tributes for the city, who had laid hands upon the philosopher Xenocrates, and would have ledde him to prison in all haste, because he paid not the duties imposed upon strangers; for which he gave the publicane a rappe on the head with the rodde or walking thatte which hee had in his hand, and recovered the philosopher out of his clouches; which done, he cast the said officer himselfe into prison for his labor, as having comitted a great indignity unto such a personage:a few daies after, the fame philosopher meeting him with the children of Lycurgsu: I have (quoth he unto them) my good children rendred thanks unto your father, and that right speedily, in that he is so praised and commended of all men for succouring and rescuing me. He proposed and published certeine publicke decrees, using the helpe heerein of one Euclides an Olynthian, who was thought to be a very fufficient man in framing and penning fuch acts; and albeit he was a wealthy person, yethe never ware but one and the same kinde of garment both winter and fummer, yea, and the fame shooes he went in every day, what need soever was He exercifed himfelfe continually in declaming both night and day, for that he was not fo fit to speak of a fudden and unprovided, upon his bedde or pallet where he lay, he had onely for his covering asheepes skinne, fell and all, and under his head abousster, to the end that the sooner and with more case, he might awake and goe to his study. There was one who reproched him, for that 20 he paid his money still unto sophisters and professed thetoricians, for teaching him to make orations: But (quoth he) againe, if there were any would promife and undertake to profit my children and make them better, I would give him willingly not onely a thousand deniers, but the one moitie of all my goods. Very bold he was and refolute to speake his minde franckly unto the people, and to tell them the truth plainly, bearing himselfe upon his nobility; infomuch as one day when the Athenians would not fuffer him to make a speech in open audience, he cried out with a loud voice; & whippeof corfu, how many talents art thou woorth? Another time, when some there were who called Alexander god: And what maner of god may he be (quoth Lyeurgus, out of whose temple whosoever go, had need to be sprinckled and drenched all over with water to purifie themselves.

After he was dead, they delivered his children into the hands of the eleven officers for execution of justice, for that Thrafieles had framed an accusation, & Menefachmus endited them; but upon the letters of Demosthenes, which in the time of his exilene wrote unto the Athenians, advertifing them that they were ill spoken of about Lyourgus his children, they repented themselves of that which they had done, and let them go: & verily Democles the scholar of Theophrastus justified them, and spake in their defence. Himselfe and some of his children were buried at the cities charges, over and against the temple of Minerva Paonia, within the orchard or grove of Melanthius the philosopher: and found there be even in these our daies certaine tombes with the names of Lycurgus and his children written thereupon. But that which is the greatest thing that foundeth most to the praise of his government, he raised the revenues of the 40 common-weale unto twelve hundred talents, whereas before they amounted but unto threefcore. A little before he died, when he perceived death to approach, hee caused himselfe to be caried into the temple of Cybelethe great mother of the gods, and into the Senate house, desirous there to render an account of his whole administration of the common-weale; but no man wasfo hardy as to come foorth and charge him with any unjust and wrongfull dealing, fave onely Menefachmus; now after he had fully answered those imputations which he charged uponhim, he was caried home againe to his house, where he ended his daies; reputed all his life time for a good and honest man, commended for his eloquence, and never condemned in any fine, notwithstanding many actions and accusations were framed against him.

Three children he had by Califto, the daughter of Abron, and fifter to Caleus, the fonne also for Abron, of the burrough Bata, who was treasurour of the campe during the warres that yeere wherein Cherondus was provost; of this affinitie and alliance, Dinarchus maketh mention, in that oration which he made against Pastius. He left behinde him thele children, Abron after Lyeurgus, and Lyeophron; of whom Abron and Lyeurgus died without issue; but Abron after helad with good reputation and credit, managed State matters, changed this life: and Lyeophron having espoused Calistomacha, the daughter of Philippus Aixenes, begat a daughter named Calesto, matried afterwards to Cleombrosus, the sonne of Dimocrates, an Achamanian, who by her had a sonne named Lyeophron, whom Lyeophron the grand-father adopted for his owne fonne; and he departed this life without children: after the deceale of this Lycophron Callisto was remarried unto Socrates, unto whom the bare a fonne, named Symmachus; who begat Aristonymus; and of Aristonymus came Charmides, whole daughter was Philippe, and the bare a symus; and of Aristonymus came Charmides, whole daughter was Philippe, and the barea fonne, to wit, Listander Medius, who became an interpreter also, one of the Europipidas: of him and of Timothea the daughter of Glaucus descended Laodamia and Medius, who held the priethood of A phune Erectheus: Philippa also a daughter, who afterwards was a religious priethreste, devoted to Minerva; for before time, had Diocles the Melittean espoused her, and the bare him a fonne named skewise Diocles, who was a colonell of a regiment of footmen; and the tooke to wite Hediste the daughter of Abron, of whose body he begat Philippida and Nicossard ta; and Themssock to wite Hediste the daughter of Abron, of whose body he begat Philippida and Nicossard ta; and Themssock to wite tock-beater some of Theophrassus married Nicossard, by whom he had Theophrassus and Diocles, notwithstanding he was priest unto Repume Erechtheus.

There be found of this oratours penning, fifteene orations. Crowned hee was many times by the people; and ordeined there were for him divers statues and images, whereof there was one all of braffe, according to a publike decree of the citie, standing in the street Ceranicum, that yeere when Chaxierates was provost; under whom there was allowed unto himselfe and his fonne Lyeur gus, as allo to his eldest nephew, table and diet in Prytanneum, by vertue of the same decree of the people: howbeit, after the decease of Lyenrgus, Lycophron his eldest sonne made fute by law for this gift and donation. He pleaded also many times for matters of religion, and accused Antolieus the senatour, and one of the high court Areopagus, Lysieles also the captaine, and Demades the sonne of Demius, together with Menefachmus, and many others, whom he 20 overthrew and caused to be condemned every one. Moreover, he called judicially into question Diphilus, for that he tooke away out of the mettal mines, those middle posts or props which supported the weight of earth bearing upon them, by which meanes he enriched himselfe, directly against the lawes: and whereas the penaltie of this crime was death, he caused him to be condemned. He distributed out of his goods, unto every citizen of Athens fiftie drachmes, or as some say, one mus, or pound of silver: for the totall summe of his wealth amounted unto an hundred and threefcore talents. He accused likewise Aristogiton, Cleocrates, and Autolyem, for that being no better than flaves, they caried themselves like men of free condition. This Lycurgus was furnamed Ibis, that is to fay, the blacke Storke: and mencommonly would fay to Lycurgus, this, like as to Xenophon, Nyéteris, that is to fay, the Howlet. The most ancient of this 20 house, were descended from Erectheus, the sonne of the Earth and of Vulcane; but the neerest, from Lycomedes and Lycur gus, whom the people honoured with publicke funerals and obsequies, And this descent of their race, is drawen from those who were priests of Neptune, and set downe in a full and perfect table, which hangeth up in the temple Erecht hium, and was painted by Ifmenias the Chalcidian; where also stand certaine statues of wood, aswell of Lyeurgus as of his children, to wit, Abron, Lycurgus and Lychophron, which fometimes were made by Timarchus and Cephisodorus the sonnes of Praxiteles the imager. He who let up and dedicated the painted table beforefaid, was Abron, unto whom by order of hereditarie fuccession, fell the priesthood, but he gave over his right thereto voluntarily unto his brother Lycophron: this is the reason that he is painted giving a three-forked mace unto his brother. Now this Lycurgus having caused to be 40 engraven upon a square pillar, a briefe of his whole administration of the comon weale, caused it to be planted just beford the wrestling hall, for every man to see it that would. Neither could any man be foud to hardy, as to accuse him for robbing the State, or inverting any thing to his own use. He proposed unto the people, that there should be a coronet given unto 2x coprolemus the fonne of Anticles, and a statue besides, for that he undertooke and promised to gild (all over) the altar of Apollo in the market place, according to the commandement & direction of the oracle. He demanded also, that honour should be decreed for Euonymus the sonne of Diotimus, whose father was Dispithes, in that yeere wherein Cteffeles was provost.

DEMOSTHENES. VIII.

Demostheres the sonne of Demostheres and of Cleobule the daughter of Gylon, of the linage or tribe of Peania, being left an orphan by his father, at the age of seven yeeres, together with a fifter five yeeres olde; during the time of orphanage kept with his mother a widow, and went to schoole unto Isoerates, as some say, or as most men give out, to Isour the Chalcidian the disciple of Isoerates, who lived in Athens: he imitated Thusydides and Plato the Philosopher, in whose schoole there be that say he was first brought up: but as Hegessus the Magnesian reportes.

teth, being advertifed that Calliftrat to the fonne of Empades, an Aphidinean and famous orator, who had bene captaine and commander of a troupe of horfemen, and who had dedicated an altar to Mercurie furnamed Ageraies, that is to fay, the Speaker, was to make a folemne oration unto the people, craved leave of his tutour and fehoolemafter, that he might go to heare him: and no founer had he heard him fpeake, but he was in love with his eloquence.

But as for this oratour, he heard him but a while, even until he left the citie; for banished he was. Now after that he was departed into Thrace, by which time Demosthenes grew to be a yong man, then began he to frequent the company of Iforrares and Plato: howbert, afterwards hee tooke home into his house Is em, whom he enterteined the space of source yeeres, and exercised 10 himselfe in the imitation of his stile, or (as Ctesibius reporteth in his treatile of Philosophie) he wrought fo, that by the meanes of Callins the Syracufian, he recovered the orations of Zethus the Amphipolitane, and by the helpe of Charieles the Chariffian, he got them also of Alcidamus, and those he gaive himselfe wholly to imitate. But in processe of time, when he was come to mans estate, and past a ward, seeing that his tutours and guardians allowed him not sufficiently out of his living and patrimonie, he called them to account for their guardianship, that yeere wherein Timocrates was provost of Athens. Now three tutours or governours he had, to wit, Aphobus, Theripedes, Demophon alias Demea, whom he charged more than the test, being his uncle by the mothers fide: he laied actions upon them of ten talents a piece, and so much he demanded of them by law: he overthrew them all; but he could not come by ought of that where-20 in they were condemned: for neither recovered he money nor favour of the one or the other.

 * When Aristophon was now to aged, that he could not take paines nor attend to tet out the folemne dances and thewes, for which he was chosen commissarie and overseer, he gave over his place, and Demosthenes in his roome was substituted the matter of the said dances: and for that in the open theater as he was bufie in his office about fetting out and ordering the dances, Medias the Anagyrafian, gave him a box of the eare with his fift, he fued him granactio of batterie: howbeit, he gave over his fute for the furn of three thouland drachmes of filver, which Midias paied him. This is reported of him, that being a yoong man, he retired himselfe apart into a certeine cave, where he gave himfelfe unto his booke, having caufed his head to be shaven the halfe of it, because he might not goe abroad to be seene, and so leave his booke: also, that he 30 lay upon a very streight and narrow bed, for that he would the sooner atile, and with more case: and there he exercised and forced himselfe to frame his speech better : but for that he had an ill grace with him, ever as he fpake, to shake and thrinke up his should er, he remedied that, by sticking up a broch or spit, or as some say, a dagger, to the floore over head, that for feare of pricking his thoulder, he might forget this evill cuttome that he had in his getture : and according as he profited and proceeded forward in the art, he caused a mirrour to be made just as bigge as himfelse, before which he used to declame, that thereby he might observe the evill gestures or illavoured faces that he made when he spake, and learne to reforme and amend them: also, he need otherwhiles to goe downe to the water fide, to the haven Phalerium, for to exercise himselfe in declaming, even where the furging waves of the fea did beat upon the banks, to the end that he 40 might at no time after be troubled nor put out and driven to an extatie, with the noise and clamour of the people when hee thould speake before them: but for that naturally hee was shortwinded, and his breath commonly failed him, hee bestowed upon Neoptolemus a famous actour or stage-plaier, tenne thousand drachmes of filver, to teach him for to pronounce long periods and fentences with one breath, and not taking his winde betweene.

When he began to enter into the management of the rubblicke State, fluding that the citizens were divided into two factions; the one fiding and takir appart with king Philip; the other speaking and pleading still for their liberties and freedom, the chose to joine with that which was opposite in all their dooings unto Philip; and all his? I fet time he continued countelling and perfect all their dooings unto Philip; and all his? I fet time he continued countelling and perfect faulting his counfels in the administration of Astate affaires, & devising evermore with Hyperides, Nanfates, Polyeustum, and Diotimus: and therefore he drew into league & confederacy with the men of Astates, the Thebanes, Eubear 115, Corryceans, Corinthians, Bacotians, and many others besides. One day he chanced to be out and his memorie to faile him, to that he was hissed at by the people in a great assembly of dictitie: for which disgrace he was out of heart, and ill appaid, insomuch as in great disconternment he went home to his house; whereby the way, Eumona the Thriasian, being now an ancient man, met with him, who cheered up Demossiblenes, and comforted him all that he could: out most of all Andronicus the stage-plaier; who said unto him.

That his orations were as good as possibly might be, only he was wanting somehat in action; & thereupon reheated certaine places out of his oration, which he had delivered in that frequent affembly : unto whom Demost henes gave good eare and credit, whereupon he betooke himselse unto Andronicus; infomuch as afterwards when he was demaunded the question which was the first point of eloquence, he answered, Action; which the second, he made answer, Action; and which was the third, he faid, Action, still. Another time he put himselfe foorth to speak in open audience of a great affembly, and was likewife whiftled at, and driven hufty out of countenance; for speaking some words that savoured too much of youthfulnesse; so that he was slouted by the comicali poets, Aniphanes and Timoeles, who used to twit him with these tearnes:

That is to fay,

By the earth, by the fountaines, by rivers, flouds, and streames. For having sworne in this maner before the people, hee raised a stirre and hurli-burly among them. He tooke his oath another time by the name of Aslepius, which hee founded aloft with accent in the * second syllable; and although he did this upon errour in Profodia, yet hee mainteined and proved that he had pronounced the word aright; for that Aefeulapius was Bees mines, that is to fay, a milde and gracious god: and for this maner of swearing he was oftentimes troubled; but after he had frequented the schoole of Eubulades the Milesian, and a Logicien, he corrected and amended all. Being one day at the folemnitic of the Olympian games, and hearing Lamachus the Terinaan how he rehearfed an encomiasticall oration in the praise of king Phi. 20 Ep, and of Alexander his fonne; namely, how they invaded and over ran the Thebans and Olynthians, he came forward, and standing close unto him, on the contrary fide, alledging testimonies out of auncient poets, importing the commendation of Thebans and Ólynthians both, for the brave exploits by them atchieved; which when Lamachus heard, hee gave over and would not speake a word more, but flipt away as soone as hee could out of the assemblie. King Philip himselfe would fay unto them who related unto him the cautions and orations that he made against him: Certes, I believe verily, that if I had heard him with mine owne cares pleading in this wife, I should have given the man my voice, and chosen him captaine to make warre upon my felfe. And much to the fame purpose the faid Philip was wont to liken the orations of Demosthenes unto fouldiers, for the warlike force that appeared in them; but the spee- 30 ches of Isocrates he compared to fenfers or sword-plaiers, for the delightfull shew and flourish that they made.

Being now thittie feven yeares old, counting from Dexithem to Callimachus, in the time of syhole provoithing the Olynthians by their embaffage required aid of the Athenians, for that they were fore plagned with the warre that king Philip levied against them; he pertwaded the people to fend them fuccour: but in the yeere following, wherein Plato changed this life, king Fintip utterly definoied the Olynthians. Xenophon also the disciple of Socrates, had a knowledge of Demofiberes, either in his prime when hee began to rife and grow up, or else in the very floure and best of his time; for Xenophon wrote his Chronicles as touching the acts and decids of the Greeks, and specially of those affaires which passed about the time of the battell at 40 Maintimen, or a little after, namely, in that yeere when Charieles was provost; and Demosthenes fornewhat before that, had given his tutors and guardians the overthrow at the barre. When as Aeschines upon his condemnation was fielde toward Athens, there to live in exile; Demosthenes being advertised thereof, made after him on horse-backe; whereupon Aeschines imagining that he thould be taken prisoner, fell downe at his feet, and covered his face, but Demosthenes willed him to artic and fland up, gave him comfortable words, and befides, put a ralent of filver into his hands. He gave counfell unto the Athenians to enterteine a certeine number of mercenaric fouldiers, trangers in the ifle of Thajos, and to this effect he failed thither as captaine with the charge of a great galley under his hands. He was chosen another time chiefe purveior occome, and being accuted for demeaning himfelfe badly, and purloining the cities money, 50 he cleared himselfe and was acquit. When Philip had forced the city Elatia, and was master of is, Demosthenes abandoned the faid city, together with those who had fought in the battell of Cherones; whereupon is thought that he forlooke his colours and fledde; now as he made hafte away, there chanced a bramble to take hold of his caffocke behinde, whereat he turned backe and faid unto the bramble: Save my life and take my ransome. Upon his target he had for his mot or device, Good fortune. And verily he it was that made the oration at the funerals of those who loft their lives in the faid battell. After

After this he applied his minde, and bent his chiefe care to the reparations of the citie, and being chosen commissarie for repairing the walles, he laide out of his owne (besides the defraying of the cities money) an hundred pounds of filver: over and above that, he gave ten thousand for to be emploied in the setting out of shewes, games, and plaies; which done, he embarked himselfe in a galley, and failed up and downe from coast to coast, for to levie money of the allies and confederates; for which good fervices hee was crowned many times: first by the meanes and motion of Demoteles, Aristonicus, and Hyperides; who propounded that he should be honoured with a coroner of gold, and last of all, at the instant face of Cte/phon: which decree was empeached and blamed, as contrarie to the lawes by Diodot is and Aefchines: 10 against whom he defended and maintained it so well, that he carried it cleane away; so as his ac-culer had not the fifth part of the suffrages and voices of the people on his side.

Afterwards when Alexander was paffed onward his voyage into Afia, & Harpalus fled into A thens with a great fumme of money : at the first hee would not suffer him to bee entertained and kept fafely; but after he was once arrived and fet aland, and that he had received of him a thoufand good pieces of gold, called Dariks; then he changed his note and fung another fong: for when the Athenians were minded to deliver the man into the hands of Antipater, he withflood them, and withall fet downe under his hand-writing, that his money was laid up fafe in the Citadel; the fumme wherof he had declared already unto the people, whereas Harpalus had specified it to be seven hundred and fiftie talents or somewhat above, as faith Philocharus. But after this 20 when Harpalus had broken prison, wherein hee should have beene kept, untill some messenger and newes came directly from Alexander, and was escaped and retired, as some say, to Candie, oras others, to Tenarus in Laconia; Demosthenes was called into question for corruption, briberie, and taking his money; for that he neither declared the just quantitie and summe of coinc that thither was brought, nor the negligence of those who had the custodie of it and him: thus I fay was he brought to his answere judicially by Hyperides, Pytheus, Menefechnius, Hymericus, and Patrocles, who followed the fute fo hard, that they caused him to be condemned in the high court and chamber of Ariopagus: and thus condemned he went into exile, being not able to pay five fold; for charged he was to have taken thirtie talents: others fay that he would not abide the iffue of judgement, and therefore went voluntarie before the day of triall into banishment. After 30 this time the Athenians sent Polyentlus in embassage to the communaltie of the Arcadians, for to divert and withdraw them from the league and confederacie of the Macedonians; but when Polyeuctus could not perfivade them to revolt; Demosthenes came upon them and shewed himfelfe to fecond the motion, where he spake so effectually, that he prevailed with them: for which fervice he was highly admired, and thereby wanne fuch favour and reputation, that after a certaine time, by vertue of a publicke decree, he was called home againe out of exile, and a galley was fet out of purpose to bring him backe to Athens: and the Athenians moreover ordained, that whereas he owed unto the State thirtie talents, in which he was condemned, he should cause an altar to be built unto Jupiter the Saviour, in the port Preaum, & in fo doing be held aquit and discharged. This decree was propounded by Damon the Paranian his cousen germain.

By this meanes he returned to the politicke mannaging of affaires as before. Now when as Antipater was streightly besieged by the Greeks, and enclosed within the citie Limia, whereupon the Athenians offered factifices for the good and joyfull tidings thereof, he chaunced to let fall a word in talking with Agelistratus, a familiar friend of his, and to fay that he was not of the fame mind and opinion with other, as touching the State: For I know full wel(quoth he) that the Greeks are skilfull and able both to run a short carriere, and good to make a skirmish for a spurt and away; but to hold on a long race, and to continue the warre unto the end, they can never abide. But afterwards when Antipater had wonne Pharfalus, and threatned the Athenians to lay fiege unto their citie, unleffe he would deliver into his hands those oratours who had inveighed against him: Demosthenes for seare of himselfe, lest the citie of Athens, and sed first into the life so Argina, for to put himselfe within the liberties and franchises of the temple or fanctuarie, called Meacium: but afterwards being affraid that he should be fetched out from thence by the cares, he passed over into Calauria: where having intelligence that the Athenians were resolved and had concluded to deliver those oratours, and himselfe principally among the rest; hee rested as a poore distressed suppliant within the temple of 2 epiune: and when there came unto him thither Archias the pursuvant, furnamed Phygadotheres, that is to fay, the hunter of Fugitives, who was a disciple and sectarie of Anaximenes the philosopher, perswading him to arise, and that no doubt he should be reckoned one of the friends of Anipater; he answered thus: When you play a part in a tragoedie, you can not make me beleeve that you are the man whom you reprefent; no more shall you perswade me now to give care unto your counsell: and when the other laid hands on him and would have drawen him foorth by violence, those of the city would not fuffer him; then faid Demofthenes unto them: I fledde not unto Calabria for my fafetie, and with any intention to fave my life, but to convince the Lacedamonians of their impietie and violence, even against the gods; and with that he called for writing tables, and wrote this dystichon; as fauth Demetrum the Magnefian, which the Athenians afterwards cauled to be fet as an Epigram over the statue:

ĮQ

Hadthy good heart Demostenes, mette with as good an hand: The Greeks of Macedonian Sword,

This image of his flandeth neere unto the purprise or cloister, wherein is erected the altar of Should never have had command. the twelve gods, and made it was by the hands of Polyeutius: but as some say, this was sound written withall: Demosthenes to Amipater precting. Philocharus faith, that hee died of poison which he drank: but Satyrus the historiographer reporteth, that the penne was poisoned wherewith he beganne to write his epiffle, and chancing to put it into his mouth, fo foone as ever he tailed thereof, died: Eratosthenes writeth otherwise, namely that hee standing in searce a long time of the Macedonians, was provided of poilon, which he caried within a little ring or bracelet that he wore about the wrift of his arme: & there be againe who fay, that he killed himfelfe 20 by holding his winde to long, that he was overcome and stifled withall: last of all, others write that he carried a strong poison within the collet of his signet, which he tasted, and died thereof,

Whenking Philip was dead, he came abroad wearing a faire & rich new robe, although but a * * * two and twenty. while before he had buried his owne daughter, fo glad was he of the death of that Macedonian king. He aided the Thebanes also when they warred with Alexander, and all other Greeks hea encouraged as much as possibly he could at all times; and therefore Alexander after he haddeftroied the city of Thebes, demaunded of the Athenians for to have him, menacing them if they would not deliver him into his hands. And when the faid king warred upon the Persians, and required of the Athenians their shipping, Demostheres opposed himselfe and demodit: For 30 who is able to fay (quoth he) that he will not use the same shippes even against our selves that fend them. He left behinde him two fonnes by one wife, the daughter of one Heliodorus aprincipall citizen. One daughter he had, who died before the was maried, being but yet a young childe. A fifter also he had, who being married unto Laches the Leuconian his nephew or fitters fonne, bare Demochares, a valiant man in warre, and befides, for policie and eloquence inferior to none in his time. There is an image of his to be seene at this day, standing within the common hall of the citie, called Prytaneum, on the right hand as men do enter in and go toward the altar. The first man he was who made an oration to the people with a sword by his side girded over his robe: for in that habit it is faid, that he delivered a speech unto the citizens, when Antipater came to demand their oratours : but afterwards, the Athenians both ordeined allow- 40 ance of diet in the Prytaneum for the kinred of Demosthenes, and also set up a statue for himselfe when he was dead, in the Market place, that very yeere when Gorgius was provoft, at the fitte of Demochares his nephew or fifters sonne, who required these honours for his uncle: yea, and afterwards, Laches the sonne of Demochares a Leuconian, made sute for the like honours for himfelte, the yeere that Pitharatus was provost, which was ten yeeres after; namely, his statue for to fland in the market place, and allowance of diet in the palace Prytaneum, as well for himselfe as for the eldest alwaies of his house and linage in every descent, with a priviledge of the highest roome or uppermost place at all folemne fights and games. And these decrees as touching them both, are registred, and to be seen engrossed upon record. As for the image of Demochares, whereof we have already spoken; it was transported into the palace or hall of the citie na- 50

There be extant orations which be his in deed, to the number of three score and five. Some fay, that he lived a diffolute and riotous life, and that he would not flicke to goe in womans apparell, to banquet, to be one ordinarily in all masks and mommeries, whereupon he was furnamed Baralus: though others there are, who fay that this was the name of his nourfe, and that therupon he was so tearmed by way of flouting speech or nick-name. Diogenes the dogged Cynick, spied him one day in a taverne; whereat Demosthenes was abashed, & retired more inward into the house: Nay (quoth Diegenes to him) the more you draw or shrinke backeward, the further still you go into the taverne. The same Diogenes said to him upon a time, when he was difposed to scoffe: That in words he was a Scythian, that is to say, a tough Tartarian and a brave warriour, but in warre, a fine and delicate burgeffe of Athens. He tooke golde of Ephalics alto, being one of the oratours who went in embaffage to the king of Persia, and brought with him a great fumme of money fecretly to distribute among the oratours of Athens, to this end, that they might ftirre coales, and blow the fire, to kindle warre against Philip: and it is faid, that he for his part had at one clap of the king, three thousand daricks. He caused one Anaxilus of the citic of Ores, to be apprehended, who had otherwise bene his familiar friend; and being cast into pri-10 fon, put him to be examined by torture, as a fpie; and albeit he confessed nought, yet he fued out a writ or decree that he should be committed into the hands of the eleven executioners of justice. One day when he meant to make a speech in the full affembly of the people, they were not willing to heare him: Why (quoth he unto them) it is but a fhort tale that I purpose to tell unto you: which when they heard, they gave him audience willingly: and then began he in this maner: There was not long fince (quoth he) a yong man who hired an affe in the time of Summer, from this citie to Megara: now when it was no one time of the day, and the Sun exceeding hot, both the one and the other, as well the owner of the affe as he who hired him, would needs have the benefit of the affes shade, and stand under it, but they hindred and impeached one another; for the owner faid that he had let to hire, his affe, but not the shadow of him : the other a-20 gaine who hired him, pleaded that the affe, shadow and all was in his power. Having thus begun his tale, he came downe and went his way: the people then called him backe, and praied him to tell the tale out, and make an end thereof: Why my mafters (quoth he) how is it; that you are so desirous that I should tell you a tale of the shadow of affe, and will not give me the hearing when I am to speake unto you of your affaires of great importance? Poles the famous actour and stage-plaier made his boast upon a time, that in two daies wherein he plaied his part, he had gotten a whole talent of filver: And I (quoth he) have gained five in one day, for holding my peace and keeping filence. His voice upon a time, when he made a speech unto the people, failed him; whereupon his audience being not well pleased, and himselfe somewhat troubled, he faid aloud unto them: You are to judge plaiers by their pleafant and firong voice; but ora-30 tours by their good and grave sentences. Epicles seemed to upbraid and reproch him, for that he was alwaies musing and premeditating: I would be assumed (quoth he unto him) if being to speake before so great an affembly of people, I should come unprovided. It is written of him, that he never put out his lampe, that is to fay, that he never ceafed fludying how to file and polith (as it were) his orations, untill he was fiftie yeres old. He faid of himfelfe, that he drunke nothing but faire water. Lyfias the oratour had knowledge of him: and Isocrates faw him to manage the affaires of State, untill the battell of Cheronea, yea, and some also of the Socraticall oratours. The most part of his orations he pronounced * ex tempore and of a sudden, as having a *Howardenth ready and pregnant wit, and one who naturally was fitted to speake. The first that ever proposed this sould read when the state of the and put up a bill unto the people, that he should be crowned with a coronet of gold, was Arifto-limbet land 40 nieus the Anagyrafian the fonne of Nicophanes : and Dionales did fecond the motion with an Interpretative

HYPERIDES. IX.

Trerides the fonne of Glaucippus, who was the fonne of Dionyfus of the burrough Colyttea, Had a fonne who bare the name of his father Glaucippus, an orator who composed certains orations and he begat another oratour, named Alphinus. He was at one time the scholar of Plato the Philosopher, of Lyeurgus and of Isocrates. He dealt in the State at what time as Alexander the Great intended the affaires of Greece, and he croffed him as touching those captaines which he demanded of the Athenians, as also about the gallies which he required to have, 50 He advised the people not to caffe and discharge those souldiers which were enterteined at T.e. mara, who had for their captaine, Chares, and whose friend particularly he was. He pleaded ordimarily at the first as an advocate for his fee; and was suspected to have received part of that money which Ephialtes brought out of Persia. Chosen he was the captaine of one great galley, ar what time as king Philip went to lay fiege unto the citie Bizantium: and fent he was to aide the Bizantines. The very fame yeere he tooke the charge of defraying the expenses of the folemme dames; whereas the rest of the captaines were exempt from all publicke offices for that yeere. He palled a decree, that certeine honours should be done unto Demosthenes; and when the faid decree was by Diondas repealed, as made against the lawes, and himselfe thereupon acculed, yet found he was unguiltie, and thereupon acquit. Friend he was to Demosthenes, Lysicles and Lyeurgue; howbeit, in this amitte he continued not unto the end: for after that Lysteles and Lyeurgus were dead, when Demosthenes was once called in question for taking money of Harpalus, he alone (for that his hands onely were free of bribery) was nominated and picked out from the rest, to frame an accusation against him, because they were all thought culpable in the same fault, and so he judicially accused him: but himselfe was charged by Aristogiton for publishing acts contrary to the lawes, after the battell at Charonea, namely; That all the inhabitants and dwellers in Athens, should be burgeffes of the citie; that all flaves should manumized and made free; that all facred and holy reliques; that women and children should be bestowed with- 10 in the port or haven Pireaum: howbeit, absolved he was, and went cleere away. And when some there were who found fault with him, and marvelled how he should be so negligent and overfeene, as not to know formany lawes which were directly opposit to the said decrees; he made this answere: If (quoth he) the armes of the Macedonians and the battell of Charonea, had not dazzeled and dimmed my fight, I had never written nor proposed such an edict. But certeine it is, that after this, Philip being affrighted, gave the Athenians leave to take up the bodies of their dead that lay in the field, which before he had denied unto the heralds that came of purpose un-

Afterwards, upon the defaiture at Cranon, when he was demanded by Antipater, and the peoto him out of Lebadia. ple resolved to deliver him into his hands, he for sooke the citie, and fled into the Ille Argina, 20 with other persons who likewisewere condemned; where meeting with Demosthenes, he defired him to holde him excused, for that he had by constraint accused him. And when he minded to depart from thence, surprised he was by one Archies surnamed Phygadostheres, a man borne in the citie of Thurit, and who at the first was a professed stage-plaier, but then imploied in the service and aid of Antipater: fo he was apprehended perforce within the temple of 2 epiune; notwithflanding hee held the image of the faid god in his armes; and from thencebrought to Corint b before Antipater; where being fet upon the racke, and put to torture, he bit his tongue off with his owne teeth, because he would not discover the secrets of the city, and so ended his daies the ninth day of the moneth October: howbeit, Hermippus faith, that as he went into Macedonie, he had his tongue cut out of his head, and his dead corps was cast forth unto the beasts of 30 the field without sepulture : yet one Alphinus his cousen germaine, or as some say, the cousen of Glaucippus his sonne obtained licence (by the meanes of Philopithes a certaine physician) to take up his bodie, who burnt the same in a funerall fire; the ashes and bones whereof, he caried to Athens afterwards, among his kinsfolke and friends, contrary to the orders and decrees fet downe, both by the Macedonians and the Athenians: for by vertue thereof they were not onely banished but interdicted, so as they might not be interred within their owne countrey. Others fay, that he was carried unto the citie Cleone with others, where he died; and that his tongue was cut, and afterwards, himfelfe murdred in maner aforefaid. Howbeit, his kinfemen and friends gathered up his bones when his corps was burnt, and buried them amongs his parents and progenitours before the gates called Hippades, according as Heliodorus hath recorded in the third 40 booke of his monuments. But his sepulchre at this day is quite demolished, and no token remaineth thereof to be feene.

He had a fingular name above all other oratours, for speaking before the people; insomuch, as some have ranged him even above Demostheres. There go in his name, three score and seventeene orations; of which, two and fittle are truely attributed unto him, and no more. Given he was exceeding much to the love of women, which was the cause that he drave his ownesonne out of his houle, and brought in thither Myrrhina the most sumptuous and costly courtifan in those daies: and yet in Pyreaum he kept Aristagora, and at Eleusm (where his lands and posses fions lay) he had another at command, namely, Philie a Thebane borne, who cost him twentie pounds weight of filver. His ordinarie walke was every day thorow the fifth market. And when 50 the famous courtifan Phryne (whom he loved alfo) was called into question for Atheisme and impietie, inquisition was made after him likewise; and so he was troubled with her and for her fake, as it should seeme: for, so much he declareth inselfe in the beginning of his oration: now when the was at the very point to be condemned, he brought the woman foorth in open court before the judges, rent her clothes, and shewed unto them her bare brest; which the judges seeing to be fowhite and faire, in regard of her very beautic absolved and dismissed her.

nes, yet fo, as they came to light in this maner: for when Hyperides lay ficke, it fortuned that Demost benes came one day to his house for to visit him, where he found a booke drawen full of articles against him; whereat when he was much offended, and tooke it in great indignation, Hyperides made him this answere: So long as you are my friend, this shall never hort you; but if you become mine enemie, this shallbe a curbe to restreine you from enterprising any thing prejudiciall unto me. He put up abill unto the people, that certeine honours thould be done unto Jolas, who gave unto Alexander the cuppe of poison. Hee sided with Demosthenes, and joined in the raifing of the Lamiacke warre, and made an admirable oration at the funerals of those who lost their lives therein. When king Philip was ready to embark & passe over into the 10 ille Eubea, whereupon the Athenians were in great feare and perplexitie; he gathered together in afmall time a fleete of fortie faile, by voluntarie contribution, and was the first man who for himselse and his sonne rigged and set soorth two gallies of warre. When there was a controversie in law betweene the Athenians and Delians to be decided, unto whether of them apperteined by right the superintendance of the temple at Delos, and that Aefchynes was cholen to plead the cause, the counsell of Areopague elected Hyperides; and his oration as touching this matter is at this day extant, entituled The Deliaque oration. Moreover, he went in embaffage to Rhodes, where there arrived other embaffadours in the behalfe of Antipater, whom they highly praifed, as a good, milde, and gracious prince: True it is (quoth Hyperides unto them again) Iknow well that he is good and gracious, but we have no need of him to be our lord and mafter 20 how good and gracious foever he be. It is faid, that in his orations he shewed no action nor gefture at all: his maner was onely to fet downe the cafe and lay open the matter plainely and finiply, without troubling the judges any otherwise than with a naked narration. Sent hee was likewise unto the Elians for to defend the cause of Calippus, one of the champions at the facred games, unto whom this imputation was laid, that by corruption he had caried away the prize, and indirectly obtained the victorie. He opposed himselfe also against the gift which was ordeined in the honour of Phocion, at the instant sute of Midias of Anagyrra, the some of Midi-16, the yeere wherein Xenius was provolt, the 27. day of the moneth of May; and in this caule he was cast and had the overthrow.

DINARCHUS. X.

Dinarehus the sonne of Socrates or Sosstratus, borne as some thinke in the country of Atti-ea, or as others would have him, in Corimb, came to Athens very yoong, at what time as king Alexander the Great, passed with his armie into Asia; where he dwelt, and frequented the lecture of Theophrassus, who succeeded Aristotle in the Peripateticke schoole: he converfed allo with Demetrius the Phalerian, and tooke his time especially to enter into the administration of State affaires, after the death of Antipater, when the great oratours and states-men were fome dead and made away, others banished and driven out of the citie; and being besides friended and countenanced by Cassarder, he grew in short time to be exceeding rich, exacting 40 and taking money for his orations, of those at whose request he composed them. Hee banded against the most renowned oratours in his time; not by putting himselfe foorth to come in open place to speake before the people (for no gift nor grace he had therein) but by penning orations for those who made head against them. And namely when Harpalus had broken prison and was fled, he composed divers acculatorie declarations against all such as were suspected to have take money of him, and those he delivered into the hands of their accusers to be pronounced accordingly. Long time after, being accused himselfe to have communicated, conferred, and practifed with Antipater and Caffander, about the time that the baven Munichia was surprifed by Antigonus and Demetrius, who placed there a garrifon in that yeare when Anaxierates was provolt of the city, he fold most part of his goods, and made money, and when hee had 50 done, fled out of the way to Chaleis, where he lived as it were in exile the space well necre of 15. yeeres; during which time, he gathered great riches, and became very wealthy, and fo returned againe to Athens, by the meanes of Theophrastus, who procured both him and other banifled persons to be recalled and restored: he abode then in the house of one Proxenus his familiar friend; where being now very aged, and besides weake-sighted, he lost his gold that he had gotten together; and when Proxenus his hoft would have given information thereof, and feemed to make inquifition, Dinarchus called him into question judicially for it; and this was the first time that ever he was known to speake & plead personally at the barre. This oration of his Kkkk is now extant, and there are besides in mens hands threescore and source more acknowledged all to be his, and yet some of these are to be excepted, as namely, that against Aristogiton. He did imitate Hyperides, or as some thinks Demostheres in regard of that patheticall spirit in mooving affections, and the emphaticall force which appeareth in his stile. Certeinly in his figures and exornations he followeth him very evidently.

DECREES PROPOSED UNTO

the people of Athens.

Emochares the fonne of Laches, of the burrough Leucon, demandeth for Demofibenes, the fonne of Demosthenes of the burrough of Peanix, a statue of brassle to be fet up in the market place or common hal of Athens: also allowance of diet in the palace Prysansum, & the first place or feat in al honorable assembles for himfelse. By the eldett of his house in every descent for ever; for that he the said De-clife, & the eldeft of his house in every descent for ever; for that he the said Demosthenes hath alwaies bene a bene factour to the citic, & given counfell unto the people of Athens, in many of their honorable affaires to their behoote; for that he hath at all times exposed his goods to the service of the common-weale, & namely, of his liberall and bountifull minde contributed eight talents of filver, and mainteined one galley of warre, at what time the people 20 freed & delivered the isle Eubea: & another, when captaine Cephisedorus fet out his voiage into Hellesport; as also a third when Chares and Phocion were sent as captaines to Byzantium by the people. Item, for that with his owne money he raunformed and redeemed many citizens taken prisoners & captives in Pydne, Methone & Olynthus by king Philip. Item, for that he defraied at his own proper cost & charges, the publick plaies & daunces when the tribe of the Pandionides failed to furnish the officers & wardens appointed thereto. Item, for that he armed many poore citizens who had not wherewith to fet the elves forth to the warres. Item, for that being chosen by the people one of the Aediles or Commissaries, for repairing the citie walles, he laid out of his owne purse to the value of three talents of filver, over and besides ten thousand drachms which of his owne mony he emploied, in calting of two trenches about Pyreaum, Item, that after 20 the difasterous battell of Charonea, he gave out of his owne stocke one talent; & another to buy come with all in time of a dearth and great famine. Item, for that by his effectual remonstrances, faire persuasions, holesome counsels, and good demerits, he had induced the Thebanes, Eubæans, Corinthians, Megarians, Achians, Locrians, Bizantines, and Meffenians, to enter into a league as well offentive as defensive with the people of Athens. Item, for that he levied a power of ten thousand footmen well armed, and a thousand horsemen, over and above the contribution of monies, by the people and their allies. Item, for that being embaffadour, he had perfwaded the affociats and confederates of Athens, to make a contribution of money to the fumme of five hundred talents and above, toward the warres. Item, for that he empeached the Peloponnesians for aiding king Alexander against the Thebanes; for which service he parted with his owne sil- 40 ver, and went personally in embassage. As also in regard of many other good deferts, and woorthy exploits by him atchieved in confideration likewife of much wife counfel and advice, which he hath given unto the people, and of his politicke government & mannaging of State affaires, wherein he hath carried himselfe as well, yea and much better than any in his time: for the pretervation of the libertic and maintenance of the authoritie of the people. Over and belides, in that he was banished out of his countrey by certaine feditious usurpers, who for the time supprefled the authoritie of the people: and finally lost his life in Calauria, in the quarrell of the said people, and for the love and good will that he alwaies bare affectionately unto the commonalty of Athers, there being fent of purpole from Antipater certaine foldiers to apprehend him. Notwithttanding, which prefent danger wherin he flood, being now in the hands of his enemies, 50 yet perfifted he firme & fast in his heartie affection alwaies unto the people : infomuch as henever did any deed, nor let fall any word prejudiciall to his countrey, or unbefeeming the honour of the people, as necre as hee was unto his death. Subscribed, that werie yeerewhen Pythatatus mas Provost.

Laches the sonne of Demochares, of the borrough Leucon, demaundeth in free gift of the Senate and people of Athens, for Demochares the sonne of Laches, of the tribe or borrough Laucon, one statue of brassle to be erected in the market place: also his table and diet in the palace or citie

citic hall Prytaneum for himselfe, and for him that shall be the eldest of his house in everie defcentfor ever; as also the priviledge of prefidence or first feat at all solemne fights and publicke plaies: for that he hath alwaies beene abenefactour and good counfeller unto the people of thens, as having deferved well of the common-weale in these particulars; as well in those things which he hath penned, proposed and negotiated in his embassage, as in the administration of common-weale; in that he hath caused the walles of the citie to be built, made provision of harnelle & armor, as well offensive as defensive; of fabricks & engines of battery, & of artillery with shotto be discharged out of them; in that he hath well fortified the citie during the warres with the Bœotians which continued for the space of source yeeres : for which good service done, bani-10 fliedhe was and chafed out of the citie by the tyrants, who oppreffed the libertic and authoritie of the people: and in that being restored againe and called home by an honourable decree of the faid people, when Diocles was Provoft, he was the first man who restrained the administration and mannagement of those who made spare of their owne goods, and sent embassiages unto Lysimachus: in that also hee levied for the good of the common wealth at one time thirtie talents, and at another a hundred talents of filver; in that he mooved the people by a bill preferred unto them, for to fend an embaffage to king Proleman in Aegrot; by meanes whereof they that went that voyage, brought backe with them fiftie talents of filver for the people. Item, in that being fent embaffador to Antiparer, he received thereby twentie talents of filver, which he brought unto the people into the citie of Eleusin, where he practifed and perswaded with them to receive 20 the same. Item, in that he suffered banishment, because he was a protectour and defender of the popular State, never fiding nor taking part with any faction of the usurpers; nor bearing office or magistracie in common-weale, after that the faid popular State was put downe and abolished. Item, in that he onely in his time, of all those who medled in the affaires of State, never studied nor intended alteration, and to reduce his countrey unto any another kind of government, but popular. Item, in that by his politicke counfell and administration he hath pur in safetie and securitie all judgements paffed; all lawes enacted; all decrees concluded; yea and the goods and substance of all the Athenians: finally, in that he hath gone about and attempted nothing prejudiciall unto the popular government, either in word or deed.

Lycophron the fon of Lycurgus, of the borrough or communaltie of Buta, hath presented this 30 request: That he might be allowed his diet in the palace Prytaneum, according to the free gift granted before time to his father Lycurgus by the people, in that yeere wherein Anaxierates was Provost of the citie, and the tribe Antiochis President of Prytanaum: which Stratocles the son of Enthydemus, of the borrough Diomeia, proposed it in this forme: For as Lyeure us, the fonne of Lycophron of Bura, hath received of his ancestors (as it were) from hand to hand a certaine hereditatie love and affection to the people of Athens, and his progenitours likewife, Diomedes and Lycurgus, both during their lives were effected and highly honoured by the people; and after their death, had this honour done unto them in testimonie of their vertue and valour, as to be enterred at the publike charges of the citie in that conspicuous street called Ceramicum: confidering alfo, that Lycurgu himselfe (whiles he managed the affaires of the State) enacted 40 many good and holfome lawes for his countrey, and being treasurer-generall of all the cities revenues, by the space of fifteen eyeeres, during that time, had the receit and laying out of the publicke moneys, to the fumme of eighteene thousand and nine hundred talents: and for that many private mens stocks were put into his hands upon trust, for the considence they had in him, in regard of his fidelitie; in regard also, that he hath disbursed and laied foorth of his owne moneys at fundry times and upon divers occasions, for the benefit of the citie and communaltie, as much as amounteth in all, to fixe hundred and fiftie talents: for that likewife in all his imploiments, having beene ever found most trustie, just and loyall, and to carie himselfe as an honest man and good citizen, he hath bene many times crowned by the city: moreover, in this respect, that having beene chosen by the people the receiver of the finances, hee gathered together a 50 great maffe of money, and brought the same into the common cheft within the citadell, and besides, provided ornaments for the goddesse Minerva, to wit, images of victoricall of beaten gold, veffels to carie in proceffion both of golde and filver, befides other jewels of fine gold for theservice and worthip of the said goddesse, and namely, to the number of one hundred Canephora, that is to fay, Virgins carrying paniers or baskets with facred reliques upon their heads, Item, for that being elected commiffarie for the munitions and provisions necessaries for the warres, he brought into the citadell a great number of armours and weapons, and among the rell, fiftiethousand shot; rigged and set a float foure hundred gallies, some new built, others repaired and trimmed: over and besides, for that finding certeine of the citie works unperfect, to wit, the Arcenall, the Armorie and the Theater of Bacehus, he caused them to be made up, and withall, finished both the Cirque or running place Panathenaicum, and also the empaled parke for publicke exercises, and built the Lyeium likewise, and adorned the citie with many faire buildings and publicke edifices: whereas also,king Alexander the Great, having already subdued all Asia, and intending generally to be commander over all Greece, demanded to have Lyeur gui delivered up into his hands, for that he onely stood in his way, and crossed his desseignes, the people would not deliver him for any feare they had of Alexander: and for that being oft times called judicially to his answere, and to render an account of his government and administration in a free citie and governed by a popular State, he was alwaies found innocent and unreproveable, 10 not tainted with any bribetie, nor spotted with corruption and taking gifts for to pervert justice all his life time. To the end therefore, that all men might know that they who are well affected to the maintenance of liberty and popular government be highly acounted of by the people whiles they live, and that after their death the citie is willing to render unto them immortall thanks; in a good and happie houre, let it be ordeined by the people, that Lyeurgus the sonne of Lycaphron of Buta, be honoured for his vertue and righteouinefle; and that the people erect his statue all of brasse in the market-steed, unlesse it be in some place where the trade expresly forbiddeth it to stand. Item, that there be allowance of diet in the Prytaneum, to the eldest of his house in every descent for ever. Also, that the decrees by him proposed, thalbe ratified and engroffed by the publicke notatic of the citie, yea, and engraven in pillars of flone, and fet up in the 20 citadell neere unto the offerings confecrated unto the goddeffe Minerva: and for the engraving of the faid pillars, the treasurie of the citie shall defray fiftie drachmes of silver out of those moneys which are allowed for the citie decrees.

OF THREE SORTS OF GOVERNMENT: MONAR-

CHIE, DEMOCRATIE AND OLIGARCHIE.

SI devifed with my felfe and purposed to put to question for to be decided by this judicious companie, a matter which yesterday I discoursed of before you; me thought that I heard politicke vertue 40 in a true vision in deed (and not in the vaine illussion of a dreame) thus to say unto me:

The golden base and ground that now belongs Unto our worke, is laied with sacred songs.

I have alreadylaied the foundation of a discourse, perswading and exhorting to the management of State affaires, if now we can proceed to build upon it the doctrine fit for such an exhortation, which is a due debt unto Actions: for meet it is and requifit, that after a man hath received an admonition inciting him to deale in politicke matters of common weale, there should configured by given unto him and sounded in his eares the precepts of policie; the which he ob- so serving and following, may (as much as lieth in man to performe) be profitable to the commonweale; and with all, in the meane time manage his owne private businesse, both in fafetie, and also with such honour as is just and meet for him.

First and formost therefore, we are to consider and discourse of one point; which as it is a very materiall precedent unto all that shall be said, so it dependeth, and is necessarily to be inferred of that which hath bene delivered already; namely, What maner of policie and government is best: for as there be many fort of lives in particular men; so there are of people in general.

nerall: and the life of a people or commonaltic, is the politicke state and government thereof. Necessarie it is therfore, that we declare which is simply the best; that a man of State may chuse it from among the rest: or at least wise, if that be impossible, take that which most resembleth the belt. Now there is one fignification of this word Politia, that is to fay, Policie, which is as much as Burgeofie, that is to fay, the indument and enjoying of the right and priviledges of a citie; as for example, when we fay that the Megarians (by a publicke ordinance of their city) gave unto Alexander the great, their Politia, that is to fay, their Burgeofie; and when he feemed to laugh at this offer and grant of theirs, they made him answer againe: That they had never decreed this honour to any, but first to Hercules, and now to himselfe: which speech of theirs he so admired, to that he accepted of their gift, reputing it honourable, because it was so rare. Also the life of a politicke person who administreth State affaires, is called Policie: according to which sense and acceptation of the word, wee commend the policie of Pericles and Bias, that is to fay, their maner of government, but contrariwife, we diffeommend that of Hyperbolus and Cleon. Moreover, others there be, who call fome one woorthy act or memorable deed tending to the good of the common weale, by the name of Policie: as for example, the contribution of money, the finall ending and diffolution of warre, and the publishing or declaration of some notable decrees in which fignification we use commonly to fay: Such a man hath this day bene the authour of a good policie, if haply he have done and effected fome woorthy things, importing the wealepublicke. Over and above all these fignifications before specified, there is another; namely, the 20 order and state of a citie and common-wealth, by which are managed and administred all the affaires thereof: and according to this fense we say, there be three forts of policies, Monarchie, that is to fay, Roialtie; Oligarchie, that is to fay, Seignory; and Democratic, that is to fay, Popular authoritie : of which three Herodot wo maketh mention in the third booke of his hiftorie, comparing them together; and it feemeth that thefe be the most generall, for all others be (as it were) the depravations and corruptions of thele, according to want or excelle, like as it falleth out in accords and confonances of mulicke, when the first and principall strings or notes arefretched over high, or let downe to low : and fo hee devided thefe three governments among those nations which had the largest empire and greatest dominion: for the Persians held the Monarchie and absolute rotaltie, for that their king had plenary power in all things, not 30 subject to be called unto account by any person whatsoever. The Spartiats or Lacedæmonians, mainteined a grave and fevere counfell, confifting of some fewe, and those the best and principall personages of the city, who managed and dispatched all affaires. The Athenians embraced a popular government, living under their owne lawes, free, and without all mixture whatfoever. Now of these States and governments, when they be faulty and out of order, the transgressions, exorbitations and excesses, be called tyrannies, lordly oppressions of the mightier, and unbrideled rule, or licentious misrule rather of the multitude: to wit, when the prince in his absolute roialtie taketh upon him insolent pride, to commit wrong and outrage unto whom he lift: when some fewe senatours or rulers in their seignorie enter into an arrogant and prefumptuous lordlinesse, whereby they contemne and oppresse all others: also when the 40 multitude in their popular ilonomie, runne into anarchie, unrulineffe, difobedience, tearmes of equalitie, and unmeasurable libertic: and in one word, when all these forts of government fall to rash and witlesse folly: like as therefore a skilfull and harmonical musician can make use of all kindes of inftruments, framing and accommodating himfelfe by art and cunning unto every one, striking each one according as he knoweth the quality and nature thereof, to give the sweetest and most pleasant found: howbeit, if he follow the counsell of Plate, will passe by the fiddels, rebecks, dulcimers, the many stringed platteries or virginals, the vials likwife & the triangled harpes, preferring before all others the lute and the citheron or bandora: even fo a good politician, will handle with dexteritie the Laconicke feignorie, and manage well enough Lyeurgus his Oligarchie, applying and fitting his companions in government, who have equall 30 authoritie unto himfelfe, gently drawing and reducing them by little and little anto the bent of his bow: femblably, he will carie himselfe with wisedome and discretion in the popular State, as if he had to deale with an instrument of many founds, and as many strings, letting downe and remitting fome matters, setting up and extending other things in the government, as he seeth his time, giving ease and liberty, and againe, carying a hard hand and a rigorous, as one who knoweth when to refift and withfland floutly any proceedings: But if he were put to his choife, among these musicall instruments as it were of a politicke government; certes if he bee ruled by Plato, he would never chuse any other but that regall and princely Atonarchia, which onely * öjüler.

is able to mainteine that direct, absolute and * lostie note (indeed) of vertue, and not suffer it either by force of necessitie, or upon affectionate favour and grace, to frame it selle to gaine and profit; for other governments after a fort as they be ruled by a politician, fo they rule him, and as he leadeth them, so they cary him, for that he hath no affirred power over those, from whom he hath his authority, but oftentimes he is enforced to exclame and refound these verfes of Aeschylus the poet, which Demetrius Poliorectes was wontto alledge unto fortune, after that he had loft hiskingdome:

Thou mad' ft me budde and burgen fresh at first, but now at last, Thou feem ft my lovely bloume to burne, and beauty for to blast.

A BREVIARIE COMPARISON

TWEENE ARISTOPHANES

AND MENANDER.

The Summarie.

E preferreth Menander an excellent comicall poet, in all respects before Aristophaoncs, who is heere described and depainted in his colours. Then examineth he in particular what he had faid before in generality. He confidereth the sile, disposition, unifor-30 mity, and artificiall contriving of Menanders comedies, shewing that Aristopha-Incs in comparison of him was no better than a counterfeit cousiner, a crastic and prating companion, ignorant, audacious and intollerable umo all: having written his comedies not to be read of any hone st men, but onely for leud and dissolute persons.

A BREVIARIE OF THE COMparison betweene Aristophanes and Menander.

O speake in generall and summarily, he preferreth Menander by many degrees before Aristophanes; but to come unto particularities, fee what he addeth moreover : The stile of Aristophanes, and his manner of language is unfavorie and unpleafant, counterfeit, bafe and mechanicall, whereas in Menander there is no fuch thing to be feene. And verily a groffe, ignorant, and unlettered idiot may take pleasure and be delighted in Aristophanes his speeches; but alearned man will soone bee displeased and discontented therewith. I meane, his Anuthera or opposite tearmes; his clauses ending alike, and his allusions to names, which Menander useth but now and 50 then to good purpole, and with great reason and judgement, being therein verie sparie, warie, and religious: whereas the other ever and anon abufeth them hand over head, and out of feafon without all grace or life to commend them. Praifed he is (forfooth) for these cold jests; namely, when he faith: That he had drenched over head and eares the treafurours, who were not тодиц, but Augua. Alfo, This fellow doth breath out, either malice or flanderous calumniation. Againe, Here is one that liveth for his belly, his entrals and his guts. Likewife, Even for verie laughter, I shall breake out a laughing. Moreover, What shall I do to thee thou unhappy damned pitcher, and banished remblaby, You women, here I shall make you wild and savage evils, like as I am my felfe, who have beene fed among wild and favage worts: but thefe curled treffes and frifled haires furely have devoured my creft: laftly,

Come bring him hither his targuet round, with Gorgons hideous head: But give me here my cake as round, as face buckler in his stead.

befides many other bald jefts of the like fort: for there is in the composition and texture of his words, that which is tragicall and comicall both: proude and infolent; bafe also and lowly; to darke and myfticall, and anon plaine and familiar; swelled, puft up and loftie; but afterwards, vanitie, lightnes, and lothfome feurrilitie, enough to overturne a mans stomacke. Now there being in his writings such diversitie, difference, and dissimilitude; yet giveth not he to every perfon that which is proper and beforming. As for example, he attributeth not unto a king, a high and loftie language; to an oratour, eloquent and pithie speech; to a woman, a plaine and simple tongue; to an ignorant and unlettered commoner, base and lowly words; to a busic barriter or pragmaticall merchant, shrewd and odious tearmes; but he allotteth unto everie person at a venture whatfoever attributes come first to hand; so that a man cannot know nor discerne by any speech, whether he be a sonne or a father that speaketh; a countrey peasant or a citizen; a god or an old woman, or fome demi-god: whereas the stile and phrase of Menander is so uniforme; 20 fo confonant and like it felfe, that how foever it be converfant in fundrie maners and divers paffions,howfoever it be accommodate to all forts of perfons, yet it feemeth still one and the fame, and to keepe the femblance in common and familiar words, and fuch as are alwaies in use. And if perhaps otherwhiles according to the matter and prefent occasion offred, there bee required some extraordinarie narration or strange bruit and unexpected noise; he setteth a worke and openeth (as it were) all the holes of his pipe; but presently and with a seemely grace he reduceth and composeth his voice to the natural state againe. Now albeit there be in all arts & mysteries excellent artifanes; yet was there never knowen any shoomaker to make a shooe; nor artificer a maske or vifour; nor tailor a robe or garment, that would fit at one time a man and woman both; a young youth, an aged person, and a varietibut Menander hath so framed his phrase and speech, 30 that proportionate it is and furable to all natures & fexes, to each state and condition, yea and to every age, and this was he able to performe and doe in his very youth, when he began to write: for then died he when he entred into his floure and best time, either of composing or setting out and publishing his works, at such an age, when as the stile (as Aristotle faith) is come to the very grouth and height in them who make profession to pen or write ought. And if a man would confider the first comedies of Menanders making, and conferre them with those in the middes, and which he made in his latter end, a man thereby may foone know how much hee would have added to these in other, if he had lived longer: for that of them who put foorth their works to be seene and read, some write to the capacity of the multitude and vulgar fort, others for men of marke and understanding; and hardly is a man able to name the author, who 40 can skill how to observe that which is meet and besitting two kinds of people. As for Aristophanes he is neither pleafing unto the common fort, nor acceptable to men of woorth and judgment; but hispoesie may be likened unto an old stale and overworne whoore, who forsooth would counterfet an honest maried wife; for as the people cannot endure his arrogancie; so men of account and quality, deteft his intemperance and maliciousnesse: whereas Menander on the contrary fide, with a good and feemely grace, fatisfieth and contenteth all, ferving as a lecture, a knowledge and exercife common to theaters, schooles, sports, pastimes, seasts, and bankets, thewing thereby, that his poefic is one of the goodlieft things that ever Greece brought foorth; making it to appeare what a gay matter, and how puilfant is the dexteritie of speech and language, paffing throughout, with an attractive grace, which it is impossible to escape, ravi-50 fling and winning everiemans care and understanding, who hath the knowledge of the Greeke toong. For wherfore should a learned man take paines to go unto the theater, but for Menanders fake? when are the theaters frequented and full of great clearks, but when there is a masked shew before of acting his comedies? And at banquets, for whom doth the table makeroome or Bacchus give place more justly than for Menander? And as for philosophers, great scholars and students, like as painters when they have wearied their eies with looking upon fresh, lively & bright colours, turne them to those that are verdant and greene; as namely, upon herbes and flowers for to recreat and refresh their fight; even so Menander is he who intertained their minds and spirits (as it were) in a faire medow full of lovely and pleasant flowers, where there is shade, fresh and coole aire, with mild and comfortable winds. What is the reason that the city of Athens at this day is furnished with many singular actours and plaiers of comedies? even because the comedies of Menander are so full of many graces and pleasant conceits, so savorie, as if they fprang foorth of the verie fea, out of which Venus herselfe was borne: whereas the conceits and jests of Aristophanes, are bitter and sharpe withall, carrying with them a mordicative qualities which doth bite, sting and exulcerate wheresoever they light. And verily I wot not wherin lieth that lively dexteritie which is so highly commended in him; whether in his words & phrases, or in the personages and actours? Certes, those things which he doth imitate and counterfeit, encline alwaies to the woorfe part: his cunning calts and conveyances are nothing civill and gen- 10 tle, but shrewd and malicious: the rusticitie in clownes that he resembleth, is not naturall, but affected and foolish: his merrie jests to moove laughter, are nothing jocund, but rather ridiculous and to be derided his amorous parts be not levely and delectable, but wanton and diffoline. In fumme, it seemeth this man wrote not his poesse to be read of any honest and sober personfor his filthie and lascivious tearmes are meet for leacherous folke, and those which are given over to all loolenes, like as his bitter and spitefull speeches, for envious and malicious persons.

NARRATIONS OF LOVE.

The Summarie.

N this discourse, Plutatch relateth five tragicall histories, which show the pitifullaction of cidents that befell certaine persons transported with the inordinate and tregular affection of Love; leaving thereby unto the reader a saire and electronir our wherein to beholde the judgements of God upon those that abandon themselves to be carried away by intemperance and looseness.

NARRATIONS OF LOVE.

N the citie Aliartos fituate within Baotia, there was formetime a 40 yoong maiden of excellent beautie, named Ariftoelea, and the daughter she was of Theophanes: and two yoong gentlemen there were, that made sute unto her in way of mariage, to wit, Straton an Orchomenian, & Callisthenes of Aliartos aforesaid. Now was Straton to the richer of the twaine, and farre more enamoured of thedamosell; for seene her he had when she was she herselfe in the souncaine of Ereyne, which is in Lebadia, against the time that she was to carrie in procession to Japiter, surnamed King, a sacred panier, as the maner was of the Canephora to do. But Callisthenes had the vantered was of the Canephora to do. But Callisthenes had the vantered was of the Canephora to do. But Callisthenes had the vantered was of the Canephora to do. But Callisthenes had the vantered was of the Canephora to do. But Callisthenes had the vantered was of the Canephora to do. But Callisthenes had the vantered was of the Canephora to do. tage of him, and was deeper in her love, for that he was besides neere of kin unto the virgin. So 50 Theophains her sather being doubtfull what to doe (for he stood in seare of Straton, as one who for wealth and noble parentage went wel-neere beyond all the Beeotians) resolved at length to referre the choise unto the oracle of Jupiter Trophonius: but Straton, who was borne in hand by those of the house about Aristocles, that she inclined more unto him, laboured earnestly, that the matter might be put unto the election of the damosell hersels: whereupon, when Theopharnes the stather demanded of her in the sace of the world, Whom she loved better, and would chuse to be her husband; she presented Callishenes: whereas Straton shewed himselse immedia-

atly not a little discontented for this repulse and disgrace; but two daies after, hecame unto Theophanes and Callifthenes, pretending and faying, that he would not fall out with them, but was defirous still of their good favour and friendship, how ever his ill fortune had envied him the marriage of the yoong virgin. They approving well of this speech, and taking his words in very good part, invited him as a guest to the wedding feast: meane while, he provided himselfe of agood number of his friends, and befides, no finall troupe of fervants, whom he disposed tecrelly in their houses heere and there, against the time that this maiden (after the custome and maner of the countrey) should go downe to a certeine fountaine named Ciffoeifa, there to facrifice unto the Nymphes before her marriage day : now as the paffed by, those who lay in ambush to came all running forth from every fide, and feized upon her bodie, but Straton himselfe principally, who drew and haled the damofell unto him as hard as he could: Callifthenes againe on the other fide, for his part (as became him) held her fast, & so did they about him : thus the filly maiden was tugged and pulled to and fro fo long betweene them, that before they were aware, dead the was among them in their hands: upon which strange occurrent, what became of Calliff henes, it is not knowen, whether he prefently made away himselfe, or fled into voluntary exile; for he was no more seene : as for Straton, in the very fight of all men there in the place he killed himfelfe upon the very body of his espoused bride.

2 There was one named Phidon a Peloponnesian, affecting the seignorie of all Peloponnefun, and being desirous that the citie of Argos his native seat should be ladic over all others, laied 20 an ambuth first for the Corinthians, to intrap them : for he sent an embassiage unto Corinth, to demand a levie of a thousand yoong men, that were the lustiest and most valourous gallants of the whole citie. The Corinthians fent them accordingly, under the conduct of one of their captaines, named Dexander. Now the purpose of this Phidon was, to set upon this troupe, and kill them every one, to the end that he might thereby enfeeble the Corinthians, and make the citie ferve his owne turne (as a strong bulwarke most commodiously seated) to command and fubdue all Peloponnesw. This desseigne of his he communicated unto certaine of his friends for to be put in execution accordingly; among whom there was one named Abron, who being a familiar friend unto Dexander, revealed unto him the conspiracie: whereupon the said regiment of athousand yong men (before they were charged by the faid ambush) retired themselves, and 30 recovered Corinth in fafetic. Then Phidon bestirred himselfe to finde out the man who had thus betraied and discovered his plot: which Abron fearing, withdrew himselfe to Corinth, taking with him his wife, children, and his whole familie, where he fetled and remained in a village named Melissa, belonging to the territorie of that citie: there begat he a sonne, whom of the very place which he inhabited, he named Meliffer; and this Meliffer in processe of time had a sonne of his owne, called Action, who proved the most beautifull, and withall, the modestest lad of all other youths and fpringals of his age; in regard whereof, many there were enamoured of him; but among the rest, one especially, named Archias, descended lineally from the noble race of Hereules, and for wealth, credit and authoritie, the greatest person in all Corinth. This Archias, seeing that by no faire meanes and perswasions he could prevaile with young Attaon, and winne 40 his love, refolved with himfelfe to use violence, and forcibly to ravish and carrie away this faire boy : so he came upon a time (as it were) to make merrie, unto the house of Melissus his father, accompanied with a great traine of friends, and attended upon with a good troupe of his owne householde servants, where he gave the attempt to have away the boy by force: but the father with his friends made refistance; the neighbours also came foorth to rescue, and did all what they could, to holde and keepe the youth with them: but what with the one fide and what with the other, poore Actaon was so pulled and tugged, that betweene them hee lost his life, which done, all the rest went their waies and departed; but Melissus the father brought the dead corps of his childe into the market place of the Corinthians, presented it there unto them, and demaunded justice to be done upon those who had committed this soule outrage. The Corm-50 thians made no greater a matter of it, but onely shewed, that they were fory for his mishap; and so he returned home as he came without effect, attending and waiting for the solemne asfembly at the Isthmicke games; where being mounted up to the top of Neptimes temple, he cried out against the whole race of the Bacebarides, and withall, reheatsed by way of commemoration, the beneficence of his father Abron unto them, and when he had called for vengeance unto the gods, hee threw himfelfe downe headlong among the rocks, and brake his necke. Not long after there fell out to be a great drouth, and the the citie was fore visited with tamine, infomuch as the Corinthians fent unto the oracle, for to know by what meanes they might be delivered from this calamitie. unto whom the god made this answer: That the weath of Neptane was the cause of all their miscrie, who would by no meanes be appeased untill they had revenged Ast aons death which Arehias hearing, (who was himselfe one deputed to this embassing) he was not willing to returne againe to Corinth, but crossed over the seas into Sixis, where he founded and built the city Syracuss, and there hee begat two daughters, Ortygia and Syracuss, but in the end was himselfe trecherously murdred by one Telephas, whom in his youth he had abused as his minion, and who having the conduct of a shippe had failed with him into

A pooreman named Seedafus who dwelt in Leuetra, a village within the territorie of the Sicilie. Thespians, had two daughters, the name of the one was Hippo, and of the other Mileia, or as fome write, elepid they were, Theano and Enippe. Now this Seedafus was abounteous and kind 10 person, yea, and a good fellow in his house, and curteous to all strangers, notwithstanding he had but small store of goods about him. So there fortuned to visit him two yoong men of Sparta, whom hee friendly and lovingly enterteined; who being fallen into fancie with his two daughters, had thus much power yet of themselves, that in regard of their father Seedasus, and his kindnesse unto them, they attempted nothing prejudiciall unto the honest pudicitie of the virgins for that time; but the next morning tooke their leave and went directly toward the city of Delphos, unto the oracle of Apollo Pythins, for to that purpose expresly tooke they this journey and pilgrimage: after that they had confulted with the god about such matters as they came for, they returned backe againe into their owne country; & as they passed thorough Bass 20 tia, tooke Seedafushouse by the way, there for to lodge; who at that time was not at Leuetra, but gone forth: howbeit his daughters according to their courteous bringing up,& their usual maner of intertainment, received these two guests into the house, who seeing their opportunitie, & that they were alone, forced & defloured the filly maidens : and after this deed, feeing them exceedingly offended and angry for this villany offered unto them, fo as by no meanes they would be appealed, they proceeded farther & murdred them both, and when they had so done, threw them into a certeine blinde pit, and so departed. Seedasse being returned home, found all things else in his house fase and found as hee left them, onely his two daughters hee could not meet with, neither wift he what to fay or doe, untill fuch time as a bitch that he had began to whine and complaine, running one while to him and another while training him as it were to the pit fide, whereupon at length, he suspected that which was, and so drew foorth the 30 dead bodies of his two daughters; understanding moreover by his neighbors, that the day before they had seene going into his house those two yoong men of Lacedemon, who not long before had beene lodged with him; he doubted presently that they were those who had committed this crime, and namely, when he called to minde that the first time they came, they did nothing but praife the maidens, faying: That they reputed them most happy, whose fortune should be to espouse them for their wives . Well, to Lacedamon he went , for to conferre with the Ephori about this matter; and by that time that he entred within the territory of Argos, he was benighted, so that he tooke up his lodging in a common inne or hostelry; within which, he found another poore old man, borne in the city Oreos, within the province Hestras, whom when Seedasm heard to sigh and groane grievously, year and to fall a cursing of the Lacedz. monians, hedemaunded what the Lacedæmonians had done unto him, that he fared thus against them, the old man set talean end and said: That a subject he was of the Spartans, and that when one Aristodemus was sent as governour from the State of Sparta, into the citie Oreum, he had dealt very cruelly, and committed many outrages and enormites: for being (quoth he) wantonly fallen in love with a fonne of mine, and feeing that he would not frame nor be induced to fatisfie his will, he affaied to enforce him, and by violence to hale him out of the publicke wreftling place, where he exercised himselse with other his seeres and companions: the warden of the exercises empeached the said governour, with the assistance of many young men, who ranne into the rescue, in such sort, as for that present Aristodemus retired without 50 effect; but the next morrow having fet out and manned a galley of purpose, hee came with a second charge, and caried away my childe; and no sooner was he rowed from Oreum to the otherfide of the water, but he offred to abuse his body; which when the youth would in no wife abide, nor yeeld unto, he made no more adoo but cut his throat, and killed him outright in the place, which done, he returned backe to Oreum, where hee feasted his friends and made great cheere: This accident was I foone advertised of (quoth the old man) whereupon I went and performed the last dutie unto my sonne, and solemnized his sunerall; and so immediately put my selfe upon my journey toward Sparta, where I complained unto the Ephori or lords connoulers, declaring unto them the whole fact, but they gave no care unto inc, nor made any reckoning of my grievance. Seed of the hearing this tale was il appaid & troubled in his mind imagining that the Spartans would make as little account of him; and therewith to requite his tale, related for his part likewise unto the stranger, his owne case; who thereupon gave him counsel, not fo much as once to go unto the Ephori, but to returne immediately backe into Ecotia, and to erect a tombe for his two daughters. Howbeit, Seedafin would not be ruled by him, but held on his journey forward to Sparta, & opened his griefe unto the lords cotroulers before faid: & when he faw that they tooke small heed of his words, he addressed himselfe to the kings of Sparia; yea 10 and afterwards to some particular burgeosies of the citie, unto whom he declared the fact, and bewailed his owne infortunitie. But feeing that all booted not, heran up and downe the streets of the citie, stretching forth his hands up to heaven, and to the sun and stamping upon the ground with his feet, calling upon the furies of hell to be revenged, and at the last killed himselfe. But in proceffe of time the Lacedæmonians paid decrely for this their injustice : for when they were growen to that greatnes, that they commanded all Greece, and had planted their garrifons in everie citie; first Epaminondas the Theban cur the throtes of those fouldiers who lay in garrison at Thebes; whereupon the Lacedæmonians made warre upon the Thebanes, who went out with a power to encounter them as far as to the village of Leučtra, taking that place for a good prefage unto them; for that before time they had been there delivered out of servitude, what time as Am-20 phictyon chaled by Sthenelus, fled and retired himselfe unto the citie of Thebes; where finding them subdued by the Chalcidians, and made their tributaries: after he had slaine Chalcodon the king of the Eubæans, he eafed the Thebanes of the tribute which they before had paid. So it fortuned that the Lacedæmonians were discomfitted and defeated, neere unto the verie same monument or tombe of the faid two daughters of Seedafus. It is reported moreover that a little before this battell, Seedas appeared in a vision or dreame unto Pelopidas, one of the captaines of the Thebane army, who had beene altogether discouraged with certaine signes and foretokens, which he judged and interpreted to portend ill; whom Seedafes willed to take a good heart, for that the Lacedæmonians were thither come, for to fuffer that punishment which they owed to him & his daughters; adviting him withal the day before he encountred with the Lacedæmo-30 nians, to facrifice a yoong white tole or colt, which he should find readie even before the sepulcher of his two daughters. And then Pelopidas, while ithe enemies lay yet encamped at Teges; fent before unto Leuctra for to enquire of the faid tombe; and being enformed thereof by the inhabitants of the countrey, advanced forward boldly with his army, and wan the field.

Phoeu, a Bæotianborne (for descended he was from Gleisas) had a daughter named Callirrhoe, a maiden of fingular beautie, and furpaffing honesty and sobrietie withall. So there were to the number of thirtie yoong gentlemen, the noblest and best reputed of all Beeria, who were all suters unto her in the way of marriage. But Phoeus her father made alwaics some delay or other, and found meanes to put off still from day to day, as fearing lest shee should be forced. At last seeing how he was overpressed with these instant wooers; he requested them to referre the 40 election of him that should be her husbaud unto the oracle of Apollo. The young mentaking indignation at these words and answere of his, fell upon him and slew him: but in this affray and tumult the yoong maiden escaped and ran thorow the fields into the countrey: but the yoong lustie futers made after and pursued her; and shee lighting upon certaine husbandmen, who were laying together and piling up of wheat upon a floore in a ricke, by the meanes of them faved herfelfe; for the faid husbandmen hid her within the corne, fo as they paffed by who followed in chase after her. Thus having escaped this danger, shee expected the solemne feast and generall affembly, called Pambeotia, for that all the Boeotians met together: then came shee to thecitie of Coronea, and there in habite and forme of a suppliant, the fat before the altar of Minerva Itoma; where she related unto all commers the enormious wickednes and mischiefe com-50 mitted by her woocrs, rehearfing them everie one by name, and shewing in what countrey ech one was borne. The Bocotians tooke pitie of the damofell, and were highly displeased and incensed against those young gentlemen: which they hearing, fled into the citic Orehomenus, but the Orchomenians would not receive them: by occasion whereof they meant to put themselves within Hippora, a pretie towne neere unto Helicon, fituate betweene 7 hebes and Coronea, which gave them entertainment. Then fent the Thebanes unto the inhabitants therof certaine persons to calupon them for to deliver up the murderers of Phoeus, that they might receive justice accordingly but when they would not yeeld fo to do, the Thebanes with other Boeotians, gathered an armie and went against them junder the leading of Phadus, who at that time was the chiefe ruler of Thebes, and laid siege unto the said towne; which being otherwise strongly fortified, was in the end forced forwant of water; where they stoned to death the murderers; brought the inhabitants unto bondage and slavesie; rased their walles; overthrew their dwelling houses; and devided their whole territoric among the Thebanes and Coronæans. The report goeth, that overinght before that this towne of Hippora was wonne, there was a voice heard from the mount Helicon of one estsones iterating these words: Here I am, Here I am; which voice the thirty woolers knew all verie well to be the speech of Phoeus. Also the same day that they were stoned, it is said that the monument or toombe of this old man, which stood at Gleisas, showed and ran with saffron. Thus when Phadus the capraine and ruler of the Thebanes, returned from warre with to victorie, newes came unto him that his wise was delivered of a daughter; which he taking to be a good presage, named her thereupon N icostrata. 5 Aleippus, a Lacedæmonian borne, espouseda ladie named Democrita; by whom hee was the father of two daughters, who alwaies both giving counfell unto the citie for the best things, and alfoready in perfon to ferve, & execute the fame in al occurrences prefented, for the good of his countrey, incurred the envie and emulation of his concurrents in the government of the State, who with falle furmifes and flanderous imputations, went about to feduce the Ephori, buzzing into their heads, how this Alcippus would overthrow the lawes, and change the whole State and common-wealth of Sparta: infomuch as they banished him out of his countrey, and would not fuffer his wife with her daughters to follow him : and that which woorfe is, 20 they did confiscate his goods, to the end that his daughters might have no portions to bestow them for their advancement in marriage. And not with standing that divers young men in regard of their fathers vertue, made meanes for to marrie these maidens without any dowry, yet his adverfaries wrought fo cunningly, that they paffed an act and publicke edict, forbidding exprefly, that any man should seeke unto them for marriage : for they alledged and pretended that their mother Democrita had often times made her praiers unto the gods, that her daughters might quickly bring foorth children who might be revenged for the injuried one unto their father, Democrita then perceiving how on every fide she was hardly bested & driven to a straight, observed her time, and waited a certeine solemne and sestivallday, which the dames of the citie, with their daughters virgins, with their maid-fervants likewife and little children, did celebrate: 20 on which day, the wives of magistrates and men of honour, watched and passed the whole night by themselves in a great and spacious hall. When this day was come, she girded herselse with a dagger or skeine under her clothes, and taking her daughters with her, when night came, went into the temple; and observing the opportunitie of the time when all the faid dames were busine in their divine fervice and hard at their devotions in the hall abovefaid, when all the waies and passages were shut up, she brought a great deale of wood which was provided for the sacrifice, and piled the same against the doores, and so set it on fire. But when their husbands came running for to helpe from all parts, Democrita killed her two daughters and herfelfe upon them. The Lacedæmonians notknowing upon whom to discharge their anger, caused the dead bodies of Democrita and her two daughters to be throwen without the confines and liberties of their territories for which act of theirs, God being highly displeased, sent (as the Chronicles do record)

WHETHER CREATVRES BE MORE WISE, THEY OF

THE LAND, OR THOSE OF THE WATER.

The Summarie.

N this treatife and discourse, affoording (among other things) much pleasure in the reading, Plutarch bringeth in two yoong genilemen, Aristotimus and Phoedimus, who in the presence of a frequent companie plead the cause of living creatures: Aristotimus in the first place, for them of the land; and Phoedimus in the second, for those of the water: the drift and conclusion of whose pleas commeth to this point, that without resolving unto whom the prize ought to be adjudged, one of the companie inferreth that the examples alledged both of the one fide and of the other, do prove that those creatures have some use of resfon. Moreover, we may distinctly divide this booke into three principall parts: the first containeth a conference betweene Sociarus and Autobulus, who gave eare afterwards unto the others : for Soclarus taking occasion to speake of a written discourse recited in the praise of hunting, commendeth this exercise, and preferreth it before combats of sword plaiers and sencers; which Autobulus will in no wife approone, but holdeth that this warre against beasts, schooleth (as it were) and traineth mento learne for to kill one another afterwards. And for that some entrance and accesse there was to be given unto the principall disputation of the intelligence and knowledge which is in brute beasts, they doe 20 examine the opinion of the Stoicks, who bereave them of all understanding passion and pleasure: which opinion of theirs being at large debated, is afterward refuted; with this resolution, that man out goeth beasts in all subtiltie and quicknesse of wit, in justice and equitie meet for civill societie: and yet beasts, although they be more dull and beavie than men, are not therefore void of all discourse and naturall reason. Then Autobulus confirmeth this by the consideration of horses and dogges enraged: a sufficient testimonie that such creatures before time had reason and understanding. Sociarus opposeth himselfe against such a confirmation, in the behalfe of the Stoicks and Peripateticks: whereupon Autobulus distinguisheth of the arguments, and inclining partly to the side of the Pythagoreans, sheweth what maner of justice or injustice we ought to consider in the carriage of men toward beasts. And then come the two young gentlemen above named in place; where Aristotimus taking in hand the cause of so lind-beasts, discourseth at large thereupon, which is the second part of this present treatise. True it is, that all the beginning of his plea is defective and wanting ; how beit, that which remaines h and is extans, sheweth sufficiently the carefull industry of our author in searching into the history of nature, and examples drawen out thereof, as also out of an infinit number of books, to passing good purpose. Well then, Aristocimus sheweth in the first place, that the hunting of land-beast's, is a far nobler and more commendable exercise than that of the water: and comming then to the point; namely, to the use of reason, which consistes hin the election and preference of one thing before another, in provisions, forecasts and prerogatives in affections, as well those which be milde and gentle, as the other which are violent; in diligence and industry in arts and sciences in hardinesse, equitie, temperance, convage and magnanimitie, he proove thall this to be (without comparison) farremore in land-creatures than in other: 50 for the proofe and verifying whereof, he produceth bulles, elephants, lions, mice, swallowes, spiders ravens, dogs, bees, geefe, cranes, herons, pilmires, wolves, foxes, mules, partridges, bares, bearcs, urchins, and divers forts besides of foure foosed beasts: of fowles likewise, insects, wormes and serpents: all which are specified in particular afterwards. In the last part, Phoedimus making some excuse that he was not well prepared, taketh in hand neverthelesse, the cause of fishes; and in the very entrance, declareth, that not withflanding it be an hard matter to shew the sufficiencie of such creatures, which are so divided and severed from us; yet notwith standing, produce he will his proofs and arguments drawen from certeine and notable things, recommending filtes in this respect, that they are so wife and considerate (as he sheweth by examples) being not taught nor monished unto any waies framed and trained by man, like as most part of land beasts be; and yet by the way he proovethby celes. lampreis, and crocodiles, that fishes may be made tame with men, and how our auncients esteemed highly the institution of such mute creatures: after this he describeth their naturall prudence, both in defending themselves and also in offending and assailing others, alledging infinit examples to this purpose: as the skill and knowledge they have in the Mathematicks, their amity, their fellowship, their love, their kinde affection to their young ones : alledging in the end divers histories of dolphins love unto men: whereupon Sociarus taking occasion to speake, inferreth that these two pleaders agree in one point, and if a man would joine and lay together their arguments, proofes, and reasons, they would make head passing well and strongly against those, who would take from beasts both of land and 10 water all discourse of reason.

Eonidas, a king of Lacedamon, being demaunded upon a time what he thought of Tyrtam: I take him to bee (quoth he) agood 20 poet, to whet and polith the courages of yoong men; for that by his verses he doth imprint in the hearts of yoong gentlemen an ardent affection, with a magnanimous defire to winne honour and glorie, in regard whereof, they will not spare themselves in battels and fights, but expose their lives to all perils whatsoever: Semblably, am I greatly affraid my very good friends, left the discourse as touching the praife of hunting, which was read yesterday in this company, hath fo stirred up and excited beyond all measure our yoong men, who love that game fo well, that from hencefoorth they will thinke all other things but accessaries and by-matters, or rather make no account at all of other exercises, but 30 will runne altogether unto this sport, and minde none other besides, considering that I finde my felfe now a fresh more hotly given, and youthfully affectionate thereunto than mine age would require, infomuch as according to the words of dame Phedra in Euripides:

Allmy desire is now to call And cry unto my hounds in chase, The dapple stagge and hinde withall, To hunt and follow hard at trace.

So neere unto the quickedid that discourse touch me, alleaging such a number of proper and pithy reasons.

Sociarus. True it is that you say ô Autobulue, for me thought that therein he stirred up and awakened his fingular eloquence and skill in Rhetoricke, which fome time he had discontinued & which lay afleepe, to gratific (as I take it) those young gentlemen who were present in place, and withall to folace and disport himselfe among them, but that which pleased me most was this: When hee represented unto our eies by way of comparison, sword-sencers fighting at sharpe one with another to the uttrance, alledging this for one of his reasons, wherefore he principally commending hunting, in that it diverteth and calleth away a certeine affection that we have either naturally engraffed, or elfe acquired by use and custome to take pleasure in seeing men at swords point enter into combat for life & death one against another, & turneth it especially hither, yeelding unto us a faire pure and innocent spectacle of artificial cunning, conjoi-50 ned with hardinesse and courage, guided with reason, against brutish force and witlesse strength: and in so doing giveth us to understand that this sentence of Euripides is woorthy to be praised

> Small is mans strength and puissance corporall; His wit is great and prudence naturall; It tames all fish beneath in sea so deepe And wily beafts aloft on earth that keepe

Autoeulus.

Autobulus.

And yet my good friend Soclarus, fome there be who hold, that this inflexible rigour and favage impaffibility of notbeing mooved at all with pitty, came from hence into mens hearts. namely, from the custome of killing of beasts in chase, and of learning not to have in honour the fight of bloudshed, and of the grievous wounds of beasts which they received, but to take delight in seeing them to die, and to be cut in pieces: and like as in the citie of Athens, when it was reduced under the tyrannie of the thirtie usurpers, the first man whom they put to death was afycophant, of whom it was faid then, that hee had well deferved it, and was rightly ferved; and so they faid by a second and a third: but from thence they went forward by little and to little, untill they came to lay hold upon honest men, and in the end spared not the best and most vertuous citizens: even so he that killed at the first a beare, or a woolfe, was highly commended, and thought to have done a very good deed; and an oxe or a fwine that had eaten fomethings provided for a facrifice or oblation to the gods, was condemned as fit and worthy to die: heereupon stagges and hinds, hares also and goates, which men began already to eat, invited also the flesh of theepe, yea, and in some places of dogges and horses to the table. But they who taught first to diffmember, and cut in pieces for meat, a tame goose, a house dove, and familiar pigeon, a dung-hill cocke, or domesticall henne of the roust, and that not for to latisfie and remedie the necessitie of hunger, as doe these weezils and cattes, and but onely for pleasure, and to feed a daintie tooth, surely have confirmed and strengthened all that 20 bloudinesse and savage cruelty which was in our nature, and made it altogether instexible and immooveable without any compassion: but contrariwise enseebled and dulled for the most part all natural mildnesse and humanitie; whereas on the other side the Pythagoreans would have men to accustome themselves to use gentlenesse even towards beasts, as an exercise of pitty and mercy to men? for cultome which traineth us familiarly by little and little to any passion and affection, hath a wonderous efficacie, to fet a man forward thereunto. But I wot not how, being entred into speech, we have forgotten our selves, and not kept us to that which was begun yesterday, and should be continued and held on this day: for yesterday as you know very well, having agreed upon this: That all forts of living creatures have in them fome little discourse and reason, we gave good occasion and matter of a learned and pleasant disputation, unto our 30 young gentlemen, who love hunting fo well, namely, as touching the wit and wisedome of bealts, whether there be more in them of the land, or those of the sea? which question we are as I take it, this day to decide, in case Aristotimus and Phadimus hold on still, and persist in their defiances and chalenges, which yesterday they gave one another; for the one of them undertooke unto his friends and companions, to mainteine that the earth bringeth foorth beafts of more fense, capacitie and understanding; and the other contrariwise promised as much in the behalfe of the water.

SOCLARUS.

That they do, Autobulus, they are of the same mind still to dispute it out, and here they wil be anon for this very purpose; for I saw them in the morning betimes, addressing & making them-40 selves readie: but if you thinke it good, before this combat begin, let us go in hand againe with that which yesterday should have been handled, and was not; partly for that the time and place ferved not therto; or rather because the matter was proposed unto them at the table, and among the cups of wine, which went merrily about, and not treated of in good earnest and sadnesse in deed: for one there was, who feemed after a pragmaticall fort to refound on the adverse part not impertinently, as if he came out of the Stoicks schoole, thus much: That like as mortal is oppofite unto immortall, corruptible unto incorruptible, and corporall to incorporall; even fo, confesse ought, that reasonable is contrarie to unreasonable; so that if one of them be, the other ought likewise of necessitie to be, and that this onely couple of contraries among so many other, ought not to be left defectuous or unperfect.

Аитовигия. And what is he, friend Sociar us, who will fay, that if we admit in nature, that which is reasonable to subfift and have being; wee should not likewise allow that which is unreasonable: for (no doubt) it is, and that in great measure, namely in all creatures which have no life nor soule: neither need we to feeke farther for any other opposition unto that which is reasonable; for whatfoever is without life and foule, is incontinently opposite unto that which together with foule, hath the use of understanding and reason: and if any one there be who maintaineth, that nature for all this is not unperfect, in that everie substance having soule is either reasonable or unreasonable: another will say unto hun likewise, that a nature endued with life and soule, is not defective, namely in that, either it hath imagination, or else is without; it is either sensitive, or else hath no sense; to the end that it may have on either side these two oppositions or privations, making counterpoife one against another, about one and the same kind, as two contrarie branchesarifing out of one stemme or trunke. And if he thinke him to be absurd, who demanndeth that it should be graunted unto him, that of a nature endued with soule, one branch should be sensitive, and another sensitisfier that he thinketh that everie nature which hath a soule is incontinently both sensitive, and also imaginative: yet for all this shall be have no more apparance to require that one flould suppose this unto him for to be true; namely, that whatsoever hath foule, should be either reasonable or unreasonable, discoursing with those men, who held to opinon that nothing hath fenfe, but the fame hath understanding withall; and that there is not one kind of animall creatures, but it hath fome manner of opinion and difcourfe of reason, like as it hath sense and natural appetite; for nature, who as men say, and that right truely, maketh all things for fome cause and to some end, hath not made a living creature sentitive, onely and simply to have a passive sense: but whereas there be a number of things proper and agreeable to it, and as many againe for the contratie, it could not possibly endure and continue the minute of an houre, if it knew not how to fit it selfe with one, and to take heed and beware of the other. So it is therefore, that fenfe giveth unto every animall creature the knowledge of them both indifferently : but the discretion which accompanieth the said sense, in chusing, receiving, and pursuing after that which is profitable; or refuling, rejecting and flying from that which is hurtfull 20 and pernicious: there is no apparance at all of reason to induce us to say that those creatures have, if they had not withall fome meane facultic and aptitude naturall, to discourse, judge, conceive, comprehend, retaine, and remember: as for those creatures verily, from which you take altogether the gift of expectance, remembrance, election, provision, and preparation afore hand: and moreover, the facultie of hoping, fearing, defiring and refusing; good have they none at all of their eies, of their eates, or of any other fense, apprehension or imagination, in case there be no use thereof: and farre better it were for them, that they were cleane destitute and quite deprived of fuch faculties, than to fuffer travell, paine and forrow, and have not wherewith to putby and repell fuch inconveniences: and yet there is a discourse extant of the naturall philosopher Strate, thewing by plaine demonstration, that impossible it is to have any sense at all, without 30 some discourse of reason: for many times we runne over the letters in bookes and writings with our cies; yea and we heare the found of words withour eares, without conceiving and comprehending either the one or the other, but they fly and passe away, when as our mind is otherwise occupied: but afterwards when the mind is come againe to it felfe and united it, it runnethand pursueth after the same, and gathereth every thing together againe which was scattered: Integard whereof it was not faid amiffe in old time:

The mind it is, that doth both heare and fee:

As for the rest full deafe and blind they bee. as if the motion and passion about the cies and cares, caused no sense at all, if the mind and underitanding were away. And therefore Chomenes king of Lacedemon, being one day at a feat in 40 Egypt, where there was reheatfed at the table a pretic Acroame or care-delight, which pleafed the companie verie well; being demaunded the question what hee thought of it? and whether hee judged it not verie well penned and let downe? As for that (quoth he) I report me unto you that heard it, and I referre it to your judgement : for mine part, my mind was all the while in Peloponnesius. And therefore necessarie it is, that everie creature which hath sense, should likewise be endued with discourse of reason and understanding, considering that by our understanding wee come to sense. But set the case that the senses have no need at all of the understanding, to exercise their functions & operations: but when the sense hath done her part, in discerning that which is proper and familiar unto a living creature, from it that is contrarie & adverse unto it, it passeth away and is gone: What is it then that remembreth and calleth to minde? what is it that fea-50 reth things notione and offentive, and contrariwife defireth those which be good and hollome? what is it that fecketh meanes to compaffe and get things when they are not prefent? what is it that devileth and prepareth offensive, forts and retracts, yea, and engins to catch and take; or contrariwife, this trand policies to escape nets and grinnes laied for them when they are at the point to be caught and surprised? and yet * these men say as much as this comes to, when ever and anon in all their introductions they dull our eares and make our heads ake againe with their definitions; for they define acodes, that is to fay, a project or deliberat purpose, to be a desseigne of bringing formewhat to effect; 376600, that is to fay, endevour, to be an appetite or defire before an appetite; Squardin, that is to fay, provision, to be an action before action; without, that is to lay, remembrance or memorie, to be the comprehension of a proposition affirmative or negative, already past; whereof the present trueth was otherwise comprised by the sense; for of all these faculties, there is not so much as one reasonlesse (I meane) not proceeding from the discourse of reason : and yet they all concurre, and are to be found in every living creature : and even to verily, they define pointers, that is to fay, intelligences, to be notions laied up apart and referved within; but staroforers, that is to fay, cogitations, to be notions still in motion: as for passions, they confesting and defining them all in generality to be evil judgements & falle opinions, 10 awoonder it is, how they passe over so many effects and motions which are to be found in brute bealts; some proceeding from anger and choler, others againe from seare: and besides all this, envie (I may tell you) and jealoufie; when as they themselves (beleeve me) slicke not to punish their horles, and beat their dogs, when they do a fault; not raffily and in vaine, but confideratly, for to correct them and make them wifer, working thereby & imprinting in them a displeasure with themselves proceeding from paine, which we call repentance: as touching other pleasures and delights, that which paffeth and is received by the cares, they terme it (for footh) xinners, that istofay, an enchantment; that which commeth by the eie, 2011 cia, that is to fay, bewitching: and they use both the one and the other against wilde beasts; for certeine it is, that stagges and horles do joy in the found of whiftles, flutes and hautboies; also men call forth crabfiff, crevif-20 fes and grampels out of their holes perforce, with burning torches and light fire brands: moreover, it is faid, that the fifth alofa hearing men to fing, to clap their hands, or otherwise to make a noife, will arrie out of the water, and come abroad: likewife, the horne owle or buffard is (as it were) enchanted with the beholding of men dancing together in his fight, and fo far overtaken he is with the delight thereof, that whiles he thinketh to counterfeit their jeftures, flirring and moving his shoulders according to the measures with them, he suffereth himselfe (like a foole) to be taken by the fowler. As for those who of these matters speake so foolishly and absurdly, faying, that beafts rejoice not, are not angry, nor fearefull; and namely, that the * nightingale un musus dedoth not studie, meditate and prepare against her singing; that the bee hath no memorie; but all the state of doth notitudie, meditate and prepare against ner tinging; that the oce nath no memorie; but as Phine ret that the swallow seemeth onely to make provision by a kinde of providence; that the lion is (as pointed of 30 it were) angrie; and the hinde given as though the were afraied: I wot not what answer they will her, untelle make to those who shall urge them to this, that they may aswell say, that the same creatures nei your rade your make to those who shall urge them to this, that they may aswell say, that the same creatures nei your rade you ther fee nor heare, but feeme onely (as it were) to heare and fee and to have a voice; and in one finte, that the word, that they live not at all, but feeme to live: for I affure you (in my judgement) these are no (wallow doth more repugnant to evidence and daily experience, than the other.

Soclarus.

I thinke no leffe (6 Autobulus) and therefore range me among those of your opinion in this former indulties point. But to compare the maners, lives, actions, behaviours and conversations of men, with in artificiall those of beafts, & to affirme that beafts herein fort with us: besides, that I fee in this, great indig. building. nitie derogatorie to mans woorthinesse, I doubt much, and can not conceive how nature hath 40 given unto them the beginning of vertue, which is reason, and unto which reason is referred and doth aime, confidering they can not attaine unto the end; and befides, there is not one of them all that sheweth any signe of tending thereto, of progresse therein, or of desire and appetite that Autobulus.

Yea, but this (my good friend Soclarus) is no strange and absurd thing with these men, I meane the Stoicks : for notwithstanding that they put downe the natural love and affection which we have to the iffue of our owne bodies begotten, for the foundation of civil focietic and of justice, and see the same in brute beasts very evident and puissant, yet for all that, they statly and flourly denie that they have any part of justice in them. And that which more is, mules are 50 not without all the inftruments of generation; for nature hath given to the males generative members, and to the females the parts fit for conception; yea, and in the use of these members and instruments they have the same delight and pleasure which other creatures have; howbeit, they never speed, nor attaine to the end of generation. Consider againe on the other side, whether it were not a ridiculous abfurditie for fuch philosophers as they would seeme to be, to affirme and mainteine, that Socrates and Plato, and fuch men as they, were no leffe vicious than any vile flave or wicked wretch in the world, but that all were foolish, witleffe, lascivious and un-

justalike (because for footh, all finnes with them be equall) and then to lay the blame and fault in the fource and beginning of vertue, that is to fay, Reason, as being not pure nor perfect in brute beafts to the accomplishment of vertue : as if this were not some defect and imbecillitie of reason, seeing they confesse themselves that there is an imperfection in the use of reason, of which all beafts be full: for we fee in many of them, that there is cowardife, intemperance, injuflice and malice. Now he who affirmeth that what foever is not apt and fitted by nature, to receive reason aright and in absolute maner, is simply not capable of reason: first he doth as much as if he mainteined, that neither the ape is capable of ilfavoured deformitie, nor the tortoife of flow pace, because the one of them is not susceptible of beautifull favour, nor the other of swiftneffe and good footmanship. Againe, he doth not see and marke the difference betweene reafon perfect, and fimple reason; for reason simply proceedeth from nature, but honest, vertu- 10 ous, and perfect reason commeth by industry, study, diligence, and teaching; which is the cause that all creatures endued with a sensitive soule, are capable and susceptible of a kinde of discipline and learning by the meanes of this facultie of discourse and reason: mary this abfoliate and right reason indeed which we affect and seeke for, and is nothing else but sapience and wisedome, they are not able to name any one man, that ever attained unto it. Like as therefore a difference there is betweene fight and fight; betweene flight and fight; for haukes fee otherwise than grashoppers doe; eagles also and partridges flie not alike; even so all creatures endued with reason, have not the like vivacity, promptitude and nimblenesse of reason, as to reach up to the highest pitch and perfection thereof: for we may observe in some beasts many evident tokens of just focietie, of valour, of witty industry in their provision and dispose : and 20 contrariwife, in others as many fignes of infociable violence and injuffice, of cowardife and fottifhnesse, as witnesseth that which now mooveth the contention and debate betweene our yoong gentlemen; for as if they both supposed there was a difference in this behalfe, some of them mainteine that naturally, the beafts of the land are proceeded farther in vertue; and others contrariwise affirme, the same of those in the sea and waters; a thing very evident, whofoever will compare ftorkes with the river horses; for those doe nourish and feede their fathers who engendred them, whereas these doe kill them, because they might ride and cover their mothers: as also who will but conferre cocke-doves with partridges; for doves doe oftentimes fquash and marre the egges, yea, and otherwhiles kill the hennes when they cover or fit, because they are not willing during that time to be troden; whereas the male partridges take upon them 20 part of the care and paine in fitting upon the egges, and in their turne doc keepe them warme, that they chill not; yea, and that which more is, they be the first that bring meat in their billes unto the little ones newly hatched; and if haply the damme raunge abroad, tarie foorth too long out of the nest, the male beats and pecks her with his bill, drives her home to her egges and yoong birds. As for Antiparer who reprocheth and rebuketh both affes and sheepe for their filthinesse, and being so negligent in keeping themselves cleane, he hath forgotten (I wot not how) to speake of ounces and swallowes: for the ounces seeke a by-place by themselves apart, where to bestow their urine, and by all meanes hide and conceale that fine stony substance, called Lyncurium, which is engendred of it: and the swallowes teach their yoong ones to turne their tailes fo, as they may ment out of their nests. Moreover, why say we not that one 40 tree is more ignorant or untaught than another, like as we hold, and that truely, that a sheepe is more dull of capacitie than a dogge? or that this herbe is more fearefull than that, like as we affirme very well, that a stagge is more timorous, or rather lesse valourous than a lion: and as in things which are unmooveable, we never fay, that one is more flow than another; nor among fuch things as yeeld no found at all, that this hath a smaller or bigger voice than that; Semblably, it is never faid, that there is lessewitte, more dulnesse, and greater intemperance in fuch or fuch things, unleffe it be in that kinde, whereof all by nature are endued with the gift of reason, and of prudence in some measure, which puissance and facultie being given to fome more, and to others leffe, is that which maketh all the difference that we fee. Yea mary, but there is no comparison will some man say, between emen and beasts; so infinitly surpas- 50 feth he them in fineneffe of witte, in justice and equity, beforming civill focietie, that it is wonderfull: And even fo, (my good friend) there be many which in biggeneffe and strength of bodie, in swiftnesse of seet, in quicknesse of eie-sight, and subtility, of hearing out-goe all the men in the world, and leave them farre behinde, and yet for all this, wee are not to inferre and conclude that man is blinde, that he is impotent of hand and foot, or otherwise dease: neither hath naturedeprived us altogether of bigge armes and bodies, or of strength both in the one and the other, although in comparison of the elephant and the camell, our force and bulke of body is nothing: after the fame maner may we speake of beasts; if their discourse and understanding be more grosse; if their witte be more dull than ours, it followeth not thereupon, that they have neither reason nor naturall witte: for without all question, both they have, seeble though they be and troubled, like as an cie is otherwhiles weake, dimme, and muddy: and were it not that I certeinly expect, and that among our yoong men who are studious; learned and verie well seene in the books of our auncient writers, that they will alledge an infinit number of examples, the one from the land, and the other out of the sea; I could not conteine my selbe but recite and alledge heere before you an innumerable fort of proofes and arguments, as well of the natural subtly of beasts, as of their docility, which the beautifull and famous city of some

the natural morning of beares, as of their doctine, switch the beautiful and failed is refer to hath affounded unto us to draw and lade up aboundantly by whole fcuppets and buckets full (as they fay,) from the flately theaters of their emperours, and the princely games exhibited

there

But let us leave this matter fresh and entire for those young men, thereby to embelish their discourses, and set out their eloquence: meane while I would gladly examine and confider one point with you now that we are at leafure. For I suppose that in every part & naturall power or facultie of our bodie, there doth befall some proper defect, some maime or maladie, as namely, in the cie, blindnesse; in the legge, lamenesse; in the tongue, stutting and stammering; and that which is proper to one member, is not incident unto another; for wee use not to say, that a thing is become blinde, which never had power by nature to fee, nor lame which was not or-20 deined to goe; neither was there ever man who would fay, that a thing stammered which never had tongue, or muffled and wharled, which naturally yeeldeth no voice at all: and even fo we cannot (to speake properly and truely) tearme that foolish, furious, or enraged, which by course of nature is not capable of understanding, discourse and reason: for impossible it is, that a part may be faid to be interested, affected or prejudiced in a thing, which never had an aptitude or naturall power, that might receive diminution, privation, mutilation, or otherwise some infirmitie : and yet I doubt not but you have otherwhiles feene dogges runne madde; and for mine owne part I have known horses enraged; and there be moreover, who affirme that kine and other beefes will be horne-wood, yea and foxes as well as dogges: but the example of dogges whereof no man makes doubt, may fuffice to proove and beare witnesse, that this kinde of 30 beaft hath reason and understanding, and therefore not in small measure to bee contemued but when it chanceth that it is troubled and confounded, then comes upom them that difeafe which is called rage and madnesse; for at such a time we cannot perceive in them, that either their fight or their hearing is altered : but like as he that should give out of a man who is overcharged with a melancholike humour, or given to rave and go beside himselfe, that his underflanding is not transported and out of order, that his discourse of reason is not out of the way, nor his braines broken, or memorie corrupt, were very abfurd: for that the ordinary custome and behaviour of such foolish and bestraught persons sufficiently convinceth, that they are past themselves, and have lost the discourse of reason; even so, who soever thinketh that mad dogges fuffer any other paffion, than a confusion and perturbation of that part in them, which before 40 time was woont to imagine, discourse and remember, in such fort that when they be thus surprifed with rage, they are to foolish and sottish, as they know not their best friends, who were woont to make much of them, but flie those places of their feeding and bringing up, which they used most to haunt & to converse in, & do not so much as discerne; but oversee that which is presentedplaine before them: this man (I fay) feemeth obstinately to strive against the truth, and not to comprehend that which daily experience doth shew.

SOCLARUS.

Certes, your conjecture in mine opinion is very good, and you are in the right: but the Stoicks and Peripatericks shifty stand against all this, and impugne it with tooth and naile, saying: That justice cannot have any other breeding and beginning; and that impossible it is to main50 taine that there is any justice in the world, if it be confessed that all bests are any waies capable of reason: for that necessarie it is, either that wedo injurie in not sparing them; or in case we make nouse of them for our food, that impossible it were for us to live; or else our life should ternaine destitute of such things as well it may not misse and be without. In summe, that we were to live in some fort a savage and beastlike life, if wee should reject the profits and commodities which they affoord. For I passe by infinit thousands and millions of the Troglodyts and Nomades, that know no other seeding, but of section only and nothing else: but as for us who seeme to leade a mild, civill, & more gentle life, what worke were there less for us to do upon the land; what businesses.

finesse have wee at sea? what skill or art should wee exercise among the mountaines? what ornament or beautie would there be in our life, if wee were taught this once as a true lefton, that we ought to respect all beasts, and use all equitie towards them, as being reasonable creatures as we are, and made of the same mould that we be? Certes, it were verie hard to say; and therefore there is no answere to associate this doubt; no medicine or falve to heale this fore; no device to undo this knot, and difficulty which taketh away, either all civilitie, or elfe all justice out of mans life, unleffe we keepe that ancient limit and lawe, whereby God having feparated (according as He siodus faith) sundrie natures and distinguished every kind a part by it selfe:

Tomen alone, he justice gave therein to take delight. Given(I fay)he hath juftice unto them for to exercise among themselves:and as for other living creatures as they cannot deale justly with us fo it is certaine that we cannot use injustice to them: and looke who foever reject this conclusion and resolution, have left no other use, nor so much as a fimple way whereby justice may enter and come among us.

Autorulus.

Now truely my friend, you have faid this very wel, and even according to the mind and hearts defire of these men: howbeit we are not to give & grant unto these philosophers (as the maner is to tie about those women who have hard travell, some Ocytocium, or medicinable drogue, to cause them forto have more speedy and easie deliverance) this device to hang upon them, that 20 they may with case and without all paine, beare and bring sooth justice unto us; seeing that in the maine and most important points of all philosophie, they would not allow Epicurus so finall a thing, & fo vile, as to decline one only atomic, or indivisible body never so little aside, for to make way for the starres, for living creatures, and fortune to come into the world, and that thereby our free will might bee faved for they ought either to proove by demonstration, that which is doubtfull, or to suppose that which of it selfe is manifelt; and not to take this article as touching beafts, for to establish justice, seeing that it is neither confessed & granted unto them, nor they otherwise doe proove it for another path-way there is to bring in justice among men, which is nothing to flipperie, dangerous, and full of fleepe downfalles, nor that which leadeth thorough the subversion and overthrow of things most evident; even that which my some 30 and one of your familiar friends (Soclarus) having learned of Plato, doeth fhew and teach those who will not obstinately contest, but follow reason and learne: for that man is not altogether cleere and voide of injustice, in using beasts, and dealing with them as he doeth. Heraclitus and Empedocles receive as an undoubted truth, complaining in many places, and reproching nature, as if the were under necessity, and a very warre, having in her nothing that is simple, pure, fincere, and unmixed, but performing all her operations by many unjust accidents and paffions; feeing they hold that even her generation proceeded from injuffice, namely, by conjunction of mortall with immortall, and in that the thing which is engendred thereof, rejoiceth to difmember unnaturally, that which engendred it: but haply all this may feeme too bitter and exceeding thatpe: well there is another gentle meanes, and cafe remedy of this inconveni-40 ence which doth not quite bereave beafts of all use of reason, and saveth justice in those who use them as they ought; which meane and indifferent way being in times past brought in by wife men, was afterwards rejected and wholly destroied by a conspiracie of gourmandise and sless. ly pleasure together; howsoever Pythagoras would have recovered it againe, by teaching men how they might make use and commoditie of beasts, and yet doethern no wrong nor injurie; for they who punish and put to death those wilde beasts which have no societie nor fellowship atall with man, but rather doe him much hurt and dammage, committo injustice; no more than they who make them tame and familiar, training them up to their ule and imploying them in services, whereunto they are by nature most fit: whom Prometheus in a tragoedie of Aefthylus, faith hebestowed upon us,

The race of borse and asses for to breed, With bulles encrease, which in the fields doe feed.

To ferve and drudge in stead of us,

And do our works laborious. Neither do they any wrong, who make use of dogges to keepe their flocks of goats and sheepe: nor they who milke goats and sheepe, and sheare their sleeces for the wooll, especially if they give them passurage: for it can not be said, that men can not live, or their life is utterly undone, if they have not their platters of fifth, or their livers of geefe, or if they cut not beefs and goats intopieces for to ferve up at their feafts : or if for their idle disport in theaters, or to take their pleafure in chase and hunting, they put not fome to the combat and force them to fight whether they will or no; and kill others which have no defence of their owne, nor any meanes to make reliftance: for he who needs wil have his delights and pastimes, ought in all reason (as I thinke) tomake himselfe merrie, and solace his heart with those that can play and disport together with him; and not to do (as Bion faid) like to little children, who joy in throwing stones at frogs, and make a game of it; meane while, the poore frogges have no pleafure in this their game, for they are fire to die for it in good earnest; even so we are not either to hunt or fish for any delight to that we have in the paine, and much leffe in the death of other creatures: no more to take a pleafure in driving or taking them away from their whelps and yoong ones, a pitifull fight to beholde; for they be not they that commit injustice, who use beasts, but such as missife them unmercifully and cruelly, without any respect and commiseration.

Stay a while, good Atistobulus, and put off this invective of yours unto another time; for now I fee comming toward us neere at hand, a crew of yoong gentlemen, all great hunters and lovers of the game, whom it were neither an easie matter to drive off unto another day, neither is it needfull to provoke and offend them.

Autobulus.

True it is that you fay, and I like your admonition; but as for Eubiotus, I know very well, and my nephew Arifton; the two sonnes also of Dionysius a citizen of Delphos, to wit, Accides and Aristotimus, yea, and after them, Nicander the sonne of Euthydamus, OPTATUS.

Very well gueffed of you Autobulus, I purpose so indeed; for long since was that law of Solon cashing: in repealed and abolished, by vertue wherof, they were punished who in a civill sedition joined not which sense, to the one fide nor to the other.

Aurogulus.

Come hither, therefore, and fit by us, that if we have need of any testimonies, we trouble not the books of Aristole, with dripping and turning over their leaves; for that we will referre our felves and frand to that which you shall say, as justly and truely delivered, in regard of your great knowledge and experience.

SOCLARUS. How now my mafters, you two gentlemen, are you agreed betweene your felves of the order, who shall begin first to speake?

In this place a great defect and breach there is in the Greeke originall, which can not be made up and supplied without the helpe of some ancient copie, not

The may from The barre and the hall is for them that plead. * But these destroy the spawne within the wombe, be speaketh of by running upon their semales when they be great and neere the time of casting the same. And tersundickand one kinde there is of spotted mullets, called thereupon Perdie, which feed upon their owne of filles, by *flime and glutinous fubstance that proceedeth from themselves. As for the poulpe or polyp tray of oppo-fitton to some fith, he eateth and gnaweth himselfe, sitting still all Winter land-creafo idle is he, or fo blockith and fenfeleffe, or els fo gluttonous, or rather subject to all these vices together: which is the reason that Plate also in his booke of lawes, forbiddeth estsoones young men to fet their minds upon fifthing in the fea, or rather he deteffeth it in them, as an abominable thing, if they should take a love thereto. For no exercise there is of hardinesse and valour, no proofe of wit or triall of wildome; no imploiment of ftrength, swiftnesse or activitie of bodie in combats and fights with the wide mouthed fea-pikes, with congres or guiltheads, like as there is in hunting upon the land, where the fierce and courageous beafts exercise the fortitude of those who encounter them, and stirring up their animositie to enter upon dangers: the wily and craftic, whet and sharpen the wits of such as set upon them, causing them to looke about and 20 bestirre themselves every way with great circumspection : and the swift and light-sooted, trie the able, nimble, and painfull bodies of those who have them in chase: in all which respects hunting is reputed an honest and commendable exercise: whereas contrariwise, fishing hath nothing in it to commend the game, and make it honourable; neither shall you ever finde my good friend, any one of the gods, defirous to be called Congrottonus, that is to fay, the conget-killer; as Apollo gloried to be named Lycottonus, that is to fay, the killer of woolves: norany of them delighted in the name of Triglobólos, that is to fay, the striker of barbels: like as Diana joied in the epithit of Elaphobolos, that is to fay, a shooter at stagges and hindes: and no marvell, confidering that it is more laudable for a gentleman to take in chase a wildeboare, a ftagge, a fallow deere, aroe bucke, yea, & it were but an hate, than to buie any of these with his 40 money: but furely it is more for his credit & reputation to go into the fish market as a cater to exchange his coine for a tunny, a lobstar, or the * Amia, than to be seene fishing for them: for the cowardife, blockishnesse, stupiditie, want of shifts and meanes in fishes, either offensive, or defensive, cause the taking of them to be dishonest, discommendable, unlovely, and illiberall.

In fumme, for a fmuch as the proofes and arguments which philosophers alledge, to shew that beafts have some discourse and use of reason, are drawen from their projects, their elections in preferring one thing before another, their provisions and forecasts, their memories, their affections, their tender care of their yong ones, their thankfulneffe to those who have done the good, their hatted & rankor against them who have done them a shrewd turne: their industry to find ont things necessary for them, the evident apparence of vertues in them, to wit, of fortitude, 50 fociable equity & communion, temperance and magnanimitie: Let us confider these maritime fea creatures, whether they have any one at all of these parts, or if there be any little shew thereof, it is fo darke and obfcure, that unneth or hardly it can be perceived, how diligent foever we be in searching after it; whereas in these terrene beasts, and such as the land breedeth, a man may conceive, yea and plainly fee most cleere, evident, and assured examples of ech, of the qualities beforefaid, First & formost behold I pray you the first setting out, the preparatives and flourishes as it were, that bulles and boares make against their combat, how they raise and cast up the dust with their feet al about them, as also how these whet & sharpen their tusks; the elephants likewise for that one of their two teeth wherewith they root in the earth, or plucke up and cut such matter as they feed upon , is ordinarily thereby worne dull and blunt, they use it onely for these purposes, but the other they keepe and referve alwaies sharpe pointed and keene edged, for to serve their turnes when they are to fight; the lion when he goeth in the forrest, marcheth evermore with his pawes drawen in close and turned round, hiding his cleies and nailes within, for feare left being worne with going, their points should be dull and blunt, as also because he would give no light by his tracts to the hunters that follow in chase; for hard-10 ly and with much adoo shall you trace a lion by his foot, the print of his clawes is so small that it cannot be seene, whereby they that are full upon their footing, yet misse of him, and wander

Yee have heard I am fure of the Ichnewnon or ratte of India, how he prepares himselfe against he should fight with the crocodile, no lesse than a legionarie souldiour armed at all picces, incomplet harneffe, fuch a deale of mudde, and the fame hardned and baked in maner of a crust, hathhe all over his body, as it were a good curace of proofe.

What provision and preparation the swallowes or martines make against their breeding and laying time, we daily fee; namely, how in building of their nefts, they lay first as a ground worke underneath, good stickes, stiffe strawes, and found bents, and those they enterlace afterwards 20 with others that be more gentle and pliable; and if they fee that their nefts had need of some glutinous mudde to glue and fodder all together, what doe they? mary they flie floring fo close to the water of some river, lake, or the sea, that lightly they dippe their wings therewith, so that they may be onely wette, and in no wife heavy and overcharged with moistute, then they role and basker themselves in the dust, by which meanes they close up, binde, and knit as with parget or plastre, all chinks and breaches, and whatsoever was not well compact and united together in their nests: as for the forme and figure thereof, they make them not cornered nor yeelding many fides and faces, but even and smooth as possible may be, and the same round as a bal; for furely this kinde of workmanship is most durable without, and of greatest capacity within, and such as giveth least hold unto other beasts abroad that lie in wait to destroy them.

30 The copwebs that spiders weave, which serve for patterns, as welfor our women to make their webbes of cloth, as for fishers to knit and worke their nets, are in many respects very admirable: first in regard of the fine threeds, and the subtile weaving thereof, which are not distinct one from another, nor ranged after the order of the warpe & woofe in our artificiall webbes upon the loome, but are continued and runne all into one, in maner of thinne filme, kell, & skin, united and fodred as one would fay, with I wot not what glutinous humidity mingled among, after an invitible and imperceptible maner; then the tineture and colour thereof, which maketh it feeme a farre off like unto fome thicke or duskifh aire, to the end that it felfe might the leffe be perceived; but principally and above all, the very governing, conduct, and managing of this fabrick & device made by her-felfe, surpasseth; namely, when some flie or small creature 40 is gotten within the compaffe of this toile & entangled, to fee how immediately the perceiveth it, and can skill quickly to pull in and draw the nette; no hunter & fouler in the world, be he never fo cunning, more nimbly, for to enclose the prey: al which because we daily see in our continuall experience presented unto our cies, we believe and know to be true; otherwise we would hold all to be fables: like as wee thinke that to be a tale of the crowes and ravens in Barbary, who when they are very thirsty & the water setled so low where they should drinke, that they can not reach unto it, cast stones into it for to make it arise so high as they may easily meet with it. Andverily upon a time, I marvelled my felfe very much whe I faw a dog within a ship, while the marriners were out of the way, to cast little stones into an earthen pot, which was nothing neere ful of oyle, how he should discourse and reason thus in his mind, that the lighter things, as name-50 ly oyle, must needs mount up & be driven aloft, when the weightier such as the stones were went downe to the bottome. As much may be said of the bees in Candi, and the geese of Cilicia. As for the bees, being to double a point or capelying into the sea, which is much exposed to the winds, they ballafe themselves with small grit or pretie stones, for to bee able to endure the weather, and not be carried away against their wils with the wind through their lightnes otherwise. And the geefe aforesaid being affraid of the eagles, which have their airies upon the high rocks, at what time as they should passe over the mountaine Taurus, take every one within their bils a good big stone, thereby to stop and muzzle (as it were) their mouthes, that being by nature clamorous and given much to gagling, they might make no noise not crie at all during their flight, and so in filence and safetie both, get beyond the said hill. The verie order that cranes keepe in their flying is woonderfull and memorable: for when the aire is troubled and the wind alost, they fly not as they use to do when it is faire weather and calme, either all afront, or in manner of the halfe moone or croissant: but presently at their first setting out, they cast themselves into a triangle with the point forward, therby to cut and pierce the wind that bloweth before and about triangle with the point forward, therby to cut and pierce the wind that bloweth before and about them, to the end that their ranke thus raunged and set in order, might not possibly bee broken: afterwards when they are alighted and settled upon the ground; looke whose course and charge it is to watch al night, stands up right upon one leg, & in the foot of the other claspes a stone and holds it up a lost; for the continual streining of themselves to hold the said stone, keepeth them to that long they cannot sleepe: and when once they chance to let go their hold, the stone falling upon the rocke, quickly awakneth her that let it fall. So that after 1 had seene this, I did not greatly wonder at Hereules, if putting his bow under his arme hole, and clipping it hard with his might te strong arme neither marvelled I much at hun who first devised the meanes how to open an oyster close and hard shut, when I beheld once the crastic subtilitie of herons; for the heron when he hath swallowed downe an oyster, or other shell sith, all whole and fast shut, although it put him to some trouble, yet he endureth for a time and keepeth it within his, craw or gifter, untill he perceive that it is mollistical and relaxed by the natural lheat of his bodie, then casteth he it up againe by vomit, sindeth it gaping and wide open, and so picketh out of it the good meat therein.

As touching the industrious provision and care of housekeeping which is in pilmires, to difcourfe thereof in particular, and exquifitely to deliver the fame were a verie hard piece of worke, if not impossible; and to passe the same over in silence, argueth supine negligence: for looke throughout the whole hiftoric of nature, you shall not find to small a mirrour againe for to represent greater things and more beautifull, being (as itwere) a most pure and cleere drop, wherein appeareth most apparantly the full resemblance of entier vertue. Here may be seene lovely friendship and civill societie there sheweth it selfe the verie image of valour and prowesse, with painfull patience and industrie: here may a man behold many feeds of continence, many sparks 30 of wisedome, and as many of righteousnes. Cleanthes the philosopher, although he maintaineth not that beafts have any use of reason, made report neverthelesse that he was present at the sight of fuch a spectacle and occurrent as this. There were (quoth he) a number of ants which went toward another ants hole, that was not their owne, carrying with them the corps of a dead ant: out of which hole, there came certaine other ants to meet them on the way (as it were) to parle with them, and within a while returned backe and went downe againe: after this they came forth a fecond, yea a third time, & retired accordingly untill in the end they brought up from beneath (as it were a ranfom for the dead body) a grub or little worme; which the others received and tooke upon their shoulders, and after they had delivered in exchange the foresaid corps, departed home: moreover, it is worth the observation, although it be athing daily seene of everie 40 man, what curtefie and civilitie they use in meeting one another, how those who be light and carienothing, willingly give way unto fuch as bee charged and loaden, and suffer them to passe: likewife how they graw afunder and divide piece meale fuch burdens, as they being fingle, cannot beare whole, to the end that the same may be carried and transported from place to place by more in number. Aratus in his prognostickes setteth this downe for a signe of raine toward, when they bring foorth their feeds and graines, and lay them abroad to take the aire:

And yet there be some who in this place write not a sea, that is to fay, egs, but ma, as if they would fay, their goods, to wit, the fruits or seeds which they have gathered and laid up for their provifes on, when they perceive them to begin to mould or bee fusty, or seare that they will corrupt and putrific. But that which surpassed in other prudence, policie and wit, is their caution and prevention which they use, that their wheat or other corne may not spurt and grow. For this is certaine, that dry it cannot continue alwaies nor sound and uncorrupt, but it will in time waxe soft, resolve into a milkie juice, when it turneth and beginneth to swell and chit: for seare therefore that it become not a generative seed, and so by growing, loose the nature & property of food for their nourithment, they gnaw that end thereof or head, where it is woont to spurt and bud forth.

Formine owne part, I do not admit or believe all that which fome do anatomize of their caves and holes: who give out that there is not one direct and straight way leading downe thereinto, northe same easte and ready for any other creature to passe through; but there be certeine secret allies, blinde-pathes, crooked turnings, and hollow cranks, which meet all at the end in three holes or concavities; whereof the one for footh is the common hall for them to meet all together: the second is their cellar or ambry for their victuals and provision; and the third a by-roome where they bestow their dead.

Well, I thinke it not amiffe nor impertinent, if next after pilmires, I bring foorth upon the flage before you the elephants, to the end that we may know the nature of this art, and intelli-10 gence which now is in question, as well in the greatest beasts as the smallest creatures, and see how as it appeareth in the one, fo it is not defective or wanting in the other. Other men I am fure doe make a woonder at that which the elephant learneth, and is taught, whose docilitie is exhibited unto us in the theaters, by his fundry forts of geftures, and changes in dauncing, fuch as fortheir varietie and exquifit elegancie, it were very hard for men with all their memorie, perfection of witte, and exercise, to remember, to expresse, and performe accordingly: but I for my part, me'thinks, doe fee more electely and evidently the prudence and fagacitie of this beaft, in the passions, affections, and motions which he hath of himselfe without teaching, as being more fimple, fincere, and naturall; for not long fince, at Rome there were a number of them trained and exercised against the solemnity of their games and plaies, in certeine strange 20 stations, intricate motions, and hard turnings round, to goe, to come, to stande, and wheele about in a trice: but among them, there was one more dull, blockish, groffe, and flowe, than the rest, both in conceiving, and also in reteining; by reason whereof, he being ever and anon reproched and rated with thamefull words, yea, and many times beaten well for hisuntowardnesse, was found otherwhiles alone by himselfe in the night, repeating as it were and coming his leffons by moone-fhine, labouring hard for to expresse and atteine unto that which hee had beene taught. Agnon writeth, that before this time, in Syria there was an elephant kept and nourished in a private mans house, whose governour had allowed unto him from his mafter, a certeine measure of barley every day for his provender; but there was not a day went over his head, wherein he robbed and deceived him not of the one halfe: it for-30 tuned, that one time above the rest, the master of the house would needs see the elephant served, then his governour powred out before him his full allowance, even the whole measure that was his due; but the elephant casting an unhappy and untoward eie at him, divided his barley with the fnout of his trunke, and put a part the one moity thereof, shewing the best way he could devife unto his mafter, the wrong that the governour aforefaid had done unto him: He reporteth likewise of another, who seeing that his keeper blended earth and stones among his barley, to make the measure to seeme compleat; spied his time and came unto the potage pot standing over the fire, wherein was flesh a feething for dinner, and filled it up with ashes.

Another being provoked and missifed at Rome, by certaine little boies, who with their bodkins and penknives used to pricke and punch his snout or trunke; caught up one of them by the 40 middle, and held him up in the aire, so as it was thought the would have crushed and squeazed the guttes out of his belly; they that saw the maner of it, tooke up a great cry incontinently for searce of the poore boy, but the elephant set him downe softly againe upon the ground, in the very place where he caught him up, and doing him no hurt at all passed by; judging it a sufficient chasticement for so little a childe, that he was onely put in a fright: Thus much of tame and trained elephants. As for those which are savage, and live in the wilde fields at their liberty, woonderfull things be reported of them, and namely as touching their passage over rivers; for the yoongest and least of them all, exposing himselfet to hazard for the rest, leadeth the way, and wadeth first thorough; the other seeing him landed upon the banke of the other side, make this account, that if the least and lowest of their heard be tall enough to surmount the depth of 50 the chanell, they which are bigger and higher, have no cause to searce any thing, but that they also may get over in safety.

And fince I am fallen into this argument, and proceeded so faire into it, methinks I should not forget one example of Reinard, for the affinitie and conformity it hath with this device last rehearted: Those who have invented fabulous tales make report, that during the great deluge, Dewalian used to let foorth a dove out of the arke, to know what weather it was like to be abroad; for if she returned soone againe, she brought newes of tempest and raine, but if she flew cleane away, and came no more backe, the shewed thereby that it was calme and faire wea-

But true it is that the Thracians even at this day when they purpose to passe over a riverfrozen all over with ice, take a fox with them for their guide, to found the way before them, whether the ice be strong enough and able to beare; the fox goes gently before, and laieth his eare clote to the ice, and if by the noise of the water running underneath and comming unto his care, he gueffeth that the ice is northicke norfrozen deepe, but thinne and weake, he maketh a stay, and returneth if a man will let him: contrariwise, if hee perceive by his eare no noise at all of water running under the ice, ne paffeth forward confidently: Surely we cannot fay that this is onely an exquisite quicknesse in the sense of hearing, without any discourse of reason, but 10 without all question a kinde of fyllogisme or reasoning, by consequence drawen from that naturall fence in this fort: that which foundeth stirreth; that which stirreth is not frozen or congealed; what is not congealed, must needs be liquid; and what soever is liquid, yeeldeth, and is not able to hold, ergo, erc.

The Logicians holde that the hound meeting with a quarreferrie or crosse way divided into many paths, uleth a kinde of argumentation or reasoning, which is called a disjunct proceeding from the enumeration of many parts; in this maner discourseth with himselfe : It must needs be that the beaft in chase, passed by one of these three waies: but this way it went not, nor yet that way; therefore it can not chuse, but this way he tooke, for the fent of the nofethrils yeelded him no other intelligence, than of the premisses: and it was the discourse of reason which gave 20 him to understand the necessitie of the consequence or conclusion inserted upon the said premiffes and impositions. Howbeit, the dogge hath need of no such testimonie of Logicians, for falle it is and counterfeit, because it is the smell it selfe and sent of the nose, which by the tract of the foot and the fluxion of the odour comming from the beaft, sheweth him which way it fled, bidding farewell to these propositions either disjunct or junct, neither careth it for that enumeration of parts; but by many other effects, passions, functions, offices and actions which proceed neither from fense of feeing nor of fmelling, but onely from intelligence and discourse of reason, by which they are evidently performed, a man may sufficiently perceive and comprehend what is the nature of a dogge, whose continencie, obedience, sagacitie, parience and paines-taking in chase, if I should now discourse upon, I should but make my selfe ridiculous to unto you, who fee the fame daily, and have experience and practife thereof continually. But this one example will I alledge unto you; namely, that during the civill warres at Rome, when a Romane citizen was murdered, the murderers could never cut off his head, untill they environed his doggeround and stabbed him to death, who guarded his masters bodie, and fought most fiercely for him. King Pyrrhus as he travelled by the way, met with a dogge who kept the dead corps of his mafter lately flaine, and understanding by the inhabitants of the place, that he had continued three daies already, and never ftirred from thence, nor yet eat or drunke ought, he commanded the bodie to be interred, ledde the dogge away with him, and made much of him: certaine daies after, there hapned a muster or generall revew to be made of his fouldiers, who shewed themselves and passed before the king sitting in his chaire of estate, and having the said 40 dog hard by him, who never quetched nor ftirred all the whiles, untill he had a fight of those perfons who murdered his mafter; upon whom heranne immediatly, baying and barking at them with open mouth and in great anger, eftloones running backe and making toward Pyrthu; infornuch as not onely the king, but all those who were about his person, entred into great suspition that those parties were they who had killed his master; whereupon they were apprehended, put in prison, and judicially brought to their answere upon the point, and together with other prefumptions and light evidences inferred against them, they were so hardly urged, that they confessed the fact, til fuffered punishment accordingly. The like (by report) did the dogge of learned Hesiodus, who detected the sonnes of Ganystor the Naupactian, of murder committed upon the person of his master. But that which our fathers saw themselves with their owne eies 50 whiles they were students at Athens, is more evident than all that hath beene said already. And this it was: A certaine fellow had by stealth entred into the temple of Aefculapius, & stollen from thence the fairest and goodliest jewels both of gold and filver among the oblations there, which were most portable, and thinking that he was not espied by any creature, made means to get away againe fectetly. The dog which kept the faid temple, and was named Capparm, did his best to barke andbay; but feeing none of the fextures and wardens of the church to come for all that, putfued the church-robber as he fled away; and notwithstanding that he flung stones at hun, yet gave not he over his purfute, but traced him hard at heels al the night. When day light was come, he would not approch neere unto him, but kept aloofe, followed him with his eie and never lost the fight of him; and notwithstanding that he cast him bread and other meat, he would none : so the night following the theefe laid him downe to fleepe, the dog likewife kept all night hardby him; and the morrow morning when he tooke his way againe, the dog likewife arole and went after. Met he any paffengers or waifaring men, hee would fawne upon them and wag his taile; contrariwife he barked eagerly at the theele, and was readie to fly upon him. They who had the charge to follow with huy and crie, being enformed thus much by the travellers whom they met, 10 asalfo of what bignes, colour and haire the dog was, continued their chase more willingly, and made fuch hot purfute that they overtooke the fellow at Crommyon, & from thence brought him to Athens. The dog he marched before them all and leade them the way, as jocound, pleafant, and gamesome as possibly could bee, as taking great joy that this church robber had beene the game and prey that he had hunted and gotten. The Athenians when they heard the truth of this matter related unto them, ordained that the faid dog should have a certaine measure of corne allowed him at the cities charges for his bread, and gave an especially charge to the priests of that temple, to have a care of him to long as he lived: following herein the kindnesse and liberallitie of their ancestours which they extended in times past to a mule. For what time as Pericles caufed to be built the temple of Minerva, named Hecatompedon, within the castle of the citie, there 20 were is ordinarie for fuch buildings, conveighed thither daily flones, timber, and other fluffe in earts and wagons drawen with beafts. Now when many of those mules which before time had willingly and painefully ferved, were now for verie age discharged and sent away to pasture : one there was among the reft, who everie day would come into the high broad freet Ceramicum, and go before those draught beafts which drew up stones to the mount, yea & accompanie them, as ifhe encouraged and hartned them to labour and travell. The people of Athens commending and admiring the good heart and industrious mind of the beatt, gave order by a publike decree for his maintenance and keeping at the cities cost, no lesse than they would have done for an old bruifed fouldier, who now was past service. And therefore we must say, that those philosophers who hold: That there is no communion nor societic of justice betweene us and bruit beasts, say 30 true, if they restraine theirspeech unto those creatures onely, which live in the sea and deepe bottomleffe waters, with who m in deed we can have no fellowship at all of good will, love and affection, as being beafts farre remote from all gentlenesse, sweet converse, and good nature: and therefore Homer speaking unto a man, who seemed to be inhumane, cruell and unsociable, said elegantly thus:

The blackish blew sea Ishinke well,

Engendred thee, thou art fo fell. as if he would thereby give us to understand, that the sea brings forth no creature that is milde, lovely, meek and gentle: but he that should say as much and apply the former proposition unto the land-beafts, were himfelfe cruell and favage; if I fay, he denied that there was no reciprocall 40 commerce of amitie and justice betweene king Lyfmachus and his dog Hyreanus, who remained continually alone about his corps when he was dead; yea and at the time that it was burned in the funerall fire, lept into it and was confumed into afthes with him for company. And reported it is, that there was another dog named Attue, did no leffe which Pyrrhuckept, I meane not the king of that name, but another private person: for after his master was dead, he would never stirre from the bodie; and when the corps was carried forth in a couch upon the biere, he leapt upon it and was borne with all: and finally forung himfelfe into the fire and was burnt with him.

When king Porces was fore wounded in a battell against king Alexander the Great; the elephant upon whose backe he rode and fought, drew foorth with his trunke right gently for feare of doing harme, many darts, arrowes and javelins wherewith hee was shot: and albeit himselfe 50 was grievoufly hurt, yet never fainted he and gave over before he perceived that his lord the king was readie to recleand finke downe, by reason of the effusion of blood which hee had lost; and then fearing that he would fall from on high to the ground, he gently couched and yeelded with his bodie downeward to the earth, that he might alight with ease and without all danger. King _alexanders horse called Bucephalm, all while he was bare without his saddle and caparifon, would wel enough abide that his keeper should mount upon his backe: was he trapped once andrichly fet out with the kings royall furniture, harnesse, and ornament, hee would suffer none to fithim but Alexander alone. And if others came neere him, and went about to get upon his Mmmm 2

backe, he would runne a front upon them fnuffing, fnorting and neighing, rifing up all afore at them; and if they made not good hafte to retire behind him and fly, hee would bee fure to have them under his feet and trample over them. I know full well that you thinke these examples are hudled together in a confuled varietie but furely it is no easie matter to find any action of these noble beatts, which reprefenteth one bare vertue and no more: for together with their kindneffe and naturall love there is to be seene a certaine desire of honour; amid their generositie a man may perceive a kind of industrious sagacitie and wisedome; neither is their wit and subtilitie void of courage and magnanimitie: howbeit, if men be disposed to distinguish and separate one from another by themselves; the dogs do represent an example of a mild and gentle nature together with an haughtic courage and high mind, namely when they passe by and turneaside from those to that fubmit themselves before them, according to that which Homer faith in one place:

The hares when they have kinled, and be afraied of the hunters, returne to their formes, and carrie their leverets, fome one way and fome another, fo as many times there is an arpent or good acre of ground distance betweene them, to the end that if either hound or hunter should come upon them, they might not be all in danger at once to be taken; and they themfelvestunne up and downe backward and forward in divers places, croffing this way and that way, leaving their tracts very confused, and in the end take one great leape as farre as ever they can, from their foresaid footing, and spring unto their forme, where they rest and take their re-10 pole.

The dogs ran foorth with open mouth, they cried and bark't amaine: ulviles wife his flafe let fall, and firred not againe.

The beare being furprifed with a certeine drowfie difease, called Pholia, before the be altogether so heavily benummed and stupissed therewith, that she can not well stirre, maketh cleane the cave into which the meaneth to retire herfelfe: & when the is to go downe into it, all the way belides which is toward it, she treadeth very lightly, bearing herselfe (as it were) upon her tiptoes; and being come neere unto it, the turnes upon her backe, and so eicheth forward her bodie aswell as she can into her den.

For their manner is not to fight any longer against those who humbly fall downe prostrate, or thew any femblance of lowly suppliants. Certes, the report goeth of a principall Indian dogge, who being for a fingularitie above all other, fent to fight a combat before king Alexander the Great, when there was let loofe at him first a stag, then a wild boare, and afterwards abeare, made no reckoning of them, nor deigned once to stirre out of his place nor rife up: but when hee faw 20 a lion presented unto him, then incontinently he stood upon his feet, and addressed himselfe to the combat; shewing evidently that he effected the lion alone worthic to fight with him, and disclained all the rest. As for those here among us which are woont to hunt hares, if they themfelves chaunce to kill them with faire play in the open field, they take pleasure to teare them in pieces; they licke and lap their blood full willingly: but if the hare being out of heart and in despaire of her selfe, as many times it falleth out, employ all the force and strength that shee hath in one course for all, and run her selfe out of breath, so as her winde is now cleane gone, and shee dead withall: the hounds finding her so, will not once touch her, but they keepe a wagging of their tailes round about her body, as if they would fay, it is not for greedinesse of hares sleih, but an earnest desire to winne the prise in running, that we hunt thus as we do. As touching the craft and fubtilitie which is in beafts; for a fmuch as there be infinite xamples

Ofred deere, the hynds commonly calve neere unto highway fides, where ravenous beafts, fuch as live by prey, doe not ordinarily haunt. The stags when they perceive themselves to be fat, well fleshed, and good venison, seeke blinde corners to hide themselves in, for the better se-20 curine of their lives, as not trufting then to their heeles and fwift running.

thereof, overpasse I will the wily pranks of foxes, woolves, cranes and jaies: for common they be and every man feeth them; onely produce I will the testimonic of wife Thales, the most ancient of the seven sages, who by report was not least admired for his skill and cunning, in that hee discovered right well the crastines in a beast, and went beyond it. There was a companie of mules that had falt a load, and were carrying it from one place to another; and as they paffed through the foord of ariver, one of them chanced to fall under his burden into the water: the falt in his facke by this meanes taking wet, melted and refolved into water for the most part of it, in such fort as the mule having recovered himselfe upon all foure, found that he was well lightned of his load, and presently conceived what was the reason: which gave so deepe an impression in his 40 memorie, that ever after, as often as he was to go thorow a river, hee would be fure to floup and couch his bodie low; first leaning of one side, and then of another, purposedly and for the nonce to wet and drench the bags on his backe which had falt in them. Thales hearing of this unhappy and shrewd wit of the mule, commaunded the muliter to fill the facks with the same weight of wooll and foundges, in flead of falt, to lay them upon his backe, and fo to drive him with the reft. The mule left not his old woont; but when he perceived that he was overcharged now with water befides his ordinary load of wooll and fpunges, he tooke himfelfe in the maner, and found that his craft now flood him in small stead, but did him hurt: whereupon, ever after, he would go

The land-urchins are so wise and wary in defending and faving themselves, that they have thereby given occasion of this proverbe:

Athousand wiles and mo, of craftie fox there are: The wrchin one doth know, and that is singular. for when the urchin perceiveth Renard comming toward him, All of a tumpe, as round as bur or ball, His bodie lies, with pricks befet withall: No meanes (he hath, for thornie briftles thicke, upright when loever he waded, and was very carefull that none of his packs or carriages should once (though full against his will) touch the water. Partridges have another kinde of fubtilitie and craft by themselves, and the same proceedeth

To bite, to pinch, or touch him to the quicke. and yet more ingenious is their forecast and providence for the feeding of their little ones; for in Autumne, a little before vintage time, you shall have an urchin or hedge-hogge get under a vine, and with his feet shake the stocke untill the grapes from their branches be fallen upon the ground, then he rouleth himselfe round like a foot-ball among them, and catcheth them up with his sharpe pricks; insomuch as when we stood all of us sometime to behold the manner of it, it feemed as if a cluster of grapes had beene quicke, and so crept upon the ground; so belet went he and covered all over with grapes: then fo foone as he is gotten into his hole or neaft, he offereth them unto his yoong ones to cat, to take from him and lay up for store. This hole hath two fa-40 ces or profpects; the one regardeth the fouth, the other looketh into the north. When they foresee change & alteration of weather, like as skilful ship-masters turne their failes according to the time; even fo, they shut up that hole or entrie which standeth in the wind, and set open the other: which when one of the citie Cyzieum had once observed and learned, he got a great name and reputation of a weather-wife-man, as if he foreknew of himselse by some singular gift, and could foretell from which cost the wind would blow.

from a certaine naturall love and motherly affection to their young birds, whom, when they are yet to feeble that they cannot flie & make thist for themselves being pursued, they teach to cast themselves on their backs, with their heeles and bellies upward, and to hold either a clot of earth or fome locke of straw or such like stuffe, to cover and shadow their bodies withal: meane while, the olde rowens turne those that follow in chace another way, drawing them toward themselves in flying to and fro just before them, even artheir feet, seeming (as it were) by little and little to

As touching focial love and fidelitie, accompanied with wit and understanding, the elephants asking Juba writeth, shew unto us an evident example: for they that hunt them are woont to dig deepe trenches, and thatch them over with a thinne cote of light straw or some small brush. Now when one of the heard chanceth to fall into a trench, for many of them use to go and feed 50 together, all the reft bring a mighty deale of ftones, rammell wood, and whatfoever they can get, which they fling into the ditch for to fill it up, to the end that their fellow may have meanes thereby to get up againe. The fame writer recordeth alfo that elephants use to pray unto gods, to purifie themselves with the sea water, and to adore the sunne rising, by lifting up their trunked fnour into the aire(as if it were their had)& all thus of their own accord & untaught. And to fay a truth of all beafts the elephant is most devout & religious, as K. Ptolemaus Philopater hath wel testified for after he had defaited Antiochus, & was minded to render condign thanks unto the gods for fo glorious a victorie, among many other beafts for facrifice, he flew foure elephants : but af-Mmmm 3 terwards being much disquieted and troubled in the night with scarefull dreames, and namely, that God was wroth and threatned him for fuch an uncouth and strange facrifice; hee made meanes to appeale his ire by many other propitiatorie oblations, and among the reft, hee dedicated unto him fower elephants of braffe, in freed of those which were killed: no leffe is the sociable kindnesse and good nature which lions shew one one unto another; for the yoonger fort which are more able and nimble of body, lead forth with them into the chace for to hunt and prey those that be elder and unweldy; who when they be weary, sit them downe and rest, waiting for the other; who being gone forward to hunt if they meet with game and speed, then they all fet up a roaring note altogether, much like unto the bellowing of bulles, and thereby call their fellowes to them; which the old lions hearing, prefently runne unto them, where they take 10 their part, and devour they prey in common.

To speake of the amatorious affections of brute beasts, some are very favage and exceeding furious: others more milde, and not altogether unlike unto the courting and wooing uled betweene man and woman, yea, & I may fay to you, smelling somewhat of wanton and venerious behaviour: and fuch was the love of an elephant, a counter futer or corrivall with Ariftophanes the grammarian, to a woman in Alexandria, that fold chaplets or garlands of flowers : neither did the elephant shew lesse affection to her than the man, for hee would bring her alwaies out of the fruit market, as he paffed by, fome apples, peares, or other fruit, and then he would ftay long with her, yea, and otherwhiles put his fnout, as it were his hand, within her bosome under her partlet, and gently feele her foft pappes and white skinne about her faire breft.

A dragon also there was enamoured upon a yoong maiden of Aetolia: it would come to vifit her by night, creepe along the very bare skinne of her body, yea, and winde about her without any harme in the world done unto her, either willingly or otherwife, and then would gently depart from her by the breake of day: now when this ferpent had continued thus for certeine nights together ordinarily; at the last the friends of the yoong damosel removed her, and fent her out of the way a good way off; but the dragon for three or fower nights together came not to the house, but wandred and fought up and downe heere and there as it should feem for the wench; in the end, with much adoo, having found her out, he came and clasped herabout, not in that milde and gentle maner as before time, but after a rougher fort; for having with other windings and knots bound her hands and armes fast unto her body, with the rest of 20 his taile he flapped and beat het legges, shewing a gentle kinde of amorous displeasure and anger, yet fo, as it might feeme he had more affection to pardon, than defire to punish her.

As for the goofe in Aegypt which fell in love with a boy; and the goat that cast a fansie to Glauce the minstrell wench: because they are historits so wel knowen, and in every mans mouth: for that also I suppose you are wearie already of so many tedious tales and narrations. I sorbeare to relate them before you: but the merles, crowes, and perroquets or popinjaies, which learne to prate, and yeeld their voice and breath to them that teach him, fo pliable, fo tractable and docible, for to forme and expresse a certeine number of letters and syllables as they would have them, me thinks they plead fufficiently, and are able to defend the cause of all other beasts, teaching us as I may fay, by learning of us, that capable they be not onely of the inward discourse 40 of reason, but also of the outward gift intered by distinct words, and an articulate voice: were it not then a meere ridiculous mockerie, to compate these creatures with other dumbe beasts which have not fo much voice in them, as will ferve to houle withall, or to expresse a groane and complaint? but how great a grace and elegancie there is in the naturall voices and fongs of these, which they refound of themselves, without learning of any masters, the best musicians and most sufficient poets that ever were do testifie, who compare their sweetest canticles and poems unto their fongs of fwannes and nightingals: now forafmuch as to teach, sheweth greater use of reason; than to learne wee are to give credit unto Aristotle, who faith: that brute beafts are endued also with that gift, namely, that they teach one another: for hee writeth that the nightingale hath beene seene to traine up her yoong ones in finging; and this experience 50 may serve to testifie on his behalfe, that those nightingales sing nothing so well, which are taken very yong out of the nest; and were not fedde nor brought up by their dammes; for those that be nourished by them, learne with all, of them to fing, and that not for money and gaine, nor yet for glory, but because they take pleasure to fing well, and love the elegance above the profit of the voice: and to this purpose report I will unto you a storie which I have heard of many, as well Greeks as Romans, who were present and eie witnesses. There was a barber within the city of Rome, who kept a thoppe over against the temple, called Greeoftis, or Forum Gre-cum, and there nourished a pie, which would so talke, prate, and chatte, as it was woonderfull. counting the speech of men and women, the voice of beasts, and found of musicall instruments, and that voluntarily of her felfe without the constreint of any person, onely she accuflomed her felfe fo to doe, and tooke a certeine pride and glory in it, endevouring all that the could to leave nothing unspoken, or not expressed: now it hapned that there were solemnized great funerals of one of the welthiest personages in the city, and the corps was caried foorth in a great state, with the found of many trumpets that marched before; in which folemnitie, for that the maner was that the pompe and whole company should stand still and rest a time in that verie place, it fell out fo, that the trumpetters who were right cunning and excel-10 lent in their arte, staied there, founding melodiouslie all the while: the morrow after this, the pie became mute and made no noise at all, nor uttered not so much as her maturall voice which the was wont to doe, for to expresse her ordinarie and necessarie passions; infomuch, as they who before time woondered at her voice and prating, marvelled now much more at her filence, thinking it a very strange matter to passe by the shop and heare her fay nothing; fo as there grew some suspition of others professing the same art and trade, that they had given her fome poifon: howbeit, most men guessed that it was the violent found of the trumpets which had made her deafe, and that together with the fenfe of hearing, her voice also was utterly extinct: but it was neither the one nor the other; for the trueth was this, as appeared afterwards: fhe was in a deepe studie, and through meditation retired within herselfe, 20 whiles her minde was busic and did prepare her voice like an instrument of musicke, for imitation; for at length her voice came againe and wakened (as it were) all on a fudden, uttering none of her olde notes nor that which the was accustomed before to parle and counterfeit; onely the found of trumpets the refembled, keeping the fame periods, the fame stops, paules and straines; the fame changes, the fame reports, and the fame times and measures: a thing, that confirmeth more and more that which I have faid before; namely, that there is more use of reason in teaching of themselves, than in learning by another. Yet can I not conteine my selfe, but I must needs in this place recite unto you one leffon that I my felfe faw a dogge to take out, when I was at Rome: This dog ferved a plaier who professed to counterfeit many persons, and to represent fundry geftures; & among fundry other prety tricks which his mafter taught him, answerable to 30 divers passions, occasions and occurrents represented upon the stage, his master made an experiment on him with a drogue or medicine which was fomniferous indeed and fleepie, but must be taken and supposed deadly; who tooke the piece of bread wherein the said drogue was mingled, and within a little while after he had fwallowed it downe, he began to make as though hee trembled, quaked, yea and staggered, as if he had beene astonied, in the end he stretched our himselfe, and lay as stiffe as one starke dead, suffering himselfe to be pulled, haled, and drawen from one place to another, like a very blocke, according as the prefent argument and matter of the place required; but afterwards, when hee understood by that which was faid and done, that his time was come, and that he had caught his hint, then beganne he at the first to stirre gently by little and little, as if hee had newly revived or awakened, and started out of a dead 40 fleepe, and lifting up his head, began to looke about him too and fro; at which object all the beholders woondered not a little; afterwards he arose upon his seet, and went directly to him unto whom he was to goe, very jocund and mery: this pageant was performed fo artificially, I cannot tell whether to fay or naturally, that all those who were present, and the emperonr himfelfe (for Vefpafan the father was there in person, within the theater of Marcellue) tooke exceeding great pleasure, and joied woonderfully to see it.

But peradventure we may deferve well to be mocked for our labour, praifing beafts as we doe fo highly, for that they be fo docible and aptto learne, feeing that Democritus Theweth and proveth, that we our felves have beene apprentifes and scholars to them in the principall things of this life; namely, to the spider, for spinning, weaving, derning, and drawing up a rent; to 50 the swallow, for architecture and building; to the melodious swanne and shrill nightingale, for vocall musicke, and all by way of imitation. As for the art of physicke, and the * three kindes * que mandthereof, we may fee in the nature of beafts, the greatest and most generous part of each of them: for they use not onely that, which ordeined drogues and medicines to purge ill humours out of diameters. the body, seeing that the tortoises take origan; wezels, rue, when they have caten a serpent; 2019 pm. dogges also when they be troubled with choler of the gall, purge themselves with a certaine herbe, thereupon called dogges-graffe; the dragon likewife if he finde his ciesto be dimme, clenfeth, fcoureth, and dispatcheth the cloudinesse thereof with senell; and the beare so soone

as the is gone out of her denne, feeketh out the first thing that she doth, the wilde herbecalled Aron, that is to say, wake-robin, for the actimonic and sharpnesse thereof openeth her bowels when they are growen together, yea, and at other times sinding herselse upon sulnesse, given to loth and distaste all food, she goes to finde out ants nests, where she sits her downe lilling out the tongue which is glibbe and soft, with a kinde of sweet and slimy humour, until it ling out the tongue which is glibbe and fost, with a kinde of sweet and slimy humour, until it ling out the tongue which is glibbe and soft, with a kinde of sweet and slimy humour, until it ling out the tongue which is glibbe and soft, with a kinde of sweet and slimy humour, and be full of ants and their egges, then draweth she it it againe, swalloweth them downe, and thereby cureth her lothing stomacke. Semblably it is said, that the Aegyptians having observed their bird Ibis, which is the black of torke, to give herselsea cliter of sea water, by imitation of her did the like by themselves. Certeine it is, that their priests use to be sprinkle, purise, and hallow themselves with that water out of which she hath drunke; for let any water be vene-to mous, or otherwise huttfull and unholsome, the Ibis will none of it: but also some beafts there be, which seeling themselves ill at ease, are cured by diet and abstinence; as namely woolves and lions, when they have devoured too much flesh, and are closed or glutted therewith, they lie me downe, take their ease, cherishing and keeping themselves warme.

It is reported likewise of the tygre, that when a yoong kidde was given unto her, she fasted two daies, according to the diet which the ufeth, before the touched it, and the third day being very hungry, called for other food, ready to burft the cage wherein the was enclosed, and forbare to cat the faid kid, supposing that now she was to keepe it with her, as a familiar & dometticall companion. Nay that which more is, recorded it is, that elephants practife the feat of chirurgery; for flanding by those that are wounded in a battell, they can skill of drawing out tron-20 chions of speares, javelin heads, arrowes and datts out of their bodies, with such dexterity and cale, that they will neither teare and hurt their flesh, nor put them to any paine whatsoever. The goats of Candy when they be shotte into the body with arrowes or darts, fall to cat the herbe Dictamus, & thereby thrust them out, and make them fal off with facility, & by this meanes they have taught women with child that this herbe hath a propertie to cause abortive birth, and the child in their wombe to miscarrie: for the faid goats are no fooner wounded, but they runne prefently to this herbe, and never feeke after any other remedy. Woonderfull these things are (no doubt) how best leffe miraculous, when we consider the natures of beasts, how they be capable of arithmeticke, and have the knowledge of numbring and keeping account: as the kine and oxen about Sufa; for appointed they be there to water the kings gardens, drawing up water in buckets 10 with a device of wheels that they turne about in maner of a windles; and everice one of them for their part must draw up an hundred buckets in a day; so many they will do just, but more you shal not get of them, neither by faire meanes nor foule; for no fooner have they performed their task, but prefently they give over & impossible it is to force them any farther then their account: notwiththanding triall hath bene made; fo justly and exactly they both know, and also keepe the reckoning, as Cresians the Guidian hath left in writing. As for the Lybians they mocke the Aegyprians, for reporting this of their beaft called Oryx, as a great fingularitie, that hee fetteth up a certaine crie that verie day and houre, when as the star named by them Sothe, and by us the Dog, or Netwood arife: for they give out, that with them all their goats together, at the verie inflant when the faud flarre mounteth up within their horizon with the funne, will bee fure to turne and 40 looke is so the cast: and this they hold to be an infallible figne of the revolution of that starre, agreeting juil with the rules and observations of the Mathematicians. But to close up and conchilde at length this discourse, that it may come to an end, let us (as it were) take in hand the sacred anchor, and for a finall conclusion knit up all with a briefe speech of their divinitie and propheticall nature. For certaine it is, that one of the greatest, most noble and ancient parts of divination or foothfaying, is that which being drawen from the flight and finging of birds, they call Augurie: and in truth the nature of their birds being fo quicke, so active, so spirituall, and in regard of that agilitie & nimbleneffe verie pliable, and obsequent to all visions & fantasies presented, offereth it selse unto God, as a proper instrument to be used & turned which way he wil; one while to motion, another while into certaine voices, laies & tunes, yea & into divers & fundrie gestures; on now to stop and stay, anon to drive and put forward, in mannet of the winds; by meanes whereof he impeacheth and holdeth backe some actions and affections, but directeth others unto their end & accomplithment. And this no doubt is the reason that Euripides tearmeth albirds in generall the heraulds and meffengers of the gods: and particularly Socrates faid, that he was become a fellow fervitor with the twans: femblably, among the kings, Pyrrhus was well pleafed when as men called him the Eagle, and Antrochus tooke as great pleasure to be called the Sacre or the Hauke. Whereas contrariwife, when we are disposed to mocke, to flour, or to reproch those that be dull, indocible and blockish, wee call them fishes. To bee short, an hundred thousand things there be that God doth shew, foretell and prognosticate unto us by the meanes of beasts, as well those of the land beneath, as the sowles of the aire above. But who that shall plead in the behalfe of fishes or water-creatures, will not be able to alledge so much as one; for, dease they be all and dombe; * blind also for any fore-sight or providence that they have, as being cash into a balefull place and bottomlesse guise, where impious Atheists & rebellious Titans or giants saginist God are bestowed; where they have no sight of God, no more than in hell where damned soules are; where the reasonable and intellectuall part of the soule is utterly extinct, and the rest that remainess, drenched or rather drowned (as a man would say) in the most base and vile sensitial part, so to as they seeme rather to pant then to live.

Heracleon.

Plucke up your browes, good Phedimms, open your cies, awake your spirits, and bestirre your selfe in the desense of us poore Ilanders and maritime inhabitants: for here we have heard not a discourse iwis merrily devised to passe away the time, but a serious plea premeditate and labouted before hand, a verie Rhetoricall declamation which might beseeme well to bee pronounced at the barre in judiciall court, or delivered from a pulpit and tribunall before a publicke audience.

Phaedimus.

Now verily, good fir Heracleon, this is a meere furprife and a manifest ambush laid crastily of 20 fet purpose; for this brave or atour (as you see) being yet fasting and sober himselse; and having studied his or ation all night long hath set upon us at the disvantage, and altogether unprovided, as being still having the thing was a state of the yet red and the content we ought not now to draw backe and recule for all this: for being as I am an affectionate lover of the poet Pindarus, I would not for any good in the world, heave this sentence of his justly alledged against me.

When games of prife and combats once are fet, Who swinketh backe, and doth pretend some let, In darknesse hides and obscuritie,

30 for at great leafure we are all, and not the dances onely be at repose, but also dogs and horses, castnets, drags, and all manner of nets befides: yea and this day there is a generall ceffation given to all creatures as wel on land as in feastor to give care unto this disputation. And as for you my mafters here, have no doubt, nor be you affraid; for I will use my libertie in a meane, and not draw out an Apologie or counterplea in length, by alledging the opinions of philosophers; the fables of the Aegyptians; the headleffe tales of the Indians or Libyans, without proofe of any testimonies; but quickly come to the point, and looke what examples be most manifest and evident to the eie, and fuch as shall bee testified and verified by all those marriners or travellers that are acquainted with the seas, some few of them I will produce. And yet verily in the proofes and arguments drawen from creatures above the ground, there is nothing to empeach the fight, the view 40 of them being so apparant and daily presented unto our eie, whereas the sea affoordeth us the fight of a few effects, within it & those hardly and with much adoe (as it were) by a glaunce and glimmering light, hiding from us the most part of the breeding and feeding of fishes: the meanes also that they use, either to assaile one another or to defend themselves wherein I assure you there be actions of prudence, memory, focietie, and equity not a few, which because they are not knowen, it cannot chuse but our discourse as touching this argument will be lesse enriched and enlarged with examples, and fo by confequence the cause more hardly desended and mainteined.

Over and befides, this advantage have land beafts, that by reason of their affinity as it were, and daily conversation with men, they get a tincture as it were from them, of their maners and 50 fashions, and consequently enjoy a kinde of nurture, teaching, discipline, and apprentising by imitation; which is able to dulce, allay, and mittigate all the bitternesse and austerity of their nature, no lesse than fresh water mingled with the sea, maketh it more sweet and porable: like-wise all the unsociable wildenesse, and heavy unweldinesse therein, it stirreth up, when the same is once mooved and set on foot by the motions that it learneth by conversing with men; whereas on the others de the life of sea-creatures being farre remote and devided by long and large confines from the frequentation of men, as having no helpe of any thing without, nor any thing to be taught it by use and custome, is altogether solitarie and by it selfe, as nature brought it foorth, so it continueth and goeth not abroad; neither mingled nor mixed with forren fashions, and all by reason of the place which they inhabit, and not occasioned by the quality of their ownenature, for furely their nature conceiving and reteining within it felfe as much difcipline and knowledge as it is possible for to atteine unto and apprehend, exhibiteth unto us many tame and familiar eeles (which they call facred) that use to come to hand; such as are among the rest, of those in the fountaine Aretbusa, besides many other fishes in divers places. which are very obcifant and obsequious when they be called by their names, as is reported of Marcus Crassus his lamprey, for which he wept when it was dead; and when Domitus upon a time reproched him for it, by way of mockerie in this wife: Were not you the man who wept for your lamprey when it was dead; he came upon him presently in this maner: And were not you the kinde and sweet husband who having buried three wives never shed teare for the matter? the crocodiles not only know the voice of the preists when they call unto them, and endure to be handled and stroked by them, but also yawne and offer there teeth unto them to be picked and clenfed with there hands, yea and to be skowred and rubbed all over with linen clothes. It is not long fince that Philinus a right good man and well reputed, after his returne from his voiage out of Aegypt, where he had bin to fee the countrey recounted unto us, that in the city of Anteus he had feene an olde woman ly a fleepe on a little pallet together with a crocodile, who very decently and modeftly couched close along by her fide. And it is found in old records, that when one of the kings called Ptolomai, called unto the facred crocodile, it would not come nor obey the voice of the priefts, notwithstanding they gently praied and intreated her; a signe thought 20 to be a prognosticke and presage of his death, which soone after ensued: whereby it is plaine that the kind and generation of these water beasts, is neither incapable, nor deprived of that sacred and highly effeemed science of divination and foretelling future things; considering that even in the countrey of Lycia; betweene the cities of Phellos and Myrz, that is, a village called Sura, where I heare fay, the inhabitants use to fit and behold the fifthes swimming in the water, like as in other places they observe birds flying in the aire, marking their lying in wait and ambuth, their feudding away and purfute after them; whereby according to a certeine skill that is among them, they can foretell future things to come. But this may suffice to shew and declare, that their nature is not altogether estranged from us, nor unsociable.

As touching their proper wit, and naturall prudence, wherein there is no mixture at all bor- 20 rowed from other, this is ingenerall, a great argument thereof, that there is no creature that fwimmeth or liveth in the waters, except those which sticke to stones, and cleave to rocks, that is so easie to be caught by man, or otherwise to be taken without trouble, as asses are by wolves; bees by the birds Meropes; grafhoppers by swallowes; or serpents by stagges, who are so easily caught up by them; in Greeke they tooke the name inapor, not soof inagement, that is to fay, of lightnesse: but said extens, 28 oftens, that is to say, of drawing up a serpent out of his hole. The sheepe calleth as it were the woolfe, by the foote; like as by report the leopard allureth unto him the most part of beafts, who are willing to approach him for the pleasure they take in his fanell, and above all others the ape. But fea creatures generally all, have a certeine inbred fagacity, a wary perceivance before hand, which maketh them to be suspicious and circumspect, yea, and 40 to stand upon their guard against all fore-laying s so that the arte of hunting and catching them is not a small piece of worke, and a simple cunning; but that which require tha great number of engins of all forts, and asketh woonderfull devices, and subtill sleights to compasse and goe beyond them; and this appeareth by the experience of fuch things, as we have daily in our hands: For first and formost the cane or reed of which the angle rodde is made, fishers would not have to bee bigge and thicke, and yet they had need of fuch an one as is tough and ftrong, for to plucke up and hold the fishes, which commonly doe mightily fling and struggle when they be caught; but they chuse rather that which is small and slender, for seare lest if it cast abroad shadow, it might moove the doubt and suspicion that is naturally in fishes: moreover the line they make not with many water-knots, but defite to have it as plaine and even as possi- 50 bly may be without any roughnesse, for that this giveth as it were some denuntiation unto them of fraud and deceit: they take order likewise that the haires which reach to the hooke, should feeme as white as possibly they can devise, for the whiter they be, the leffe are they feene in the water, for the conformity and likenefle in colour to it: as for that which the poet Homer

> Downcright to bottome of the fea, like plumbe of leade fre went,

That peifeth downe the fishers booke, and holdes the line extent; Which passing through transparent * borne, that rurall oxes head bare, To greedy fishes secretly brings death ere they be ware.

Some mifunderstanding these verses, would infer the rupon; that men in old time used the hairs of anoxe tale to make there lines withal, faying that this word wees, which commonly in Greeke is taken for an horne, fignifieth in this place haire; & that hereupon x news is derived, which beto tokeneth to sheere or cut haire; and week, that is to say, sheering or clipping; as also, that from hence it is that Archilochus tearmeth a daintie & wanton minion, who taketh delight in tricking and trimming the haire & wearing a peruke curioufly fet, xteamasses. But furely, this their collection is not true, for they used as we do, the haire of horse tailes, to make their angle-lines withal, chusing those that grow either on stone-horses or geldings, and not of mares, for that ever & anonthey wet their tailes with staling, and by that means the haires of them are tenderand apt to breake. And Aristotle himselse writeth, that in those verses above cited there is no deepe matter that requireth fuch an exquifit & curious fearning; for that (in truth) fifthers use to overcast the line neere unto the hooke with a piece of horne, for feare left fifthes when they have swallowed down the hooke, thould with their teeth bite or fret a two the line. And as for the hooks, they use 20 those that be round, for to take mullets and the fishes amia, because they have narrow mouthes: for very wary they are to avoid the longer and streighter kind; yea, and many times the mullet fulpecteth the round hooke, fwimming round about it, and flurting with the raile the bait and meat that is upon it, and never linnes flapping, untill he have shaken it off, and then devoureth it: but fay, he can not fpeed that way, he drawes his mouth together, and with the very edge and utmost brim of his lips he nibleth about the bait, untill he have gnawen it off. The wide mouthed fea-pike, when he perceiveth that he is caught with the hooke, sheweth herein more valour and animolitie than the elephant; for he plucketh not out of another the dart or arrow flicking the bodie; but maketh meanes to deliver himselfe from the faid hooke, shaking his head and writhing it to and fro untill he have inlarged the wound and made it wider; enduring most 30 flourly and resolutely the dolour to be thus rent and torne, and never gives over, untill he have wrested and wrung the hooke out of his bodie. The sea fox will not many times come necreunto an hooke, he reculeth backe and is afraid of some deceitfull guile; but say that he chance to be furprifed quickly, he maketh shift to winde himselfe off againe: for such is his strength, agilitie and flipperie moisture withall, that he will turne himselse upside downe with his taile upward, in fuch fort, that when by overturning his stomacke all within is come forth, it can not chuse but the hooke looseth the hold which it had and falleth foorth.

These examples do show a certeine intelligence, and withall a wittie and readie execution of that which is expedient for them, as need and occasion requireth. But other fishes there be, which befides this industrious fagacitie in shifting for themselves, do represent a sociable nature 40 and loving affection one unto another; as for example, the anthie and feari: for when the fearus hath swallowed downe an hooke, other of his fellowes come leaping about him, and gnaw the line afunder; and if peradventure there be any of them gotten within a net and entangled, their companions give them their tailes without, which they holde as fast as they can with their teeth, and the other lie pulling and haling of them untill they have drawen them foorth. As for the anthia, they come to refcue and fuccour one of their owne kinde with more audacitie, for putting the line against their backe, they set to it the ridge bone, which is sharpe toothed in maner of a faw, and with it they endevour to file and faw it in twaine. And verily, there is not a creature living on the land (as farre as wee know) that hath the heart and courage to aid their fellowes being in danger of life, neither beare, bore, lion, nor leopard. Well may those gather all 50 together in heaps, which are of the fame kind and run one with another gound about the cirque or thew place with the Amphitheaters: but to rescue or succour one another neither know they the meanes how, nor have the courage to doe it: for they fly and leape backward as farr as ever they can possibly from one that is hurt or killed in their fight: as for that story my good friend that you alledge of the elephants, that they cast into the ditch or trench whereinto one of their company is fallen all that ever they can get & gather together, thereby to make a banke, that he may call himselfe upon, & besides so get forth; it is very strange and far set; and because it comit foorth, so it continueth and goeth not abroad; neither mingled nor mixed with forren fashions, and all by reason of the place which they inhabit, and not occasioned by the quality of their ownenature, for furely their nature conceiving and reteining within it felfe as much difcipline and knowledge as it is possible for to atteine unto and apprehend, exhibiteth unto us many tame and familiar celes (which they call facred) that use to come to hand; such as are among the rest, of those in the fountaine Aresbufa, besides many other fishes indivers places, which are very obeisant and obsequious when they be called by their names, as is reported of Marcus Crassus his lamprey, for which he wept when it was dead; and when Dominus upon a time reproched him for it, by way of mockerie in this wife: Were not you the man who wept for your lamprey when it was dead; he came upon him presently in this maner: And were not you the kinde and sweet husband who having buried three wives never shed teare for the matter? the crocodiles not only know the voice of the preists when they call unto them, and endure to be handled and stroked by them, but also yawne and offer there teeth unto them to be picked and clenfed with there hands, yea and to be skowred and rubbed all over with linen clothes, It is not long fince that Philinus a right good man and well reputed, after his returne from his voiage out of Aegret, where he had bin to fee the countrey recounted unto us, that in the city of Anteus he had feene an olde woman ly a fleepe on a little pallet together with a crocodile, who very decently and modefuly couched close along by her fide. As touching their proper wit, and naturall prudence, wherein there is no mixture at all bor- 20 rowed from other, this is ingenerall, a great argument thereof, that there is no creature that fwimmeth or liveth in the waters, except those which slicke to stones, and cleave to rocks, that is so easie to be caught by man, or otherwise to be taken without trouble, as assess are by wolves; bees by the birds Meropes; graftoppers by swallowes; or serpents by stagges, who are so easily caught up by them; in Greeke they tooke the name inapo, not with inapefums, that is to fay, of lightnesse: but 37 4 EAZEWS, 78 EAZEWS, that is to say, of drawing up a serpent out of his hole. The Theepe calleth as it were the woolfe, by the foote; like as by report the leopard allureth unto him the most part of beasts, who are willing to approach him for the pleasure they take in his smell, and above all others the ape. But fea creatures generally all, have a certeine inbred fagacity, a wary perceivance before hand, which maketh them to be suspicious and circumspect, yea, and 40 to stand upon their guard against all fore-laying, so that the arte of hunting and catching them is not a small piece of worke, and a simple cunning; but that which requireth a great number of engins of all forts, and asketh woonderfull devices, and subtill sleights to compasse and goe beyond them; and this appeareth by the experience of fuch things, as we have daily in our hands: For first and formost the cane or reed of which the angle rodde is made, fishers would not have to bee bigge and thicke, and yet they had need of fuch an one as is tough and ftrong, for to plucke up and hold the fifnes, which commonly doe mightily fling and struggle when they be caught; but they chuse rather that which is small and slender, for scare lest if it cast abroad shadow, it might moove the doubt and suspicion that is naturally in fishes: moreover the line they make not with many water knots, but defire to have it as plaine and even as possi- 50 bly may be without any roughnesse, for that this giveth as it were some denuntiation unto them of fraud and deceit: they take order likewise that the haires which reach to the hooke, should feeme as white as possibly they can devise, for the whiter they be, the lesse are they seene in the water, for the conformity and likeneffe in colour to it: as for that which the poet Homer faith:

> Downe right to bottome of the sea, like plumbe of leade she went,

That peifeth downe the fishers booke, and holdes the line extent; it his passing through transparent * borne, that rurall oxes head bare, To greedy spikes secretly brings death ere they be ware.

Some milunderstanding these verses, would infer therupon; that men in old time used the hairs of an oxe tale to make there lines withal, faying that this word west, which commonly in Greeke is taken for an horne, fignifieth in this place haire; & that hereupon x ereally is derived, which be-10 tokeneth to sheere or cut haire; and xxea, that is to say, sheering or clipping; as also, that from hence it is that Archilochus tearmeth adaintie & wanton minion, who taketh delight in tricking and trimming the haire & wearing a peruke curioufly fet, Meganhasus. But furely, this their collection is not true, for they used as we do, the haire of horse tailes, to make their angle-lines withal, chuling those that grow either on stone-horses or geldings, and not of mares, for that ever & anonthey wet their tailes with staling, and by that means the haires of them are tenderand apt to breake. And Aristotle himselfe writeth, that in those verses above cited there is no deepe matter that requireth fuch an exquisit & curious scanning; for that (in truth) fishers use to overcast the line neete unto the hooke with a piece of horne, for feare lest fishes when they have swallowed down the hooke, should with their teeth bite or fret a two the line. And as for the hooks, they use 20 those that be round, for to take mullets and the fishes amia, because they have narrow mouthes: for very wary they are to avoid the longer and streighter kind; yea, and many times the mullet fuspecteth the round hooke, swimming round about it, and flurting with the taile the bait and meat that is upon it, and never linnes flapping, untill he have shaken it off, and then devoureth it: but fay, he can not speed that way, he drawes his mouth together, and with the very edge and unnost brim of his lips he nibleth about the bait, untill he have gnawen it off. The wide mouthed fea-pike, when he perceiveth that he is caught with the hooke, sheweth herein more valour and animofitie than the elephant; for he plucketh not out of another the dart or arrow fricking the bodie; but maketh meanes to deliver himselfe from the said hooke, shaking his head and writhing it to and fro untill he have inlarged the wound and made it wider; enduring most , froutly and refolutely the dolour to be thus rent and torne, and never gives over, untill he have wrested and wrung the hooke out of his bodie. The sea fox will not many times come necre unto an hooke, he reculeth backe and is afraid of some deceitfull guile; but say that he chance to be furprifed quickly, he maketh shift to winde himselfe off againe : for such is his strength, agilitie and flipperie moisture withall, that he will turne himselfe upside downe with his taile upward, in flich fort, that when by overturning his stomacke all within is come forth, it can not chuse but the hooke looseth the hold which it had and falleth foorth.

These examples do show a certeine intelligence, and withall a wittle and readie execution of that which is expedient for them, as need and occasion requireth. As for the anthia, they come to refeue and fuccour one of their owne kinde with more audacitie, for putting the line against their backe, they set to it the ridge bone, which is sharpe toothed in maner of a faw, and with it they endevour to file and faw it in twaine. And verily, there is not a creattireliving on the land (as farre as weeknow) that hath the heart and courage to aid their fellowes being in danger of life, neither beare, bore, lion, nor leopard. Well may those gather all 50 together in heaps, which are of the same kind and run one with another sound about the cirque or thew place with the Amphitheaters: but to rescue or succour one another neither know they the meanes how, nor have the courage to doe it : for they fly and leape backward as farr as ever they can possibly from one that is hurt or killed in their fight: as for that story my good friend that you alledge of the elephants, that they cast into the ditch or trench whereinto one of their company is fallen all that ever they can get & gather together, thereby to make a banke, that he may call himselfe upon, & besides so get forth, it is very strange and far fet : and because it commeth out of the books of king Juba, it would feeme to command us (as it were) by a roiall edict, to give credit thereto. But fay it were, true there be examples of fea-creatures enough to prove that for fociable kindneffe and prudence withall, there be many of them which give no place to the wifeft of all those which the land affoordeth: but as touching their communion and fellow-

To returne unto our fishers: perceiving as they doe, that the most part of fishes scorne the line and hooke as stale devices or such as be discovered, they betake themselves to fine force and thut them up within great casting nets, like as the Persians use to serve their enemies in their warres, making this account, that if they be enclosed once within those nets, they are theirs sure enough, as if no discourse of reason in the world, no wit & policie whatsoever will serve them to escape: for with hoopnets or castnets are mullets caught, & the iilides, the marmyri also, the sar-10 gi,fca-gogeon, and the wide mouthed pikes: but fuch as plunge themselves downe to the bottome of the water, called thereupon bonistes, fuch as are the barbel, the guiltheads, and the foorbions of the sea, those they use to catch and draw up with great drags and sweepnets. And verily this kinde of net Homer calleth Panagra, which is as much to fay, as catching and swooping all afore it. And yet as cunningly devised as these engins be, the sea-dogs have devices to avoid the fame, as also the wide mouthed labrax; for when he perceiveth that the said sweepenet is a drawing along the bottome, he setteth all his strength to, scrapeth in the earth, and patteth it fo, as he maketh an hole therein; and when he hath thus digged (as it were) as deepe a trench as will hide him against the incursion of the net, then he coucheth himselfe close within it, walting untill the net be glided over him and past. The dolphin, if he be surprised, and perceive that he is inclosed and clasped within the armes (as one would say) of a net, endureth his fortune resolutely, and never distinaieth for the matter; nay, he is very well appaied and pleased; sorhe is glad in his heart, that he hath fo many fifthes about him caught in the fame net, which hee may devour and make merrie with at his pleasure without paines taking : and when he sees that he is drawen up neere to the land, he makes no more adoe but gnawes a great hole in the net,& away he goes. But fay that he cannot dispatch this feat so quickly, but he comes into the fishers hands, yet hee diethnot for this at the first time; for they draw a rish or reed thorow the skinne along his creft, and fo let him go : but if he fuffer himselfe to be taken the second time, then they beat and cudgell him well; and know him they do by the feames or skars remaining of the forefaid reed. Howbeit, this falleth out verie seldome; for the most part of them when they have 30 beene once pardoned, do acknowledge what favour they have received, and beware for ever after how they do a fault and come into danger againe. But whereas there be infinit other examples of fubtle flights and wittie wiles which fifthes have invented, both to foresee and prevent a perill,& alfo to escape out of a danger, that of the cuttle is woorthie to be recited and would not be paffed over in filence: for having about her necke a bladder or bag hanging, full of a blacke muddie liquor, which thereupon they call blow, that is to fay, Inke: when the perceives herfelfe befet & compassed about, so as the is ready to be taken, the casteth forth from her the said inke full crastily, that by troubling the water of the sea all about her, and making it looke thicke and blacke, she might avoid the fight of the fisher, and so make an escape unseene. Following heerein the gods in Homer, who many times with overspreading a back cloud withdraw and steale away those 40 whom they are minded to fave: but enough of this.

Now as souching their craft and subtilitie in affailing and chasing others, there be many experiments and examples presented unto our sight: for the sish called the Starre, knowing full well, that whaloever he touchest wil much and resolve, offseth and yeeldeth her body to be handled, suffering as many as passed by her, or approach neere to stroke him: and as for the cramp-sish Torpedo, you all know well enough her powerfull propertie; not onely to benumme and stupisse those who touch her, but also to transmit a stupesactive qualitie, even along the maisses and cords of the net, to the verie hands of the sishers who have caught her. And some there be who report thus much moreover, as having farther experience of her woonderfull nature, that in case she cape and get away alive, if men do baddle aloft in the water, or dash the same upon them, they shall feele the said passion running up to the verie hand, and benumming their sense of they shall seel the said passion, by reason of the water which before was altered and turned in that manner. This sish therefore having an imbred knowledge hereof by nature, never sighteeth a front with any other; neither hazardeth himselse openly: but setching a compasse about the prey which it hunteth after, shooteth forth from her these contagious insuences like datts, infe-eding or charming rather the water first therewith, and afterwards by meanes thereof the fish that the latest for; so that it can neither defend it selfe, nor slie and make an escape, but remaineth as it were arrested, and bound fast with chaines, or utterly associated.

The sea-frog, called the Fisher, which name he gat by a kind of fishing that he doth practise, is knowen well enough to many: and driffotle saith, that the cuttle aforesaid useth likewise the same craft that he doth. His manner is to hang downe as it were an angle line, a certaine small string or gut from about his necke, which so othat nature, that hee can let out in length a great way when it is loose, and draw it in againe close together verie quickly when he list. Now when he perciveth some small fish necre unto him, hee suffresh it to nibble the end thereof and bite it, to add then by litle and little privily plucketh and draweth it backe toward him, untill he can reach with his mouth the fish that hangeth to it.

them in these verses:

His mind doth alter most mutable, To poulpe the sea fish skinne semblable, Which changeth hue to all things susable, To live in all worlds he is pliable.

The poet Theognis likewife:

Put on a mind like polyp fish, and learne so to dissemble, Which of the rocke whereto it slicks, the colour doshresemble.

True it is that the chamæleon also eftsoone changeth colour, but it is not upon any craftie deffeigne that he hath, nor yet for to hide himfelfe, but only for that he is fo timorous; for cowardly he is by nature, and feareth everie noise. Over and besides (as T heophrast w writeth) full he is of a deale of wind; and the bodie of this creature wanteth but a little of being all lungs and lights; whereby it may bee gueffed that it standeth altogether upon ventofitie and wind, and so confequently verie variable and subject to change: whereas that mutabilitie of the polype is a powerfull and fetled action of his, and not a momentarie paffion or infirmitie : for hee altereth his co-30 lour of a deliberate purpose, using it as a fleight or device, either to conceale himselfe from that whereof he is affraid; or elfe to catch that whereof hee feedeth: and by meanes of this deceitfull wile, he praieth upon the one that escapeth him not, & escapeth the other that passeth by & sees him not. But to fay that he eateth his owne cleies or long armes that he uleth to stretch foorth, is a loudlie; marie thathe standeth in feare of the lampray and the conger, is verietrue: for these fishes do him many shrewd turnes, and he cannot requite them the like, so slipperie they be and fo foone gone. Like as the lobster on the other fide if they come within his clutches, holdeth them falt & fqueizeth them to death: for their glibby flickneffe ferveth them in no ftead againft his rough cleies; and yet if the polype can get & entangle him once within his long laces, hee dies for it. See how nature hath given this circular viciffitude to avoid and chase one another by 40 turnes, as a veric exercife and triall to make proofe of their wit and fagacitie.

But Aristotimus hath alledged unto us the hedghoge, or land urchin, and stood much upon I wotnot what forefight he hath of the winds: and a woondrous matter he hath made also of the triangular slight of cranes. As for me, I will not produce the sea urchins of this or that particular coast, to wit, either of Bizantine, or of Cyzieum, but generally all in what seas soever; namely, how against a tempest and storme, when they see that the sea will be every much troubled, they charge and ballast themselves with little stones, for seare of being overturned or driven to and fro for their lightnesse, by the billowes and waves of the sea: and thus by the meanes of this weight, they remaine firme and sast upon the little rocks whereto they are settled. As for the cranes, who change their maner of flying according to the winde; I say, this is a skilfful quality, 50 not proper and peculiar to one kinde of sishes, but common unto them all; namely, 50 swimme evermore against the waves & the currentysea, and very warie they be, that the windeblow not their tailes, and raise their skales, and so hurtand offend their bodies laid bare and naked, yea evermore against the waves & the current; yea, and very warie they be, that the winde blow nor their tailes, and raife their skales, and so hurt and offend their bodies laid bare and naked, yea and made rugged by that meanes. Hecreupon they carie their shouts and muzzels alwaies into the winde, and so direct their course: and thus the sea being cut asson at their head, keepeth downe their sinnes, and gliding smoothly over their body, laieth their scales even, so as none of them stand staring up. This is a thing, as I have said, comon unto al sisses, except the Elops, whose nature is to swimme downe the winde and the water; neither search he that the winde will drive up his scales in so swimming, because they doe not lie toward his taile, but contrary to other fishes, toward his head.

Moreover, the tuny is so skilfull in the solflices and equinoxes, that he hath taught men to observe them without need of any astrologicall rules; for looke in what place or coast of the sea the winter tropicke or folftice finds him, there resteth he, and stirreth not untill the equinox in the fpring. But a woonderfull wisedome (quoth he) there is in the crane, to hold a stone in his foot, that by the fall thereof he may quickly awaken. How much wifer then, my good friend Ariflotimus, is the dolphin? who may not abide to lie still and cease stirring, for that by nature he is in continual motion, and endeth his mooving and living together: but when he hath need of fleepe, hespringeth up with his body to the toppe of the water, and turneth him upon his to backe with the belly upward, and so suffreth it partly to flote and hull, and in part to be caried through the deepe, waving to and fro as it were in a hanging bedde, with the agitation of the fea, fleeping all the while, untill he fettle downe to the bottom of the fea, and touch the ground; then wakenethlie, and mounting up with a jetke a fecond time, fuffreth himselfe to bee caried untill he be fetled downe againe; and thus hath he deviled to have his repose and rest intermingled with a kinde of motion. And it is faid that the tunies doe the like, and upon the same caufe.

And now forasmuch as we have shewed already the mathematicall and astrological foreknowledge that fishes have in the revolution and conversion of the sunne, which is consirmed likewise by the testimonic of Aristotle, listen what skill they have in arithmeticke; but first (be- 20 leeve me) of the perspective science; whereof as it should seeme, the poet Aeschylus was not ignorant: for thus he faith in one place:

For tunies in the other cie are thought to have a dimme and feeble fight: and therefore when they enter Mer major into the sea of Pontus, they coast along the land on the right side; but contrariwife when they come foorth, wherein they doe very wifely and circumfpectly, to commit the cultody of the body alwaies to the better eie. Now for that they have need of arithmeticke, by reason of their societie (as it may be thought) and mutual love wherein they delight, they are come to that height and perfection in this arte, that because they take a woondrous 30 pleasure to feed together, and to keepe one with another in sculles & troupes, they alwaies cast their company into a cubicke forme, in maner of a battailon, folid and fquare every way, clofe, and environed with fix equall fides or faces; and arranged in this ordinance as it were of a quadrat battell doe they swim, as large before as behind, & of the one side as of the other, in such fort, as he that lieth in espiall to hunt these tunies, if he can but take the just number how many there be of that fide or front that appeareth next unto him, may prefently tell what the number is of the whole troupe, being affured that the depth is equall to the bredth, and the bredth even with the length. 'Of apar, that The fifth called in Greeke* Hamia, tooke that name, it may be thought, for their converfing in is to tay, alto companies al together : and fo I suppose came the Pelamydes by their name. As for other sistes 40 that be fociable & love to live & are feene to converfe in great companies together, no man is able to nüber the, they be so many. Come we rather therfore to some particular societies & infeparable fellowships that some have in living together: amog which is that *Pinnotheres, which neere.

* Sometake it cost the philosopher Chrysippus so much inke in his descriptio, for in al his books as wel of mofor the throup, rall as naturall philosophie, he is ranged formost. As for the Spongetheres, I suppose he never knew, for otherwise he would not have left it out. Well, this Pinnotheres is a little fish, as they fay, of the crabs kind, which goeth & commeth evermore with the Nacre, a big shel fish keeping ftill by it, and fits as it were a porter at his shell side, which he letteth continually to stand wide open, untill he spie some small fishes gotten within it, such as they are woont to take for their food then doth he enter likewise into the Nacres shell, and seemeth to bite the fleshy sub- 50 stance thereof; whereupon presently the Nacre shutteth the shell hard, and then they two together feed upon the bootie which they have gotten prisoners within this enclosure.

As touching the fongotheres, a little creature it is, not like unto the crabbe fish as the other, but rather resembling a spider, & it seemeth to rule and governe the spunge, which is altogether without life, without bloud and fenfe; but as many other living creatures within the fea, cleaveth indeed heard to the rocks, and hath a peculiar motion of the owne, namely, to stretch our and draw in it felfe: but for to do this need, the hath of the direction and advertisement of ano ther: for being of a rare, hollow, and fost constitution otherwise, and full of many concavities, void & fo dull of fense besides, & idle withal, that it perceiveth not when there is any substance of good meat gotten within the faid void and emptie holes; this little animall at fuch a time givethakind of warning, and with it the gathereth in her body, holdeth it falt, and devoureth the fame: but much more will this fpunge draw in her felfe when a man comes neere and touches her; for then being better advertised and touched to the quicke, the quakethas it were for feare, and plucketh in her body fo streight and so hard, that the divers, and such as seeke after them haveno small adoe, but finde it to be a painfull matter for to get under and cut them from the

The purple fithes keepe in companies together, & make themseves a common cel, much like to the combs which bees doe frame, wherein by report, they do engender & breed: and looke what they have laid up for their flore and provision of victuals, to wit, mosse, reits and such seaweeds, those they put forth out of their shels, & present them unto their fellowes for to cat, banquetting round as it were every one in their turne, and keeping their course to feast, one eating of anothers provision. But no great marvell it is to see such an amiable society and loving fellowship among them, confidering that the most unfociable, cruel and savage creature of all that live either in rivers or lakes or feas, I meane the crocodile, theweth himfelfe wonderfull fellowlike and gracious in that fociety and dealing that is betweene him & the trochilm. For this trochilue is a little bird of the kinde of those which ordinarily doe haunt meres, marithes and rivers, 20 waiting and attending upon the crocodile as it were one of his guard: neither liveth this bird at her owne finding nor upon her owne provision, but of the reliques that the crocodile leaveth. The service that the doth for it is this: when the seeth the ichneumon, having plastred his body as it were with a coat of mud baked hard in maner of a cruft, and like unto a champion with his hands aldusty, ready to wrestle & prepared to take hold of his enimy, ly in wait for to surprise the crocodile afleepe, the awakeneth him partly with her voice, and partly by nebbing him with her bill. Now the crocodile is so gentle and familiar with her, that he will gape with his chawes wide open, and let her enter into his mouth, taking great pleafure that the thould picke his teeth and pecke out the little morfels of flesh that sticke betweene, with her prety beake, & withall, to fearifichis gummes. But when he hath had enough of this, & would flut and close his mouth 30 againe, he letteth fall the upper chaw a little, which is a warning unto the bird for to get forth: but he never bringeth both jawes together, before he knowe that the trochilus is flowen out.

There is a little fish called the guide, for quantity & proportion of shape, refembling the guidgeon, only without forth it feemeth like unto a bird, whose feathers for feare stand up; the scales stare so, and are so rough. This fish is ever in the company of one of these great whales, swimming before, and directing his course as if he were his pilot, for feare left he should light upon some thelves, runne upon the sands in the shallowes, or otherwise shoot himselfe into some narrow creeke where he can hardly turne and get foorth. The whale followeth hard after, willing to be guided, and directed by him, even as a shippe by the helme: and looke what other thing foever befides commeth within the chaos of this monsters mouth, be it beast, boat, 40 or ftone, downe it goes all incontinently that foule great fwallow of his, and periffieth in the bottomleffe gulfe of his panch: onely this little fifth he knoweth from the reft, and receiveth into his mouth and no farther, as an ancker, for within it fleepeth; and while the fifth is at repose, the whale likewise resteth still, as if he ridde at ancker; no sooner is it gotten foorth, but he followeth on a fresh, never leaving it by day nor by night, for otherwise hee would wander heere and there: and many of these whales there have been elost in this manner, wanting their guide & pilot, which have runne themselves a land, for default of a good pilot. For we our selves have leene one of them so cast away not long since about the sile Anticyra: and before time by report, there was another cast upon the sands, and not farre from the city Buna, which lay there flinking and putrified; whereupon by the infection of the aire, there enfued a peffilence 50 in those parts adjoining. What should one say? Is there any other example woorthy to bee compared with these societies so streightly linked, and enterlaced with mutuall benevolence? Aristotle indeed reporteth great friendship and amitic betweene foxes and serpents, joining and combining together against their common enemie the eagle, also betweene the Otides and horses; for the bird ot is delighteth in their company, and to be necre them, for that they may rake into their dung. For mine owne part, I cannot fee that the very bees, or the pifmires, are to industrious and carefull one for another. True it is, that they travell and labour in common for a publicke weale; but to aime at any particular good, or to respect the private benefit one of another, we can finde example of no beast upon the land where soever: but we shall perceive this difference much better, if we convert our speech to the principall duties and greatest offices of societie; generation (Imeane) and procreation of yoong: First and formost, all fishes which haunt any fea, either neere unto lakes, or fuch as receiveth great rivers into it, when they perceive their spawning time to be neere, come up toward the land, and seeke for that fresh water which is most quiet and least subject to agitation for that calmenesse is good for their breeding; besides, these lakes and rivers ordinarily have none of these monstrous sea monsters; to as both their spawne and their yoong frie, is there in most fafetie, which is the reason that there are so many fishes bred about the Euxine sea; for that it nourisheth no whales or other great fifthes: onely the fea-calfe which there is but finall, and the dolphin 10 who is as little. Moreover, the mixture of many great rivers which discharge themselves into the fea, caufeth the temperature of the water to be very good and fit for great bellied fpawners, But mott admirable of all others, is the nature of the fifth anthios, which Homer called the facred fish; although some thinke that facred in that place, is as much to say, as great: in which fenfe we tearme the great bone, icor, that is to fay, facred; whereupon the ridge bone refleth; as alfo the great maladie, called the falling ficknefle, is tearmed in Greeke isez reors, that is to fay, the facted fickneffe: others interpret it after the common and vulgar maner, namely, for that which is vowed and dedicated to fome god, or otherwife abandoned : but feemeth that Eratofhenes to called the guilthead or golden ey, as appeareth by this verfe of his:

Most swift of course, with browes as bright as golde,

This is the figh which I doe facred holde. but many take it for the clops; for rate he is to be found, and hard to be taken: howbeit, manie times he is feene about the coaft of Pamphylia; and whenfoever the fifthers can meet with any of them, and bring them home, both they themselves weare chaplets of flowers for joy, and also they crowne and adorne their barques with garlands, yea, and at their arrivall they are received with much flouting and clapping of hands; but the most part are of opinion, that the anthios belorefaid, is he which they call the facred fifth; and so is he held to be; for that wheresoever he is, there may no hurtfull nor ravening monster be found there: infomuch as the Divers plunge downe into the fea for spunges, boldly in those coasts where these be; yea, and other fishes, both spawne and reare their yoong frie safely there, as having him for their pledge and warrant of all 30 fafety and security, as in a priviledged place. The cause hereof is hardly to be rendred; whether it be that fuch hurtfull fithes upon a fecret antipathie in nature, doe avoid him as elephants a fwine, and lions a cocke; or that there be fome marks & fignes of those coasts which are clere of fuch harmfull monsters, which he knoweth well and observeth, being a fish quicke of wit, and as good of memoric. Common it is to all females for to have a naturall care and providence for their yong, but in fitnes, the males generally are fo respective that way, and so farre off from devouring the feed of their owne kinde, that they continue necre unto the spawne that the semales have calt, and keepe the fame, as Ariffotle hath left in writing. Some milters there be, that follow after the spawners, and sprinkle them a little about the taile; otherwise, the spawne or frie will not befaire and great, but remaine unperfect, and come to no growth. This property particu-40 Moles or Le- larly by themselves have the phycides, that they build their nests with the sea weeds or reits, covering and defending therewith their spawne and frie against the waves of the sea.

Dog-fishes give not place in any fort to the most tame and gentle beasts in the world, for kinde love and naturali affection to their yoong : for first they engender spawne, and after that, a quicke frie; and that not without, but within, nourishing and carrying the same within their ownebodies, after a kind of fecond generation; but when they are growen to any bigneffe, they put them foorth and teach them how to fwim hard by them, and afterwards receive them by the mouth into their bodie, which serveth in stead of a place of abode, of nourishment and of refuge, untill such time as they be so big, that they can shift for themselves.

Moreover, the provident care of the tortoile in the generation, nourishment and preservati- 50 on of yer young, is woonderfull: for out the goeth of the fea, and laieth her egges or casteth her spawne upon the banke fide; but being not able to cove or fit upon them, nor to remaine herfelfe upon the land out of the fea any long time, the bestoweth them in the gravell, and afterwards covereth them with the lightest and finest fand that she can get : when she hath thus hidden them furely, some say, that with her feet the draweth raies or lines, or els imprinteth certeine pricks, which may ferve for privy marks to herfelfe, to finde out the place againe: others affirme, that the male turneth the females upon the backe, and so leaveth the print of their shell within the fame : but that which is more admirable, the observeth just the fortieth day (for info many daies, the egges come to their maturity, and behatched) and then returneth the to the place where knowing her owne treasure by the feale, she openeth it with great joy and pleasure, as no man doth his casket of jewels or cabinet where his golde lieth.

The crocodiles deale much after this maner in all other points; but at what marks they aime including or finding out the place where they breed, no mortall man is able to imagine or give a reason whereupon it is commonly said, that the foreknowledge of this beast in that respect, proceedeth not from any discourse of reason, but of some supernatural divination: for going neither farther nor necree than just to that gage and height where Wilus the river for that yeere to will rife and cover the earth, there laieth fhe her egges : fo that when the paifant or countrey man chanceth by fortune to hit upen a crocodiles neft, himfelfe knoweth and telleth his neighbours how high the river will overflow that Summer following: fo just doth the measure the place that will be drowned with water, that herfelfe may be fure not to be drenched while the fittethand coveth: furthermore, when her young bee newly hatched, if the fee any one of them (so some as ever it is out of the shell) not to catch with the mouth one thing or other comming next in the way, be it flie, pifmire, gnat, earth-worme, ftraw or graffe, the damme taketh it betweene her teeth, teareth it and killeth it prefently; but fuch as give some proofe of animolitie, audacitie and execution, those she loveth, those the cherisheth and maketh much of, bestowing her love as the wifest men judge it meet and reasonable, according to reason and discretion, and 20 not with blinde affection.

The fea-calves likewife bring forth their yoong on the dry land; but within a while after they traine them to the fea; give them a tafte of the falt water, & then quickly bring them back againe: thus practife they with them by little and little many times together, untill they have gotten more heart and begin of themselves to delight for to live within the sea. Frogs about their breeding time, call one to another, by a certaine amorous note or nuptiall tune, called properly Ololugon. And when the male hath by this meanes entifed and allured the female to him, they attend and waite together for the night: and why? In the water they cannot possibly engender, and upon the land they fear to do it in the day time; dark night is no fooner come, but boldly they go foorth of the water, and then without feare they claspe and embrace one another. Moreover 30 against a showre of raine their crooking voice, such as it is, you shall heare more cleere and shrill

But (oh sweet 2/eptune) what a soule fault and groffe errour was I like to have committed; how abfurd and ridiculous (hould I have made my felfe, if being amused and busied to speake of these sea-calves and frogs, I had forgotten and overpassed the wifest creature, and that which the gods love best, of all those that do frequent and hant the sear for what musicke of the nightingale is comparable to that of the halcyon; what * artificiall building of the swallowes, and martinets; * operation what entier amitie & love of doves; what skilfull cunning of the bees, deferveth to be put in bal-forme readerlance with these sea-sowles halcyones? Of what living creatures have the gods and goddesses so kerkere, that much honored the breeding, travell and birth? for it is faid that there was but one onely Isle, to young birds. 40 wit Delos, that was fo wel beloved, that it received the childbirth of Latona, when she was delivered of apollo & Diana: which iland floating before time, continued afterwards firme-land; whereas the pleasure of God is such, that all seas should be still and calme without waves, winds or drop of raine falling upon them, all the while that the haleyon laieth and coveth, which is just about the winter foldlice, even when the daies bee shortest: which is the reason that there is no living creature that men love fowell; by whose meanes seven daies they have, and seven nights even in the verie heart of winter, during which time they may fafely faile, having their voiage by fea for those daies space, more secure than their travell by land. Now if I must say somewhat likewise of ech particular vertue that this bird bath: first and foremost the female is so loving to the male her mate, that the tarrieth not with him for one feafon only, but al the yeere long keepeth him com-50 pany; and that not for shamelesse lust & wantonnesse (for she never admitteth any other male to tread her) but onely upon a kind love and tender affection; even like an honeft wedded wife that keepeth onely to her husband. And when the male groweth to be for age weake and unweldie, in fuch fort as he cannot follow her, but with much ado, the beareth and feedeth him in his old age; the never for faketh nor leaveth him alone for any thing, but the taketh him upon her thoulders, carrieth him everie where about, tendeth him most tenderly, and is with him stil unto his dying day. Now for the affection which the beareth to her yoong, and the care that the hath of them

building of her nell; not tempering mudde or cley for to make thereof morter; nor dawbing it upon the walles, and fpreading it over the rouse as the swallowes do; and yet employing her whole body or the most part thereof about her worke, as doth the bee, which entring in the hony-combe with her entier bodie 3 and working with all the fix feet together, devideth the place in fix angled cels: but the alcyon having but one instrument, one toole, one engine to worke withall, even her owne bill, without any thing else in the world to helpe her in her travell and operazion; yet what workmanship she makes & what fabricks she frameth, like unto a master carpenter or shipwright, hard it were to beleeve, unlesse a man had seene it, being in deed such a fabricke and piece of worke, which onely of all other cannot bee overthrowen nor drenched with the sea: for first and formost shee goes and gathers a number of bones of the fish called 10 Belone, that is to fay, a Needle, which thee joineth and bindeth together, interlacing them some long-wife, others overthwart, much like as the woofe is woven upon the warpe in a loome, winding, plaiting and twifting them up and downe one within another; so that in the end fashioned it is in forme round, yet extended out in length like unto a fishers weele or bow-net: after she hath finished this frame, shee bringeth it to some creeke, and opposeth it against the waves, where the fea gently beating and dathing upon it, teacheth her to mend that was not well compact, and to fortific it in fuch places where thee fees it gapeth, or is not united close by reason of the fea water that hath undone the composition thereof: contrariwise, that which was well jointed, the fea doth fo fettle and drive together, that hardly a man is able to breake, diffoleor doe it injurie eithet with knocke of stone or dint of edged toole. But that which yet makethit 20 more admirable, is the proportion and forme of the concavitie and hole within this veffell; for framed it is & composed in such fort, that it will receive and admit no other thing, but the verie bird which made it, for nought else can enter into it, so close it is and shutup, no not so much as the very water of the fea. I am affured that there is not one of you all, but he hath many times feene this nelt: but for mine owne part, who have both viewed, touched and handled it, and that verie often, I am readie to fay and fing thus:

The like at Delos once Iweene,

Wasin Apollos temple seene. I meane the altar made al of homes, renowmed amongst the seven wonders of the world; for that without foder, glew, or any other matter to binde and holde the parcels together, made it was 30 and framed of hornes which grew on the right fide of the head onely. But o that this god would be fo good and gracious unto me, being in some fort musicall and an islander, like himselfe, as to pardon me if I fing the praise of that firene and mer maid so highly commended; as also gently to heare mee laugh at these demands and interrogatories that these propound, who in mocketie seeme to aske, Why Apollo is never called Κογρεκτόν Φ, that is to say, the killer of conger, nor Diana his fifter Terna case, that is to fay, a striker of barbels, knowing that even Venus, borneas the was of the sea, and instituting her facrifices neere unto it, takethno pleasure that any thing should be killed. And moreover, ye wot well enough, that in the city of Leptu, the priefts of Neptune cat nothing that commeth out of the fea, as also that in the citie Eleufin, those who are professed religious, and admitted to the holy mysteries of Ceres, honour the barbell; 40 yea, and in the city of Argos the priestresse of Diana upon a devout reverence forbeareth to feed of this creature; for that these barbles doe kill and destroy all that ever they can, the sea-hare, which is so venimous and so deadly a poison to man: in regard of which benefit, reported they are friendly unto mankinde, and prefervers of their health, and therefore honoured they be, and kept as factofanct: and yet you shall fee in many cities of Greece, both temples and altars dedicated unto Diana surnamed Dietymna, as one would say, affected unto sishers nets: like as to Apollo Delphinius: for certeine it is, that the place which he especially chose above all others for his abode, the posteritie descended from the Cretansians came to inhabit and people, being conducted thither by the guidance of a dolphin: and not because himselfe (as some fabulous writers report) being transformed into a dolphin, fwam before their fleet; but furely a dolphin 50 he fent to direct those men in their navigation, and so he brought them to the bay of Circhi.

Alfo written it is in histories, that those who were fent by king Ptolomaus furnamed Soter, to the city Sinope, for to carie the god Serapis, together with their captaine Diony fine, were by force of winde and tempest driven against their willes beyond the cape or promontorie Malea, where they had Peloponness on the right hand; and when they wandered and were tossed to and fro upon the feas, not knowing where they were, making account they were lost and cast away, there thewed himselfe before the prow of their ship, a dolphin, which seemed to call unto them, and who guided them unto those coasts where there were many commodious havens and faire baies for ships to harbour and ride in with safetie; and thus he conducted and accompanied their ship from place to place, untill at length he brought it within the rode of Circha; where after they had facrificed for their fafe arrivall and landing, they understood that of two images there, they were to have away that of Pluto, and carrie it with them, but the other of Proferpina to leave behinde them, when they had taken onely the mould and patterne thereof. Probable it is therefore, that the god Apollo carried an affection to this dolphin, for that it loveth mulicke fo well: whereupon the poet Pindarus comparing himselfe unto the dolphin, faith that he was provoked and stirred up to musicke by the leaping and dauncing of this fish.

Like as the dolphin swimmes apace Directly forward to that place Whereas the pleasant shawmes do sound. And whence their noice doth soone rebound: What time both winds and waves do lie At fea, and let no harmonie.

or rather we are to thinke that the god is well affected unto him, because he is so kind and loving unto man: for the onely creature it is, that loveth man for his owne fake, and in regard that he is a man: whereas of land-beafts, fome you shall have that love none at all; others, and those that be of the tamest kinde, make much of those onely, of whom they have some use and benefit; 20 namely, fuch as feed them or converse with them familiarly, as the dogge, the horse and the elephant: and as for swallowes, received though they be into our houses, where they have enterteinment, and whatfoever they need, to wit, thade, harbour and a necessary retrait for their fafetie, yet they be afraied of man, and fhun him as if he were some savage beast; whereas the dolphin alone of all other creatures in the world, by a certeine inftinct of nature, carrieth that fincere affection unto man, which is fo much fought for and defired by our best philosophers, even without any respect at all of commoditie: for having no need at all of mans helpe, yet is he nevertheleffe friendly and courteous unto all, and hath succoured many in their distresse; as the storie of Arion will testifie, which is so famous, as no man is ignorant thereof: and even you Aristotimus your owne selfe, rehearted to very good purpose the example of Hesiodus:

for when you reported unto us the fidelitie of his dogge, you should have proceeded farther, and told out all, not leaving out (as you did) the narration of the dolphins: for furely the notice that the dogge gave, by baying, barking, and running after the murderers with open mouth, was (I may tell you) but a blinde prefumption, and no evident argument. About the citie Nemium, the dolphins meeting with the dead corps of a man floting up and downe upon the fea, tooke it up and laied it on their backs, shifting it from one to another by turnes, as any of them were wearie with the carriage, and very willingly, yea, and as it should seeme, with great affection, they conveied it as farre as to the port Rhium, where they laied it downe upon the shore, and so made 40 it knowen that there was a man murdered. Myrtilus the Lesbian writeth, that Aenalus the Acolianbeing fallen in fansie with a daughter of Phinew, who according to the oracle of Imphirite, was by the daughters of Pentheus cast downeheadlong into the sea, threw himselfe after her; but there was a dolphin tooke him up, and brought him fafe unto the ifle Lesbos. Over and besides, the affection and good will which a dolphin bare unto a yoong lad of the citic tasos, was so hot and vehement, in the highest degree, that if ever one creature was in love with another, it was he; for there was not a day went over his head, but he would disport, play and swimme with him, yea, and fuffer himselfe to be handled and tickled by him upon his bare skinne; and if the boy were disposed to mount aloft upon his backe, he would not resule, nor seeme to avoide him; nay hee was verie well content with fuch a carriage, turning what way foever 50 heereined him, or feemed to encline : and thus would hee doe in the presence of the Iasians, who oftentimes would all runnefoorth to the feafide of purpose to behold this fight. Well on a daie above the rest, when this ladde was upon the dolphins backe, there fell an exceeding great shower of raine, together with a monstrous storme of haile; by reason whereof the poore boy fell into the fea, and there died: but the dolphin tooke up his bodie dead as it was, and together with it shut himselfe upon the land; neither would be depart from the corps fo long as there was any life in him, and fo died, judging it great reason to take part with him of his death, who feemed partly to be the cause thereof. In remembrance of which memorable accident, the lassans represent the historie thereof stamped and printed upon their coine, to wit, a boy tiding upon a dolphin, which storie hath caused that the sable or tale that goeth of Caranus is beleeved for a truth: for this Caranua, as they fay, borne in Pares, chanced to be upon a time at Byzantium, where seeing a great draught of dolphins taken up in a casting-net by the sisters, whom they meant to kill and cut into pieces, bought them all alive, and let them go againe into the fea. Notlong after, it hapned that he failed homeward in a foilt of fiftie oares, which had aboord (by report) a number of pyrates and rovers 5 but in the streights betweene Naxosand Paros the veffel was cast away, and swallowed up in a gust: in which shipwracke, when all the rest perished, he onely was saved, by meanes as they say of adolphin, which comming under his bodie as he was newly plunged into the fea, bare him up, tooke him upon his backe, and carried 10 him as farre as to a certaine cave about Zacynthus, and there landed him : which place is the wed for a monumentar this day, and after his name, is called Caranium. Upon this occasion, Archilachus the poet, is faid to have made these verses:

Of fiftie men by tempest drown'd, And left in sea all dead behind: Coeran alone alive was found,

God Neptune was to him fo kind, Afterwards the faid Caranu himfelfe died: and when his kinsfolke & friends burned his corps nere to the feafide in a funerall fire, many dolphins were discovered along the coast hard by the thore, thewing (as it were) themselves how they were come to honour his obsequies; for depart 20 they would not before the whole folemnitie of this last dutie was performed. That the scutchion or shield of ultifes had for the badge or enfigne, a dolphin, Stefichorus hath testified, but the occasion and cause thereof, the Zacynthians report in this manner, as Critem the historian beareth witnesse. Telemachus his sonne being yet an infant, chanced to slip with his feet, as men say, to fall into a place of the fea, where it was very deep; but by the means of certaine dolphins who tooke him as he fell, faved he was and carried out of the water: whereupon his father in a thankfull regard and honour to this creature, engraved within the collet of his fignet, wherewith hee fealed the portrait of a dolphin, & likewise carried it as his armes upon his shield. But for a smuch as I protested in the beginning that I would relate to you no fables, and yet (I wot not how) in fpeaking of dolphins, I am carried farther than I was aware, and fallen upon the ges and Caranus, 30 fornewhat beyond the bounds of likelihood and probabilitie, I will fet a fine upon mine owne head, and even here for amends lay a straw and make an end. You therefore my masters who are judges, may when it pleafeth you proceed to your verdict.

SOCLARUS. As for us, we were of mind a good while fince to fay according to the fentence of Sophoeles: Your talke ere while which seem'd to disagre,

Will soone accord and joint-wise framed be. for if you will, both of you conferre your arguments, proofes and reasons which you have alledged of the one fide and the other, and lay them all together in common betweene you, it will be feene how mightily you shall confute and put downe those who would deprive bruit beasts of all understanding and discourse of reason.

WHETHER THE

NOWMED FOR MARTIALL ARMES OR GOOD LETTERS.

The Summarie.

E have here the fragments of a pleasant discourse written in the savour of Athenian warriours and great captaines; which at this day hash neither beginning nor end, and in the middle u altogether maimed and unperfect: but that which the infortanitie of in the middle us altogether mamnen and unper section we may gather some good, and the in-the times hath left unso us, such set as thereout we may gather some good, and the intention of Plutarch is therein sufficiently discovered unto us : for he sheweth that the Athenians were more famous and excellent in feats of armes than in the profession of learning. Which position may seeme to be a strange paradox, considering that Athens was reputed the habitation of themuses: and if there were ever any brave historians, singular poets, and notable or atours in the world, we are to looke for them in this citie. Yet for all this, he taketh upon him to proove that the prowesse of Athenian captaines was without all comparison more commendable and praise woorthie than all the dexteritie of others, who at their leasure have written in the shade and within house the occurrents and accidents of the times, or exhibited pleasures and passimes to the people upon the stage or scaffold. And to effect this intended purpose of his, he considereth in the first place, historiographers, 30 and adjoineth thereto a briefe treasife of the art of painting : and by comparison of two persons, bringing newes of a field fought, whereof the one was onely a beholder and looker on; the other an actor himselfe, and a souldier fighting in the battell, he sheweth that noble captaines ought to be preferred before historians, who pen and set downesheir dessenses and executions. From history he passeth on to poesie, both comicall and tragicall, which hereprove th and debasesh, not with standing the Athenians made exceeding account thereof; giving to under stand, that their walor confisted rather in martiall exploits. In the last place he speaketh of oratours, and by conference of their orations and other reasons, proveth that these great speakers deserve not that place, as to have their words weighed in ballance against the deeds of lo many politike and valiant warriours.

40 WHETHER THE ATHENIANS

armes or good letters.

Ell faid this was (in trueth) of him unto those great captaines and commanders who fucceeded him, unto whom hee made way and gave entrance to the executions of those exploits which they perof formed afterwards, when himselfe had to their hands chased out of Greece the barbarous king Xerxes, and delivered the Greeks out of offervitude: but aswell may the same be said also to those who are proud of their learning and stand highly upon their crudition. For If you take away men of action, you shall be fure to have no writers of them: take away the politike government of Pericles at home; the navall victories and trophæs atchieved by Phormio, neere the promontorie of Rhum; the noble prowesses of Nicias about the isle Cythera, as also before the cities of Corinth and Megara; take away the sea fight of Demosthenes before Pylos; the source hundred captives and prisoners of Clean; the worthy deeds of Tolmias who fcowred all the coasts of Peloponnesm; the brave acts of Myronides, and the battell which he woon against the Boeotians in the place called Oenophyta; and withall, you blot out the whole historic of Thucydides; take away the valiant service of Alcibrades thewed in Hellefont; the rare manhood of Thrafylus neere unto the ifle Lesbos; the happie suppression and abolition of the tyrannicall oligarchie of the thirty usurpers, by Theramenes; take away the valourous endevours of Thraspulus and Archippus, together with the rare deffeignes and enterprises executed by those seven hundred, who from Phylarose up in armes and were to hardie and refolute as to levie a power and wage warre against the lordly potentates of Sparta; and last of all Conon, who caused the Athenians to go to sea againe and maintaine the warres; and therewithall, take away Cratippus and all his Chronicles. For as touching Xenophon, he was the writer of his owne historie, keeping a booke and commentarie of those occurrents to and proceedings which paffed under his happie conduct and direction : and (by report) he gave it out in writing, that Themistogenes the Syracusian composed the said narration of his acts, to the end that Xenophon might win more credit and be the better believed, writing as he did of himselfe as of a stranger, and withall, gratifying another man by that meanes with the honour of cloquence in digefting and penning the fame. All other historians besides, as these, Clinodemi and Diylli, Philochorus and Philarchus, may be counted as it were the actors of other mens plaies: who fetting downe the acts of kings, princes and great captaines, shrowded close under their memorials, to the end that themselves might have some part with them of their light and fplendor. For furely there is a certaine image of glorie, which by a kinde of reflexion, as in a mirrour, doth rebound from those who have atchieved noble acts, even unto them that commit 20 the fame to writing, when as the actions of other men are represented by their reports and re-

Certes this city of Athens hath beene the fruitfull mother and kinde nourse of many and fundry arts, whereof some she first invented and brought to light; others she gave growth, strength, honour and credit unto. And among the rest, the skill of painters crast hath not beene least advanced and adorned by her. For Apollodor we the painter, the first man who devised the mixture of colours, and the manner of darkning them by the shadow, was an Athenian rover whose works was set this epigram by his owne selse.

Sooner will one, this carpe and twit;

Than doe the like or fample it.

So were Euphranor and Nicias, Asclepiodor m also, and Plistenes m the brother of Phidias, whereoffome portraied victorious captaines, others painted battels, and others drew to the lifethe worthies and demigods: like as Euphranor who painted noble Thesem, and set this picture as a paragon in comparison with another of Parrhassim making; saying that the Thesem of Parrhasim had caten roses, but his Thesem had beene sed with good oxe beefe; for to say a trueth, that picture of Parrhassim was daintly and delicately made, resembling in some fort that which Euphranor talketh of; but he that should see this of Euphranors doing, might say (not unfitly) these verses out of Homer:

The people of Ercchtheus flout, whom Pallas, daughter deare Of Jupiter that mighty god, sometime did feed and reare. Euphranor also depainted the battell of horsemen before the citic Mantinea, against Epaminond.o, which feemeth not to be without some furious and divine instinct. The argument and subjest matter whereof was this: Epaminondas the Theban, after the battell which he won before the towne Leuttra, puffed up with glory in this greatnesse of his, determined resolutely to infult over Sparta, which now was already downe the winde, and at once to tread and trample under foot the high spirit and reputation of that city. First therefore he invaded Laconia with a mightie power of threescore and ten thousand fighting men, spoiling and harrowing the countrey as he went; whereby he withdrew all the neighbour nations from their confederacie and alliance with the 50 Lacedæmonians. After this, when they put themselves in battell ray, and made head against him before Mantinea, hee challenged and provoked them to fight: which they neither would nor durit accept, expecting aid that thould come unto them from Athens. Whereupon he brake up his campe, and diflodging in the night feafon fecretly and contrary to all mens expectation, entred againe into Laconia, in which journey and expedition he went within a little of furptiling the citie of Sparra and winning it, naked as it was and without defendants. But their allies and confederates having intelligence of his comming, came with all speed to succourthe citie. Then Epaminondas made femblance that hee would turne and bend his forces to the wasting and spoiling of their territorie, as hee had done before. Thus having by this strarageme deluded his enemies, and fulled them affeepe in fecuritie, hee departed fuddenly by night out of Laconia, having over-runne and destroicd all before him with great celeritie, and presented himselfe with his whole armie before them of Mantinea, who looked for nothing leffethan fuch a gueft, but were in confultation for to fend helpe to Lacedamon: but he interrupting & breaking their counsols, immediatly commanded the Thebanes to arme, who being brave & couragious fouldiors, invested the city of Mantinear ound about, stroke up the alarme and gave an affault. The Mantineans hecreat aftonied, ran up and downe the streets, howling to and wailing, as being not able to fultaine, and much leffe put backe fo great a puillance, which all at once in manner of a violent streame, came running upon them; neither did they thinke of any aid or meanes to relieve themselves in this distresse. But at the very point of this extremity, the Athenians were discovered, descending from the hilles downe into the plaines of Maninea, who knowing nothing of this fudden furprise and present danger wherein the citic flood, marched foftly, and tooke leifure; but when they were advertised hecreof by a vaunt courrier who made meanes to get foorth of the city snotwithstanding they were but a handfull in comparison of the great multitude of their enemies, and with all somewhat we arie with their journey, and not feconded with any other of their allies and affociates; they advaunced forward, and put themselves in order of battell against their enemics, who were in number many for one: 20 the horf-men also for their parts being likewise arranged, set spurres to their horses, and rode hard to the gates and walles of the city, where they charged their enemies fo hotly with their horses, and gave them so cruell a battell, that they gat the upper hand, and rescued Mantinea out of the danger of Epaminondas. Now had Euphranor painted this conflict most lively in a table, wherein a man might have feene the furious encounter, the couragious charge and bloudie fight, wherein both horse and man seemed to pusse and blow againe for winde.

But I suppose you will not compare the wit or judgement of a painter, with the courage and policy of a captaine, nor endure those, who preferre a painted table before a glorious trophæ; or the vaine thadow before the reall substance and thing indeed: how foever Simonides faid that picture was a dumbe poefie, and poefie a speaking picture: for looke what things or 20 actions painters doe fhew as present and in manner as they were in doing, writings doe report and record as done and past; and if the one represent them in colours and figures, and the other exhibite the fame in words and fentences, they differ both in matter and alfo in manner of imitation, howbeit both the one and the other shoote at one end, and have the fame intent and purpose. And hee is counted the best historian who hath the skill to fet out a narration, as in a painted table with diversaffections, and fundry conditions of persons, as with many images and pourtraictures. And verily this may appeere in Thue ydides, who throughout his whole history contendeth to attaine unto this diluciditie of stile, striving to make the auditour of his wordes the spectatour as it were of the deeds therein conteined, and defirous to imprint in the readers the same passions of astonishment, woonder 40 and agony, which the very things themselves would worke when they are represented to the cie. For Demosthenes who put the Athenians in ordinance of battell, even upon the very fands and shore within the creeke of Pylos; and Brasidas who hastening the pilot of his galley to runne with the prow a land, walking along the hatches himselfe, and being there wounded and ready to yeeld up his vitall breath, funke downe among the feats of the rowers; also the Lacedæmonians who fought a battell at lea, as if they had beene on firme land: the Athenians likewife who upon the land embattailed themselves, and sought as if they had beene within their gallies at fea againe, in the Sicilian warre: the description which he maketh of the two armies arranged on the land, hard by the fea fide, to behold their men fighting a navall battell, wherein the victory hung a long time in equall ballance , and inclined neither to the one fide nor the other, by 50 occasion of which doubtfull issue, they were in an intollerable agony, distresse, and perplexity, to behold the fundry encounters and reciprocall charges and recharges, communicating their violence and heat of contention even to the very bodies of the beholders upon the strond, who puffing, blowing, panting, and sweating in as great paine and seare, as if they had beene personally in the very conflict: the orderly disposition, the graphicall description and the lively narration which he maketh of all this, what is it but an evident representation of a picture? Now if it be not meet to compare painters with captaines, there is as little reason to set historians in comparison with them.

Hc

He who brought the newes of the battell and victorie at Marathon, as Heraclides of Pontus writeth, was one Thersippus of Eroe, or as most historians report, it was one Eucles, who came running in a great heat from the field in his armour as he was, and knocking at the gates of the principall mens houses of Ashens, was able to say nothing elsebut this, zaipens, & zaipens, that isto fay, rejoice yee, all is well with us, and therewith his breath failed, and so he gave up the ghoft, and yet this man came and brought tidings of that battell wherein himselse was an actour. But tell me I pray you; if there were some goat herd or neat-herd, who from the toppe of an hill or an high banke, had beheld a farre off this great service, and indeed greater than any words can expresse, should have come into the city with newes thereof, not wounded himselfe, nor having loft one droppe of bloud, and for his good tidings demaund afterwards to have 10 the fame honors and memorials which were graunted unto Cynagirus, to Callimachus, and Polyzebus, onely because forfooth he had made report of the doughty deeds, the wounds and death of these brave men; would you not thinke that he surpassed all the impudencie that can be imagined? confidering especially, that the Lacedamonians, by report, fent unto him who brought the first word of the victory at Mantinea, which Thueydides described in his story, a piece of flesh from one of their dinners, or hals, called Fhichita, for a recompence of his happy newes And (to fay a truth) what are historiographers else but certeine messengers to relate and declare the acts of others, having a loud and audible voice, and who by their pleafant eloquence and fignificant phrases, are able to set foorth the matter to the best, which they take in hand: unto whom they owe indeed the reward due for good tidings, who first doe light upon their compo- 20 fitions, and have the first reading of them : for surely, praised they bee onely when they make mention of fuch exploits, and read they be in regard of those singular persons whom they make knowen, as the authours and actours thereof. Neither are they the goodly words and fine phrafes in histories that performe the deeds, or deferve fo greatly to be heard : for even poetry hath a grace, and is effected, for that it describeth and relateth things as if they had beene done, and which carie a refemblance of truth: and according as Homer in one place faith:

Nany false tales how for to tell, Much like to trueths, she knowes full well.

And it is reported, that one of Menanders familiar friends faid unto him upon a time: Menanders, the Bacchanale feafts are at hand, and halt not thou yet done thy comcedy? who returned 30 him this answer: Yes iwis have I, so helpe me the gods, composed it I fay, I have; for the matter thereof is laid foorth, and the disposition digested already; there remainest no more to be done, but onely to set thereto the verses that must go to it. So that you see that the poets themselves reputed the things and deeds more necessary and important than words and speech. The samous courtizan Corinna one day reprooved Pindarus, who then was a yoong man, and tooke a great pride in himselfe, for his learning and knowledge: Thou hast no skill at all Pindarus (quoth she) in poetrie, for that thou does not invent and devise fables, which is indeed the proper and peculiar worke of poesie; as for thy tongue, it ministrest some retorical success, catachteses and metaphrases, songs, musicall measures and numbers, unto the matter and argument onely, as pleasant sauces to commend the same. Pindarus pondering well these 40 words and admonitions of hers, thought better of the matter, and thereupon out of his poeticall veine, powered out this canticle:

Imenus, or the launce with staffe of gold,
Sir Cadmus, or that sared race of old,
Which dragons teeth they say sometime did yeeld,
Of warriours brave, when sowen they were in field:
Or Hercules who was in such account,
And his maine sorce of body, to surmount, &e.

Which when he had thewed to Corima, the woman laughed a good, & faid: That corne should be sowen out of ones hand, and not immediately from out of the sull sake: for in trueth much go after this fort had Pindarus gathered and heaped up a miscellane deale of fables, and powred them foorth all huddle together in this one canticle. But that poesseconsisten much in the fine invention of fables, Plate himselfe hath written: and verily a fable or tale is a false narration, resembling that which is true, and therefore farre remote it is from the thing indeed, if it be so, that a narration is the image of an act done, & a fable the image or shadow of a narration. Whereupon this may be inferred, that they who devise and seigne fabulous deeds of armes, are so much inferiour to historiographers that make true reports, as historiographers who relate onely fuch deeds come behinde the actours and authours themselves. Certes this city of then had never any excellent or renowmed worke men in the feat of poetrie, no not lo much as in the Lyrick part thereof, which professeth musicall odes and songs: for Cynesias seemeth to have made his dithyrambes or canticles in the honor of Bacchus, hardly and with much ado, and was himfelfe barren and of no grace or gift at all , befides, he was fo mocked and flouted by the comical poets, that he grew to be of no reckoning and reputation, but incurred an ill and odiousname: As for that part of poetrie which dealeth in representation of personages in places upon a stage, fo small account they made at Athens of the Comedians and their professions naythey diffained and feorned it fo much, that a law there was enacted, forbidding exprefly, to that no fenatour of the counfell Areopague, might make a comedy : contratiwife, the trageodic flourished, and was in much request, for delivering the best care sport, and representing the most woonderfull spectacle that men in those daies could heare or behold; giving both unto fictions, & affections a deceiveable power, which was of fuch a propertie, according to the faying of Gorgias: That he who deceived thereby, was more just than he who deceived not; and he whowas deceived became wifer than he that was not deceived at all: the deceiver (I fay) was more just, because he performed that which he promised, and the deceived person wifer; for that fuch as are not altogether groffe, doltifh, and fenfleste, are soonest caught with the pleafure and delight of words.

To come now to the maine point: what profit ever brought these excellent trageedies unto the citie of Athens, comparable unto that which the prudent policie of Themssociets effected in causing the walles of the citie to be built? or to the vigilant care and diligence of Perioles, who adorned the castle and citadell with so many beautifull buildings; or to the valour of Multiades who delivered the citie from the danger of servitude; or to the brave minde of Cimon, who advanced that State to the soveraigntic and command of all Greece? If the learning of Euripides, the eloquence of Sophoeles, or the sweet and pleasant tongue of Aeschylus had freed them from any perils and extremities, or purchased and procured them any glory more than they had before, good reason peradventure it were, to compare poeticall fictions and inventions with warlike triumphs and trophæs; to set the theater against the generals pavilion and palace; and to oppose the schooling and teaching of plaiers how to act comedies and trageedies, unto prowests and trageedies. Will you that we bring in place the personages themsselves? carying with them the marks, badges & enfigues that teltific their deeds, and allow either of them entrance apart by themsselves, and passage along by us. Then let there march on the one side poets with their flutes, harps, lutes and viols, singing and saying:

Silence,mymasters, or all words of sing good:

Depart be must, there is no remedie, Our learning here who never understood, And hath no skill in play or tragædie:

Whose tongue's impure, or who in melodie And dance unexpret is, that doth helong puisant army upon the land. For he that would fet downe and cast accoumpt, how much every comædic cost them, shall find that the people of Athens spent more in exhibiting the tragedies of Baccha, Phenisse, of both the Oedipodes, & of Antigon, or in representing the calamities of Medea and Electra, than they disbutfed in their warrs against the Barbarians, either to win the foveraignty and dominion over them, or to defend their owne freedome and libertie: formany times their great captaines and commanders led foorth their fouldiers to battell, having made proclamation before, for to carrie with them fuch victuals as * required no fire for their drefsome expoid fing. This is certaine, that the captaines of gallies and war-ships, for their failers, having proving from their mariners, as well rowers as mentioned. failers, have to embarked them & gone to fea: whereas the wardens and Aediles who were to fet 10 forth plaies and dances have (to their great cost) fed their actors and plaiers with delicate eeles, with tender lectuces, with cloves of garlicke, and with good marrow-bones, feafting them along time before, most deintilie, and whiles they did nought els but exercise their voice, scowre their throats and elecretheir brefts, they made good cheerefull merrily. And what good had thefe wastefull spenders of their goods (spent about such vanities) in the end ? If their plaies spednor well, but loft the victorie, they were well mocked, hifled and laughed at for all their paines and cost: bottay they went away winners and having the better hand, what got they by it? furely not a trevet or threefooted stoole nor any other marke and monument of victorie, as Demetrius faid, but to remaine a lamentable example of unthrifts, who have laied all they had upon > tombs. This is the end that commeth of fuch expenses about poetrie; and no greater honour is to be looked for. Now on the other fide, let us beholde likewife their brave captaines and warriours: and while

these passe along,

There should indeed be silence or good words: They ought to void out of this company, Who idle live, and never drew their swords In field, or ferv'd with care and agonie In common weale : whose heart would never frand To such exploits, whose minde is eke profane, Who neither by Miltiades his hand, That flew the Medes nor by the Persians bane, Themistocles, was ever institute,

And sworne to lawes of knighthood resolute, Yearnary, heere (me thinks) I fee a martiall maske, and brave flew toward : fet out with fquadrons embatteled on land, with fleetes arranged for to fight at fea, loden and heavily charged with rich spoiles and glorious trophæes:

Alal' Alala, daughter deare,

Of bloudy warre, come foorth and heare. Behold and fee a forrest of pikes and launces in the fore-front, the very preamble and flourish 40 before the battell: me thinks I heare one of them refound: Embrace death most hardy knights, the best sacrifice and most fant oblations, that is, (for so faith Epaminondas the Thebane) fighting valiantly, and exposing your selves to the most honorable and bravest services that be in defence of countrey, of your auncestors tombes and sepulchers, and of your temples and religion: mee thinks also I see their victories, comming toward mee in solemne pompe and procession, not drawing or leading after them for their prize and reward, an ox or a goat; neither be the faid victories crowned with ivie, or fmelling strong of new wine in the lees, as the Bacchanales doe; but they have in their traine, whole cities, illands, continents, and firme lands, as wel mediterranean as maritime fea-coafts, together with new colonies of ten thousand men a piece, to be planted heere and there; and withall, crowned they be and adorned on eve- 50 ry side with trophas, with triumphes, pillage and booty of all forts; the ensignes, badges, and armes that these victorious captaines give; the images also that they represent in shew, be their stately & beautiful temples, as the Parthenon, the Hecatompedos, their city walles on the fouth fide, the accenals to receive & lodge their thips; their beautifull porches and galleties; the province of the demy ifle Chersonesus, & the city Amphipolis; as for the plaine of Marathon, it goeth before the laureat garland and victorie of Militades; Solanius accompanieth that of Themistoeles, trampling under his feet, and going over the broken timber and shipwracke of a thousand

veffels: as for the victory of Cimon, it bringeth with it an hundred Phænician great gallies, from the rivers Eurymedon: that of Demosthenes and Cleon, comes from Sphatteria, with the targuet of captaine Brasidas wonne in the field, and a number of his fouldiers captive and bound in chaines: the victory of Conon, walled the city, and that of Thrasibulus reduced the people with victorie and liberty from Phyle: the fundry victories of Aleibiades fet upright the State of the city, which by the infortunate overthrow in Sicilia, reeled, and was ready to fall to the ground; and by the battels fought by Nelem and Androelm in Lydia and Caria : Greece law all Jonia raifed up againe and supported. And if a man demand of each one of the other victories, what benefit hath accrued unto the city by them? one will name the ifle Lesbes, and another Sames: to one will speake of the Euxine sea, and another of five hundred gallies, and he shall have another talke of ten thousand talents; over and above the honour and glory of trophæes. These be the causes why this city doeth folemnize and celebrate so many fettivall daies, and heercupon it is that it offreth facrifices as it doeth to the gods; not iwis for the victory of Aefchylus or Sophoeles, nor for the prizes of poetry: no, nor when Carcinus lay with Aerope or * Alidamus with Thenames Hettor: But upon the fixth of May, even to this prefent day, the city holdeth fellivall the memory of that victory, in the plaines of Marathen: and the fixth day of [ another *] moneth, maketh a folemne offring of wine unto the gods, in remembrance of that victorie which Chabrias obtained neere unto the ifle Naxos: and upon the 12, day of the fame moneth, there is another facrifice likewife performed in the name of a thankes-giving to the gods, for their li-20 berty recovered, because upon the same day those citizens which were prisoners and in bondage within Phyle, came downcand returned into the city: upon the third day of March they wonnethe famous field of Plarea: and the fixteenth day of the faid March, they confecrated to Diana; for on that day this goddeffe shone bright, and it was full moone, to the victorious Greeks, before the ifle of Salamia. The noble victory which they archieved before the citie of Mantinea, made the twelfth day of September more holy, and with greater folemnity observed, for upon that day when all other their allies and affociates were discomfitted and put to flight, they onely by their valour wonne the field, and erected a tropha over their enemies who were upon the point of victory. See what hath raifed this city to fuch grandence! Lo what hath exalted it to fo high a pitch of honor! and this was the cause that Pindarus called the city of 20 Athens, the pillar that supported Greece; not for that by the tragedies of Phrynichus or Theshis, it fet the fortune of the Greeks upright, but in regard of this, that as himfelfe writeth in another place, along the coast of Artemisium:

And afterwards at Salamis, at Myeale, and Plataes, having fetled it firme and strong as upon a rocke of diamonds, they delivered it from hand to hand unto others.

But haply fome man will fay: True it is indeed, all that ever poets doe, are no better than sports and pastimes: But what say you to oratours, they seeme to have some prerogative and ought to be compared with martiall captaines; whereupon it may feeme, as Aefchynes feoffing 40 merily, and quipping at Demosphenes faid: That there is some reason why the barre or pulpit for publicke orations, may commence action and processe against the tribunal seat of generals, and their chaire of estate. Is it then meet and reasonable that the oration of Hyperides intituled Plataicus, should be preferred before the victory which Ariftides wonne before the city Plarea? or the oration of Lyses against the thirty tyrants, goe before the matsacre and execution of them performed by Thras bulus and Archias? or that of Aeschines against Timarchus, being accused for keeping harlots, and a brothell house, before the aide that Phocion brought into the city of Byzantium, belieged? by which fuccour he impeached the Macedonians, and reprefled their infolent vilanies and outrages committed in abufing the children of the Athenian confederates? or shall we compare the oration of Demosthenes as touching the crowne, with 50 those publicke and honorable coroners which Themistocles received for setting Greece free? confidering that the most excellent place of all the said oration, and fullest of eloquence is that wherein the faid oratour conjureth the foules of those their auncestors, and citeth them for witneffes, who in the battell of Marathon exposed their lives with such resolution for the fastie of Greece? or shall we put in balance to weigh against woorthy warriours, these that in schooles teachyoong men rhetoricke, namely, such as Isocrates, Antiphon, and Isano? But certeine it is, that this city honored those valiant captaines with publicke funerals, and with great devotion gathered up the reliques of their bodies; yea, and the fame oratour canonized them for gods in heaven, when he sware by them, although he followed not their steps: and I feer ates who extolled and highly praifed thole who manfully fought & willing were to fpend their harbloud in the battell of Marathon, faying, that they made fo little account of their lives, as if their owne foules had bene else where, & other mens in their bodies, magnifying this their resolution, and the finall reckoning which they made of this life; yet when himfelfe was very old, upon occafion that one asked him how he did: answered: I doe even as an aged man, (having above 90. yeeres upon my backe) may do; and who thinketh death to be the greatest misery in the world: and how waxed he thus old: certes, not by filing and tharpening the edge of his fword, not by and now waxed no thing the point of his fpeares head, not with feouring & forbiffing his headpieceor morion; not with bearing armes in the field; not by rowing in the gallies: but for footh with couching, knitting, and gluing as it were together rhetoricall tropes and figures; to wit, his anuibeta, confifting of contraries, his parifa, standing upon equal weight and measure of fyllables, his homooptasa, precifely observing the like termination, and falling even of his clautes, polithing, fmoothing, and peruling his periods and fentences, not with the rough hammer and pickax, but with the file and plainer most exactly. No marvell then, if the man could not abide the rulling of harneis, and clattering of armour; no marvell (I fay) if hee feared the thocke and encounter of two armies, who was afraid that one vowell (houldrunne upon another, and led he thould pronounce a clause or number of a sentence which wanted one poore fyllable : for the very morrow after that Milliades had wonne that field upon the plaines of Ms- 20 rathon, he returned with his victorious armie into the citie of Athens: and Pericles having vanquithed and fubdued the Samians within the space of nine moneths, gloried more than Agamemnon did, who had much adoe to winne Troie, at the tenth yeeres end: whereas sources spent the time well necre of three, Olympiades in penning one oration which hee called Panegiriem: notwithstanding all that long time, he never served in the warres, nor went in anyembuffage: he built no city, nor was fent out as a captaine of a galley and warre-fhip, and yetthat verie timebrought foorth infinit warres : But during the space that Timetheus delivered the islle Eubaa out of bondage; all the while that Chabrias warred at sea about the island Naxes, and Iphicrates defeited and hewed in pieces one whole regiment of the Lacedæmonians, neere the port of Lechaum, and in which time the people of Athens having enfranchifed all cities, en. 30 dued Greece throughout with the same libertie of giving voices in the generall assemblie of the States, as they had themselves, hee fat at home in his house porting at his booke, seekingout proper phrases and choise words for the said oration of his; in which space, Perieles raised great porches, and the goodly temple Hecasompedes; and yet the comicall poet Craimus, fcoffing even at this Pericles, for that he went but flowly about his works, speaketh thus as touching his wal, halfe done and halfe vindone:

Inwords long fince our Peticles, hathrear d us up a wall, But in effect and very deed, he doth nothing at all.

Consider now I pray you a little, the base minde of this great professor of rhetoricke, who spent the ninth part of his life, in composing of one onely oration: but were it meet and reasonable to compare the orations of Demostheres as he was an oratour, with the martiall exploits of Demostheres being a captaine; namely, that which he made against the considerate folly of Conon, with the trophees which himselfe erected before Pylos, or that which hee wrote against Amarhuss as concerning slaves, with his woorthy service, whereby hee brought the Lacedzmonians to be slaves: neither in this respect, for that he composed one oration for the graunting of free bourgestero those who were newly come to inhabit Athens, therefore hedesered as much honour as Alcibrades did, who combined the Mantineaus and Elians in one league to be affociates with the Athenians against the Lacedæmonians:

and yet this must needs be confessed, that his publicke orations deserved this praise, that in his Philippiques, he inciteth the Athenians to take armes, and commendeth the enterprise

The Summarie.

N this Academicke declamation, Plutarch in the first places alledgeth the reasons which attribute more prosit unto water. Secondly, heproposeth those that are in favor of the fire: whereunto bee seemeth the rather to encline, although hee resolveth not: wherein he followeth his owne maner of philosophizing upon naturall causes; namely, not to disfute either for or against onething: leaving unto the reader his owne libertie, to settle unto that which he shall see to be more probable.

WHETHER OF THE TWAINE is more profitable, Fire or Water.

He water is of all things be ft, And golde like fire is in request.

Thus faid the poet Pindarm: whereby it appeareth evidently, that he gives the fecond place unto fire. And with him accordeth Heford when he faith:

Chaos was the formost thing In all the world that had being.

For this iscetteine, that the most part of ancient philosophers called water by the name of Chios, ಹೌತಿಗೆಯೆಂಡ್, that is to say, for that it followeth so easily. But it we should stand onely upon testimonics about this question, the proofe would be caried equally on both sides: for that there be in maner as many who thinke fire to be the primitive element and principle of all things, and the very 40 feed which as of it felfe it produceth all things, fo it receiveth likewife all into it felfe, in that univerfall conflagration of the world. But leaving the testimonies of men, let us consider apart the reasons of the one and the other, and see to whether side they will rather draw us. First therefore, to begin withall, may not this be laied for a ground? that a thing is to be judged more profitable, whereof we have at all times and continually need, and that in more quantitie than another? as being a toole or necessarie instrument, and as it were a friend at all seasons and every houre, and fuch as a man would fay, presenteth it selfe evermore to doe us service? As for fire, certeinly, it is not alwaies commodious unto us; nay, contrariwife, it otherwhiles doth moleft and trouble us; and in that regard we withdraw our felves farre from it : whereas water ferveth our turnes both in Winter and Summer, when wee are ficke, and when wee are whole, by 50 night and by day; neither is there any time or feafon, wherein a man standeth in no need of it. And this is the reason that they call the dead, anisarras, as one would say, and answer that is to say, without juice, or wanting moisture, and so by consequence deprived of life. Moreover, without fire a man hath oft continued a long time, but without water never. And withall, that which hathbene from the first beginning and creation of man, is more profitable than that which was invented afterwards. And there is no question, but that nature hath given us the one, to wit, water, for our necessarieuse; but the other (I meane fire) either fortune or industrie hath devifed and found out as an appendant and acceffarie. Neither can it be faid, what time of the world 00003

it was when as man had no water: nor ever read we in any records that one of the gods or demigods was the inventer therof; for it was at the very inftant with them: nay, what and we fay that it gave them their being? But the use of fire was but yesterday or the other day, to speake of, found out by Prometheus: fo that the time was when as men lived without fire; but void of water, our life never was. Now that this is no devised poeticall fiction, this daily and present life of ours doth plainly testifie: for there be at this day in the world divers nations that are mainteined without fire , without house , without hearth or chimney diving abroad in the open wide aire. And Diogenes the Cynicke, feldome or never had any use of fire, infomuch as having upon a time swallowed downe a polype fish raw: Loe (quoth he) my masters, how for your sake we put our felves in jeopardie: howbeit, without water there was never any man thought that either we to might live honeflly and civilly, or that our nature would possibly endure it. But what need is there that I should particularize thus, and go so neere, as to search farre into the nature of man? confidering that whereas there be formany, or rather fo infinit kinds of living creatures, mankinde onely in a maner knoweth the use of fire: whereas all the rest have their nourishment and food without the benefit of fire. Those that brouse, feed, flie and creepe, get their living by eatingherbes, roots, fruits and flesh, all without fire : but without water there is not one that can live, neither going or creeping on the land nor swimming in the sea, nor yet flying in the aire, True itis, I mult needs fay, that Ariflotle writeth, how some beafts there be, even of those that devoure flesh, which never drunke; but in very trueth, nourished they be by some moisture; Well then, that is more profitable without which no maner of life can confust or endure. Pro-20 ceed we farther, & paffe from those living creatures which use to feed upon plants & fruits, even unto the fame that are by us & them used for food: Some of them there be, which have no heat at all: others so little, as it can not be perceived. Contrariwise, moissure is that which causeth all kind of feeds to chit, to bud, to grow, and in the end to bring forth fruit: for what need I to alledge for this purpose either wine and oile or other liquors which we draw, presse out, or milke forth out of beafts paps, which we do fee dayly before our cies? confidering that even our wheat which seemeth to be adrie nuttiment, is engendred by the transmutation, putrefaction and diffusion of moisture. Furthermore, that is to be held more profitable, which bringeth withit no hurt nor dammage: but we all know that fire, if it breake forth, get head and be at libertie, is the most pernicious thing in the world; wheras the nature of water of it felfe doth never any harme, 30

Againe, of two things, that is held to be more commodious which is the simpler, and without preparation can yeeld the profit which it hath : but fire requireth alwaies fome fuccour and matter, which is the reason that the rich have more of it than the poore, and princes than private persons; whereas water is so kind and courteous, that it giveth it selfe indifferently to all sorts of people: it hath no need at all of tooles or instruments to prepare it for use; compleat and perfect it is in it selfe, without borowing ought abroad of others. Over and besides, that which be ing multiplied as it were and augmented, loseth the utilitie and profit that it had, is by consequence leffe profitable: and fuch is fire, refembling herein a ravenous wild beaft, which devourethand confumeth all that it commeth neete; in fo much as it were by the industrie and artificiall meanes of him who knoweth how to use it with moderation, rather than of the ownena-40 ture, that it doth any good at all 3 whereas water is never to be feared. Againe, of two things, that which can do good being both alone, and also in the company of the other, is the more profitable of the twaine: but fo it is, that fire willingly admitteth not the fellowship of water, nor by the participation thereof is any way commodious; whereas water is together with fire profitable, as we may see by the fountaines of hot water how they be medicinable, and verie sensibly is their helpe perceived. Never shall a man meet with any fire moist; but water as well hot as colde is ever more profitable to man. Moreover, water being one of the foure elements hath produced as one may fay, a fift, to wit the sea, and the same well neere as profitable as any one of the rest for many other causes besides, but principally in regard of commerce and trafficke. For whereas before time, mans life was favage, and they did not communicate one with another; this ele-50 menthath conjoined and made it perfect, bringing focietie and working amitte among men by mutuall fuccours and reciprocall retributions from one to the other. Heracittus faith in one place: if there were no funne, there had beene no night; and even as well may it be faid; Were it not for the fea, man had beene the most favage creature; the most penurious and needic, yea and the least respected in all the world: whereas now this element of the sea hath brought the vine out of the Indians as farre as Greece; and from Greece hath transported it unto the farthest provinces: likewise from out of Phanicia, the use of letters for preservation of the memorie of things: ithath brought wine: it hath conveighed fruits into these parts, and hath beene the cause that the greatest portion of the world was not buried in ignorance. How then can it becotherwise, that water should not be more profitable, since it surnished us with another element?

But on the contrarie fide, peradventurea man may begin hereupon to make instance oppofitely in this manner: faying, that God, as a mafter-workeman having the foure elements before him, for to frame the fabricke of this world withall; which being repugnant and refuting one another, earth and water were put beneath, as the matter to be formed and fashioned; receiving order and disposition, yea and a vegetative power to engender and breed such as is imparted unto it by the other two, aire and fire, which are they that give forme and fashion unto them, yea and excite the other twaine to generation, which otherwise had lien dead without any motion. But of these two, fire is the chiefe and hath dominion, which a man may evidently know by this induction. For the earth if it be not enchasted by some hot substance, is barren, & bringeth forth nofruit: but when as fire spreadeth it selfe upon it, it insufeth into it a certaine power, which causeth it to swell (as it were) and have an appetite to engender. For other cause there can bee nonerendred why rocks, clifts, and mountaines be barren and drie, but this, that they have either no fire at all, or else participate verie little the nature thereof: in summe, so farre off is water from being of it felfe sufficient for the owne preservation or generation of other things, that without the aide of fire it is the cause of the owne ruine and destruction. For heat it is that keepeth water 20 in good estate, and preserveth it in her nature and proper substance, like as it doth all things besides: and looke where fire is away or wanteth, there water doth corrupt and putrifie; in such fort as the ruine and destruction of water, is the default of heat, as we may evidently see in pools, marishes, and standing waters, or whereforeer water is kept within pits and holes without iffue; for fuch waters in the end become putrified and flinke againe, because they have no motion, which having this propertie to ftirre up the naturall heat which is in everiething, keepeth those waters better which have a current and runne apace, in that this motion preferveth that kind heat which they have, And hereupon it is, that To live, in Grocke is expressed by (iv, for that few fig. fieth to boile. How then can it otherwise be, that of two things it thould not be more profitable which giveth being and effence to the other, like as fire doth unto water? Furthermore, that 30 thing, the utter departure whereof is the cause that a creature dieth, is the more profitable: for this is certaine and manifest, that the same without which a thing cannot bee, hath eiven the cause of being unto the same when it was with it. For we do see that in dead things there is a moisture, neither are they dried up altogether; for otherwise moist bodies would not putrifie, confidering that putteraction is the turning of that which is drie to be moult, or rather the corruption of humours in the flesh; and death is nothing else but an utter defect and extinction of heat: and therefore dead things be extreme cold, infomuch as if a man should fet unto them the very edge of rafours, they are enough to dull the fame through excessive cold. And we may see plainely, that in the veriebodies of living creatures, those parts which participate least of the nature of fire, are more fenselesse than any other, as bones and haire, and such as be farthest 40 remooved from the heart: and in manner all the difference that is betweene great and fmall creatures, proceedeth from the prefence of fire, more or leffe: for humiditie fimply it is not, that bringeth forth plants and fruits; but warme humiditie is it that doth the deed: whereas cold waters be either barren altogether, or not verie fruitful and fertill; and yet if water were of the owne nature fructuous, it must needs follow, that it felfe alone and at all times should be able to produce fruit: whereas we fee it is cleane contrarie; namely, that it is rather hurtfull to fruits.

And now to reason from another head and go another way to worke, to make use of fire as it is fire, need wee have not of water; nay, it hutteth rather, for it quencheth and putterh it out cleane: on the other side many there be who cannot tell what to doe with water without fire, for being made hot it is more profitable, and otherwise in the ownek inde huttfull. Of two things 50 therefore, that which can do good of it selfe without need of the others helpe, is better and more profitable. Moreover water yeeldeth commodity but after one fort onely, to wit, by touching, as when we seele it or wash and bathe with it: whereas fire serveth all the five senses & doth them good: for it is felt both neere at hand and also seene a farte of: so that among other meanes that it hath of profiting, no man may account the multiplicity of the uses that it affoordeth: for that a man should be at any time without fire it is impossible: nay be cannot have his first generation without it: and yet there is a difference in this kinde, as in all other things. The very sea it selses made more commodious by hear, so as it doth heat more by the agitation and current that it hath, than any other waters: for of it felfe otherwise it differeth not. Also for such as have no need of outward fire, we may not fay that they stand in need of none at all ; but the reason is because they have plenty and store of naturall heat within them; so that in this very point, the commodity of fire ought to be efteemed the more. And as for water, it is never in that good state, but some need it hath of helpe without: whereas the exellencie of fire is such, as it is content with it felle, and requireth not the aid of the other. Like as therefore, that captaine is to be reputed more excellent, who knowes to order and furnish a citie so as it hath no need of forcen allies; fo we are to thinke that among elements, that is the woorthier, which may often times confift without the fuccour and aide of another. And even as much may be faid of living creatures, which have least need of others helpe. And yet haply it may be replied contrariwife, that the thing is more profitable which we use alone by it selfe, namely, when by discourse of reason we are able to chule the better. For what is more commodious and profitable to men than reafon? and yet there is none at all in brute beafts. And what followeth heereupon ? Shall weinferre therefore that it is leffe profitable, as invented by the providence of a better nature, which is god ? But since we are fallen into this argument : What is more profitable to mans life than arts? but there is no art which fire devised not, or at least wise doth not maintaine: And hereupon it is, that we make Vulsan the prince and mafter of all arts. Furthermore, whereas the time and space of life is very short that is given unto man, as short as it is, yet sleepe as, Ariston laith, like unto a falle baily or publicane, taketh the halfe thereof for it felfe. True it is, that a man may lie awake, and not fleepe all night long; but I may aswell say that his waking would serve him in 20 small stead, were it not that fire presented unto him the commodities of the day, and put a difference betweene the darkenesse of the night and the light of the day. If then there be nothing more profitable unto man than life, why should we not judge fire to be the best thing in the world, fince it doth augment and multiply our life? Over and befides, that of which the five fenfes participate most, is more profitable: but evident it is, that there is not one of the faid fenses makethule of the nature of water apart and by it selfe, unlesse some aire or fire be tempered with it: whereas every fenfe findeth benefit of fire as of a vivificant power and quickening vertue: and principally our fight above the rest, which is the quickest of all the senses in the bodie, as being the very flame of fire, a thing that conformeth us in our faith and beliefe of the gods and as Plato faith, by the meanes of our fight we are able to conforme our foule to the motions of 20 celestiall bodies.

OF THE PRIMITIVE OR FIRST COLD.

The Summarie.

The have heere another declaration of Plutacch, wherein he examineth and disusses any after the maner of the Academicke philosophers, without deciding or determining any thing, a natural guession as souching Primitive colde. And in the very first entries thereof refute the bose who are of opinion that this sirst colde is the privation of heat: there and not as privation unto habitude. Then proceedeth he to dispute of the essence nature, and so function of this colde: for the cleering of which point, he examineth at large three opinions: the sirst, of the Stoicks, who attributes the primitive colde unto are: the second, of Empedocles and Chrysip Pus, who ascribe the cause thereof unto water. Unto all their reasons and arguments he maketh answer, and medineth to a third opinion; namely, that earth is that primitive colde. Which position he confirmenth by divers arguments, yet resolved he not, but leaveth it to the discretion of Phavotinus, unto whom he writeth, for to conferre all the reasons of the one part and the other, without resting in any particular opinion, supposing that to suffeed and hold his judgement in matters obscure and uncertaine, is the wifer part of a philosopher, than to yeeld and grant his consent either to one part or the other. Wherein we may see, that in regard of naturall philosophie, our authour was of the Academicks seet: but at touching the morall part, we have seene before, and specially in divers treatises of the sommer tome, that he followesh of all the ancient philosophers, those who were least impure and corrupt, such to meant, as in all their discourses had no other light to direct them, but R ature.

S there then (ô Phavorinus) a certaine primitive power and fubflance of cold, like as fire is of heat, by the prefence and participation whereof, ech one of the other things is faid to be cold? or rather are we to hold and fay, that cold is the privation of heat, like as darknes of light, and flation of mooving 3 and namely, confidering that cold is flationarie and heat motive? and the cooling of things which were hot, is not done by the entrance of any cold power, but by the departure of freat? for as foone as it is once gone, that which remaineth is altogether cooled; and the verie vapour and fleim which feething waters doe yeeld, paffeth away together

20 with the heat, which is the reason that refrigeration diminisheth the quantitie therof, in as much as it chafeth that heat which was, whithout the entrance of any other thing into the place? Or rather, may not this opinion be suspected? first and formost for that it overthroweth and taketh away many powers and puiffances, as if they were not qualities and habitudes really fublitting, but onely the privations and extinctions of qualities and habitudes: as for example, heavinefle of lightnesse, hardnesse of softnesse, blacke of white, bitter of sweete, and so of other semblablethings, according as ech one is in puissance contrarie unto an other and not as privation is opposite unto habit? Moreover, for as much as everie privation is idle and wholy without action, as blindnesse, deafnesse, filence and death, for that these bee the departures of formes, and the abolitions of substances, and not certaine natures nor reall substances 30 apart by themselves. We see that cold after it be entred and imprinted (as it were) within the bodie, breedeth no fewer nor leffe accidents & alterations than doth heat; confidering that many things become stiffe and congealed by cold, many things I fay, are staited, retained and thickened by the meanes thereof: which confiftence and stabilitie unapt to stirre and hard to bee moved, is not therefore idle, but it is weightie and firme, having a force and power to arrest and to hold in. And therefore privation is a defect and departure of a contrarie power; whereas many things be cooled, although they have plentic of heat within: and some things there be, which cold doth constraine and constipate so much the more, as it findeth them hotter, like as we may observe in iron red hot, when by quenching it becommet the harder. And the stoickephilofophers doe hold that the naturall fpirits enclosed within the bodies of yoong infants lying in 40 the wombe, by the cold of the ambient aire environing them about is hardened (as it were) and refined, and so changing the nature becommeth a soule. But this is a nice point and verie disputable; yet confidering that we see cold to be the efficient cause of many other effects, there is no reason to thinke that it is a privation. Furthermore, privation is not capable of more or lesse; for fo of twaine that fee not at all, the one is not more blind than the other: and of two who cannot speake, one is not more dombe than another; neither of twaine who live not, is one more dead than the other: but among cold things we may well admit more & leffe: overmuch and not overmuch, and generally, intentions and remiffions like as in those things that are hot, and therefore ech matter according as it suffreth more or leffe, by contrarie puissances produceth of it selfe some substances, cold and hot, more or lesse than others, for mixture and compositi-50 on there can be none of habitude with privation; neither is there any power which receiveth or admitteth the contrary unto it, to bring a privation, nor ever maketh it her companion, but yeeldeth and giveth place unto it. But contrariwife, cold continueth very well, as it is mixed with heat, unto a certeine degree; like as blacke with white colours; base notes with small and shill; sweet favours, with tart & austere; and by this affociation, mixture & accord of colours, founds, drogues, favours, and tafts; there are produced many compositions exceeding plea fant and delectable: for the opposition which is betweene habitude and privation, is alwaies a oddes and enmity, without any meanes of reconciliation, confidering that the effence and bee ing of the one, is the destruction of the other: whereas that fight which is occasioned by contrary powers, if it meet with fit time and leafon, ferveth oftentimes in good flead unto arts, and to nature much more, as well in other productions and procreations, as in changes and alterations of the aire: for in the orderly governance and rule whereof, God who difpenfeth and disposeth them, is called Harmonicall and Musicall; not in regard that he maketh a friendly accord betweene base and treble, or a loving medly of white and blacke, but for that by his providence he ordereth fo well the accord and difcord of the elementary heat & cold of the world, that in a certaine moderation, and without excelle they ftrive, and yet are reconciled agame, by taking from the one and the other that which was excessive and reducing them both in fuch a temperature and estate as apperteineth. Semblably, a man may sensibly seelecold as 10 well as hee doth heat; whereas you shall never see, heare, or touch, nor by any other sense perceive a privation, for it need to have some substance with it that doth affect the senses, and where there appeareth no fubftance, there we must suppose a privation, which is as it were the deniall of substance, like as blindnesse is the negation of sight; silence, of voice; void emptineffe, of a body: for never shall one perceive voidneffe by the tenfe of feeling; but where there is not a body to be touched, there we must suppose is vacuity: neither doe we heare silence, but when we heare no noise at all, then we understand there is silence: the like we are to say of those who are blinde, of the naked and difarmed, there is no fenfe of fuch privations, but rather a barre and negative of fenfe; and even fo, we should have no feeling and perceiverance of cold, but onely where there wanted heat, there we should have imagined cold to be, in case it were no- 20 thing elfe but a deprivation of heat; but if it be fo, that like as heat is felt by the warmth of the skinne, and diffusion or dilatation of the flesh; even so is cold also by the aftriction & condenfation thereof, therefore it appeareth evidently, that it hath a proper, principle, and particular fource, as well as heat: over and befides, in every kind, privation is one and fimple, but fubfiances have many differences, and as many powers and faculties, for filence is never but after one fort, whereas the voice is divers, one while troublefome, another while delightfome. Senses, colours, and figures femblably have like differences, which difpofe and affect diverfly the subject which they approchanto, but that which is not palpable, not coloured, and generally not qualified with any quality, hath no divertitie, but is ever alike. Now then, doth this cold refemble these privatives in such fort, as it worketh no diversitie in the accidents thereof? Or rather is 30 it cleane otherwise? for as sometimes there come unto bodies great and profitable pleasures by cold, so contrariwise it findeth as much hurt, as great displeasure, trouble, and encombrance thereby: by the offensive qualities whereof, the naturall heat of the body is not alwaies chaced quite foorth and cleane gone, but oftentimes being pent and reftreined within the body, it fighteth and maketh refiftance, which combat of two contraries, is called horrour, quaking or trembling; but when the faidheat is altogether vanquished, there must needs ensue a benumming and congelation of the body, but if heat get the victorie, it bringeth a certeine warmth and dilatation with pleafure, which Homer by a proper tearing calleth in the whereby it appecrethevidently unto every man, and as much by these accidents it is manifest, or rather more, than by any other arguments, that cold is opposit unto heat, as one substance to another, or as 40 pallion to passion; but not as privation to habitude, or negation to affirmation; and that it is nor the corruption or utter destruction of heat, but a nature and puissance active by it selfeand powerfull, to corrupt and destroy: for if it were not so, wee must not have winter to bee one of tower featons of the yeere; nor the north winde one of the fower windes; as if the one were but a privation of the hotte featon, and the other of the fouth winde, and we shall be driven to fay, that they have no proper fource and peculiar principle: howbeit there being in the univerfall world fower principall bodies, which in regard of their pluralitie, fimple nature and puillance, most men call the elements, and suppose them to be the principles of all other bodies, to wit, fire, water, aire, and earth, it followeth by necessary consequence, that there be also fower primitive and simple qualities: and which be they, if they be not heat, cold, moissure, 50 and drinefle? by the meanes whereof, the faid elements, both doe and fufferall things interchangeably? And like as in the elements and principles of Grammar, which be the letters, there be brieves and longs; like as also in musicke notes, there is high and lowe, base, and treble, and one of these is not the privation of the other; even so we are to thinke, that in these naturall bo dies of the elements, there be contrarieties of moilture against drinesse, and of colde against heat, if we will believe either reason or outward sense: or else we must say as old Anaximenes was of opinion; that there is nothing hot or colde abfolutely in substance; but wee must confidently thinke that these be common passions of the matter comming, and occasioned after mutations: for he affirmeth that the thing which is pent, conftrict, and thickned in any matter, the fame is colde, and that which openeth & relaxeth it felfe, for so he useth this proper tearing sand therefore it is not without fome reason, that we commonly say, that a man bloweth both hot and cold out of his mouth; for the breath is cooled when it is preffed close betweene the lippes, but iffuing foorth of the mouth all open, it is hot by reason of the raritie and laxity thereof: howbeit, Aristotle faith; that it was meere ignorance in him thus to fay: For that when we breath with our mouthes wide open, wee let foorth the hot aire that is within us, but when we make a blaft with our lippes together, we blow not out the breath that arifeth from to our felves, but drive that aire from us that is before our mouth, which is cold, & felt before the other that commeth out of us. Seeing then that upon necessitie enforced by fo many reasons, we must admit a substance of colde and heat, proceed we and continue our first intent to search what is the fubstance, nature, and fountaine of the foresaid primitive colde? They then who fav that flarknesse and stiffenesse for colde, trembling and quaking of the body, and the staring and standing of haires upright, and such like accidents and passions, are occasioned by certeme triangular formes with unequal fides which are within our bodies, although they faile and miffe the marke in particularity: yet foit is, that they fetch the beginning from whence they should, for furely the foundation and original of this inquifition ought to be drawen as it were from the goddeffe Vesta, after the common proverbe, even from the universall nature of all things. And 20 hecrein it secmeth, that a philosopher most of all differeth from an empiricke physician, a husbandman, a minstrell, and other such particular artificers, whom it suffiseth to know and understand the last and conjunct causes. For so it be, that a physician doe comprehend the neerest and next cause of his patients malady, for example, of an ague, that it is a shooting orfalling of the bloud out of the veines into the arteries; and the husbandman conceive that the cause of blafting or Maying his corne, is an hot gleame of the funne after a shower of raine; and the plaier upon the fluites comprile the reason of the base found, is the bending downward of his instrument, or the bringing of them one neere unto another: it is sufficient for any of these to proceed to their proper worke and operation: But a naturall philosopher who searcheth into the trueth of things, onely for meere knowledge and speculation, maketh not the know-30 ledge of these last causes the end, but rather taketh from them his beginning, and arifeth from them to the primitive and highest causes. And therefore well did Plato and Democritue, who fearching into the causes of heat and of heavinesse, staicd not the course of their inquisition, when they came to fire and earth, but referring and reducing things fenfible unto intelligible principles, proceeded forward, and never stated untill they came unto the least parcels as it were to the smallest seeds and principles thereof. Howbeit, better it were first to handle and discusse these sensible things, wherein Empedocles, Straton, and the Stoicks do repose the effences of all powers: the Stoicks attributing the primitive colde unto aire, but Empedocles and Straton unto water: and another peradventure would inppose the earth rather to be the fubstantiall subject of cold. But first let us examine the opinions of these 40 before named. Confidering then that fire is both hot and shining ; it must needs be that the nature of that which is contrarie unto it, should be colde and darke: for obscuritie is opposite unto brightneffe, like as cold to heat: and like as darkneffe and obscuritie doth confound and trouble the fight; even so doth colde the sense of feeling: whereas heat doth dilate the sense of him that toucheth it, like as elecrenesse the fight of him that seeth it: and therefore we must needs fay, that the thing which is principally darke and miltie, is likewife colde in nature. But that the aire above all things els is dimme and darke, the very poets were not ignorant: for the aire they call darkenesse, as appeareth by these verses of Homer:

For why, the aire stood thicke the shows about,

And no moone shine from heaven showed throughout.

50 And in another place:

The aire anon he foone diffatch's, and miss did drive away: With thus, the sunne stone out full bright, and battell did display.

And hereupon it is, that men call the aire wanting light 30 season as one would say, xwire edus, that is to say, void of light: and the grosse aire which is gathered thicke together, rise @, by way of privation of all light. Airealso is called $200 and $200 s, that is to say, a mill: and looke what things foever hinder our fight, that we cannot fee thorow, be differences all of the aire; and that part of it which can not be seene and hath no colour, is called alone, that is to say, and it, invisible, azeror, which is as much to say, as azeros, for want of colour. Like as therefore the aire remaineth darke, when the light is taken from it; even so when the heat is gone, that which remaineth, is nothing but colde aire. And therefore, such aire by reason of coldnesse, is named Tartaru, which Hestodus seemeth to infinuate by these words, and processing that is to say, the airie Tartarus; and to tremble and quake for cold, he expresseth by this verbe, represelent. These are the reasons allodged in this behalte. But forasimuch as corruption is the change of anything into the contrary, let us confider whether it be truely faid, The death of fire is the birth of aire? For fire dieth as living creatures, either quenched by force, or by languishing and going 10 out of it selfe. As for the violent quenching and extinction thereof, it sheweth evidently, that it turneth into aire: for smoake is a kinde of aire, and according as Pindarus writeth,

The vapour of the aire thicke,

Is wont against the smoake to kicke. And not onely that, but we may see also that when a slame beginneth to die for want of nourishment, as in lamps and burning lights, the very top and head thereof doth vanish and resolve into a darke and obscure aire: and this may sufficiently be perceived, by the vapour which after we are bathed or fit in a flouph, flieth and fleimeth up along our bodies, as allo by that fmoake which arifeth by throwing cold water upon; namely, that heat when it is extinguithed, is converted into aire, as being naturally opposite unto fire: whereupon it followeth necessarily, that 20 the aire was fulf darke and cold. But that which is more, the most violent and forcible impress. on inhodies by cold, is congealation, which is a passion of water, & action of the aire; for water of it felfe is given to forcad and flow, as being neither folide nor compact and faft by nature; but hard it becommeth, thicke also and stiffe, when it is thrust close to by the aire, and cold together comming betweene: and therefore thus we fay commonly: If after South, the North-winde straight do blow,

We Shall be fure anon to have some snow. For the South winde prepareth the matter which is moisture, and the aire of the North winde comming upon it, doth frize and congeale the same: which appeareth manifestly in snow, for no fooner hath it evaporated and exhaled a little the thinne and colde aire in it, but immediatly 30 it resolveth and runneth to water. And Aristotle writeth, that plates and pluminets of lead doe melt and resolve with the cold and rigor of Winter, so soone as water only commeth unto them and be frozen upon them. And the aire (as it should seeme) by pressing such bodies together with colde, breaketh and knappeth them afunder. Moreover, the water that is drawen out of a well or fpring, is fooner frozen and turned to ice, than any other, for that the airchath more power over a little water, than a great deale. And if a man draw up a small quantitie of water in a bucket out of a pit or well, and let the fame downe againe into the well, yet to, as the veffell touch not the water, but hang in the aire, and so continue there but a while, that water will be much colder than that which is in the bottome of the well: whereby it appeareth manifeltly, that the primitive cause of cold, is not in water, but in aire. And that so it is, the great rivers will testifie, 40 which never are frozen to the bottome, because the aire is not able to pierce and enter so low, but as much as it can take holde of with the colde, either in touching or approching neere unto it, so much it frizeth and congealeth. And this is the reason that Barbarians when they are to paffe great rivers frozen over with ice, fend out foxes before the: for if the ice he not thicke, but Superficiall, the foxes hearing the noise of the waterrunning underneath, returne backe againe. Some also that are disposed to fish, do thaw and open the ice with casting hot water upon it, and fo let downe their lines at the hole; for then will the fifthes come to the bait and bite. Thus it appeareth that the bottome of the river is not frozen, although the upper face thereof fland all over with an ice, and that fo strong, that the water thereby drawen and driven in so hard, is able to cruth and breake the boats and veffels within it; according as they make credible relation unto 50 us, who now doe winter upon the river Donow with the emperour, And yet, without all these farre-fet examples, the very experiments that we finde in our owne bodies, doe testifieno lesse: for after much bathing or fweating, alwaies we are more colde and chill; for that our bodies being then open and refolved, we receive at the pores, cold together with aire in more abundance. The fame befalleth into water it felfe, which both fooner cooleth and groweth also colder after it hath beene once made hot : for then more subject it is to the injurie of the aire : considering also that even they who fling and cast up scalding water into the aire, do it for no other purpose, but to mingle it with much aire. The opinion then of him, O Phavorinu, who affigueth the first cause of cold unto aire, is founded upon such reasons and probabilities as these. As for him who ascribeth it unto water, he laieth his ground likewise upon such principles : for in this maner writeth Empedocles:

Beholde the Sunne how bright alwaies, and hot he is beside, But raine is ever blacke and darke, and colde on every side.

For in oppofing cold to heat, as blackneffe unto brightneffe, he giveth us occasion to collect to and inferre, that as heat and brightneffe belong to one and the fame fubstance, even so cold and blackneffe to another. Now that the blacke hew proceedeth not from aire, but from water, the very experience of our outward fenfes is able to proove : for nothing waxeth blacke in the aire, but every thing in the water. Do but cast into the water and drench therein a locke of wooll or peece of cloth beit never so white, you shal when you take it foorth againe, see it looke blackish, and so will it continue, untill by hear the moisture be fully sucked up and dried, or that by the preffe or some waights it be squeized out. Marke the earth, when there falleth a showre of raine, how every place whereupon the drops fall, seemes blacke, and all the rest beside retaineth the fame colour that it had before. And even water it felfe, the deeper that it is, the blacker hew it hath, because there is more quantity of it: but contrariwise, what part soever thereof is neere

Confider among other liquid fubstances, how oile is most transparent, as wherein there is most aire: for proofe wherof, see how light it is; and this is it which causeth it to swim above all other liquors, as being carried aloft by the meanes of airc. And that which more is, it maketh acalme in the sea, when it is flung and sprinkled upon the waves, not in regard of the slipery smoothnesse, whereby the windes do glide over it and will take no hold, according as Aristosle faith; but for that the waves being beaten with any humor whatfoever, will fpred themselves and ly even; and principally by the meanes af oile, which hath this speciall and peculiar property above all other liquors, that it maketh clere, and giveth meanes to fee in the bottome of the waters, forthat humidity openeth and cleaveth when aire comes in place: and not onely yeel-30 dethacleere light within the fea to Divers who fifth ebb in the night for fpunges, and plucke them from the rocks whereto they cleave, but also in the deepest holes thereof, when they spure it out of their mouths, the aire then is no blacker than the water, but leffe colde: for triall heerof, looke but upon oile, which of all liquors having most aire in it, is nothing cold at all, and if it frize at all, it is but gently, by reason that the aire incorporate within it, will not suffer it to gather and congeale hard: marke worke men also and artisanes, how they doe not dippe and keepe their needles, buckles, and claspes, or other such things made of iron, in water, but in oile, for feare left the excessive colde of the water would marre and spoile them quite. I Rand the more hecreupon, because I thinke it more meet to debate this disputation by such proofes, rather than by the colours; confidering that fnowe, haile, and ice, are exceeding 40 white and cleere, and with all most colde; contrariwise, pitch is hotter than hony, and yet you fee it is more darke and duskith. And heere I cannot chuse but woonder at those who would needs have the aire to be colde, because for footh it is darke; as also that they consider not how others take and judge it hot, because it is light: for tenebrositie and darknesse be not so familiar and necre cousens unto colde, as ponderositie and unweldinesse be proper thereto; for many things there be altogether void of heat, which not withflanding are bright and cleere: but there is no coldething light and nimble, or mounting upward; for clouds the more they stand upon the nature of the aire, the higher they are caried and flie aloft, but no sooner resolve they into a liquid nature and substance, but incontinently they fall and loofe their lightnesse and agilitic, no leffe than their heat, when colde is engendred in them: contrariwife, when heat commeth 50 in place, they change their motion against to the contrary, and their substance mounterh upward to foone as it is converted into aire. Neither is that supposition true as touching corruption; for every thing that perisheth is not transmuted into the contrary: but the tructh is, all things are killed and die by their contrary: for so fire being quenched by fire turneth into aire. And to this purpose Aeschylus the poer faid truely, although tragically, when hee called water the punishment of fire, for these be his words:

999

And Homer in a certaine battell opposed Vulcane to the river, and with Neptune matched pollo, not fo much by way of fabulous fiction, as by phylicall and naturall reason: and as for Archilochus, a wicked woman, who meant cleane contrary to that which the faid and thewed, wrote elegantly in this wife:

The crafty queane in right hand water cold,

And in the left, hot fire did closely hold. And among the Perfians the most effectuall maner of supplication and that which might in no wife be rejected and denied, was, if the suppliant with fire in his hand entred into a river, & there menaced to fling it into the water, if he might not have his request granted: & then he obtained verily his peritio, but afterwards punished he was for that threatning which he used, as being wic- 10 ked, wretched & unnatural. And what proverbe is there readier in every mans mouth than to fay, when we would fignify an unpossible thing, This is to mingle fire and water together? which tefifieth thus much, that water is the mortall enimy unto fire, warring with it, punishing & quenching it, and not the aire, which receiveth & entertaineth fire, & into the substance whereof it is transmuted: for if that into which a thing is turned when it perisheth, were contrary unto it, then fire should be more contrary to aire than water is. For aire when it doth gather and thicken is converted into water, but when it is made more fubtil it refolveth into fire: as also in like case, water by rarefaction is refolved into aire and by condenfation becommeth earth, not upon any enmity or contrariety that it hath to these both, as I take it, but rather by reason of some amity and kindred that is between them. Wel, whether way of these two it is that these philosophers 20 will take, they overthrow still their intent and purpose. But to say that it is the aire which caufeth water to frize and become yee, it is without all fense and most absurd: for we see that the very aire it felfe is never conglaciate nor frozen, nor hardened, confidering that mifts, fogs and clouds are no congealations, but onely gatherings and thickenings of a moilt and vapourous aire : for the true aire indeed which hath no vapour at all and is altogether drie, admittethno fuch refrigeration as may alter it to that degree and height. And certeine mountaines there be which are not subject either to clouds, mists, or dewes, for that their heads reach up to that tegion of the aire which is pure and exempt from all humidity : wherby it is apparent, that thele gatherings and thickenings which are scene in the aire beneath, proceed from cold and mossiture, which is mingled therewith & ruuneth from els where. As for the bottoms of great rivers which 30 be never frozen to yee; great reason there is of it: for that the upper part being glazed over with ice, suffreth not the exhalation which atifeth from beneath to paffe thorow, but keepethit enclosed & striketh it downward, wherby is engendred a certaine heat in the water that runneth in the bottome. And hecreof we may fee a faire demonstration in this, that when the yee is broken, the water rifeth up, and there mounteth withall a great quantity of vapours and exhalations; which is the reason also that the bellies and other concavities within the bodies of living creatures, are alwaies hotter in winter, for that they hold and containe the heat, which the coldneffe of the circumstant aire driveth inward. As for the drawing & flinging up of water into the aire, it taketh not onely the heat away from waters but also their cold, and therefore they that defire to have their snow or the liquor expressed out of it exceeding cold, moove it as little as 40 they can, for this stirring chaseth away the colde both of the one and the other. But that it is the inward power of the water and not of the aire that doth it, a man may thus discourse and begin againe: First and formost, it is not probable that the aire being so neere as it is to the elementarie fire, touching also as it doth that ardent revolution, and being touched of it againe, hath a contrary nature and power unto it: neither is it possible that it should be so, considering that their two extremities are contignate, yea, and continuate one to the other: neither foundethit and is conformable to reason, that nature hath sastened with one tenon (as they say) and placed to neere together the killer and that which is killed, the confumer and that which is confumed; as if the were not the mediatressebetweene them of peace, unitie audaccord, butrather the workmittreffe of warre, debate and discord. For surely her order and custome is not to 50 joine front to front, substances that be altogether contrarie, and open enemies one to the other; but to place betweene them fuch as participate with the one and the other, which are lo feated, disposed and interlaced in the middle, as that they tend not to the destruction, but to the affociation of two contraries. Such a fituation and region hath the aire in the world, being fored under the fire, and before the water, for to accommodate and frame it felfe both to the one and the other, and to conjoine and linke them both together, being of it selfeneither hot nor colde, but is as it were a medley and temperature of them both; not (I fay) a pernicious mixture, but a gracious, which gently enterteineth and receiveth these contrarie extremities. Furthermore, the aire is alwaies equall, and yet the Winter is not ever more colde a little: but some parts of the world be cold and exceeding moift; others colde and as dry, and that not calually and by fortune, but for that one and the fame fubiliance is susceptable both of heat and colde. For the greater part of Africke is hot and dry, alrogether without water. And those who have travelled through Scithia, Thracia and Pontus, doe report that there be exceeding great lakes therein, and that those kingdoms be watered with many mighty deepe rivers; also that the countries in the midft betweene, and those parts which adjoyne upon those huges, meres, and fens be extreeme colde, by reason of the vapours that arise from them. As for Positionius when he faith that the to cause of that moisture is this, that the fenny and morish aire is ever fresh and moist, he hath not folved the question which was probable, but made it more doubtfull and without probability; for the aire feemed not alwaies to much colder as it is more fresh, in case cold be not engendred ofmoisture: and therefore Homer faid much better:

Is alwaies bleake, and blowes full cold. as if he pointed with his very finger to the fource and fountaine of colde. Moreover, our fense doth oftentimes beguile and deceive us, asnamely, when we ctouch wooll or clothes that be colde, for we thinke that they be moift and wet, for that there is one substance common to both these qualities, and both these natures be neighbours and familiar. Also in those climates 20 of the world where the winter is extreme hard and rough, the colde many times cracketh and breaketh vessels of brasse and of earth; nor any I meane that is voide and emptie, but all full, by reason that the water by the coldnesse thereof doth violence unto them: howsoever Theophrastus thinketh, that it is the aire that bursteth such vessels; using colde as it were a spike or great naile to doe the feat. But take heed that this be not rather a prety & elegant speech of his, than founding to trueth; for if aire were the cause, then should vessels full of pitch or milke, fooner burft than other. More likely it is therefore, that water is colde of it felfe and primitive ly, for contrary it is to the heat of fire, in regard of that coldnesses, like as to the drinesse thereof, in respect of humidity. To be briefe, the property of fire ingenerall, is to dissipate, divide, and fegregate; but contrariwife, of water to joine, conglutinate, unite, and binde, knitting and 30 cloting together by the vertue of moisture. And this makes me thinke that Empedacles upon this occasion, ever and anon calleth fire a pernicious debate, but water a fast amity, for sewell and food of fire, is that which turneth into fire, and every thing turneth which is most proper and familiar; as for that which is contrary, the fame is hardly to be turned, as water which of it felfe it is impossible to burne, causing both greene or wet herbs, as also most or drenched wood hardly to take fire, and to in the end with much a doe, they kindle and catch fire, although the fame benotlight and cleere, but darke, dimme, and weake, because the viridity or greenenesse by the meanes of colde, fighteth against the heat, as his naturall enemie.

Peifing now and weighing thefe reasons, conferre them with the others. But for that Chryfipus esteeming the aire to be the primitive colde, in that it is dimme and darke, hath made 40 mention of those onely who say, that water is more distant and farther remote from the elementary fire, than the aire, and being defirous to fay fomewhat against them: By the same reason (quoth he) may a man aswel assume that the earth is the faid primitive colds for that it is farthest from the elementary fire, rejecting this argument and reason as salse, and altogether absurd. Me thinks that I can well thew that the earth it felfe wanteth no probable proofes, laying my foundation even upon that which Chrysppas hath taken for the aire : And what is that? namely, because it is principally and above all things els obscure & dark; for if he taking two contrarictics of powers, thinketh of necessitie the one must follow upon the other; certes, there be infinitoppolitions and repugnances betweene the earth and the aire, for the earth is not oppolit unto the aire, as heavy unto light, nor as that which bendeth downward unto that which tendeth 50 upward onely; nor as maffie, unto rare; or flow and ftedfaft unto quicke and mooveable; but as motheavy unto most light; most massic unto most rare; and finally, as immooveable in it felfe, unto that which mooveth of it felfe; or as that which holdeth fill the center in the mids, unto that which turneth continually round. Were it not then very abfund to fay 3 that upon fo many, and those so great oppositions, this also of heat and cold did not likewise jointly follow? Yes verily: but fire is electe and bright, and earth darke: nay rather it is the darkett of all things in the world, and most without light; for aire is that which doth participate of the first light & brightnesse, which soonest of all other burneth: being also once full thereof, it distributes that Pppp 2

light every where, exhibiting it felte as the very body of light; for as one of the Dithyrambick poets faid:

No fooner doth the funne appeere In our horizon faire and cleere, But with his light the pallace great Of sire and windes is all repleat.

And then anon it descendeth lower, and imparteth one portion thereof to the lakes and to the fea; the very bottomes of the rivers doe rejoice and laugh for joy, fo fatte foorth as the aire pierceth and entreth into them: the earth onely, of all other bodies, is evermore destitute of light, and not penetrable with the radiant beames of finne and moone; well may it be warmed alittle, and prefent it felfe to be fomented with the heat of the funne, which entreth a little way into it, but furely the folidity of it will not admit the resplendent light thereof; onely it is superficially illuminated by the sunne, for all the bowels and inward parts of it be called Orphne, Chaos, and Ades, that is to fay, darkeneffe, confusion, and hell it selfe: and as for Erebus, it is nothing elfe, to fay a truth, but terrestrial obscurity, and mirke darknesse within the earth. The poets feigne the night to be the daughter of the earth; and the mathematicians by reason and demonstration, proove, that it is no other thing than the shadow of the earth, opposed against the sume: for the aire as it is full of darknesse from the earth, so it is replenished with light from the funne; and looke how much of the aire is not lightned not illuminate, to wit all the thadow that the earth caffeth, fo long is the night, more or leffe; and therefore both man 20 and beaft make much use of the aire without their houses, although it be night season; and as for beatls, many of them goe to reliefe and palturage in the night, because the aire hath yet fome reliques and traces left of light, and a certeine influence of brightnesse, dispersed heere and there; but he that is enclosed within house, and covered with the rouse thereof, is as it were blinde and full of darkneffe, as one environed round about within the earth: and verily the hides and hornes of beafts, folong as they bee hole and found, transmit no light through them: let them be cut, fawed, pared, and scraped, they become transparent, because aire is admitted into them. And I thinke truely that the poets eftfoones heereupon call the earth blacke, meaning thereby darke and without light, to that the most important and principall opposition, between cleere and darke, is found rather in the earth than in the aire: But this is impertinent to our 30 question in hand; for we have shewed already that there be many cleere things which are knowen to be cold, and as many browne and darke which be hot.

But there be other qualities and puissances more proper unto colde, namely, ponderositie, fleadineffe, foliditie, & immutability, of which the aire hath not fo much as one, but the earth in part hath them all more than the water. Furthermore, it may be faide, that colde is that which most sensibly is hard, as making things stiffe and hard : for Theophrastus writeth, that those fithes which be frozen with extreme rigour of colde, if they be let fal upon the ground, breake and knap in pieces, no leffe than glaffes or earthen veffels: and your felfe have heard at Delphi, of those who passed over the hill Pernassus, to succour and relieve the women called B.iceh.e. who were furprized with a tharpe pinching winde and drifts of fnow; that their cloakes 40 and mantels through extremity of colde, were as Harke and Hiffe as pieces of wood, infomuch as they brake and rent into tattars, so soone as they went about to stretch them out. To say yet more, excellive colde caufeth the finewes to be fo stiffe, as hardly they will bend: the tongue likewife for thanke, that it will not flirre or utter any voice, congealing the moift, foft, and tender parts of the body; which being feene by daily experience, they proceed to gather this consequence: Every power and facultie which getteth the maistrie, is woont to turne and convert into it selfe, that over which it is predominant: whatsoever is overcome by heat, becommeth fire; that which is conquered by spirit or winde, changeth into aire; what falleth into water, if it get not foorth againe, dissolveth, and in the end runneth to water. Then must it needs follow, that fuch things as are exceeding colde, degenerate into that primitive colde 50 whereof we speake: nowexcessive colde is first; and the greatest alteration that can be devised by colde, is when a thing is congealed & made an ice, which congelation altereth the nature of the thing formuch, that in the end it becommeth as hard as a stone; namely, when the cold is to predominant, as well all the moisture of it is congealed, as the heat that it had driven out perforce. Heereupon it is that the earth toward her center, and in the bottom thereof, is frozenalrogether, and in maner nothing else butice, for that the excessive colde which never will yeeld and relent, there dwelleth and abideth continually, as being thrust and driven into that corner, farthest off from the elementary fire. As touching those rocks, cragges, and cliffes, which we fee to appeare out of the earth: Empedocles is of opinion, that they were there let, driven up, fulleined, & supported by the violence of a certeine boiling and swelling fire within the bowels of the earth: but it should seeme rather, that those things out of which all the heat is evaporate and flowen away, be congealed and conglaciat fo hard by the meanes of colde: and this is the cause that such cragges be named in Greeke #124, as one would say, congealed: toward the head and toppe whereof, a man shall see in them many places blacke againe, namely, whereas the hear flew out when the time was, fo as to fee to, one would imagine that they had herretofore beene burnt; for the nature of colde is to congeale all things, but some more, others leffe; to but above all, those in which it is naturally at the first inharent: for like as the property of fire is to alleviate, it cannot otherwise be, but the hotter that a thing is, the more light also it is : and so the nature of moisture is to soften; insomuch as the moister any thing is, the softer also it is found to be : femblably, given it is to colde, to aftringe and congeale : it followeth therefore of necessity, that whatfoever is most aftrict and congealed, as is the earth, is likewife the coldett; and looke what is colde in the highest degree, the same must be principally and naturally that colde, whereof we are in question. And thereupon we must conclude, that the earth is both by nature colde, and also that primitive colde; a thing apparent and evident to our very sense; for dirt and clay is colder than water: and when a man would quickly fuffocate and put out a fire he throweth earth upon it. Blacke-fmithes alfo, and fuch as forge iron, when they fee it redde hot, 20 and at the point to melt, they firew upon it finall powder, or grit of marble or other flones that have fallen from them, when they were squared and wrought, for to keepe it from resolving too much, and to coole the excessive heat: the very dust also that is used to bee throwen upon the bodies of wreftlers, doth coole them and reprefletheir sweats. Moreover, to speake of the commodity that caufeth us every yeere to remoove and change our lodgings, what is the meaning of it? winter maketh us to feeke for high lofts, and fuch chambers as be farte from the earth; contrariwife, fummer bringeth us downe to the halles and parlours beneath, driving us to feeke retiring roomes, and willingly we love to live in vaults within the bofome of the earth: doe we not thus thinke you, directed by the inflinct of nature, to feeke out & acknowledge that which is naturally the primitive colde? and therefore when winter comes, we lay for houses 30 and habitations neere the fea fide, that is to fay, we flie from the earth as much as we can, because of colde, and we compasse our selves with the aire of the sea, for that it is not : contrariwise, in summer time, by reason of immoderate heat, we cover mediterranean places faither within the land, and farre remooved from the sea, not for that the aire of it selfe is colde, but because it seemeth to spring and budde as it were out of the primitive colde, and to have a tin-Eture as I may fo fay, after the maner of iron from the power which is in the earth: and verily among running waters, those that arise out of rocks, and descend from mountaines, are evermore coldeft: but if welles and pittes, fuch as be deepest yield the coldest waters: for by reason of their profunditie, the aire from without is not mingled with these; and the others passe thorough pure and sincere earth, without the mixture of aire among. 40 As for example, such is the water neere the cape of Tanarus, which they call Styx, destilling by little and little out of the rocke, and so gathered unto an head: which water is so extreeme colde, that there is no veffell in the world will holde it, but onely that which is made of an affes hoofe; for put it into any other, it cleaveth and breaketh it. Moreover, we heare physicians fav, that to speake generally, all kinds of earth do restraine and coole; and they reckon unto us a number of minerals drawen out of entrails of the earth, which in the use of physicke yeeld unto them an aftringent and binding power: for the very element it felfe from whence they come, is nothing incifive, nor bath the vertue for to flirre and extenuate; it is not active and quicke, not emollitive, nor aprito spread; but firme, steadfast and permanent, as a square cube or die, and not to be removed: whereupon, being maffic and ponderous as it is, the colde also thereof ha-50 ving a power to condensate, constipate and to expresse forthall humors, procureth by the asperity and inequalitie of the parts, flakings, horrors and quakings in our bodies: and if it prevaile more and be predominant, so that the heat be driven out quite and extinct, it imprinteth an habitude of congealation and dead stupefaction. And hereupon it is, that the earth either will not burne at all, or els hardly and by little and little: whereas the aire many times of it felfe fendeth forth flaming fire, it (hooteth and floweth, yea, and feemeth as inflamed, to lighten and flash: and the humiditie which it hath, ferveth to feed and nourish the hear thereof. For it is not the Pppp 3 folide and spent, the solide substance remaineth drie, and is nothing els but ashes. As for those who labour and endevour to shew by demostration, that the same also is changed and consumed, for which purpose they sprinckle it estsoones with oile, or temper it with greace, and so put it into the fire againe, prevaile nothing at all: for when the fattie and uncteous substance is burnt, there

NATURALL QUESTIONS.

What is the cause that sea water nourisheth no trees?

Sit for the same reason, that it nourisheth no land-creatures? for that aplant according to the opinions of Plato, Anaxagoras and Demoeritus, is a living creature of the land. For fay that it ferves for food to plants growing within the fea, as also to fishes, and is to them their drinke, yet we must not inferre thereupon, that it feedeth trees that be without the fea and upon the land; for neither can it pierce downe to their rootes, it is fo groffe, nor rife up in the nature of fappe, it is fo heavy. That it is groffe, heavy, and terreftriall, appeareth by many other reasons, and by this especially, for that it beareth up and susteineth both vessels and swimmers more than any other.

Or is it principally for this, that whereas nothing is more offenfive and hurtfull to trees than drinesse, the water of the sea is very deficuative? which is the reason that falt withstandeth putrifaction formuch as it doth, and why the bodies of those who are washed in the sea, have in-20 continently their skin exceding dry and rugged.

Or rather may it not be, for that oile is naturally an enimy to all plants, causing as many of them as are rubbed or anointed therewith to die ? Now the fea water standeth much upon a kinde of fattinesse, and is very unceous, in such fort that it will both kindle and also increase fire: and therefore we give warning and forbid to throw fea water into flaming fire.

Or is it because the water of the sea is bitter and not potable, by reason (as Aristotle faith) of the burnt earth that is mixed with it? like as lie, which is made by cafting fresh water aloft upon after : for the running and paffing through the faid after marreth that sweet and potable quality of the water: as also within our bodies, the unnaturall heats of an ague turne humors into cholar. As for those plants, woods or trees, which are faid to grow within the red sea, if they 30 doc, certainly they beare no fruit; but nourished they are by the fresh rivers, which bring in with them a deale of mud; an argument heereof is this: for that fuch grownor farre within the fea but neere unto the land.

What might the reason be, that trees and seeds are nourished better with raine, than any other water that they can be watered withall?

S it for that raine as it falleth, by the dint that it maketh, openeth the ground and causeth litle holes, whereby it pierceth to the rootes, as Laten faith?

Or is this untrue? and Latus was ignorant hecreof, namely that morifh plants and fuch as 40 grow in pooles, as the reed mace, canes and ruthes, will not thrive if they want their kinde raines in due scason But true is that which Artstorle faith: That the raine water is all fresh and new made, whereas that of meeres and lakes is old and stale.

Or haply, this carieth more shew and probabilitie, with it than trueth, for certeine it is, that the water of fountaines, brookes, and rivers, come as new and fresh as they: for as Heraclitus faith: It is impossible for a man to enter into one and the same rivertwice, because new water commeth still, and runneth away continually, and yet these nourish lesse than raine wa-

Is this therefore the reason, because the water from heaven is light, subtile, aircous, and mixed with a kinde of spirit, which by that subtilitie, entreth soone, and is easily caried to the 50 root of plants: and heereupon in the fall it raifeth little bubbles, because of the aire and spirit enclosed within.

Or doth raine water nourish more in this regard, that it is sooner altered and overcome by that which it nourisheth; for this is it that we call concoction properly: contrariwise, cruditie and indigestion, when things are so strong and hard that they will not suffer; for such as be thinne, fimple, and unfavory, are most easily and soonest altered : of which kinde is raine water, for being engendred as it is in the aire and the winde, it falleth pure and cleane; whereas fpringing waters, are like to the earth, out of which they iffue, or the places through which they paffe, remaine still evermore behinde, the terrestrial parts. And therefore earth being not onely immooveable in respect of fituation, but also immutable in regard of the very substance, the ancient called 65ta, that is to fay, vefta, standing as it were fure and stedfast within the habitation of the gods: of which steadinesse and congealation, the bond and linke is cold, as Archilochus the Naturallilt faid: And nothing is there able to relax or mollifie it, after it hath once bene baked 10 in the fire or hardened against the Sun. As touching those who say that they feele very sensibly the winde and the water colde, but the earth not fo well; furely thefe do confider this earth here. which is next unto us, and is no other thing intructh, than a mixture and composition of aire, water, finne and heat; and me thinks this is all one, as if a man should say, that the elementarie fire is not the primitive and originall heat, but rather fealding water, or an iron red hot in the fire; for that in trueth there is no touching of these or comming neere unto them; as also that of the faid pure and celestiall fire, they have no fensible experience nor knowledge by feeling, no more than they have of the earth which is about the center, which we may imagine to be true, pure and naturall earth, as most remote and farthest separate from all other: howbein wee may have some guesse and token thereof by these rockes heere with us, which from their 20 profunditie fend forth a vehement colde, which is in maner intolerable. And they likewife who defire to drinke their water passing colde, use to throw pibble stones into it, which thereby commeth to be more colde, sharpe and piercing, by occasion of the great and fresh colde that arifeth from the faid flones. And therefore we ought thus to thinke, that when our ancients, those deepe clearks and great scholars I meane, thought there could be no mixture of earthly things with heavenly, they never looked to places high or low, as if they hung in the scales of a ballance, but unto the difference and diversitie of their powers; attributing the qualities of heat, elecrenesse, agilitie, celeritie and lightnesse, unto that immortall and eternallinature: butcolde, darkneffe and tarditie, they affigned as the unhappie lot and wretched portion of those infernall wights that are dead and perished. For the very bodie of a creature, all while 30 that it doth breathe and flourish in verdure as the Poets fay, hath life and heat, but so soone as it is deftitute of these, and left in the onely portion and possession of the earth, it presently becom-

meth stiffe and colde, as if heat were in any other body naturally, rather than in that which is terrestriall. Compare now good fir Phavorinus, these arguments with the reasons of other men, and if you finde that they neither yeeld in probabilitie, nor over way them much, bid all opinions and the stiffe mainteining of them farewell, and thinke that to forbeare resolution and to holde off in matters obscure and uncerteine, is the part of the wifest philosopher, rather than to seule his judgement and affent to one or other.

* Coaxant, Lat. Prezenenet,

gathering thereby many qualities, which cause them unwilling to be digested, and more slow to be reduced by concoction, into the fubstance of that which is to be nourished thereby; on the other fide, that raine waters be eafie to be changed and transmuted, it appeareth by this; that more subject they are to corruption and putrefaction, than those either of rivers, or of pittes and welles : and concoction feemeth to be a kinde of putrefaction: as Empedocles beareth witnesse saying:

When in vine-wood the water putrifies, It turnes to wine, whiles under barke it lies.

Or rather the truest and readiest reason that can be alledged, is the sweetnesse and holsomneffe of raine waters, falling as they doe fo prefently, fo foone as the winde fends them downe: 10 and heereupon it is that beafts defire to drinke thereof before any other: yea, and the frogges and paddocks expecting a raine, for joy fing more shrill and merily, ready to receive and enterreine that which will feafon the dead and dormant waters of standing lakes, as being the very feed of all their sweetnesse: for Aratus reckoneth this also for one of the signes of a showre toward, writing thus:

When wretched brood, The adders food, from out of standing lake, (The tad pole fires, Imeane)desires fresh raine, and loud doth * coake.

What might be the cause that skepherds and other herdmen give salt unto their sheepe and cattell which they feed?

S it as most men doe thinke, to the end that they should fall the better to their mear, and so confequently feed fatte the fooner? because the actimony of salt provoketh appetite, and opening the pores, maketh way unto the nourishment for to be digested and distributed more casily throughout the whole body? in regard whereof the physician Apollonius, the sonne of 30 Herophilus, gave counsell and prescribed leane folke and such as thrived not in their flesh; not groffe sweet wine, thicke gruell, and frumentie, but falt fish out of the pickle, anchoves, powdred meats, and fuch as were condite in brine: the fubtile acrimonic whereof might in maner of fetting a peruke for want of haire, ferve to apply nutriment through the pores of the body into those parts that need it.

Or rather may it not be for health-fake? in which regard they use their cattell to little falt, thereby to take downe their ranke feeding, and restreine their grossenesse and corpulencie? for fuch as grow exceeding fatte, are subject to breed diseases: but salt consumeth and dispatcheth this fatte; and by this meanes also when they be killed, they are sooner and with greater expedition flaied, because the fatte which knit and bound the skinne fast to the flesh, is now be- 40 come more thinne, gentle, and pliable through the acrimony of the falt: befides, the bloudalfo of fuch as be ever licking of falt, becommeth more liquid; and nothing there is within, that will gather and grow together, in case there be salt mingled therewith.

It may be moreover, that they doe it for to make them more fruitfull and apter for generation; for we fee that falt bitches which have beene fed with falt meats, are more hot, apter to goe proud, and fooner with whelpe. And for this cause, those keeles and barges that transport salt, breed greater store of mice, for that they engender the oftener.

How commeth it to paffe, that of raine waters, fuch as fall with thunder and lightning, which there so upon be called as earner, are better for to water feeds or yong plants, than any other?

May it not be, because they be full of winde and ventositie, by reason of the trouble and Confused agitation of the aire. And the nature of wind and spirit is to stirre the humiditie 3 and by that meanes doth fend it forth and distribute it the better?

Or is it not rather, that heat fighting against colde, is the cause of thunder and lightning in the aire? which is the reason that seldome there is any thunder in winter: but contrariwise, very often in the Spring and Autumne, for the inconstant and unequall diffemperature of the aire which being supposed; the heat concocting the humiditie, causeth it to be more pleasant and profitable unto the plants of the earth.

Or suby may it not be, because it thundreth and lightneth especially and more often in the Spring, than in any other feafon of the yeere, for the reafon before alledged : now the Spring showers and raines are most necessarie for seeds and herbs, against the Summer time : whereupon the fecountries wherein there be many good ground thowers in the Spring, as the ifle Steille, bring forth plentie of good fruits.

How is it, that there being eight kind of * favours, there is no more but onely one of them, to wit. " How were faltish, that can not be found naturally in fruits? For as touching the buter savour, the olive I make choice hath it at first; and the grape is source at the beginning: but as these fruits begin to change and or samue so grow to their ripenesse, the bitternesse of the olive turneth into a fastie and unctuous savour, objectiof salic, and the sharpe werdure of the grape into a smacke of wine: semblably, the harshnesse in the un-commune so ripe dates, as also the austere and unpleasant sharpnesse in pomgranats changeth into sweetnesse, doubtoos. Asfor pomgranats, some there be, as also other apples, which are samply source, and never have o fore, and can ther tafte. And as for the sharpe and biting favour, it is ordinarie in many roots and feeds.

Sit for that the falt favor is not primitive nor engendred originally, but is rather the corrup- This means 20 Ition of other primitive favors; and in that regard can not ferve to nourifh any creature, living favours or with graffe or graine? but it is to some in stead of a fauce, because it is a meanes that they should when sallenot upon fulneffe either lothe or distaste that which they feed upon.

Or because, that like as they who boile sea water, rid it from that salt, brackish and biting quaknow.we colitie that it hath: fo, in those that are hot by nature, the falt savour is dulled and mortified by monly attri-

Or rather, for that a favour or smacke, according as Plato saith, is a water or juice passing thorow the stem or stalke of a plant: but we see that the sea water runing as thorow a streiner, loseth personas, as the faltnesse, being the terrestrial and grossest part that is in it. And hereupon it is, that when as Tthinke. men digge along by the sea side, they meet with springs of fresh and potable water. And many to there be, who draw out of the very fea, fresh water and good to be drunke; namely, when it hath rnnne thorow certeine veffels of wax, by reason that the terrestriall and saltish parts thereof be ffreined out. In one word, *cley or marle also, yea, and the carrying of seawater in long con- * express, haply duct pipes, caufeth the fame when it is fo streined, to be potable, for that there are kept still in relieuring them the terrestrial parts, and are not suffered to passe thorow. Which being so, very probable it is that plants neither receive from without forth any falt favour, nor if haply any fuch qualitie breed in them, doe they transfule the same into their fruits; for that the conducts of their pores being very fmall and streight, there can not be transmitted thorow them any groffe or terrestriall fubstance.

Or els we must say, that saltnesse is in some sort a kinde of bitternesse, according as Homer 40 fignifieth in these verses:

Bitter falt-water at mouth he cast againe, And all there with his head did drop amaine.

And Plate affirmeth, that both the one and the other favour is abster five and liquefactive; but the faltish, leffe of the twaine, as that which is not rough: and so it will seeme that bitter differeth from falt in excesse of drinesse, for that the salt favour is also a great drier.

What is the cause, that if folke use ordinarily and continually to goe among yong trees or shrubs full of deaw, those parts of their bodies which do touch the twigs of the said plants, are wont to have a Scurfe or mange rife upon their skin?

Sit (as Lærus faith) for that the deaw by the fubtilitie thereof doth fret and pierce the skin? Or rather, because like as the blast and mil-deaw is incident to those seeds or plants that take wet and be drenched; even fo, when the smoothe and tender superficial parts of the skinne be fretted, fearified, and diffolved a little with the deaw, there arifeth a certeine humour, and filleth the fretted place with a smart and angry scurse: for lighting upon those parts which have but little bloud, fuch as be the smalles of the legs and the feet, it biteth & gnaweth the superficies of them. Now that there is in deaw a certeine inordinate qualitie, it appeareth by this, that it maketh those who are grosse and corpulent, to be leaner and more spare of bodie: with effe our women who are given to be fat, and would be fine, who gather deaw with linnen clothes, or els with locks or sleeces of wooll, thinking therewith to take downe and spend their fogginesse, and make themselves more gant and slender.

What is the cause that barges and other vessels in Winter time, go more slowly upon the rivers than at other seasons; but they do not so upon the seas

What fay you to this? May it not be, for that the aire of rivers being alwaies groffe and heavy, in Winter is more infpiffate by reason of the circumstant cold, and so hin-

Or haply this accident is to be imputed to the water of rivers, rather than to the aire about them; for colde driving in and restraining the water, maketh itmore heavy and grosse; as we may perceive in water houre-glasses, for the water runneth out of them more leasurely and showly in winter then in summer. And Theophrasse written that in Thrasia, neere unto the mount called Pangaon, there is a sountaine, the water whereof istwice as much heavie in winter than it is in summer, waigh it in one & the same vessell full. That the thicknesse of water maketh a vessell to passe more sluggishly, it may appeare by this, that the barges of the river carry greater straights by farre, in winter than in summer: because the water being thicke, is stronger and able to be are more. As for the sea water it cannot be made more thicke in winter, by reason of the owne hear, which is the cause that it congealeth not, and if it gather any thickening, it seen neith to be very slender and little.

What is the reason that we observe, all other waters, if they be mooved and troubled, are the colder, but the sea the more surging and waving, the hotter it is?

Is it because, if there be any heat in other waters, the same is a stranger unto it, and comming from without, and so the motion and agitation thereof doth dissipate and drive the same forth againe: but that heat of the sea which is proper and naturall to it, the windes doe stirre up and augment. That the sea is naturally hot, may evidently be proved by this, that it is so transparent and shining; as also for that it is not ordinarily frozen, heavy though it be and terrestrial.

What should be the cause that in winter the seawater is less bitter and brackish in taste?

Or so (by report) written Dienysia the great convaier of conduicts, who in a treatise of that argument, saith that the bitternesse of the sea water is not without some sweetnesse, seeing that the sea receive the many and so great rivers: sor admit that the sunne doe draw up that which is fresh and potable out of it, because it is light and subtill; that is but from the upper part onely: and withall, it doth more in Summer than in any other season, by reason that in Winter his beames are not so strong to strike, sor that his heat skewise is but saint and feeble: and so a good portion of the sweetnesse remaining behinde, doth delay that excessive bitternesse and all other that be potable: for even such in Summer time become worse and more offensive to the taste than in Winter, by how much the heat of the sume doth resolve and dissipate the light and sweet parts thereof: but in Winter it runneth alwaies new and fresh; where such that the rivers running into it, be great and impart their fresh water unto it.

What is the reason, that men are wont to powre sea water into their wine vessels, among the wine? So Multhe common report goeth that there were sometime certeine mariners and sisher men who broughs with them an oracle, commanding to plunge and sis Bacchus in the sea: And such as awell faire from the sea, instead of sea water, put in baked plaster of Lacynthus?

I Sit to this end, that it cheat thereof thould helpe to refift the colde, that it take not away the heart of the wine? Or rather cleane contrary, doth it not weaken the headinesse of wine, by extinguishing the power and strength thereof?

Or

Orit may be, that feeing wine is much fubied to alteration, and will quickly turne, the terrefiriall matter which is cast into it, having a naturall property to restraine, to binde and to stoppe, doth in some fort condensate and stay the waterish and spirituall substance of it. Now the salt together with the sea water, comming to substiliate and consume that which is superstuous, and naught in the wine, and not the proper substance thereof, keepeth it so, as it will not suffer any strong & evil smell or corruption to be ingended therin: Besides all the grosse and terrestriall patts of the wine, sticking and cleaving to that which fetlets to the bottom, and being drawen downward with it, maketh a residence of the lees and dregges, and by consequence leaveth the rest more cleare, pure, and neat.

What is the cause that those who faile upon the sea, are more suck in the stomacke, than they that faile upon rivers, yea, though thoweather be saire and the water calme?

Is it for that of all the fenfes, finelling, and of all paffions, feare's caufeth men most to be stomacke sicke? for so soone as the apprehension of any pertill seifeth upon a man, he trembleth and quaketh for seare, his haire stareth and standeth upright, yea and his belly groweth to be loose. Wheras there is none of all this that troubleth those who saile or row upon the river: for why, the simel is aquainted with all fresh and potable water, neither is the sailing so perillous: whereas upon the sea men are offended with strange and unusuall smelles, yea, and be estable so soone sattraid, how faire soever the season be, not trusting upon that which they see present, but missed within that which may fall out. And therefore little or nothing serveth the calme without, when the minde within is tossed, troubled, and wexed, partly with seare, and in part with distrust, drawing the body into the sellowship of like passions and perturbations.

What is the reason that if the sea be sprinckled alost with oile, there is to be seene a cleere transparence sogether with a calme and tranquility within?

Whether is it (as Ariftotle faith) because the winde gliding and glauncing over oile which is smooth and even, bath no power to stirre it, or to make any agitation.

30 Or, this reason may well carie with it some probability as touching the outward part, and upmost superficies of the sea: but seeing that they also by report, who plunge and dive to the bottome thereof, holding oile within their mouthes, if they spurt the same foorth when they are in the bottome, have a light all about them, and are able to see cleerely in the deepe; a man cannot attribute the cause thereof unto the gliding over of the wind. See therefore if it may not rather be, for that the oile by the solidity and thicknesses that that, doth drive before it, cut, and open the sea water first, being terrestriall and unequall; which after being returned and drawen together againe into it selfe; there be left still in the mids betweene, certeine little holes which yeeld unto the eies a through-light and transparence.

Or rather is it, for that the aire mingled within the fea, is by reason of heat, naturally light40 some and perspicuous; but when it is troubled and stirred, becommeth unequall and shadowy; when as the oile therefore by meanes of solidity commeth to pollith and smooth the said inequalitie, it resumeth againe the owne plainnesse and perspicuity.

What is the reason that fisher mens nets doe not in Winterrather than in Summer, notwithstanding that all other things putrific more in Summer than in Winter?

I Sit because (as Theophrasses supposets) the heat then beset round about with the circumfant colde, giveth place thereto, and therefore causeth the bottome of these as well as of so the carth, to be the hotter? which is the reason that spring waters be warrier, yea and both lakes and rivers doe reike and smooke more in Winter than in Summer, because the heat is kept downe, and driven to the bottome by the colde, which is predominant over it?

Or rather are we to fay, that the nets rot not at all, but when foever they be fiffee congealed with colde which drieth them up, foone broken afterwards they are with the violence of the waves, and so seems as if they were rotten and putrified indeed; for in more danger they are in colde and frostly weather; and like as strings and sinewes over-stretched doe breake, seeing especially that the sea in Wintermost commonly is troubled, which is the reason that they use to

restreine and thicken them with certeine tinctures, for feare they should be overmuch relaxed and resolved; for otherwise, if it were not for that doubt, being not so died and besmeared all over, they would fooner deceive fishes, because they could not perceive them so soone; for that the colour naturally of the lines and threds refembling the aire, is very meet to deceive within the fea.

What is the reason that the * Dorians, * pray for to have ill inning of their hey?

* Amenis, fome translate it husbandmen,reading reporta.

S not this the cause, because hey is not well inned wet, or having taken a showre ? for mowen downe it is not dry, but while it is greeneand full of fappe; and if it take wet withall, it rot. 10 teth incontinently and is marred; whereas contrariwife if standing come be moistened with raine a little before harvest, it taketh much good against hot foutherne windes, which will not fusfer the come to gather and knit in the eare, but cause it to be loose that it cannot eare well by meanes of heat, were it not by the drenching and watering of the ground, the moisture did coole and mollifie the earth.

What is the reason that a fat, strong, and heavy clay ground, beareth wheat best: but contrarinise alight and fandy foile, is better for barley?

MAy not this be a reason, that of all corne, that which is more strong and solide, requireth 20 larger food, and the weaker lesse, and more slender nourishment 2 now it is well known that barley is a more feeble and hollow graine than wheat is: in which regard it will not abide and beare plentifull nouriture and strong. An argument and testimonie hereof we may have of that kinde of wheat which is called three-moneth wheat, for that in drier grounds it liketh better, and commeth up in greater plenty: the reason is, because it is not so firme and solid as others, and therefore requireth leffe nutriment: in regard whereof, also it commeth sooner to ripenesse and persection.

How commeth this common proverbe: Sow wheat in durt, and barley in dust?

r Karbarly it should be ditaling, or ourceen, that is to fay, to fow, unleffe Hand it thus, that their ricks of corne and thrathing lands.

S it not as I faid before, because wheat is able to overcome more nourishment, but barley can not endure much moisture to drench and drowne it?

Or in this respect, that wheat being a stiffe and hard kinde of graine, resembling the nature of wood, doth sooner come and chit within the ground, in case it be well soked and sostened with moisture, and therefore liketh better of a wet ground; whereas the drier soile at the first fowing agreeth better with barley, and is more commodious for it, being as it is, a more loofe and fpungcous kinde of graine.

Or because such a temperature of the ground in regard of the heat, is more proportionable

Howres were and leffe hurtfull unto barley, being as it is the colder graine?

Or rather, husbandmen are affraid to * thrash their wheat upon a dry and sandy sloore, be-40 cause of * ants; for some will they take to that kind of graine in such a place. As for barley, they Torpinites use leffe to beare it, because the cornes thereof be hard to be carried and recaried from one place to another, they are fo bigge.

> What is the cause that fishers chuse the haire of stone-horsetailes, rather than of mares, to make their angling lines?

S it because the male, as in all other parts, so in hairealso, is more strong than the semale? Or rather, for that they thinke the haire of mares tailes, drenched and wet as it is ever and 50 anon with their staling, is more brittle and woorse than the other?

* Sometakeit What is the resson that when the * Calamacie fish is seene in the sea, it is a signe of a great tempest? for the cutic.

S it because all soft and unscaly fishes are very impatient of colde and of soule-weather, they be so bare and naked, and have withall their flesh exceeding tender, as being covered, neither with shell nor thicke skinne, ne yet scale; but contrariwise, having their hardy, griftly, and bony fubstance within? which is the reason that all such fishes be called Malacia, as one would say. Softand tender. For which cause naturally they soone foresee a tempest, and seele colde comming, for that it is offenfive unto them : and therefore likewife, when the Poulpe or Polyp runneth to land, and catcheth holde of some little rocks, it is a token that there is great winde to ward. And for the Calamacie, he leapeth forth for to avoid the colde and the trouble or agitation of the water in the bottome of the fea: for of other foft fifthes, his flesh is most tender and aptest to be pierced and hurt.

19 Why doth the Polyp change his colour?

Sitaccording to the opinon of Theophrastum, because it is a fearefull and timorous creature Lynature; and therefore when he is troubled or amazed as his spirit turneth, so he altereth withall his colour, even as we men do? whereupon we fay in the common proverbe:

The coward, in view Soone changeth bew.

Or may this be a good probable conjecture of the change, but not fufficient, for the refemblance? confidering that he changeth fo, as herefembleth the rocks which he fetleth upon, unto which propertie, Pindarus alluded in these verses:

Hisminde doth alter most mutable, To Poulpe the fea-fish skin semblable; Which changeth hue to echibing futable: To live in all worlds he ispliable.

And Theognis:

Put on a minde like Polype fijh, and learne so to dissemble: Which of the rocke whereto it flicks, the colour doth resemble.

Alfo, men usually fay, such as surpasse others for cunning and cautelous dealing, studie and practife this: that for to fave themselves, and not to be seene or knowen of those about them, 20 they alwaies will be like unto the poulpe, and change their colours, that is to fay, their maneis

Or do they thinke fuch an one to make use of his colour readily, as of a garment, to change and put on another whenfoever he will?

Well then, the poulpe fith himfelfe, by his feare may haply give the occasion and beginning of this change and paffion; but the principall point of the cause consisteth in something els. And therefore weigh and confider what Empedocles writeth:

Wot well, all mortall things that be, Defluxions have in some degree.

For there passe away continually, many defluxions, not onely from living creatures, plants, 40 earth and sea, but also from stones, braffe and iron : for all things perish and yeeld a smell, in that there runneth fomething alwaies from them, and they weare continually: infomuch as it is thought that by these defluxions are all attractions and infultations: and some suppose their embracings and connexions; others, their fmilings: fome their impulfions, and I wot not what circumplexions and environments, to be attributed unto such defluxions; and especially from rocks and stones along the sea continually, washed and dashed with the waves, there be decisions palle of some parcels and small fragments, the which do cleave unto other bodies, and cling about those which have their pores more strict and close, or els passe thorow such as have the fame over rare and open. As for the flesh of the Polype, it is to see to, fishulous and spongeous, like unto hony-combs, apt to receive all fuch defluxions and decisions from other bodies, 50 when as then he is afraid, his windegoeth and commeth, and withall, shutteth up his bodie, and bringeth it together, that he may receive and reteine in the superficies of his skin, the defluxions that come from that which is next it: for the rivels and wrinckles of his foft skin, which are knit with feare, are in stead of crooke and bending cleies fit to enterteine the defluxions and parcels lighting upon them, which featter not heere and there, but gathering upon the skin, make the superficies thereof to be of semblable colour. And that this is a true cause, it may appeare by one great argument, namely, that neither the Polyp doth resemble in colour all that which is neere unto it, nor the Chamæleon the white colour; but both the one & the other, fuch things onely, as the defluxions whereof are proportionate unto their pores and small passages.

10 that is the cause that the teares of wilde boares be sweet, but of stagges and hinds, saltish and unpleasant to the tasse?

Hat and colde are the cause of both 3 for the stagge is colde of nature, but the bore exceeding hot and sierie: whereupon it is, that the one sleeth away, the other maketh head, and stands to it when he is assaulted, and then is it most of all that he sheddeth teates, upon a sell to heart: for when plentie of heat (as I said before) mounteth up unto his cies, and so the humour that distilleth from his cies, is sweet. Others say, that these teares are pressed and wrong out from the bloud being troubled, like as whey from milke: and of this opinion was Empedocles. And forasmuch as the bloud of the wilde bore is blacke and thicke in regard of heat, but that of stags and hinds, thin and waterish, great reason there is that the teares which passes from the one in anger, and the other in seare, should be such as is aforesaid.

11 What ushe reason, that tame swine do farrow often in one yeere some at one time, and some at another; whereas the wide of that kinde, bring forth pigs but once in the yeere, and all of them in a maner upon the same daies, and those are in the beginning of Summer: whereupon we say in our vulgar proverbe:

The night once past, of wilde sowes farrowing: T'will raine no more be sure, for any thing.

Is it (thinke you) for the plentie they have of meat; as in trueth, fulnesse brings wantonnesse, and of full feeding comes lust of breeding; for abundance of food causeth superfluitie of seed, as well in living creatures as in plants. As for the wilde swine, they seeke their victuals them-30 selves, and that with travell and seare: whereas the tame have alwaies store thereof, either naturally growing for them, or els provided by mans industry.

Or is the cause of this difference to be attributed unto the idle life of the one, and the painfull labour of the other: for the domesticall and tame are sluggish, and never wander farre from their swineherds: but the other range and rove abroad among the forrests and mountaines, running to and fro, dispatching quickly all the food they can get, and spending it every whit upon the substance of their bodies, leaving no superfluities, expedient for geniture or seed.

Or may it not be, that tame fowes dockeepe company, feed and goe in heards together with their bores, which provoketh their lust, and kindleth the defire to engender: according as Empedocles hath written of men in these verses:

The fight of ese, doth kindle lust in brest, Of looking, liking, then loving and the rest.

Whereas the wilde, because they live apart, and pasture not together, have no such desire and lust one to another; for their naturall appetite that way is dulled and quenched.

Or rather, that is true which Ariffoile faith, namely that Homer calleth a wilde bore 2006 as having but one genetorie, for that the most part of them, in rubbing themselves against the trunks and stocks of trees, doe crush and breake their stones.

What is the reason of this usual speech: that beares have a most sweet hand, and that their slesh is 50 most pleasant to be eaten?

Because those parts of the body which doe best concoct and digest nourishment, yeeld their flesh most delicate: now that concocteth and digestesh best, which stirreth most, and doth greatest exercise: like as the beare mooveth most this part, for his forepawes he uses he uses a goe and runne withall, he maketh use also of them as of hands to apprehend and catch any thing.

What

What is the cause that in the spring time wilde beasts are hardly hunted by the sent, and sollowed by the trace?

S it forthat hounds, as Empedocles faith, By fent of noshbrils, when they trace Wilde beast, to finde their resting place.

dot take hold of those vapours and defluxions which the said beasts leave behind them in the wood as they passe: but in the spring time these are consounded or unterly extinct by many other sines of plants and strubs, which as then be in their flower, and comming upon the aire that the beasts made, and intermingled therewith, do trouble and deceive the sent of the hounds, whereby they are put out and at default, that they cannot truly hunt after them by their trace; which is the reason, (men say) that upon the mountaine Aetma, in Stellie, there is never any hunting with hounds, for that all the yeere long there is such abundance of flowers, both in hilles and dales, growing as it were in amedow or garden, whereof the place simelish all over so sweet the sum of sweets, has the way gathering flowers there: in which regard the inhabitants honouting the place with great reverence and devotion, never put up or hunt the beasts that pasture about that mountaine.

What is the reason, that when the moone is at the full, it is very hard for hounds so meet with wilde beasts by the trace or sent of the sooting?

Is it not for the fame cause before alledged, for that about the sull moone there is engendred store of deaw: whereupon it is that the poet Aleman calleth deaw the daughter of Jupiter, and the moone in these vertes:

Dame Deaw is nour se, whom of god Jupiter And lady Moone, men call the daughter.

For the deaw is nothing elle but a weake and feeble raine: and why? because the heat of the moone is but infirme: whereof it commeth to passe, that she draweth up vapours indeed from 30 the earth, as doeth the sunne, but not able to setch them up alost, nor there to comprehend them, letteth them fall againe.

What is the cause that in a white or hourie frost, wilde beasts are hardly traced?

WHether is it for that they being loth for very colde to range farre from their dennes, leave not many marks of their footings upon the ground: which is the reason that at other times they make spare of that prey which is neere unto them, for searce of danger if they should be forced to range farre abroad in Winter, and because they would have ready at hand about them at such an hard season to seed upon.

40 Or else is it requisit that the place where men doe hunt, have not onely the tracts of the beast to be feene, but also of force to affect the fent of the hounds, and to fet their nothrils a worke; but then doe they moove this fense of theirs, when as they are gently dissolved and dilated as it were by heat: whereas the aire if it be extreme colde, congealing as it were the sinels, will not suffer them to spread and be diffused abroad, thereby to move the sense; will not folke say) that perfumes, ointments, and wines, be lesses fragrant and odoriserous in Winter, or incold weather, than at other times, for the aire being it selfe bound and shut close, doth likewise stay within it all sents, and will not suffer them to passe footh.

59. What is the cause that brute beasts, so often as they are sicke, or feele themselves amisse, seeke after divers meditionable meanes for remedie, and using the same, finde many times beloe? as for example: dogges when they be stornacke sicke, fall to eat a kinde of quitchy grasse, because they would cast and avamit choler; hogges search for craissibes of the river, for by seeding upon them they cure their headach; the tortois likewise having eaten the slish of a wiper, eateth upon it the herbe origan; and the beare when she is full in the stornacke and dot boath all victuals, licketh up pismires with her tongue, which she no sooner hash swallowed downe, but she is warished, and yet none of all this were they taught, either by experience, or some casuall occasion?

Is it then the finel that mooveth them to feeke theferemedies, and like as the hony combes by the odor fittre up the bee: and the flesh of dead carions the vultures, drawing and alluring them a farre of : fo the craifishes invite unto them swine, origan the tortoile, and pismires the beare, by certaine fents and fluxions which are accommodate and familiar unto them, without any sense leading them thereto by discourse of reason, and teaching them what is good and profitable?

Or rather be they the temperatures of the bodies disposed unto sicknesse, that bring unto these creatures fuch appetites, engendring divers ceremonies, sweetnesses, or other strange & unusuall qualities; as we fee it ordinary in great bellied women, who during the time that they go with to childe fall to cat grit & earth with greedinefferin fo much as expert philitians fore-know by the fundry appetites of their patients, whether they shall live or die, for so Mnesa beau the phisitian doth report, that in the beginning of the Pneumonie or inflamation of the lungs, one patient of his, longing for to eate onions escaped that maladie; and another whose appetite stoodto figgs, died for it, of the fame disease: for that the appetites follow the temperatures, and the temperatures are proportionate to the diseases.

It flandeth therefore to great reason that beasts likewise, such as are not surprised withmor. tall maladies, nor ficke to death, have that disposition and temperature, whereby their appetites doe moove and provoke each one to that which is good and holfome, yea and expedient to the cure of their ficknesse.

What is the cause that must or new wine, connucth sweet a long time, in case the vessell whereinit is kept be colde round about it?

IS it because the alteration of this sweet savour into the natural taste of wine, is the very con-Lcoction of the wine; and colde hindereth the faid concoction, which proceedeth from heat

Or contrariwife, because the proper joice and naturall favour of the grape is sweet, for wefay that then the grape beginneth to ripen, when it waxeth sweet. Now colde not suffring new wine to exhale, but keeping the kinde heat thereof within, preferveth the faid sweetnesse still. And this is the very cause that those who make their vintage in a rainy constitution of the weather, 20 doe finde that their new wine wil not worke fo wel in the vault, because that such ebullition proceedeth of hear, and the colde doth restraine and refresh the said heat.

What is the cause that of all savage beasts, the beare doth never lightly gnaw the net andtoile with her teeth, whereas wolves and foxes use ordinarily to eate the same?

Sit for that her teeth grow farre within her mouth, in fuch fortthat the cannot get within I the cords of the nets, having befides fo great and thicke lippes betweene, that they hinderher for catching hold with her faid fangs.

Or rather because she having more force in her fore-feet, which she useth in stead of hands 40 therewith the doth teare and breake the cords; or elfe having ufe both of her pawes and alfo of her month: the imploieth those to the burfting of the nets, and with her teeth fighteth, and maketh her part good against the hunters. Besides the tumbling and rolling of her body that she doth practife, ferveth her in as good flead as any thing elfe. And therefore feeing her felfe in canger to be taken within the toile many times, casteth her selferound upon her head, and indevoureth that way to escape, rather than either by pawes or fangs to burst the toile.

What is the reason that we woonder not to see any sources or springs of coldewater, like as we doe of hot? not with standing it is evident that as heat is the cause of these so is colde of the other.

Or we must not say as some holde opinion, that heat indeed is an habitude of it selfe, but colde nothing else but the privation of heat: for it were in truth more woonderfull how that which bath no subfistance, should be the cause of that which hath a beeing. But it seemeth that nature would have us to woonder hecreat, onely for the rare fight hecreof; and because it is not often seene, therefore we should enquire for some secret cause, and demand how that may be, which is but feldome observed,

But feelt thouthis starry firmament, So high above and infinitly vaft, In bosom moist of water element, The earth beneath how is encloseth fast,

How many strange and woonderfull fights doth it representanto us in the night season, and what beauty sheweth it unto us in the day time? and the common people woonder at the na-* * As also at the rainebowes, and the divers tinctures formes and ture of these things pictures of the clouds appearing by day: and how they be adorned with fundry shapes, breaking out of them in maner of bubbles.

What is the cause that when vines or other young plants, which be ranke of leaves, and otherwise fruitlesse, are said reagant

T Sit because that goats in Greeke (2001), which are exceeding fat, be lesse apt to engender, and hardly for their fatneffe can leape the females. For generative feed is the superfluous excrement of that nourishment which is conglutinate to the substantial parts of the body. Now when as any living creature or plant is in very good plight and growen groffe, it is an evident figne, that the nouriture is imploied and spent altogether in the maintenance of it selfe, leaving 20 no excrement at all, or the fame very finall, and not good for generation.

What is the reason, that if a vine be sprinkled and drenched with wine, e specially that which came of the owne grape, it drieth and withereth away?

I S there not the same reason heereof as of the baldnesse in great drinkers, when as the wine by I meanes of heat, causeth the moisture to evaporate which should feed the haire of their head? Orisit not rather, because the very liquor of wine commeth in some fort of putrefaction, according to the verses of Empedacles:

When in vine-wood the water putrifies, It turnes to wine, whiles under barke it lies.

When as then a vine commeth to be wet with wine outwardly, it is as much as if fire were put into it, which doth corrupt the naturall temperature of that humour which should nourish it?

Or rather, pure wine, being of an aftringent nature, foketh and pierceth to the very root, where shutting up and enclosing the pores, it empeacheth the entrance of that sap (by vertue whereof, the vine is woont to bud, burgen, and flourish) that it can not runne to the stocke?

Or may it not be, it is cleane contrary to the nature of a vine, that the liquor which once went out of it, should return eagaine into it? for a liquor or humour whiles it is within the plant in the nature of a fap, may well have power to feed the fame; but that being departed once from 40 thence, it should joine thereto againe, or become a part thereof, I cannot see how it is possible.

Wby doth the date tree onely of all others arife archwife, and bendupward, when a weight is laide nall, or the thereupon?

WHether may it not be that the fire and spiritual power which it hath and is predominant translation it in it, being once provoked, and as it were angred, putteth footth it felfe fo much the followethon more, and mounteth upward?

50 Or because the poste or weight aforesaid forcing the boughes suddenly, oppresset and keepeth downe the airie substance which they have, and driveth all of it inward: but the same afterwards having refumed strength againe, maketh head afresh, and more egerly withstandeth the

Or lastly, the softer and more tender branches not able to susteine the violence at first, so foone as the burden resteth quiet, by little and little lift up themselves, and make a shew as if theyrose up against it.

33 What is thereason that pit-water is lesse nurritive than either that which arisethout of springs, or falleth downe from heaven?

I S it because it is more colde, and with all hath lefte aire in it?

Or, for that it conteineth much falt therein, by reason of such store of earth mingled there.

with: now it is well knowen, that falt above all other things caufeth leannesse.

Or because standing as it doeth still, and not exercised with running and stirring, it gettetha certaine malignant quality, which is hurtfull and offensive to all living creatures drinking thereof; for by occasion of that hurtfull qualitie, neither is it well concocted, nor yet can it 10 feed or nourish anything. And verily the same is the very cause that all dead waters of pooles and meares be unholfome, for that they cannot digeft and dispatch those harmefull qualities which they borrow of the evill propertie, either of aire or of earth.

Why is the west wind held commonly to be of all other the swiftest according to thu verse of Homes: Let us likewise bestir our feet, As fast as westerne winds do fleet.

 \mathbf{I} S it not thinke you, because this winde is woont to blow when the skie is very well clensed, 20 and the aire exceeding cleere and without all clouds; for the thicknesse and impuritie of the aire, doth not (I may fay to you) a little impeach and interrupt the course of the winds.

Or rather, because the funne with his beames striking through a cold winde, is the cause that it passeth the faster away; for what soever is drawen in by the restrigerative force of the windes, the fame if it be overcome by heat as his enemie, we must thinke is driven and set forward both farther, and also with greater celeritie.

m V Hether is it because the pores and passages of their vitall spirits be exceeding streight, 30 and if it chance that smoke be gotten into them and therekept in and intercepted, it is enough to stop the poore bees breath, yea and to strangle them quite?

Or is it not the actimony and bitterneffe (thinke you) of the finoke in cause? for bees are delighted with sweet things, and in very trueth they have no other nourishment, and therefore no marvell if they detelt and abhorre smoke, as a thing for the bitternesse most adverse and contrary unto them: and therefore hony mafters when they make a fmoke for to drive away bees, are woont to burne bitter herbes, as hemlock, centaury, &c.

14 but might be the reason that bees will sooner sting those who newly before have committed 40

S it not because it is a creature that woonderfully delighteth in puritie, cleanlinesse and elegancie? and withall the hath a marvellous quicke fense of smelling: because therefore such uncleane dealings betweene man and woman in regard of fleshly and beastly lust, immoderately performed, are wont to leave behind in the parties much filthineffe and impurity; the bees both fooner finde them out, and also conceive the greater hatred against them: heereupon it is that in Theoerissa the Shepherd after a merry and pleasant maner, fendeth Venus away into Anchifes to be well fluing with bees, for her adultery; as appeareth by these verses: 50

Now go thy wate to Ida mount, go to Anchifes now, Where mightie okes, where banks along of square Cypirus grow, Where hives and hollow truncks of trees, with hony sweet abound, Where all the place with humming noise of busie bees resound.

And Pindarus: Thou painfull bee, thou pretie creature, Who hony-combs fix angled, as they be, With feet doest frame, false Rhoecus and impure, With sting hast pricks for his leand villaning 37 What is the cause that dogges follow after a stone that is throwen at them, and biteth it, letting the man alone who flang it?

Sitbecause he can apprehend nothing by imagination, nor call a thing to minde: which are I gifts and vertues proper to man alone ? and therefore, feeing he can not difcerne nor conceive the partie indeed that offered him injurie, he supposed that to be his enemie which seemeth in his cie to threaten him, and of it he goes about to be revenged?

Or thinking the stone whiles it runnes along the ground, to be some wilde beast, according to his nature he intendeth to catch it first: but afterwards, when he feeth himselfe deceived and put besides his reckoning, he setteth upon the man?

Orrather, doth he not hate the stone and man both alike; but pursueth that onely which is next unto him?

What is thereason that at accretine time of the yeare, shee woolves doe all whelpe within the compaffe of twelve dates?

Ntipater in his booke containing the historie of living creatures, affirmeth, that shee A woolves exclude foorth their young ones about the time that mast trees doe shed their bloffomes; for upon the tafte thereof their wombs open: but if there be none of such blowmes to be had, then their yoong die within the bodie, and never come to light. He faith moreover, that those countries which bring not foorth oaks and mast, are never troubled nor spoiled with wolves. Some there be who attributeall this to a tale that goes of Latena; who being 30 with childe, and finding no abiding place of reft and fafetie by reason of Juno, for the space of twelve daies; during which time, the went to Delos, being transmuted by Jupiter into a wolfe, obteined at his hands, that all wolves for ever after might within that time be delivered of their

How commethit, that water sceming white aloft, sheweth to be blacke in the bottome ?

Sit, for that depth is the mother of darkeneffe, as being that which doth dimme and marre the Sunne beames before they can descend so low as it: as for the uppermost superficies of the water, because it is immediatly affected by the Sunne, it must need receive the white $4^{\rm o}$ brightnesse of the light , the which Empedocles verily approve h in these veries :

Ariver in the bottome seemes, by Shade of colour blacke; The like is seene in caves and holes, by depth, where light they lacke.

Or many times the bottome of the lea and great rivers being full of mud, doth by the reflexion of the Sunne-beames reprefent the like colour that the faid mud hath?

Or is not more probable, that the water toward the bottome is not pure and fincere, but corrupted with an earthly qualitie, as continually carying with it fomewhat of that, by which it runneth and wherewith it is stirred; and the same setling once to the bottome, causeth it to be more

PLATONIQVE QVE-STIONS.

The Summarie.

N these gatherings, Plutarch expoundeth the sense of divers hard places, which are found in the disputations of Socrates, conteined in the Dialogues of Plato his disple, but especially in Timacus; which may serve to allure young students to the reading of that great Philosopher, who under the barke of words, hath delivered grave and pleasant matters.

PLATONIQUE QUESTIONS.

What is the reason, that God other-whiles commanded Socrates to do the part of a Midwisein had ping others to be delivered of child-birth, but for had himsels in any wise to procreate children? according as it is written in a treatise entitled. The executs. For we ought not to thinke that if be had bene displosed to easyll toosels to specifically in this place, he would have a bussel the name of God. Besides, in this selfe same treasise he astribute th many other high and magniscall specehes unto Socrates, on namely this among many others: Certes (quoth he) there be many mengo (right good fir) who eary this minde to me-ward, that they are disposed plainly to carpe and bits me, in case at any time I seeme to rid them of any soldshopinion that they have, neither thinke they that I do it of good will and meaning well unto them; shewing therefoleves herein far short of this dostrine. That no God be are hevill will so men: no more verily do I this unto them upon any malice: but surely I can not otherwise chuse, neither doe I thinke it lawfull for me either to smoother up and pardon a lie, or to dissemble and suppressed trueth.

Sit for that he tearmeth his owne nature, as being more judicious

And Heraclitus :

Mans nature we must needs confesse, Is heavenly and a god doubtlesse.

Or rather in very trueth, there was some divine and celestial cause, which suggested and inspired into Socrates this maner of philosophy; whereby sisting as heedid continually, and examinate the source of the sou ning others, he cured them of all swelling pride, of vaine errour, of presumptuous arrogancy; likewise of being odious, first to themselves, and afterwards to those about them of their company: for it fortuned about his time, that a number of these sophisters swarmed over all orece, so unto whom yong gentlemen resorting & paying good summes of money for their salary, were filled with a great weening and opinion of themselves, with a vaine persuasion of their owne learning and zelous love to good letters, spending their time in idle disputations, and frivolous contentions, without doing any thing in the world, that was either good, honest, or profitable. Secrates therefore, who had a speciall gift by his maner of speech and discourse, as it were by some purgative medicine, to argue and convince, was of greater authority and credit when he confuted others, in that he never affirmed nor pronounced resolutely any thing of his owner yea, and hepierced deeper into the foules and hearts of his hearers, by how much he feemed to feeke out the trueth in common, and never to favorize and mainteine any opinion of his owne: for this begetting of a mans owne fanfies, mightily empeacheth the facultie and power to judge another, for evermore the lover is blinded in the behalfe of that which he loveth: and verily there is nothing in the world that loveth fo much the owne, as a man doth the opinions and reason whereof himselse was the father; for surely that distribution and partition among children which is commonly faid to be most and equall, is in this case of opinions and reasons most unjust; for in the former every one must take his owne, but in this hee ought to to chuse the better, yea, though it were another mans: and therefore once againe, he that fathereth fomewhat of his owne, becommeth the worle judge of other mens. And like as there was fometime a fophister or great learned man, who faid: That the Elians would be the better impires and judges of the facred Olympick games, in cafe there were never any Elian came in place to performe his prizes; even fo, he that would be a good prefident to fit and determine of divers fentences and opinions; no reason there is in the world that he thould defire to have his owner fentence crowned, no nor to be one of the parties contending, and who in truth are to be judged by him. The Grecian captaines after they had defaited the Barbarians, being affembled in counfell to give their voices unto those whom they deemed woorthy of reward and honour, for their proweffe; judged theinfelves all to have done the best fervice, and to be the most valorous 20 warriours. And of philosophers I affure you there is not one but he would doe as much, unleffeit were Socrates and fuch as he, who confesse that they neither have, nor know ought of their owne: for these in truth be they who onely thew themselves to be uncorrupt, and competent judges of the truth, and fuch as cannot be chalenged: for like as the aire within our eares if itbenot firme and fleady, nor cleere without any voice of the owne, but full of finging founds, and ringing noifes, cannot exactly comprehend that which is faid unto us; even to, that which isto judge of reasons in philosophie, if it meet with any thing that resoundeth and keepeth an hammering within, hardly will it be able to understand that which shall be delivered without foorth: for the owne particular opinion which is domesticall and dwelleth at home, of what matter foever it be that is treated of, will alwaies be the philosopher that hitteth the marke, and 20 toucheth the truth best; whereas all the rest shall be thought but to opine probably the trueth. Moreover, if it be true that a man is not able perfectly to comprise or know any thing, by good right and reason then did God forbid him to call forth these false conceptions as it were of untrue and unconstant opinions, and forced him to reproove and detect those who ever had fuch: for no fmall profit, but right great commoditie comes by fuch a speech as is able to deliver men from the greatest evill that is, even the spirit of error, of illusion and vanitie in opi-

So great a gift as God of special grace, Gave never to Asclepius hisrace,

For the phylicke of Socrates was not to heale the body, but to clenfe and purific the foule, feste-40 stered inwardly and corrupt. Contrariwise, if it be so, that the trueth may be knowen, and that there be but one truth, he who learned it of him that found it not out, hath no leffe than the inventer himselfe; yea,& better receiveth it he, who is not perswaded that he hath it: nay, he receiveth that which is fimply best of all: much like as hee who having no naturall children of his owne body begotten, taketh the best that he can chuse, for to make his adopted childe. But confider heere with me, whether other kinds of learning deferve not haply to have much fludy imploied in them, as namely, Poetry, Mathematicks, the art of Eloquence, and the opinions of Sophisters and great clearks: Therefore God of that divine power whatfoever, forbad Socrates to engender them; but as touching that which Socrates effected to be the onely wifedome, to wit, the knowledge of God and spiritual things, which hee himselfe calleth the amorous sci-50 ence; there be no men that beget or invent it, but call the fame onely to remembrance: whereupon Socrates himsele never taught any thing, but proposing onely unto yoong men certeine beginning of difficulties and doubts, as it were the fore throwes of child-birth, flirred up, awakened, and drew toorth their ownenaturall wits, and inbred intelligences: and this was it that he called the midwives art, which brought nothing into them from without, as others would make them beloeve, who conferred with them, that they infused reason and understanding, but shewed onely and taught them, that they had already within themselves a minde and understanding Platonique questions.

understanding of their owne, and the same sufficient to nourish, though it were consulted and unperfect.

What is thereason that in some places he called the soveraigne God, father and maker of all things?

As it for that he is intruced the father of gods, such as were ingendred, and also of men, as Homer called him, like as the maker of those creatives which have not the father of gods, such as were ingendred, and also of men, as Homer callethhim, like as the maker of those creatures which have neither reason nor foule? for according as Clay ppus faith, we use not to cal him the father of the secondine where. in the infant is inwrapped within the wombe, who conferred generall feed, although the faid fe-

Or uleth he not a metal-hor, as his maner is, when figuratively he tearmeth him Father of the condine be made of the feed. world, who is the efficient caufe, according to his ufuall maner of speaking; as namely, in the Dialogue entituled Sympolium, where he maketh Phedrus the father of amatorious discourses, for that he it was , whio proposed and set abroad the same : like as he named Callipedas in a dialogue bearing his name, The father of philosophicall discourses, for that there passed many beautifull speeches in philosophy, whereof he ministred the occasion and beginning?

Or rather was it not, because there is a difference betweene father and maker, as also betweene generation and creation for whatfoever is ingendred, is made, but not econverse, whatfoever is made, is likewife ingendred : femblably, who hath begotten, hath also made; for generation is the making of aliving creature : but if we confider a workeman, to wit, either a malon or carpenter, a weaver, a lute maker, or imager; certes, the worke is diffined and feparate from the maker: whereas the mooving principle, and the puissance of him who begetteth, is installed into that which is begotten; it contemeth his nature, being as it were a parcell distracted from the very fubthance of him who ingended it. For a funch then, as the world doth not refemble a conjunction of many pieces, fet, joined, fastened and glued together; but hath in it a great portion of the animall life, yea, and of divinity, which God hath infused and mingled in the matter, as derived from his ownernature and substance; good reason it is therefore, that he should be sumamed both the father and maker of the world, being a living creature as it is. These points being very conformable and proportionate to the opinion of Plato, confider withall a little, if this allo which I thall deliver, be not likewife accordant thereunto; namely, that the world being com- 30 posed of two parts, to wit, of body and of soule: the one, which is the body, God hath not ingendred; but having the matter thereof exhibited unto him, he hath formed, flaped and fitted it, binding and limiting it according to the infinitie thereof, with termes, bounds and figures proper thereto: but the foule having a portion of understanding discourse of reason, order and harmonie, is not onely the worke, but also a part of God, not by him, but even of him, and issuing from his owne proper substance. In his booke therefore of Politiques or Common wealth, having divided the whole world, as it were aline into two fegments or fections unequall, he subdivideth either section into other twaine, after the same proportion; for two generall kindsho maketh of all things; the one fentiale and visible, the other intelligible: unto the intelligible kinde he attributeth in the first degree the primitive formes and Idea; in the fecond degree, the 40 Mathematicks: and as for the fenfible kinde, he attributeth thereto in the first ranke, all solide hodies; and in the fecond place, the images and figures of them. Alfo to every one of these foure members of his faid divition, he given his owne proper judge: to the first of Idaes, underflanding; to the Mathematicks, imagination; to the folide bodies, faith and beleefe; to theimages and figures, conjecture. To what end then, and upon what intention hath he divided the whole world into two fections, and the fame unequalle and of those two sections, whether is the greater, that of fenfible objects, or that of intelligible ? As for himselfe, he hath not shewed and declared it but presently it wil appeare, that the portion of sensible things is the greater: for the indivitible fubftance is of things intellectuall, being evermore of one fort, and refting upon the fame subject in one state, and reduced to very short and narrowroome, and the same pure and 50 neat: whereas the other being spread and wandering upon bodies, is that section of sensible things. Morcover, the propertie of that which is incorporall, is to be definite and determinate. And a bodie as touching the matter thereof, is indefinite and undeterminate; becomming fenfiele, when by participation of the intelligible it is made finite and limitable. Over and belides, like as every femble thing hath many images, many fhadowes, and many figures, and general ly, out of one onely patterne there may be drawen many copies and examples, imitated as well by art as by nature; fo it cannot chuse, but the things that here be sensible, should be more in niber than they above, which are intelligible, according to the opinion of Plato, supposing this, that things sensible be as it were the images and examples of the original patterns, to wit, the intelligible Idea. Furthermore, the intelligence of these Idaes and formes by subtraction, deduction and division of bodies, is ranged answerable to the order of the Mathematicks, arising fro Arithmeticke which is the science of Numbers, into Geometry, to wit, the skill of measures; then afterwards to Astrologie, which is the knowledge of the stars, & in the highest place above all the rest, setteth Harmonica, which is the skill of sounds and accords: for the subject of Geometric is this, when as to quantity in generall, there is adjoined magnitude in length & bredth: 10 of Stereometrie, when to the magnitude of length and bredth, there is added depth or profunditie. Likewise, the proper subject of Astrology is this, when to the solid magnitude there cometh motion. The fubject of harmony or mulick, when to a bodic moving, there is adjoined found or voice. If we fubtract then and take away, from moving bodies, voice; from folid bodies, motion; from superficies, depth and profundity; and from quantities, magnitude; we shall come by this time to the intelligible Idea which have no difference among them, in regard of one and fole thing: for unitie maketh no number, unleffe it come once to touch binarie or two, which is infinite: but in this wife having produced a number, it proceedeth to points and pricks, from pricks to lines, and to forth from lines to superficies, from superficies to profundities; from thence to bodies, and so forward to the qualities of bodies subject to passions and alrerations. Moreover, 20 of intellectuall things, there is no other judge but the understanding or the mind; for cognation or intelligence, is no other thing but the understanding, so long as it is applied unto Mathematicals, wherein things intellectuall appeare as within mirrours; whereas, for the knowledge of bodies, by reason of their great number, nature hath given unto us five powers and faculties of severall and different senses for to judge withall: and yet sufficient they are not to discover all objects; for many there be of them fo * small, that they can not be perceived by the senses. And . Margarette

like as, although every one of us being composed of soule and bodie, yet that principall part, some reade which is our spirit and understanding, is a very small thing, hidden and inclosed within a great that is to say maffe of flesh; even so, very like it is, that there is the fame proportion within the univerfall they are so world, betweene things sensible and intellectuall for the intellectuall are the beginning of cor- farre off, 30 porall: now that which proceedeth from a beginning, is alwaies in number more, and in magnitude greater, than the faid beginning.

But on the contrary, a man may reason thus and say: First and formost, that in comparing sensible and corporall things with intellectuall, we doe in some fort make mortall things equal with devine, for God is to be reckened among intellectuals. Now this is to be granted, that the content is alwaies leffe then the continent; but the nature of the univerfall world, within the intellectuall, comprehendeth the sensible. For God having set the soule in the midst, hath spred and stretched it through all within, and yet without forth hath covered all bodies with it. As for the foule it is invisible, yea and inperceptible to all the natural fenses, according as he hath written in his booke of lawes : and therefore every one of us is corruptible; but the world 40 shall never perish: for that in each of us that which is mortall and subject to diffolution, containeth within it the power which is vitall; but in the world it is cleane contrary, for the principall puiffance and nature, which is ever after one fort immutable, and doth alwaies preferve the corporall part, which it containeth and imbraceth within it felfe. Besides, in a bodily nature and corporall, a thing is called individuall and importible for the smallnesse therof, to wit, when it is so little that it cannot be devided, but in the spirituall and incorporall, it is so called for the fimplicity, fincerity & purity thereof, as being exempt from all multiplicity & diverfity : for otherwise folly it were to cast a guesse at spirituall things by corporal. Furthermore the very prefent time which we call Now, is faid to be inpartible and indivisible: howbeit, instant together it is every where, neither is their any part of this habitable world without it : but all passions, all 50 actions, all corruptions & generations throughout the world are comprised in this very present Now. Now the onely instrument to judge of things intellectuall is the understanding, like as the eie, of light; which for fimplicity is uniforme, & every way like unto it selfe: but bodies having many diversities & differences, are comprehended by divers instruments, & judged some by this, and others by that. And yet some there be who unwoorthily disesteeme and contemne the intellectuall puissance and spirituall which is in us: for in truth, being goodly and great, it furmounteth every fensible thing and reacheth up as farre as to the gods. But that which of all others is most, himselfe in his booke entituled Symposium, teaching how to use love and love matters, in withdrawing the foule from the affection of beauties corporall, and applying the fame to those which are intellectuall, exhortest us not to subject and inthrall our selves into the lovely beauty of any body, nor of one study and science, but by erecting and lifting up our mindes a lost from such base objects, to turne unto that vast ocean indeed of pulcritude and beauty, which is vertue.

How commeth it to passe, that considering he assume the vermore the soule to be more ancient than the body, as the very cause of the generation of it, and the beginning likewise thereof spea contrarivise be saith, that the soule was never without the bodie, nor the understanding without the soule, and that of necessitie the soule must be within the bodie, and the understanding in the soule for it seems to that he tere in there is some contradiction; namely, that the body both is, and to not, in case the true, that it is together with the soule, and yet neverthess singendred by the soule?

I Sit bocause that is true which we oftentimes doe say? namely, that the soule without understanding and the body without forme have alwaies beene together, & neither the one nor the other had ever commensiment of being nor beginning of generation; but when the soule came to have participation of understanding and of harmonic, and became to be wise by the meanes of consonance and accord, then caused she mutation in matter, and being more powerfull and strong in her owne motions, drew and turned into her the motions of the other? and even so the society of the world had the first generation from the soule, whereby it was shaped and made uniforme. For the soule of her selfe, brought not foorth the nature of a body, not created it of nothing, but of a body without all order and forme whatsoever, he made it orderly and very obeisant: as if one said that the force of a seed or kernell is alwaies with the bodie, but yet nevertheless the body of the sig tree or olive tree is engendred of the seed or kernell, he should not speake contrarieties: for the very body it selfe being mooved and altered by the seed, springesh and groweth to be such: semblably the matter void of forme and indeterminate, having once bene shapen by the soule, which was within, received such a forme and disposition.

• What is the reason, that whereas there be bodies and figures some consisting of right lines and there of circular, he hath taken for the foundation and beginning of those which stand of right lines, the triangle Hoccles, with two equals sides, and scalenum, with three sides all unequals. Of which, the triangle with two even legs composed the cube or square bodie, which is the element and principle of the earth: and the triangle with three enequals legs made the pyramidal body, as also octaedron with eight saces, and coloradorn with swenty saces whereof the first the element and seed of sive, the second of aire, and the third of water: and yet he hat bover passed quite all bodies and sigures circular: not with standing that he made mention of the sphericall sigure or round body when he said that every one of those sigures above named is apt to divide a globe or sphericall body into equall parts?

Is it as some doe imagine and suppose, because he attributed the Dodecaedron, that is to say, the body with twelve faces unto the globe or round sphære, in saying that God made use of this forme and figure, in the framing of the world? for in regard of the multitude of elements, and bluntnesse of angles, it is farthest off from direct and right lines, whereby it is shexible, and by stretching foorth round in maner of a ball made of twelve pieces of leather, it approchet neerest unto roundnesse, and in that regard is of greatest capacitie; for it conteined twenty angles solid, and every one of them is comprized and environed within three state obtained by the sum of the sum

Or may not this be the reason, that by nature the right goeth before the round? or rather, to speake more truely, that a circular line seemeth to be some vicious passion or faulty qualitie of the right, for we use ordinarily to say, that the right line doth bow or bend; and a circle is drawen and

and described by the center, and the distance from it to the circumference, which is the verice place of the right line, by which it is measured out; for the circumference is on every fide equally distant from the center. Moreover, the Conus, which is a round pyramys; and the Cylindre, which is as it were a round columne or pillar of equal compaffe, are both made of figures withdirect lines, the one, to wit, the Conus, by atriangle, whereof one fide remaineth firme, and the other with the base goeth round about it: the Cylindre, when the same befalleth to a parallell. Moreover, that which is leffe, commeth neerest unto the beginning, and resembleth it most : but the least and simplest of all lines is the right; for of the round line that part which is within, doth crooke and curbe hollow, the other without doth bumpe and bunch. Over and beto fides, numbers are before figures, for unity is before a pricke; feeing that a pricke is in position and fituation an unity, but an unity is triangular, for that every number triangular, eight times repeated or multiplied, by addition of an unity becommeth quadrangular, and the same also befalleth to unity; and therefore a triangle is before a circle, which being fo, the right line goethbefore the circular. Moreover, an element is never divided into that which is composed of it:burcontrariwife, every thing else is divided and resolved into the owne elements whereof it doth confift. If then the triangle is not refolved into any thing circular; but contrariwife, two diametres croffing one another, part a circle just into fower parts; then we must needs inferre the figure confifting of right lines, went before those which are circular: now that the right line goeth first, and the circular doth succeed and follow after, Flato himselfe bath shewed 20 by demonstration, namely when hee faith, that the earth is composed of many cubes or fquare folid bodies, whereof every one is enclosed, and contained with right lined superfices, in such maner disposed, as yet the whole body and masse of the earth seemeth round like a globe, fo that we need not to make any proper element thereof round; if it be fo that bodies with right lines, conjoined and fet in fome fort one to another, bringeth forth this former Over and besides the direct line, be it little or be it great, keepeth alwaies the same rectitude: whereas contrariwise we see the circumferences of circles if they be small, are more coping, bending, and contracted in their outward curvature: contrariwife, if they be great, they are more extent, lax, and fpred, infomuch as they that fland by the outward circumference of circles, lying upon a flat fuperfices, touch the fame underneath, partly by a pricke if they be final, 30 and in part by a line if they be large; fo as a man may very well conjecture, that many right lines joined one to another taile to taile by piece-meale, produce the circumference of a circle. But confider whether therebe none of these our circular or sphæricall figures, exquisitely and exactly perfect; but in regard of the extentions and circumtentions of right lines, or by reafon of the exilitie and smalnesse of the parts, there can be perceived no difference, and thereupontheresheweth a circular and round figure: And therefore it is, that there is not a bodie heere, that by by nature doth moove circularly, but all according to the right line; fo that the round and sphericall figure is not the element of a sensible body, but of the soule and understanding, unto which he attributeth likewife the circular motion as belonging unto them naturally.

In what sense and meaning delivered he this speech in his booke entituled Phædrus, that the nature of a wing, where by that which is heavy and ponderous, is caried up alost, of all other things that belong unto a body, hath a certeine communion and participation with God?

Is it because he discourse the there of love; and love is occupied about the beauty of the body, and this beauty for the resemblance that it hath to divinity, doth moove the minde, and excite the reminiscence thereof?

Or rather are we to take it fimply without curious fearching farther into any mystery thereof namely, that the soulebeing within the body, hath many faculties & powers, whereof that which is the discourse of reason and understanding, doth participate with the deitie, which hee so notunproperly and impertinently tearmeth a wing, because it lifteth up the soule from things base and mortall, unto the consideration of heavenly and celestiall matters.

How sist that Plato in some places saith, the Anteperistalis of motion, that is to say, the circumflant contrariety debarring a body to moove, in regard that there is no voidnesse or vacuity in nature, is the cause of those effects which we see in physicians ventoses and cupping glasses of swallowing downe our viands, of throwing of massy waights, of the course and convetance of wa-Rrr ters ters of the fall of lightenings, of the attraction that amber maketh of the drawing of the loaeflone, and of the accord and consonance of voices? For it seemeth egainst all reason to yeeld one onely cause, for so many effects so divers and so different in kinde. First as touching the respiration in living creatures, by the anteperistass of the aire, he hath elsewhere sufficiently declared, but of the other effects, which seeme as he saith to be miracles, and woonders in nature, and are nothing, for that they be nought else but bodies reciprocally and by alternative course, driving one another out of place round about, and musually succeeding in their roomes, he hat hieft for to be discussed by us, bow each of them particularly is done?

If It and formost for ventoses and cupping glasses thus it is. The aire that is contained with to in the ventose, stricking as it doth into the sless, being instanced with heat, and being now more fine and subtil than the holes of the brasse (box or glasse) whereof the ventose is made, getteth forth, not into a void place, for that is impossible, but into that other aire which is round about the said ventose without forth, and driven the same from it; and that forceth other before it, and thus as it were from hand to hand, whiles the one giveth place, and the other driveth continually, and so entreth into the vacant place which the first left, it commeth at length to fall upon the slesh which the ventose stricketh fast unto, and by heating and inchassing, it expresses the humor that is within, into the ventose or cupping vessell.

The fwallowing of our victuals is after the fame maner, for the cavities as well of the mouth as of the fromacke, be alwaies full of aire: when as then, the meat is driven within the paffage or 20 gullet of the throat, partly by the rongue and partly by the glandulous parts or kernelles called tonfells, and the micles which now are fireteched, the aire being preffed and firained by the faid meat, followeth it hard as it giveth place, and flicking close, it is a meanes to helpe for to drive it downeward.

Semblably the waighty things that be flung, as bigge ftones and fuch like, cut the aire and divide it, by reason that they were fent out and levelled with a violent force; then the aire all about behind, according to the nature thereof, which is to follow where a place is left vacant and to fill tup, pursue the mastle or waight aforesaid that is lanced or discharged forcibly, and setted forward the motion thereof.

The shooting and ejaculation of lightening is much what after the maner of these waights so throwen in maner aforesaid, for being enslamed and set on a light site, it shatheth out of a cloud by the violence of a stroke, into the aire, which being once open and broken, givith place unto it, and then closing up together above it, driveth it downe forcibly against the owne nature.

As for amber, we must not thinke that it draweth any thing to it of that which is presented before it, no more than doth the lode stone; neither that any thing comming nere to the one or the other, leapeth thereupon. But first, as touching the faid stone; it sendeth from it I wot not what ftrong and flatuous fluxions, by which the aire next adjoining giving backe, driveth that which is before it; and the fame turning round and reentring againe into the void place, doth thrult from it and withall carry with it the yron to the stone. And for amber it hath likewise a certeine flagrant and flatulent spirit, which when the out-fide thereof is rubbed, it putteth forth by reason 40 that the pores thereof are by that meanes opened. And verily that which iffueth out of it, worketh in some measure the like effect that the Magnet or lode stone did: and drawen there are unto it fuch matters neere at hand as be most light and dry, by reason that the substance comming thereof is but flender and weake: neither is it felfe ftrong not hath fufficient waight and force, for to chale and drive before it a great deale of aire, by means whereof it might overcome greater things, as the lode-stone doth. But how is it that this aire driveth and sendeth before it neither wood nor stone, but yron onely, and so bringeth it to the Magnet? This is a doubt and dificulty that much troubleth all those who suppose that this meeting and cleaving of two bodies together, is either by the attraction of the stone, or by the natural motion of the yron. Yron is neither fo hollow and spungeous as is wood, nor so fast and close, as is gold or stone, but it 50 hath small holes, passages and rough aspecties, which in regard of the unequality are well proportionate and fortable to the aire, in fuch wife, as it runneth not eafily through, but hath certaine staies by the way to catch hold of, so as it may stand steady and take such sure footing, as to be able to force and drive before it the yron untill it have brought it to kiffe the lode-frone. And thus much for the causes and reasons that may be rendred of these effects.

As confidering the running of water above ground, by what maner of comprefition and coarctation roud about, it should be performed it is not so easy either to be perceived or declared.

Butthus much we are to learne, that for waters of lakes, which stirre not but continue alwayes in one place, it is because the aire, spred all about, and keeping them in on every side, mooveth not nor leaveth unto them any vacant place. For even fo the upper face of the water, as well in lakes as in the sea, riseth up into waves and billowes, according to the agitation of the aire; for the water still followeth the motion of the aire, and floweth or is troubled with it, by reason of the inequalities. For the stroke of the aire downeward maketh the hollow dent of the wave : but as the same is driven upward it causeth the swelling and furging tumor of the wave untill such time as all the place above containing the water be fetled and laied, for then the waves also doe ceale, and the water likewife is still and quiet. But now for the course of waters which glide and to run continually above the face of the ground: the cause thereof is because they alwaies follow hardafter the aire that giveth way and yet are chased by those behinde by compression and driving forward, and to by that meanes maintaine a continuall streame that never resteth: which is the reason also that great rivers when they are full and doe overflow the banks, run with a more fwiftand violent streame : and contrariwise when there is but a little water in the chanell, they glide more flowly, because the aire before doth nothing to much give place, for that they are more feeble: neither is there fo great an antiperistasis to urge and presse them forward; and even fothe spring waters must of necessity boile and rife upward, for that the outward airc entering closely into the void hollow places within the ground fendeth up againe the water forth.

The paved floore of a darke close house, contening in it a great deale of flill aire, without any winde from without entring into it, if a man doe call water upon it, engendreth presently a winde and colde vapour; by reason that the aire is displaced and removed out of his sear, by the water which fell, and is thereby beaten, and receiveth the stroake and dint thereof. For this is the nature of them, to drive one another, and likewise to give place one to the other interchangeably, admitting in no wise any emprinesse, wherein the one of them should be so settled, as that it did not reciprocally seele the change and alteration of the other.

To come now unto the above named lymphonic and confonance, himfelfe hath declared how it is that that founds and voices do accord: for the finall and treble is quicke and fivilf; whereas the bigge and bafe is heavie and flow. And thereupon it is, that finall and thrill founds do move the fentle of hearing before others: but if when these begin to fall and decay, the flow 30 and base begin to succeed and receive then the mixture and temperature of them both, by a kind of conformitie yeeldeth a delight and pleasure to the eare, which they call a symphonic or accord. And that hereof the aire is the instrument, it may evidently appeare by that which we have said already: for voice is a stroake or percussion by the aire of that which the eare doth heare; so that the institute by motion, so it frikethagaine the auditoric organ forcibly, if the motion be quicke; and gently, if the same bestow: and that which is stricken forcibly with a violence, commeth first into the sense of hearing, but afterwards, turning about and meeting with that which is more flow, it followeth and accompanieth the sense.

40 What is the meaning of Timzeus, when he faith: That the foules are differfed and fowen (as it were) upon the ground the moone and all other instruments of time what sever.

Is it because he was of opinion, that the earth did move like unto the funne, moone and other five planets, which he calleth the instruments of time, because of their conversions? and held besides, that we ought notto imagine the earth so framed, as if it were firme and immoveable, fast fixed and perpetually to the axlettee or pole that passet theorew the world; but that it turneth round in maner of a wheele: like as afterwards Aristarchia and Seleucia have themed; the one supposing it onely, the other affirming so much statly. To say nothing of that which Theophias wrote; namely, how Platotoward the latter end of his daies, repented that he had associated with the center and middle of the world, a place twis unfit and unmeet for it?

Ortather, because this is directly repugnant unto many sentences which this philosopher undoubtedly held, we ought therefore to change the writing of this place of Timesus, by putting the dative case in stead of the generic yea, with a property of the sentences of time, not the planets of startes, but the bodies of living creatures; according as Assistant before the sold, the sold of a bodie, Naturall, Organicall, having sife potentially: so that the sentence in the forestaid place should be read thus; The soules have been differentiated and sowen by time in organicall bodies, meet and agreeable for them. And yet even this also is contrary unto his own-opinion: for that not in one onely place, but in many, he hath called the startes, instruments of time, considering that he affirment that the very sume was made to distinguish and keepe the number of time with other planets. The best way is therefore to understand, That the earth is the instrument of time, not because it moveth as doe the startes, but for that so continuing as it doeth, alwaies firme and steady in itselfe, it gives meanes unto the startes moving round about it, to rise and to fall; whereby are limited the day and the night, which are the first measures of time: and therefore himselfe hath called it the Guardien, yea, the A-tizan in deed and right truely of night and day: for the Gnomons in Sun dials, not moving with the shadowes, but standing still and keeping their place, are the instruments and measures of time, representing the obstacle of the earth opposite unto the Sun mooto to ving round about it; like as Empedoeles stath:

The earth fet just twixt Sun beames and our sight, Shuts up the day and bringeth in the night.

And thus much for the enodation of this knot. But haply this a man may doubt to be a strange and absurd speech, to say that the Sun, together with the Moone & the planets, were made for diffinction of times: for otherwise by it felle. great is the dignitic of the Sun; and Plato himselfe in his books of Common wealth, calleth him the king and lord of all the sensible world, like as Good he pronounceth to be the sovereign of the intelligible world. And the Sun (faith he) is the very iffue extract from that Good, gi. ving unto things visible, together with their apparance, being also, & subsistance; like as Good 20 giveth unto intelligible things this gift, both to have a being, and also to be knowen. Now, that God having such puissance and so great, should be the instrument of time, and an evidentrule and measure of the difference that is of swiftnesse or of slownesse among the eight heavenly fphæres, seemeth not very decent; no nor any consonant to reason. It remaineth therefore thus much to fay, those who trouble themselves about these points, for very ignorance are deceived, supposing that time according to the definition of Aristotle, is the measure of motion, and the number in regard of prioritic and posteriority: or the quantity in motion after the opinion of Speulippus: or elfe the distance of motion, and no other thing, as the Stoicks describe it, desining forfooth one accident, but never comming neere unto the substance and power thereof, which as it should seeme, the poet Pindarus imagined and conceived not amisse when he said: 20

In right of age, time hath thu ods,

That is surpassed all the gods.

Pythagor as also, who being asked what time was ? answered: The soule of the heaven: for time be it what it will be, is not some accident or passion of any motion, but it is the cause, the pussion and the principle of that proportion, and order that conteineth and heldeth together all things, according to which, the nature of the world, and this whole universality, which also is animate, doth move, or rather the very same proportion it selfe and order which doth moove, is the thing that we call time:

For walke it doth with filent pace, In way where as no noife is made: Conducting justly to their place, All mortall things that paffe and fade.

And verily according to the minde of auncient philosophers, the substance of the soule was defined to be a number mooving it selfe; which is the reason why Plato said: That time and heaven were made together; but motion was before heaven, at what time as there was no heaven at all; for why, there was no order nor measure whatsoever, no nor any distinction, but an undeterminate motion, like as the matter was rude without forme & sigure: but after that nature once had cast this matter into a colour, and had shaped it with forme and figure, and then determined motion with periodicall revolutions, she made withall, both the world and time both at once; which two are the very images of God: to wit, the world of his substance, and time of so his eternitie; for God in that he mooveth, is time, and in that he hath being, is the world. This is the reason why he saith: That both of them comming together, shall likewise-both be dissolved together, in case that ever there will be any dissolution of them. For that which had a beginning and generation, cannot be without time, no more than that which is intelligible without eternity; in case the one is to continue for ever, and the other being once made, shall never perish and be dissolved. Time then being so necessarily linked and interlaced with the heaven, is not simply a motion, but as we have said already, a motion ordeined by order, which hath a just measure, set limits and bonds, yea and certeine revolutions; of all which, the sume being superintendent, governour and directour, for to dispose, limit, and digest all; for to discover, set out and show, the alterations and seasons the which bring sooth all things, as Herallia sith: consessed it must be, that he is a workeman cooperant with that chiese and soverages God, the prince of all, not in petie, base, and frivolous things, but in the greatest and most principall works that be.

Plate in his books of common-wealth, having excellently well compared the fymphony of the three faculties & powers of the foule, to wit, the reasonable, the irascible & concupici-10 ble, unto the mulicall harmony of the notes, Mefe, Hypate, and Nete, hath given occasion for aman to doubt, whether hee fet the irafcible or reasonable part, correspondent to the meane? feeing that he shewed not his meaning in this present place; for according to the situation of the parts of the body, wherein these faculties are seated, furely the couragious and irascible is placed in the middes, and answered to the region of Mese the meane: but the reasonable is ranged into the place of Hypate: for that which is aloft, first and principall our auncestours used to call Hypaton: according to which fense Xenoerates calleth Jupiter or the aire (that I meane which converfeth above where all things continue the fame, and after one fort) Hypatos; like as that which is under the moone, Neatos. And before him Homer speaking of the toveraigne God and prince of princes, faith thus to dire xperbrary, that is to fay, our foveraigne and fupreme 20 of all rulers. And in trueth, nature hath by very good right given unto the best part of the foule, the highest place in lodging the discourse of reason, as the governour of the rest within the head; but hath removed farre from thence to the base and inferior members, the concupiscible: for the low situation is called Neate, according as appeareth by the denomination of the dead, who are tearmed Nepress and Ever, that is to fay, inferior or infernall: and for this cause, some there be who say, that the winde which bloweth from beneath, and out of placesunfeene, that is to fay, from the pole Antarticke, is called None, that is to fay, the fourth, Since then it is fo, that there is the fame proportion of contrariety between econcupifcible and reasonable parts of the soule, as there is betweene lowest and highest, last and first; it is not posfible, that reason should be the highest and principall, and not withall, correspondent to Hygopate, but to some other note in musicke: for they who attribute unto her as unto the principall faculty and power Mefe, that is to fay, the meane, fee not (ignorant as they be) how they take from her that which is more principall, to wit, Hypate, which cannot fit well either with ire or luft, for both these, the one and the other are made for to follow, and be commanded by reason, and not to command or goe before reason. Moreover, it should seeme by nature, that anger ought to have the meane and middle place, confidering that naturally reason is to command; and anger both to command and be commanded, as being on the one fide fubject to the discourse of reason, and on the other side, commanding lust, yea, and punishing it, when the is disobedient to reason. And like as in grammar, those letters which wee call semivowels, be of a middle nature, betweene mute confonants and vowels: for that as they found 40 more than the one, fo they found leffe than the other: even fo in the foule of man, wrath is not fimply a meere paffion, but hath many times an apparence of duty and honefty mixed with defire of revenge. And Plate himselfe comparing the substance of the soule unto a couple of hotles drawing a chariot, and guided by a chariot man, who driveth them, and understandeth by the driver & guide, as every man well knowes the discourse of reason: now of the two steeds, that of lusts and pleasures is frampold, skittish, flinging, winsing, unruly altogether, and unbroken, stiffenecked, deafe, hardly caring either for whip or spurre; where as the other of ire, is for the most part tractable, and obeisant to the bridle of reason, yea, and ready to joine with it in execution of good things. And like as in a chariot with two horses, the driver or chariot-man is not in vertue and puissance the middle, but rather one of the horses, which is woorse than the 50 chariot man, and better than his fellow that draweth with him: even fo likewise hath not he given the middle place unto that part which doth rule and governe in the foule, but unto that wherein there is leffe paffion than in the first, and more reason than in the third: for this order and disposition observeth the proportion of the irascible to the reasonable part, as is of Diatellaron to Hypate; and to the concupifcible, as Dapente to Nete: also of the reasonable Part to the concupifcible, as Hypate to Nete, which is Dia pason: But if we draw reason and the discourse thereof to the meane, anger shall be farther off from lust and concupiscence, which Rrtt 3 fome of the philosophers held to be one and the selfe-same thing, for the great similitude and resemblance betweene them.

Orrather, it is but a ridiculous thing to attribute unto the places, first, middet, and last. feeing (as we do) how in a harpe, lute, or stringed instrument, Hypate hath the first and highest place; but in flutes and pipes the lowest & the last: furthermore, the meane in what place soever of the harpe or lute you fet it, you shal find it foundeth alwaies the same note still, to wit, smaller than Hypate, & bigger than Neresfor the very eie it felfe hath not the fame fituation in al creatures, but in any creature, and in what place foever it is fet according to nature, alwaies it is or. deined and made for to fee. Like as therefore the pædagogue or governour of youth, who or dinarily commeth behinde, and goeth not before his children, is notwithstanding faid to lead to and guide them: And the captaine of the Trojanes in Homer:

Who with the formost in the front, sometimes appeer'd in sight, And in the receivard other whiles, his men strr'dup to fight. As well in the one part as the other, was alwaies the chiefe, and had the principall power: even fowe ought not to force the parts of the foule to any places or names, but to examine and fearch the power and proportion of them; for that the discourse of reason in situation should be fer in the first and principall place of mansbody, falleth out accidentally: but the first and principall power it hath, as being Mele or the meane, in regard of Hypate, the concupifible 20 part; and Nete the irafcible, by letting downe and fetting up, by making confonance and accord, by taking from the one and the other that which is excessive; and againe, by not suffring them either to be let loofe and flacke altogether, or to lie afleepe: for mediocrity and a competent temperature, is limited by a meane; or rather to speake more properly, a principall piece of worke this is, and a fingular gift and puiffance of reason, to make and imprint in passions, meanes and mediocrities, if we may fo fay, which are called holy and facred, confifting in a temperature of two extremities with reason, yea and betweene them both by the meanes of reason: for the teeme of two steeds hath not for the meane & in the middest, that of two which is better: neither are we to imagine, that the government of them is one of the extremities; but rather we ought to thinke, that it is the middes and mediocritic betwixt the immoderate ce-20 leritie or flownesse of the two steeds; like as the power of reason which holdeth in the passions when they stirrewithout measure and reason, and by composing and framing them unto her in measurable proportion, setteth downe a mediocritic and meane betweene too much, and over little, betweene excesse (I say) and defect.

What is the reasons hat Plato Saith: Our speech is tempered and composed of nownes and of verbes? for he seemesh so make no account of all other parts of speech be side these two: and to thinke that Homer in a gallant youthfull humour to shew his fresh wit affected to thrust them all eight into this one ver le:

* duris leur xxiorius, ro cor yepas, opp di eid es,

For heere you have a Pronoune, a Participle, a Nowne, a Verbe, a Preposition, an Article, a Conjunction, and an Adverbe for the Participle, se, is put in stead of the Preposition is, that is to fay, to: and xxioilude, that is to fay, to thy tent, is after the maner of abluage, that is to fay, to Athens: But what shall we answer in the behalfe of Plato.

ving the time Sit for that in olde time they called that winn Abpen, that is to fay, the first speech, which then as it flands, it was named netruns, that is to fay, a proposition, and now they tearme attours, that is to fay, digto be done in nitie: which when they utter first, they either lie or speake trueth. And this proposition is compounded of a Nowne and a verbe, whereof the one is called by the Logicians, refers, that is to fay, 50 the case; the other, yangfengua, that is to say, the predicable or pradicatum. For when we heare one fay, Socrates teacheth; and againe, Socrates is turned; we fay the one is true, and the other is falle: and we require no more words. For it is probable that men at the first had need of speech and voice articulate, when they were defirous to explaine and fignific one unto another the actions and the persons and the doers thereof: like as the passions and the persons who suffer the same. For almuch then, as by the Verbe we expresse sufficiently the actions and passions;

andby the Nowne, the perfons doing or fuffering according as he himfelfe faith; it feemeth that thele be the two parts of speech that he meaneth: as for the rest, a man may well and truely fay, that they fignific nothing, no more than doe the groanes, fighes and lamentations of plaiers in a tragoedie, yea, and many times iwis, a finile, a reticence or keeping filence, which otherwhiles may well expresse a speech, and make it more emphaticall; but surely, no necessarie and fignificative power have they to declare ought, like as the Verbe & the Nowne hath: onely they lerve as acceffary adjuncts, to vary, illustrate & beautifie the speech; like as they also diverfife the very letters, who put to their spirits and aspirations, their accents also to some, whereby they make them long & thort, and reckon them for elements & letters indeed, whereas they be 10 pullions, accidents, & divertifications of elements, rather than diffinet elements by themselves, as it appeareth manifestly by this, that our ancients contented themselves sufficiently to speake and write with fixteene letters and no more. Moreover, confider and fee whether we doe not take the words of Plato otherwife than he delivered them; when he faith that the speech is tempered of these two parts, and not by them. Take heed (I fay) we commit not the same errour ashedoth, who should cavill and finde fault with one for faying, that such an ointment or salve was made of wax and galbanum, alledging against him for so saying, that he left out fire and the veffell, without which a manknoweth not how to temper the faid fimples or drogues: for even fo, if we should reproove him because he omitted the naming of Conjunctions, Prepositions and other parts of speech, we were likewise to be blamed for in trueth, a speech or sentence is 20 not compounded of these parts, but by them and not without them. For like as he, who should pronounce fimply these Verbs, To beat, or To be beaten; or otherwise these bare Nownes, Sotrates or Pythagor as; giveth fome light (fuch as it is) of a thing to be conceived & understood: but he that should come out with these odde words, For, or Of, and say no more, a man can not Alisa see. imagine what he meaneth thereby, nor gather any conception either of action or of body; for if there be not some other words pronounced with them or about them, they resemble naked founds and vaine noises without any fignifications at all: for that neither by themselves alone, norone with another, it is possible that they should betoken any thing. Nay, admit that we should conjoine, mingle and interlace together Conjunctions, Articles and Prepositions all in one, minding to make one entire bodie of them all, we shall seeme rather to creake than speake: 20 but so soone as a Verbe is joined to a Nowne, that which resulteth thereupon is immediatly a fentence and fignificant speech. And therefore not without good reason some doe thinke that these two (to speake properly) be the onely parts of speech. And peradventure Homer had some fuch meaning, and gave us fo much to understand, by faying in fo many places,

> He spake the word, and with the same, Immediatly out came the name.

ETOS T Epat, ch T ovona (ev.

For by was, that is to fay, the word; his maner is to fignific a Verbe: as namely in this other verfe, છે ગુર્યાલા માં દાવંત્રલ કેંજ જ દેશા ઉપાયમ મુદ્દેક કરામદક.

Now furely woman, much to blame thou art, This word to speake, it strikes so to my hart.

χαίρε πάτερ ὧ ξείνε, έπις δ' είτορτι λελεκ) θεινόν, άφαρ τὸ ρέξοιεν αναρπάζαπα άκλλαι. Adieu good Father; guest and friend

Farewell: And if some wordunkind Hath bene let fall, I wish it may By winds and stormes be caught away.

For furely it is neither Conjunction, Article, nor Preposition, that can be said either unkinde or to touch the heart, but some Verbe fignifying a shainefull deed, proceeding from an unde-50 centand dishonest passion. And therefore you see how we are woont to praise poets and historiographers, or otherwife to blame and difpraise them, faying in this wife: Such a poet hath ufed Atticke Nownes and elegant Verbs: and contrariwife, Such an historiographer hath used triviall and base Nownes and Verbs. And no man will say that either Euripides or Thueydides wrote a stile confissing of Articles that were homely and base, or otherwise elegant and Atticke.

How then (may some one say) serve these parts to no purpose in our speech? Yes iwis say I, even as much as falt in our meats, or water for our bread and gruell, Euenus was wont to fay that firealfo was an excellent kinde of fauce: and even fo be these parts of speech the seasoning of our language, like as fire and falt of our broths and viands, without the which we can not well do: and yet our speech doth not alwaies of necessitie stand in need of them: for so me thinks I may very well affirme of the Romane language, that all the world I see in maner wheth at this day: for the Romans take away all Prepositions, except a very sew; and as for those that be called Articles, they admit not so much as one, but whether Nownes plaine, and as one would say, without skirts and borders. Whereat we may wonder the lesse, considering that Homer, who for trimme and beautifull verses surpassed all other poets, set to very sew Nownes any Articles as eares unto cups and other vessels, for to take hold by, or as pennaches and cress upon morions: and therefore looke in what verses he wieth so to doe, be sure they were of speciall marke, or els suppositions and suspected to be none of his making. As for example:

สมสาก วิ ผสภารณ อินาร อองา วิขานอง อัยางร

ποίειν, ορραποκήτ Φ έπεκπείφυρων αλέοιτω.

This did he that, by flying thus apace,

He might escape the whale that was in chace.

And a few others befides these. But in the rest which are innumerable, although there be no Atticle, yet the phrase of speech is thereby nothing diminished or hurt either in beautie or perspicuitie. And thus we see, that neither living creature, if it be maimed or dismembred, nor instrument, nor armour, nor any thing in the world whatsoever, by the want and defect of any proper part belonging thereto, is the more beautifull or active thereby, neither more pleasant than it was therefore: whereas a speech or sentence, when all the Conjunctions be taken quite away, is many times more emphaticall, yea, and carieth a power and efficacie more patheticall and apter to move and affect, as this:

One found, unhurt she catching fast, another wounded new, Alive she held, another dead, in sight by heeles she drew.

Now whereas logicians have more need than any other profeffours in learning of Comjunctions copulatives, for to knit and connex their propositions or disjunctives, to disjoine and distinguish them; like as waine men or carters have need of yokes or geeres; or as Utifies 50 had of osters in Cyclops his cave to binde his sheepe together: This doth not argue, nor proove that the Conjunction is a substantiall member or part of speech; but a prety instrument and meanes to binde and conjoine according as the very name of it doth import, and to keepe and hold together not all words or sentences indifferently, but such alone as are not simply speken: unlesse unlesse unlesse unlesse unlesse and any speaken of the faid packe, or the paste and glue a part of the booke; or donatives and largess, a part of politike government; like as Demades was woontto say: That the dole of mony distributed by the poll to the citizens in the theaters for to fee the plaies, was the very glew of the popular State. And tell me what conjunction is that which will make of many propositions one, by couching and knitting them together, as the marble doth unite the iron that is calt and melted with it by the fire; and yet I trow no man will fay, that the marble for all that is part of the iron, or to to be called. Howbeit, such things verily as enter into a composition, and which beliquested together with the drogues mingled therewith; are wontafter a fort to doe and inferreciprocally from the ingredients. But as for these conjunctions, there be who deny that they doe unite any one thing, saying: That this maner of speaking with conjunctions is no other but accrreince enumeration, as if a man should reckon in order all our magistrates, or some the daies of a moneth.

Moreover, of all other parts of speech; it is very evident; that the Pronouncis a kinde of Noune, not onely in this respect, that it is declined with cases, as the Nouncis; but also for that some of them being pronounced and uttered of things and persons determinate, doe make a most proper demonstration of them accordant to their nature: neither can I see, how he who hath expressly named Socrates, hath declared his person more, than hee who said: This man

To come now unto that which they tearme a Participle, furely it is a very medly and mixture of a Noune and a Verbe, and not a part of speech substitute alone of it selfe, no more than those Nounes or names which are common to Malculine and Ferninine; and these Participles 20 are raunged with them both; with Nounes in respect of their cases, and with Verbes in regard of tenses: and verily the logicians call such, tearmes restected, as for example, ervining, that is to say, wistely foreseeing; is a restex on of a wise foreseer: and opening variety of the say, minding sobriety, is a restex on of a sobre minded person, that is to say, minding sobriety, is a restex on of a sobre minded person, that is to say, as if they had the nature and power of Nounes and appellations.

As touching Prepofitions, a man may liken them very well to pennaches, crefts, or fuch like ornaments above motions or head attires, or elfe to bales, predftals, and footfteps under flatues and pillers: forafinuch as they are not fo much parts of speech, as busic and conversant about them: but see I pray you whether they may not be compared to truncheons, pieces, and fragments of words, like as those who when they write a running hand in haste, doe not alwaies 30 make out the letters full, but use pricks, minims and dashes. For these two Verbes individue, and individue, be both of them manifest clippings of the full and compleat words in the sum and in the sum of the manifest clippings of the full and compleat words in the sum and in the sum of the therefore a man may well fay, that every one of these, excepting Noune and Verbe, doe some good in our speech, and helpe well in a sentence, but for all that, they cannot be called either elements of speech: for there is none but the Noune and the Verbe, as it hath beene said before, that maketh this composition, conteining verity and sality, which some tearme proposition, others axiome, and Plate nameth speech or oration.

SOULE, WHICH PLATO DE-SCRIBETH IN HIS BOOKE TIM AE uS.

The Summarie.

Mong those discourses which may exercise the wittes, and busie the braines of most curious spirits, those of Plato may be raunged, which in divers places of his dialogues. but especially in his Timaus he hath delivered, and namely, where he treateth of nature metaphysically, intermingling with a certeine deepe and profound maner of 20 doctrine (as a man may perceive by his writings) hu resolutions as I may say irresolute.

proseeding all from the ignorance of the facred flory and the true fense of Moyles. As for example, that which he faith as couching the foule of the world : an abfurd and fantasticall opinion, if it benot handled and expounded aright. Our authour being minded in this treatife to dispute philosophically upon the creation of the faid foule, runneth thorow numbers, tones, tunes and harmonies, aswellterrestriall as celestiall, for to declare the meaning of Plato: but with such brevitie in many places, that a man had need to reade with both his eies, and to have his minde wholly intentive and amused upon his words, for the under flanding of him. Meane while, this would be considered, seeing that in such matters we have (God be thanked) sufficient to resolve us in the word of God, and the good books of the doctours of the church, all this present discourses out do be read, as comming out of the hands of a man? walking in darkeneffe; and to speake in one word, of one blinde himselfe and following a blinde guide: to the ends hat in flead of highly admiring these subtilities of Plato, as some in these daies doe, whose heads are not flated and well fetled, we might know that the higher that man in his wifdome mounteh wish his pen, farre from Gods schoole, the lesse he is to be received and accepted of.

creation of the foule, which Plato describeth in his booke Timeus.

The father to his two sonnes Autobulus and PLUTARCH, Greeting.

Orafmuch as ye are of this minde, that whatfoever I have heere and there faid and written in divers places by way of exposition touching that which I supposed in mine opinion Plato held, thought and understood concerning the soule, ought to be reduced & brought rogether into one; and that I thould doe well to declare the fame at 50 large in a speciall treatife apart by it selfe, because it is not a matter which otherwife is easie to be handled and managed; as also for that feeming as it doth, fomewhat contrary to most of the Platonique philosophers themselves: in which regard it had need to be well mollified. I will therefore in the first place set downe the very text of Plato in his owne proper tearmes, word for word, as I finde them written in his booke entituled Timers.

Of that indivisible substance which alwaies continueth about the same things; as also of that ,, which is divifible by many bodies, he composed a third kinde of substance in the mids of them , both, holding partly of the nature of The fame, and in part of The other: and this he ordeined ,, and fet in the mids betweene the indivifible fubflance converfant about the fame things, and the ,, other which is divifible by bodies. Then taking these three natures or substances, he mixed them ,, altogether into one forme or idea, and fitted perforce the nature of Theother, which was unto ward to be mixed, to that nature of The same. Having thus mingled them with Substance, and of three made one, he divided this whole againe into fuch portions, as were fit and conve-,, nient: ech one of them being mingled with The fame, with The other, and with Sub stance. And

10 this division of his he began in this maner, &c. To begin withall if I should discourse unto you at this present what a number of disputations and contentious debates, these words have ministred unto those who tooke upon them to expound the same, it were for my selfe a peece of worke endlesse, and for you who have read the most part of them together with me, a labour needlesse. But seeing that of the most principalland excellent professiours, Xenocrates hath drawen some unto his opinion, in defining the substance of the foule to be a number mooving it selfe : and others have ranged them selves to Cramor of Soli, who affirmed the foule to be tempered of the nature intellectuall & of the other which is opinionative about objects fensible; I suppose that these two sentences being well displaied and opened will make the way and give you an easie entrance to the understanding and 20 finding of that which we feeke for and is in question. And verily there need not many words for the exposition of them both. For * the one fort of them thinke that Plato meaneth no- Xinesian forme exponetion of memoria. For the one fortor mentalinese that Patto meaner morning ellebut the generation of number, by the faid mixture of indivisible with divisible; for creations that unity is indivifible, and plurality divifible: of which twaine is engendred and produced number, whiles unity doth determine plurality, and limit out an end to that which is infinit, to wit, the binary or two indeterminate: which is the reason that Zaratas the master of Pythagoras called two the mother, and one the father of numbers: as also for that the better numbers be those which resembled unity: and yet for all that this number is not the foulle, because that both themotor and the moovable is wanting: but when The same and the other were mingled together, of which the one is the beginning of motion and mutation, the other of rest and station, 10 then commeth the foule to have a being, which is as well the principall, to ftaic and to be ftaicd, asitis to moove and to be mooved. But Cranter and his followers supposing that the proper and principall operation of the foulewas to judge things intelligible and fenfible, together with the similatudes and diffimilitudes which they have, as well them felves, as one in respect of another, affirme, that the foule is composed of All, to the end that the may judge of all. The which All aforesaid standeth upon fower principall kindes; the first is a nature intelligible, which is alwaies one and evermore after the fame fort: the second a nature passible and mutable concerning bodies: the third the nature of the same: and the forth the nature of the other: for the two first, participate in some fort both of the same and also of the other. But all these doe jointly and equally holde, that the soulc 40 was never after a certaine time, nor ever engendred, but hath many powers and faculties, into which Plate refolving for speculative disputation fake, the substance of her, supposeth in word onely, that the was engendred mixed and tempered, faying moreover that he thought as much of the world: for full well he knew, that eternal it was and ingenerable, but feeing it was not eafic to comprehend how, and in what order it was found, composed, governed and administred, for thole who at the first presupposed nor the creation and generation neither of it selfe, or of such things as concurred thereto, he therefore tooke the course to speake in such fort.

This much your fee in fum what they both doe fay: which when Eudorus well confidered, he thought there was good probability both in the one and the other of their opinions, but for mine owne part, perswaded verily I am, that neither of them twaine hath touched the point, or 50 come neere unto the minde and meaning of Plato.

If we will use the rule of probability & verifimilitude indeed, not fully building our owne properopinions, but be willing for to fay fomething agreeable & accordant thereto; for that mixture of the fubitance intelligible and fenfible which they fpeake of, giveth not us to understand thereby, that it is the generation of the foule, more than of any other thing what foever that a man may name. For the very world and every part thereof is compounded of a substance intelligible or spirituall, and of a substance sensible or corporall: whereof the one hath surnished the thing that is made and engendred with forme and shape, the other with subject matter. And as much of the matter as is forme by participation or refemblance of the intelligible, becommeth incontinently palpable and visible: but the soule is not perceptible by any sense. Neither was it ever found that Plate called the foule number, but alwaies a motion mooving of it felfe, yea the very fountain & beginning of motion. True it is, I confesse that embelished he hath & adorned the substance therof with number, proportion, accord & harmony, which he hath bestowed therein as in a subject capable & susceptible of the most beautifull forme that can be imprinted therein, by those qualities before faid. And I suppose it is not all one to say that the soule is composed by number, and that the substance thereof is number: for certaine it is that it hath the subfiftence and composition by harmony, but harmonie it is none, according as himselfe hath shewed in his treatise of the soule. Moreover altogether ignorant they are, what Plato mea- to neth, by the same and the other : for they say, that the same conferreth to the generation of the foule, the power or faculty of station and rest: the other, of motion: whereas Plato himselfein his booke entituled, The Sophister, putteth downe, that which is, the same, the other, motion and Mation, as five diffinct things differing the one from the other, fevering them a part, asha. ving nothing to doe in common one with another; which they all with one accord, yeaand many more even of those who lived and conversed with Plato, fearing and being mightily trou. bled with, doe devife and immagin all that they can, bestir themselves wresting forcibly, heaving and shooving and turning every waie, as in case of some abominable thing and not to benamed, supposing that they ought either altogether, for his honour and credit to denie, or at least wife to cover and conceale that which he had delivered, as touching the generation or creation 20 of the world, and of the foule thereof, as if the fame had not bene from all eternity, nor had time out of minde their effence: whereof we have particularly spoken a part else where; and for this present suffice it shall to say by the way, that the arguing and contestation, which Plato confesfeth himselfe to have used with more vehemencie than his age would well beare, against Atheists: the same I say they confound and shufflle up, or to speake more truely abolish altogether, For if it be fo, that the world be eternall and wasnever created, the reason of Plato falleth to the ground, namely that the foule being more ancient than the bodie, and the cause and principall author of all motion and mutation, the chiefe governour also and head Architect, ashe himselfe hath said, is placed and bestowed therein. But what, and whereof the soule is, and how it is faid and to be understood, that it is more ancient than the body and before it in time, the 30 progresse of our discourse hereafter shall declare: for this point being either unknowen or not well understood, brings great difficulty as I thinke in the well conceiving, and hinderance in beleeving the opinion of the trueth?

In the first place therefore I will shew what mine owne conceit is, proving and fortifying my fentence, and withall, mollifying the same (because at the first sight it seemeth a strange paradox) with as probable reasons as I can devise: which done, both this interpretation and proofe also of mine, I will lay unto the words of the text out of Plate, and reconcile the one unto theo-ther. For thus (in mine opinion) stands the case.

This world (quoth Heraclitus) there was never any god or man that made: as if in so saying he feared, that if we disavow God for creatour, we must of necessitie confesse that man was the 40 architect and maker thereof. But much better it were therefore, that we subscribe unto Plato, and both fay and fing aloud, that the world was created by God: for as the one is the goodlieft piece of worke that ever was made, fo the other the most excellent workman and greatest cause that is. Now the substance and matter whereof it was created, was never made or engendred, but was for ever, time out of minde and from all eternitie, subject unto the workman for to difpose and order it, yea and to make as like as possible was to himselfe. For of nothing and that which had no being, there could not possibly be made ought: but of that which was not well made nor as it ought to bee, there may be made somewhat that is good; to wit, an house, a garment, or an image and statue. But before the creation of the world, there was nothing but a chaos, that is to fay, all things in confusion and disorder: and yet was not the same without a bo- so die, without motion, or without foule: howbeit, that bodie which it had, was without forme and confistence; and that mooving that it had, was altogether rash, without reason and understanding: which was no other but a disorder of the soule not guided by reason. For Godcreated not that bodie which was incorporall, nor a foule which was inanimate; like as we fay that the mufician maketh not a voice, nor the dancer motion; but the one maketh the voice weet, accordant and harmonious; and the other, the motion to keepe measure, time, and compasse with a good grace. And even so, God created not that palpable soliditie of a bodie, nor that moving and imaginative puissance of the soule; but finding these two principles, the one darke and obscure, the other turbulent, foolish and senselesse: both impersect, disordered and indeterminate, he fo digested and disposed them, that he composed of them the most goodly, beautifull and absolute living creature that is. The substance then of the bodie, which is a certeine namethat he calleth fulceptible of all things, the very feat, the nourfe also of all things engendred, is no other thing than this. But as touching the substance of the soule, he tearmeth it in his booke entituled Philebus, Infinitie, that is to fay, the privation of all number and proportion, having in it neither end , limit , nor measure , neither excesse nor defect , neither similitude nor diffimilitude. And that which hee delivereth in Timens, namely, that it is mingled with to the indivisible nature, & is become divisible in bodies, we must not understand this to be either multitude in unities, or length and breadth in points or pricks, which things agree unto bodies, and belong rather to bodies than to foules: but that mooving principle, difordinate, indefinite, and mooving of it felfe, which hee calleth in manie places Necessitie, the same inhis books of lawes hee tearmeth directly, a diforderly fonle, wicked and evill doing. This is the foule fimply, and of it felfe it is so called; which afterwards was made to participate understanding, and discourse of reason, yea, & wise proportion, to the end that it might become the foule of the world. Semblably, this materiall principle, capable of all, had in it a certeine magnitude, diftance, and place: beauty, forme, proportionate figure, and measure it had none; but all these it gat afterwards, to the end that being thus digested and brought into decent or-20 der, it might affoord the bodies and organs of the earth, the fea, the heavens, the starres, the plants and living creatures, of all forts. But as for them who attribute & give that which he calleth in Timeso, necessitie; and in his treatise Philebso, infinity and immensity of excesse & defect of too much and too little; unto matter, and not unto the foule: how are they able to maintaine that it is the cause of evill, considering that he supposeth alwaies that the faid matter is without forme or figure whatfoever, destitute of all qualities and faculties proper unto it, comparing it unto thole oiles, which having no fmell of their owne, perfumers afe in the composition of their odors and precious ointments: for impossible it is that Plato should suppose the thing which of it felfe is idle, without active qualitie, without mooving and inclination to any thing, to be the cause and beginning of evill, or name it an infinity, wicked & evill doing; nor 30 likewise a necessirie, which in many things repugneth against God, as being rebellious, and refuling to obey him: for as touching that necessitie, which overthroweth heaven, as he faith in his Politiques, and turneth it cleane contrary; that inbred concupifcence and confusion of the first and auncient mature, wherein there was no order at all, before it was ranged to that beautifull disposition of the world as now it is; how came it among things, if the subject, which is matter, was without all qualities, and void of that efficacie which is in causes? and considering that the Creatour himselfe being of his owne nature all good, defired as much as might be, to make all things like unto himselfe? for a third, besides these two principles, there is none. And if we will bring evill into the world, without a precedent cause & principle to beget it, we shall run and fall into the difficult perplexities of the Stoicks; for of those two principles which 40 are, it cannot be that either the good, or that which is altogether without forme and quality whatloever, should give being or beginning to that which is naught. Neither hath Plato done assomethat came after him, who for want of seeing and understanding a third principle and cause, betweene God and matter, have runne on end, and tumbled into the most absurd and fallest reasons that is, devising for sooth I wot not how, that the nature of evill should come without forth cafually and by accident, or rather of the owneaccord: forasmuch as they will not graunt unto Epicurus that the least atome that is, should turne never so little or decline aside, saying, that he bringeth in a rash and inconsiderate motion, without any cause precedent; whereas they themselves the meane-while affirme that fin, vice, wickednesse and ten thoufand other deformities and imperfections of the body, come by confequence without any caufe 50 efficient in the principles. But Plato faith not fo, for he ridding matter from al different quality, and remooving farre from God all cause of evill, thus hath hee written as touching the world in his Politiques: The world (quoth he) received al good things from the first author who createdit; but what evill thing foever there is, what wickednesse, what injustice in heaven, the same it selfe hath from the exterior habitude, which was before, and the same it doth transmit, & give to the creatures beneath. And a little after he proceedeth thus: In tract of time (quoth he) as oblivion tooke holde and fee fure footing, the paffion and imperfection of the old diforder came in place and got the upper hand more and more; and great danger there is, least growing to dissolution, it be plunged againe into the vast gulte, and bottomlesse pit of confused dissimilitude.

But diffimilitude there can be none in matter, by reason that it is without qualitie, and void of all difference: whereof Eudemus among others being ignorant, mocked Place for not putting that to be the cause, source, and first originall of evil things, which in many places he calleth mother and nutfe: for Plate indeed tearmeth matter, mother and nutfe: but he faith like. wife: That the cause of evill is the motive puissance resiant in the said matter, which is in bodies become divifible, to wit, a reasonlesse and disorderly motion; howbeit, for all that, not without foule, which plainly and exprelly in his books of lawes, he tearmeth a foule, contrary to and repugnant to that which is the cause of all good; for that the soule may well be the cause and principle of motion; but understanding is the cause of order and harmony in motion: for God made northe matter idle, but hath kept it from being any any more disquieted & troubled with a foolish and rash cause: neither hath he given unto nature the beginnings and principles of mutations and passions, but being as it was enwrapped and enfolded with all forts of passions and inordinate mutations, hee elected it of all enormities, disorders, and errors whatsoever, using as proper instruments to bring about all this, numbers, measures, and proportions; the effect whereof, is not to give unto things, by mooving and mutation the puffions and differences of the other and of diverfitie, but rather to make them infallible, firme, and stable, yea, and like unto those things which are alwaies of one fort, and evermore resemble themselves.

This is in my judgement the minde and fentence of Plato, whereof my principall proofeand argument is this: that by this interpretation is falved that contrariety which men fay, and feemeth indeed to be in his writings: for a man would not attribute unto a drunken fophister, much leffe than unto Plato, so great unconstance and repugnance of words, as to affirme one and the fame nature to be created, and uncreated; and namely in his booke entituled Phedrus, that the foule is eternall, and uncreated: but in Timaus, that it was created and engendied. Now as touching those words of his in the treatise Phedrus, they are well neere in every mans mouth verie rife; whereby he prooveth that the foule can not perish, because it was never engendred; and femblably he prooveth, that generation it had none, because it mooveth it selfe. Againe, in the booke entituled Timen, God (quoth he) hath not made the foule to be yoonger than the body, 30 according as now in this place we purpose to say, that it commeth after it, for never would he have permitted that the elder being coupled and linked with the yoonger should be commannded by it. But we flanding much (I wot not how) upon inconfiderate rathnesse and vanity, use to speake in some fort accordingly: for certaine it is, that God hath with the bodie joined the foule, as precedent both in creation and also in power and vertue, like as the dame or mistresse with her fubject, for to rule and commaund. Againe, when he had faid that the foule being turned upon her felfe, began to live a wife and eternall life, The body of the heaven (quoth he) was made visible, but the foule invisible, participating the discourse of reason and of harmony, engendred by the best of things intellectuall and eternall, being likewise it selfe the best of things engendred and temporall. Where it is to be noted that in this place expresly calling God the 40 belt of all eternall things, and the foule the best of things created and temporall, by this most evident antithefis and contrariety, he taketh from the foule that eternity which is without beginning and procreation.

And what other folution or reconciliation is there, of these contradictions, but that which himself giveth to those who are willing to receive it; for he pronounceth that soule to be ingenerable and not procreated, which mooved all things rashly and disorderly before the constitution of the world: but contrativishe he calleth that, procreated and engendred, which Godstamed and composed of the first, and of a parmanent, eternall, and perfect good substance, namely by creating it wise and well ordered, and by putting and conferring even from himselse unto sense, understanding; and order unto motion: which when he had thus made, he ordained and so appointed it to be the governor and regent of the whole world. And even after the same maner he pronouncesh; that the body of the world is in one forteternall, to wit, not created, nor engendred; and after a nother fort both created and engendred. For when he saith that whassever is visible, was never at rest, but mooved rashly and without all order; and that God tooke the same, disposed and ranged it in good order; as also when he saith that the fowre general elements, fire, water, earth, and aire, before the whole world was of them framed and ordered dements, fire, water, earth, and aire, before the whole world was of them framed and ordered dements, fire, water, earth, and aire, before the whole world was of them framed and ordered dements.

cently made a woonderfull trouble & trembling as it were in the matter, and were mightily that ken by it, fuch was their deformity and inequality. It appeareth plainly that he maketh their hodies in some fort to have a being and substittence before the creation of the world. Contrariwife when he faith that the body is yoonger than the foule, and that the world was made and created in as much as the fame is visible and palpable, as having a body, and that all things appeare to as they are, when they were once made and created, manifest it is, and every manimay fee, that he attributeth a kinde of nativity to the nature of the body; and yet for all that farre is he off, from being contradictory and repugnant to himselfe so notoriously, and that in the most maine points. For it is not the fame body nor of the fame fort, which he faith was created by 10 God, and to have bene before it was; for that were directly the cafe of fome mount-banke or jugling enchanter; but himselfe sheweth unto us, what we are to understand by this, generation or creation: For before time (quoth he) all that is in the world, was without order, measure and proportion: but after that the univerfall world began to be fathioned, and brought into fome decent forme, whereas he found the fire first, the water, the earth and the aire pell mell in the fame places, and yet having fome thew and token what they were, but confusedly hudled every where, (as a man may well thinke that every thing must needs be so, where God is absent) in this case as they were then, God I say finding them, first brought the same into frame and fashion, by the meanes of formes and numbers. Furthermore, having faid before that it was the worke not of one onely proportion, but of twaine, to joine and frame together the fabricke of the world, a 20 folid maffe as it was and carying a depth and thickneffe with it : and declared moreover, that God after he had bestowed water and aire, betweene fire and earth, conjoined withall and framed the heaven, together with them. Of these things (quoti he) such as they were, and sower in number, the body of the world was in engendred, agreeable in proportion and entertaining amity by that meanes: Infomuch as being once thus united and compact, there is nothing that can make difunion or diffolution, but he alone who first limited and brought all together; teaching us hereby most plainely that God was the father and author, not of the body fimply, nor of theframe, fabricke and matter onely of the world, but also of that proportion, measure, beauty and similitude which is in the body thereof : femblably thus much we are to thinke of the foule, as if one were not created by God, nor the foule of the world, but a certaine power of motion, 20 fantalticall, turbulent, subject unto opinion, stirring and moving of it selfe, and alwaies, but without any order, measure, or reason whatsoever. The other, when God had adorned it with numbers & proportions convenient, he ordained to be the regent & governesse of the world created like as it felfe was also created. Now that this is the true sentence & meaning of Plato, and not by a fantasticall manner of speculation and inquisition, as touching the creation or generation, as well of the world as of the foule: this befides many others, may be an argument, that of the foule, he faith it was created and not created; of the world alwaies, that it was engendred and created, but never eternall and not created. To proove this, we need not for to cite testimonies out of the booke Times, confidering that the faid booke throughout, from the one end to the other, treateth of nothing elfe, but of the generation or creation of the world. And of other 40 bookes, in his Atlanticke Timam making his praiers, nameth him who beforetime was by his worke, and now by his word, God. And in his Politique, his Parmenidian guest faith, that the worldbeing framed and made by God, became partaker of many good things: and in case there beany evill thing in it, the fame is a remnant mingled within the first habitude and estate wherein it was at first, before the constitution thereof, all irregular and disorderly. And in his bookes of Common-wealth, speaking of that number, which some call the Mariage, Socrates began to discourse and fay thus: The God (quoth he) who is created and engendred, bath his period and conversation, which the perfect number doth comprise. In which place, what can he call the Godcreated and engendred, but the world. * * * * *

The first copulation is of one and two, the second of three and soure, the third of five and six; of which there is not one that maketh a quadrate number either by it selse or by others: the south is of seven and eight, which being joined to the first, make in all the square quadrat number six and thirtie.

But of those numbers which Plate hath set downe the quaternarie, hath a more persect and absolute generation; namely, when even numbers are multiplied by even intervals, and un. even numbers likewise by odde intervals : for first it conteineth unitie as the very common flocke of all numbers as well even as odde and of those under it; two and three be the first flat and plaine numbers, and after them foure and nine are the first squares, then follow eight and feven and twentie, the first cubique numbers, putting the unitie out of this account. By which it appeareth that his will was not, that these numbers should be all set one above another directly in a right line; but apart, one after another alternatively, the even of the one fide and the odde 20 of the other, according to the description above made. Thus shall the files or conjugations also be of like with like, and make the notable numbers, aswel by composition or addition as by multiplication of one with another: by composition, thus, Two and three make five; source & nine make thirteene; eight and feven and twentie arise to five and thirtie. For of these numbers the Pythagoreans call five, resolv, as much to fay, as a found, supposing that of the spaces and intervals of Tone, the fift, was the first that spake or sounded : thirteene they tearmed a signer, that is to fay, the Remanent or Defect, like as Plate did; despairing to divide a Tone in two equal portions: and five and thirtie they tearme Harmonie, for that it is composed of the first numbers cubique, proceeding from even and od of the foure numbers, to wit, fix, eight, nine and twelve, contening an Arithmeticall and Harmonicall proportion. But this will appeare more evident- 30 ly by this figure here described and represented to the eies. Suppose then there be a figure set downe in forme of a tile, called Parallelogrammon, with right angles, A.B.C.D.

whereof the one fide (to wit, the less) A. B. is of five; the other, and namely, the longer, A.D. is of feven parts: let the less fide be divided into unequall sections, to wit, into three and three, unto E. and the greater into other two unequall sections, three and source of F. Thendrawlines from the sections, crossing directly one another, by E. G. H. and F. G. I. So A. E. G. F. shall so be fix, A. B. I. G. nine, G. H. D. F. eight, and G. I. C. H. twelve. This tile-formefigure called Parallelogrammon, being more long than broad, composed of five and thirtie parts, content in it all the proportions of the first accords and consonances of Mussick in the numbers of the spaces into which it is divided. For fix and eight have the proportion Epitritos, towit, the whole and one third part; wherein consostent the symphonic Diatessaron, that is to say, a fourth. Six and nine carry the proportion Hemiolion, to wit, the whole and halfe; and therein confifteth Diapente, that is to fay, a fifth. Betweene fix and twelve there is the double proportion & therin confisteth Diapason, that is to say, an eighth. There is also the proportion of Tone fefquioctave, in nine and eight, which is the reason that the number five and thirtie conteining the proportions of tones, the confonances also and accords, they call Harmonie, which being multiplied by fix, arifeth to two hundred and tenne, the very just number of daies wherein feven moneth children have their perfection in the wombe, and are ready to be borne. Item, goe to worke another way, and begin by multiplication in this wife: Twice three make fix, and foure times nine come to fix and thirtie, and seven and twentie multiplied by eight, ariseth to two hundred and fixteene. Now the perfect number is fix, for that it standeth of equal parts, and integral of the copulation of even and odde it is called the Mariage. Againe, that which is more, it confishesh of the beginning and foundation of number, to wit, unitie or One, of the first even number which is two, and of the first and odde number that is three. Moreover, six and thinie is the first number both foure square and also triangular. Foure-square, if it arise from the balis, fix, and triangular, from eight: for it arifeth by multiplication of two quadrate numbers, to wit, of foure, multiplying nine; and by addition of three cubes, one, eight, and feven and twentie, which being put together, make up fixe and thirtie, the number before described. Furthermore, it may be drawen out in forme of a tile, more one way than another from the two fides, and arifeth by multiplying twelve by three, or nine by foure. Now if a man take the numbers of the fides in those figures before described, to wit, fix of the foure-square, and eight of the 20 triangle; nine of one of Parallelograms, and twelve of the other; he shall finde that they will make the proportions of all the fymphonics or accords in Musicke. For twelve compared with nine, will be Diatessaron or the fourth, which is the proportion that Nete hath to Mese; but compared with eight, it is Diapente or a fifth, the proportion of Mese or the Meane to Hypate; with twelve, it will be Diapason or a just eighth, which is the proportion betweene Nete and Hypate. As for the number of two hundred and fixteene, it is a cubique, arifing from fix, as the baffs, and is equall to the owne compaffe or circuit. These numbers proposed, having such vertues and properties, yet the last feven and twentie hath this peculiar qualitie by it felfe, that it is equall unto all the other before it, being pur together; namely, one, two, three, fonce, eight, and nine. Moreover, it conteineth the just number of the daies of the moones revolution. 30 The Pythagoreans also doe place the Tone of distances & intervals of founds in this very nuber, which is the reason that they call 13 requer; as one would say, the default, for that it wanteth one of being the halfe of twenty feven. Moreover, that these numbers conteine the proportions of all the confonances & accords in mulicke, it is easie to be understood; for there is the proportion double of two to one, & therein confifteth Diapafon; the Hemiolion or one and halfe of three & two, wherein is Diapente: likewife Epitritos, of fower to three, and therein confifteth Diateffaron: also the triple of nine and three, wherein you shall finde Diapason and Diapente, to wit, a fift above a duple. Item, the quadruple of eight and two wherein is Dis diapafon. There is besides, the sesquioctave, of eight to nine, wherein is Tonizon. If then a man count the unitie which is common unto the numbers'as well even as odde unto foure, the 40 whole yeeldeth ten: and the even numbers betweene it and ten, with the unity being put togethermake fifteene, a number triangular, arising from the basis five: as for the odde numbers, to wit, one, three, nine, and twenty seaven, arise to forty, if they be summed together, and this number of forty is composed of thirteene and twenty seven, by which the mathematicians doeprecifely measure the intervals of musicke and melody in fong, calling the one Diefi, and the other Tonos: and the faid number of forty artifeth by way of multiplication, by the vertue of quaternity; for if you multiply foure times every one of the foure; first, whereas by them-Selves to wit, one, two, three, foure, there will arise soure, eight, twelve, and sixteene, which being all fumined together, make forty; which number conteineth befides, all the proportions of confonances and accords: for compare fixteene with twelve, you shall have the proportion 50 Epitritos, that is to fay, one and the third part, with eight duple, with foure quadruple: also twelve compared to eight, hath the proportion Hemiolion, that is to fay, one and a halfe, to fouretriple, which comprehend the proportions just of Diatessaron, Diapente, Diapason, and Dis-diapaton: Over and befides, the forefaid number of forty, is equall to the first two quadrats, and the two first cubicke numbers taken together, for the two first squares or quadrats be one and foure, the cubicks eight and twenty feaven, which if they be put together, amount to forty: So that the quaternity of Plato is in the disposition thereof more ample, of greater varictic and perfection than that quaternity of Pythagor as.

But for a finuch as the numbers proposed, affoord not places for the medieties which are inferred; necessary it was to extend the numbers to larger tearmes and bondes, reteining still the fame proportions: in regard whereof, we must fay somewhat what they be, and treat first of these medicties. The former then, is that which both surmounting, & being also surmounted in equall number, is called in these daies Arithmeticall: the other which surmounteth, and is surmounted by the same part of their extremities, is named Hypenantia, that is to say, subcontrary; as for example: The two limits or extremities and the mids of the arithmetical, be fix, nine and twelve: for nine which is in the middes, furmounteth fixe just as much in number as it is furmounted of twelve, that is to fay, by three: but of the fubcontrary, these be the extremities and the mids, fix, eight, and twelve, for eight which is the mids, furmounteth fix by two, and is fur- to mounted of twelve by foure, which foure is the third part of twelve, like as two is the third part of fixe. Thus it falleth out in the medictie Arithmaticall, the middes furmounteth the one of these extremities, and is surmounted of the other, equally by the same part of the owne. but in the fubcontrary by the fame part, not of the owne, but of the extremities out gone of the one, and outgoing the other: and heereupon it is called fubcontrary, and the famether likewise call harmonicall, because it affourdeth to the extremities the first resonances, to wit betweene the greatest and the least Diapason, that is to say, an eight; betweene the greatest and the mids, Diapente, that is to fay, a five; & betweene the mids and the least, Diatefferon, that is to fay, a fourth: for the greatest tearme or extremity being fet upon the note or string Nete, and the least upon Hypate, the middes will be found just upon Mese, that is to say, the meane, which 20 maketh in regard of the greatest Diapente, and of the least Diatestaron: so that by this reason, eight shall be upon the meane, twelve upon Nete, and fix upon Hypate: but how to knoweassly and readily these medicties aforesaid, Endorns hath shewed the maner plainly and simply; And first and formost in the Arithmeticall, consider thus much: for if you take the two extremities, and put them together, and then the moity of the entire furn, the fame will fall out to be the medietie Arithmeticall: or take the moitie of ech one of the extremities, & addethem one to the other, that which arifeth thereof shall be mediatic arithmeticall, in duples & triples alike: but in the subcontrary, or harmonicall, if the two extremities be one to the other in proportion duple, take the halfe of the greater, and the third part of the leffe, and the number arifing of those two shall be the mediene Harmonicall: but in case the two extremities be in pro- 30 portion triple, then contrariwife a man ought to take the moitie of the leffe, and the third part of the greater, for then the fumme will be the medicite that he looketh for: as for example, let the leffe extremity be in triple proportion fix, and the greater eighteene, if you take the halfe of fix which is three, and the third part of eighteene which is fix, you shall come to nine, for the medictic which doth furmount, and is furmounted by the fame part of the two extremities, that is to fay, the one halfe. Thus you fee how the medicties are taken: now the fame must be interjected and placed betweene, for to fill and make up the places or intervals double and triple; but of the number proposed, some have no place of the middle, others, not sufficient ; and therefore the maner is to augment and fet them out, in reteining alwaics still the same proportions, and so by that meanes make places and receptacles sufficient for to receive the 40 faid medieties or mediocrities: First therefore, for the leffe end or extremity, in stead of one they put fix, because of all numbers it is the first that hath a halfe and a third part, and multiply all the numbers under by fix, as it is written underneath, for to receive both the medicties in duple intervals:

And for that Plato hath faid, the intervals being made fesquialterall, sesquitertia, and sesquite octaves, out of these links in the precedent distances, he filled all the epitrites, with the intervals of sesquite octaves, leaving one part of ech, and this distance of this part being lest number to 30 number, having for the tearmes & extremities, two hundred fifty six, and two hundred forty three, &c. Upon these words of the text, forced they were to reduce these numbers, and make them greater, for by order two ought to have sesquite desired by cutting the units peece-meale, the intelligence and doctrine thereof would be very intricate and hard to be conceived, therefore he called this operation in some fort multiplication, like as in the harmonicall mutation, where if you extend and augment the first number, necessarily the discription of all the other notes must be stretched our and enlarged likewise. And therefore Endorse following herein Crantor, taketh for the first number three hundred fowre-score and fowre, which ariseth by multiplying three-score and sowre, by fix: and these were induced so to doe by the number threeforce and fowre, having for the fefquioctave, eight, which is the proportion betweene three fore and fowre and threefcore and twelve. But it agreeth better with the text, and the wordes of Plato to Suppole a moity. For the default which they call AGUMA, will have the sequioctave proportion in the numbers which Plate hath fet downe, two hundred fix and fiftie, and two hundred three and fortie, having put for the first one hundred fourescore and twelve: and if the double of irbe supposed for the first, the rique shall be of the same proportion, but in number double, to which five hundred and twelve hath to foure hundred eighty foure: for two hundred fiftie & fix are in epitrite or fesquitertiall proportion to one hundred four escore and twelve, and five hundred and twelve to foure hundred fourefcore and foure. And verily, the reduction to this number was not without reason and proportion, but yeelded a probable reason to Cranter: for the number of threescore and foure is a cube, proceeding from the first quadrate, and a quadrate likewife, arifing from the first cube, and being multiplied by three, the first odde number: the first mangular number, the first perfect number and fesquialter, make one hundred sourcescore and twelve, which number alfo (as we will shew) hath his sesquioctave. But first of all you shall understand better what is resigned, as also what is the meaning of Plato, if you call to minde a little, that which is usually taught and delivered in the Pythagoreans schooles: for Diastema, that is 20 to fay, intervals or space in matter of song, is whatsoever is betweene two sounds different in Tenour or Tension. Of these intervals, one is called Tonus, to wit, that whereof the harmonie Diapente surmounteth Diatessaron. Of this entier Tone, as Musicians do holde, cut in twaine, by the moitieare made two intervals, and both of them, the one aswell as the other, goe under the name Hamitonium, But the Pythagoreans do not thinke that it can be equally divided : whereas therefore the two fections be unequall, they call the leffe ringer, that is to fay, the default, because it is somewhat lesse than the one halfe. And therefore some masters of Musicke there be, who make the accord Diatefferon, of two Tones and a Demi-tone or Hæmitonion: others againe of two Tones and a request. So as it seemeth that the testimonic of hearing accordeth with the harmonicall Musicians 3 and of demonstration with the Mathematicians: and their proofe 30 of demonstration goeth in this maner. This is put downe by them for certeine, and approoved by their instruments, that Diapason hath a double proportion, Diapente a sesquialterall, Diateffaron a fesquitertiall, and a Tone a sesquioctave. And the trueth hecreof, a man may trie presently by an experiment, namely, by hanging two weights double, unto two strings that be equall, or by making two concavities in pipes, the one twice as long as the other, otherwise equall: for the shawme or hauthoies, which is the longer, will found more base and loud, as Hypatein regard of Nete: and of the two strings, that which was stretched by the heavier weight will found higher & smaller as Nete in comparison of Hypate: and this is the very confonance Diapafon. Semblably, three compared unto twaine, be it in length or in weight, will make Diapence; and foure to three, Diateffaron: for the one hath the proportion epitrite, and the other 40 hemiolion. And if the unequalitie of the forefaid lengths or weights be in proportion hemioctave, that is to fay, of feven to eight, it will make the intervall Toniaon, not altogether an harmonicall accord, howbeit (as one would fay) fomewhat muficall and melodious; for that these founds, if one strike, touch or found one after another, make a pleafant noise and delectable to the eares; but if altogether, the noise will be troublesome and offensive: whereas contrariwise, in consonances and accords, howsoever one touch them, either together, or one after another, thecare receiveth the confent and accord with great delight. And yet this may moreover be shewed by reason, for the harmonie Diapason is composed of Diapente and of Diatessa ton, like as in number the double is composed of Hemiolion and Epitritos; for twelve is in Proportion of Epitritos to nine, and Hemiolion to eight, and double to fix: fo that the double 50 proportion is compounded of the fesquialterall and the sesquitertion, like as Diapason of Diapente and Diateffaron: but as there Diapente is greater than Diateffaron by a Tone, so heere in numbers, Hemiolion is greater than Epitritos by a sesquioctave. This being thus prooved by demonstration, let us see now, whether our sesquioctave may be divided into two equals sections; for if it can not, no more then, can the Tone : and for that eight and nine make the first proportion sesquioctave, and have no intervall betweene; both the one and the other being doubled, the number falling out betweene, maketh two intervals; fo that it appeareth, that if the two intervals be equall, the fefquioctave may be equally divided in twaine. Now the double of nine is eighteene, and of eight, fixteene, which admit betweene them, seventeene. Soit falleth out that one of the intervals is greater, and the other leffe; for the former is of eighteene to feventeene, and the other of seventeene to fixteene. Then the sequioctave proportion is divided into portions and sections unequall, and so consequently the tone also: and therefore this division being made, none of the sections is properly a Demytone, but one of them by good right hath beenetearmed by the mathematicians Acipum : and this is it that Plato faid : God when he filled the epitrites with lefquioctaves, left a portion of ech : whereof there is the fame reason and proportion, that two hundred fiftie fix have unto two hundred forty three; for take a Diateffaron in two numbers, which have betweene them a proportion Epitritos, as two hundred fifty and fix, to one hundred nintie two; of which let, the leffe number, one hundred nintie two to befet upon the base note of a tetracord, and the greater, to wit, two hundred fiftie and fix upon the highest note: It must be shewed, that if this be filled with two sesquioctaves, there remaineth an intervall as great as is betweene two hundred fiftie fix and two hundred forty three. For if the baser found be stretched one tone; which is the proportion sesquioctave it maketh two hundred and fixteene: and againe if it bestretched another tone, it becommeth two hundred forty three, which furmounteth two hundred & fixteene, by twenty & feven, and two hundred and fixteene furmounteth one hundred fourescore & twelve by foure and twenty, of which, the feven and twenty is the fefquioctave of two hundred and fixteene, and foure and twentie, of one hundred fourescore and twelve: and therefore of these three numbers, the greatest sesquiocave is of the middest, and the middle of the least; and the distance or intervall, from the least to the 20 greatest, to wit, from one hundred fourescore and twelve unto two hundred fortie and three, two tones filled with two fesquioctaves: which intervall being taken away, there remaineth the intervall of the whole, which is betweene two hundred fortie and three, and two hundred fiftie and fixe, and that is thirteene: and that is the reason why they called that number xoquea, that is to fay, a default or refidue.

For mine owne part, I thinke verily, that the fense of Plato is most cleerely expounded and declared in these numbers. Others having put downe the ends and tearmes of Diatesseron, for the treble two hundred eighty eight, and for the bafe, two hundred fixteene; goe through with the rest proportionably, fave onely that they take the two defaults or remnants, betweene the two extremities: for the base being set up one tone or note, maketh two hundred fortie three: 30 and the treble being let downe another note, becommeth two hundred fiftie fix: for these be sesquioctaves, two hundred forty three, and two hundred fixteene; likewise two hundred eighty eight, and two hundred fifty fix; so that either of the intervals is Tonizon: and there remaineth that which is betweene two hundred forty three, and two hundred fifty fix, which is not a Demytone, but leffe: for two hundred eighty eight, is more than two hundred fifty fix, by thirty two; and two hundred forty three, more than two hundred fixteene, by twenty feven; and two hundred fifty fixe more than two hundred forty three, by 12: and both these are lesser than the advantages or furpluffages by halfe: and therefore Diateffaron is found to be of two tones and a resulta, and not of two and a halfe. And thus you fee the demonstration of this: and so it is no hard matter to understandby that which we have delivered: what is the reason 40 who Plate having faid, that intervals fefquialterall, fefquitertian and fefquioctaves are made by filling the fefquitertians with fefquioctaves; made no mention of the fequivalterons, but hath left them behind, namely, for that the sesquialter is filled, when one putteth a sesquioctave to asesquitertiall, or rather a sesquitence to a sesquioctave.

These things thus shewed in some sort by way of demonstration: now to fill the intervals, and to interject the Medictics if none before had shewed the meanes and maner how, I would leave you to do it for your exercise: but the same having beene done already by many worthy personages, and principally by Crantor, Clearchus, and Theodorus, all borne in the city Soli: It will not be impertinent to deliver somewhat as touching the difference betweene them; for Theodorus maketh not two files of numbers as the other doe, but rangeth them all in the tame 50 line directly one after another, to wit, the duple and the triple: and principally he groundeth and fortifieth himselfe by this position (which they so call) of the substance drawen out in length, making two branches as it were from one trunke, and not foure of twaine; then he faith, that the interpositions of the Medieties ought so to take place; for otherwise there would be a trouble and confusion: and anon passeth immediately from the first duple to the first triple, when they should be that which ought to fulfill the one and the other. On the other side, there maketh for Cramor, the polition and lituation of plaine numbers with plaine, squares with fquares, and cubes with cubes, which are fer one against another in opposite files, not according to their range, but alternatively, which is of one fort as Idea or forme: but that which is divided by bodies, is the tubject and the mall matter; and the mixture of them both in common, is that which is complet and perfect.

Astouching then the fubltance indivifible, which is alwaies one and of the fame fort; wee are not thus to thinke, that it admitteth no divition for the finalneffe thereof, like to those little bodies called Atomi: but that of it which is fimple, pure, and most subject to any passion oralteration whatfoever, alwaies like it felfe, and after one maner, is faid to be indivilible, and to have no parts; by which fimplicity, when it comments to touch in fome fort, such things as be compounded, divilible, and carried to and fro, it can feth that divertitie to ceale, reftremeth that multitude, and by meanes of fimilitude, reduceth them to one and the fame habitude. And if aman be disposed to call that which is divisible by bodies, matter, as subject unto it, and participating the nature thereof, uting a certaine homonymic or equivocation, it mattereth not much, neither skilleth it as touching the thing in question: but those who would have the corporall matter to be mixed with the indivisible substance, be in a great errour : first, because Plane hath not now used any names thereof, for that he hath evermore used to call it a receptacle to receive all, and a nurse, not divisible by bodies, but rather a body divided into individuall particulars. Againe, what difference would there be, betweene the generation of the world, and of the foule, if the conflitution of the one and the other, did conflit of matter and things

Certes, Plate himselfe as one who would in no wife admit the soule to be engendred of the body, faith: That God put all that which was corporall within her; and then, that without forth the fame was enclosed round about with it: In fum, when he had framed and finished the soule according to proportion, he inferreth and amexeth afterwards a treatife of matter, which befor when he handled the creation of the foule, he never required nor called for, because crea-tedit was without the helpe of matter.

The like to this may be faid by way of confutation against Posidonius and his sectaries; for very farre they went not from matter; but imagining that the fubitance of tearmes and extremittes, was that which he called divifible by bodies, and joining with the intelligible, they affirmed and pronounced, that the foule is the Idea of that which is diffant every way, and in all thedimensions, according to the number which conteineth harmony, which is very erronious: For the Mathematicks (quoth he) are fituate betweene the first intelligible and sensible things: but the foule having of intelligible things an eternall effence, and of tenfible objects, a paffible nature: therfore meet it is that it should have a middle substance between both. But he was not ware, that God after he had made and finished the soule, used the bounds & termes of the body, for to give a forme to the matter, determining the substance thereof dispersed, and not linked or conteined within any limits, by environing it with superficies, composed of triangles, all joined together. And yet more abfurd than that it is, to make the foule an Idea, for 40 that the foule is alwaies in motion; but the Idea is immooveable, neither can the Idea be mixed with that which is fenfible , but the foule is alwaies linked fast with the body: besides, God didimitate Idea as one who followed his patterne; but he wrought the foule as his piece of worke: And that Plate held the foule not to be a number, but rather a thing ordeined by number, we have already thewed and declared before.

But against both these opinions and their patrons, this may be opposed in common: That neither in numbers nor in tearmes and limits of bodies, is there any apparence or shew of that Puillance, whereby the foule judgeth of that which is fenfible; for the intelligence and facultie that it hath, was drawen from the participation and societie of the intelligible principle: But opinions, beliefs, affents, imaginations, alto to be pattive and fenfitive of qualities inherent in 50 bodies, there is no man will thinke that they can proceed from unities, pricks, lines, or superficies: and yet not onely the foules of mortall men have the power to judge of all the exterior qualities perceptible by the fenfes; but also the very soule of the world, as Plato saith, when it returneth circularly into her-felfe, and toucheth any thing that hath a fubftance diffipable and apt to be dispersed; as also when it meeteth with ought that is indivisible, by mooving herselfe totally, the telleth in what respect any thing is the same, and in what regard divers and different; whereto principally ech thing is meet, either to doe or to fuffer, where, when, and how it is affected, alwel in luch as are engendred, as in those that are alwais the same. Moreover, making a certeine description with all of the ten predicaments, hee declareth the fame more cleerely afterwards: True reason (quoth he) when it meeteth with that which is sensible, and if there with the circle of the other goeth directly to report the fame, throughout the whole foule thereof, then there be engendred opinions and beliefes that be firme and true : but when it is converfant about that which is intelligible and discoursing by reason, and the circle likewise of the fame, turning roundly with facility, doth flew the fame, then of necessity there is bred perfect and accomplish science; and in whatsoever these two things be infused, if a man callit otherwise than soule, he faith any thing rather than the truth : whence commeth it then that the foule had this motion opinative, which comprehendeth that which is fenfible, divers and different from the other intellective that endeth in science? Hard it were to set this downe, unlesse a man firmly prefuppose that in this place, and at this present, he composeth not the soule simply, but the foule of the world, with the parts above mentioned, of a better fubflance, which is indivisible; and of a woorle that he calleth divisible by bodies; which is nothing else, but an imaginative & opinionative motion, affected & accordant to that which is fenfible, not engendred, but as the other of an eternall fublishance: for nature having the intellectuall vertue, had allo the facultie opinionative: but the intellective power is unmoveable, impaffible, founded & fer upon that fubitance, which abideth alwaies in one fort: whereas the other is divifible and wandering, in as much as it toucheth a matter that is alwaies floting, carried to and fro and diffipable. For the matter fenfible had before time no order at all, but was without all forme, bound or limitation what foever, and the faculty therein had neither expresse opinions articulate and diffinct, nor her motions all cettaine and composed in order: but for the most part resembling turbulent and vaine dreames, troubling that which was corporall, unlesse haply they fell upon a. ny thing that was better. For betweene two it was, having a nature conformable, and accordant to the one ond the other: chalenging matter by that which is fenfitive, and by the judiciall patt those things which are intelligible. And this declareth he himselfe in these proper termes: By my reckoning (quoth he) let this be the fumme of the whole account that these things had their being three waies before the heaven was, to wit, effence, space, and generation. Asfor space or place, he calleth matter by that name, as it were the seat, and otherwhiles a receptacle the effence, that which is intelligible; and the generation of the world as yet not made, canbe no other thing but a fubstance subject to motions and alterations, fituate betweene that which imprinteth a forme and which is imprinted, dispensing and distributing the images from thence hither: which is the reason it was called divisible, for that of necessitie both the sensitive must be divided and goe with the fenfible, and also the imaginative with the imaginable. For the fensitive motion being proper unto the soule mooveth toward the sensible without: but the intelligence & understanding was of it felfe, stable, firme and immovable: howbeit being infused once into the foule and become mafter and lord thereof, it rolleth and turneth upon it felfe, and accomplished a round & circular motion, about that which is alwaies permanent, and touching that principally which is, and hath being. And therefore hard was the mixtion and affociation which mingled the divisible with the indivisible, that which is every way moovable, with that which never mooveth, and forcing in one word the other to meet and joine with the same, 40 So the other was not motion, no more than the same was station; but the beginning both of Diversity and also of Identity or The samenesse: for the one and the other descend from divers principles, to wit, the same from unity, and the other, from binary, and were at the first mingled confutedly here in the foule; as tied by numbers, proportions and medicties harmonicall: and the other being imprinted into the fame, maketh difference : but the fame infused into the other, cauleth order; as it appeareth manifestly in the first powers of the soule, to wit, the faculties of moving and of judging. As for motion, it sheweth incontinently about the heaven diversity in identity by the revolution of the planets, and identity in dive. fity by the fetled order & fituation of the fixed starres; for in these, the same beareth sway and is more predominant; but contrariwile, the other, in those that be necrer to the earth. But judgement hath two principles, to wit, so understanding, from the same, for judging of things universall; and sense, from the other, to judge of particulars. Now reason is mingled of them both, being intelligence in things generall and intelligible; but opinion onely in matters tenfible, using for instruments, both the fansies and imaginations betweene, and also the memories; whereof the former make the other in the Jame; but the latter, the Jame in the other. For intelligence is the motion of the intelligent 2bout that which is stable and permanent; but opinion is the mansion of the sentient about that which moveth. As for imagination or fansie, being a connexion of opinion to the sense, the fime, placeth it in memorie; and contratiwife, the other thirreth it in the difference and diffunction of that which is past, and that which is present, touching both identity and diversitie toge-

Now the better to understand the proportion wherewith he made the soule, we must take a patterne and example, from the conflictation of the bodie of the world: for whereas the two exrienies, to wit, pure fite and earth, were by nature hard to be tempered one with another; or, to fav more truely, impossible to be mixed and incorporate together: he placed in the middles betweene, aire before fire, and water before earth : and fo contempered first these two meane e lements, and afterwards by their helpe, the other extremes alfo, which he fitted and framed to to gether, both with the faid meanes, and also with themselves one with another. And heere againe, the same and the other, being contrary puissances and extremities, sighting one against the other as meere enemies, he brought together, not immediatly by themselves, but by putting betweene other fubflances, to wit, the indivisible, before the fame, and the divisible before theother, according as in some fortthe one had affinitie and congruency with the other : afterwards when these were mixed together, he contempered likewise the extreames, and so warped and wove, as one would fay, the whole forme of the foule, making as farre as it was peffible, of things unlike, semblable, and of many one. But some there bee who give out, that it was not well faid of Plato: That the nature of the other, was hard to bee mixed and tempered; confidering (fay they) that it is not altogether infusceptible of mutation, but a friend to it, and 20 rather the nature of the fame, being firme and hard to be turned and remooved, admitteth not eafily any mixture, but flieth and rejecteth it, to the end that it may remaine simple, pure, and without alteration : but they who reproove this, are ignorant that the fame, is the Idea of fuch things as be alwaies of one fort; and the other, the Idea of those that change. Also that the effect of this, is evermore to divide, separate, and alter that which it toucheth; and in a word, to make many of one: but the effect of that is, to conjoine and unite by fimilitude, many things thereby into one forme and puiffance. Thus you fee what be the powers and faculties of the foule of this univerfality, which entring into the fraile, mortall, and paffible inflruments of bodies, however they be in themselves incorruptible, impatible and the same; yet in them now appear reth more the forme of an indeterminate duality: but that forme of the fimple unitie, the weth 30 it felfe more obscurely, as deepely setled within: howbeit for all that, hardly shall one see and perceive in a man, either paffion altogether void of reason, or motion without understanding, wherein there is no luft, no ambition, no joy or griefe: and therefore fome philosophers there be, who would have the perturbations of the mind to be reasons; as if for sooth, all diffre, storow, andanger, were judgements. Others also doe hold, that all vertues be passions: for in valour (faythey)there is foure, intemperance, pleafure, injuffice, lucre. Howbeit, the foule being both contemplative, and also active at once, as it doth contemplate universal thing; so it practifeth particulars, feeming to conceive the one by intelligence, and to perceive the other by fence: common reason meeting alwaies the same, in the other, and likewise, the other, in the same, endevoureth verily to fever by divers bonds and partitions, one from many; and the indivisible 40 from the divisible, but it can not bring it so about, as to be purely in the one or the other, for that the principles be fo enterlaced one within another, and hudled pell-mell together.

In which regard, God hath appointed a certeine receptacle for the fame, and the other, of a divilible, and indivilible fubstance, to the end, that in diversity there thould be order; for this was as much as to be engendred. Seeing that without this, the same should have had no diversitie, and confequently no motion nor generation; neither should the other have had order, and so by consequence also, neither confistence nor generation: for if it should happen to the same, to be divers from the other, and againe, to the other, to be all one with the same; fuch a communion and participation, would bring foorth of it felfe nothing generative, but require fome third matter to receive them, and to be digested and disposed by them. And this is that which God 50 ordeined and composed first, in defining and limiting the infinity of nature, mooving about bodies, by the firme iteadineffe of things intellectuall. And like as there is one kinde of brutish voice, not articulate nor distinct, and therefore not fignificant; whereas speech confishesh in voice, that giveth to understand what is in the minde: and as harmony doeth confist of many founds and intervals; the found being fimple and the fame, but the intervall a difference and diversitie of founds, which when they be mixed and tempered together, make song and melody: Even fo the passible part of the soule, was infinit, unstable, and disordinate; but afterwards became determinate, when tearmes and limits were fet to it, and a certeine forme expelled to that divisible and variable diversity of motion. Thus having conceived and comprised the same, and the other, by the similitudes and dissimilitudes of numbers, making accord of difference: thereof the life of the universall world became wise and prudent, the harmony consonant, and reason drawing with her necessitie, tempered with grace and perswasion, which the common fort call stall destiny; Empedaeles named concord and discord together: Heractism the oppositie tension and harmony of the world, as of a bow or harpe, wherein both ends bendone against another: Parmendes, light and darknesse: Anaxagarus, understanding and infinitie:

Zoroasses, God, and the devill; tearning the one Oromasses, and the other Arimanius: But Euripides did not well to use the disjunctive for the copulative, in this verse,

Jupiter, natures necessity,
Or humane minde, whether he be?

For in truth, that puiffance which pierceth and reacheth through all things, is both necessitie. and also a minde. And this is it which the Acgyptians would covertly give us to understand under the vaile of their mysticall fables, that when Horas was condemned and dismembred, his spirit and bloud was given and awarded to his father, but his slesh and grease to his mother: But of the foule there is nothing that remaineth pure and fincere, nothing unmixt and apart from others; for as Heraelitus was woont to fay: Hidden harmony, is better than the apparant for that therein, God who tempered it, hath bestowed secretly and concealed, differences and diverfities: and yet there appeareth in the unreasonable part, turbulent perturbations, in the reafonable fetled order: in tenfes necessitie and constreint; in the understanding full power and 20 entier libertie: but the terminant and defining power, loveth the univerfall and indivifible, by reason of their conjunctions and confanguinity. Contrariwise, the dividing puissance, enclineth and cleaveth to particulars by the divisible. The totall universalitie joieth in a setledorder, by the meanes of the fame, and againe, fo farre foorth as need is, in a mutation by the meanes of the other: but the difference of inclinations to honefly or dishonefly, to pleasure, or displeasure; the ravishments and transportations of the spirit in amorous persons, the combats in them, of honour against voluptuous wantonnesse; doe evidently shew, and nothing so much, the commixion of the nature divine and impaffible with the mortall and paffible partin bodily things; of which himselfe calleth the one the concupiscence of pleasure ingenerate and inbred in us, the other an opinion induced from without defirous of the foveraigne good: 30 for the foule of it selfe produceth and yeeldeth passibility; but the participation of understanding commeth to it without foorth, infused by the best principle and cause, which is God: so the very nature of heaven is not exempt from this double focietie and communion; but thata man may fee how otherwhiles it doth encline and bend another way, by the revolution of the the fame which is more predominant, and so doth governe the world: and a portion of time will come, like as it hath beene often heeretofore, when as the wifedome thereof shall be dulled and dazeled, yea and laid afleepe, being filled with the oblivion of that which is meet and decent for it : and that which from the beginnings is familiar and conformable to the body, shall draw, weigh downe, and turne backethe way and course of the whole universality on the right hand : but breake and undoe the forme thereof quite it shall not beable, but reduce it againe to 40 the better, and have a regard unto the first pattern of God, who helpeth the endevours thereof, and is ready to reforme and direct the fame.

Thus it is showed unto us in many places, that the foule is not altogether the worke of God; but having a portion of evill inbred in her, the hath bene brought into order and good dispose by him who hath limited infinity by unity; to the end that it should becom a substance bounded within the owne tearmes: and hath set by the meanes of the same and the other, order, change, difference, and similitude: and hath contracted and wrought a society; alliance and amity of all things one with another, as sarre as possible it was, by the meanes of numbers and proportions. Of which point, albeit you have heard much speech, and read many books and writings; yet I shall not doe amisse, but greatly to the purpose, it briefely I discourse thereof. First setting 50 addwne the words of Plato. God (quoth he) deducted first from the universall world, one part; and then double so much: afterwards a third portion, to wit, the one, and halse of the second, and the triple of the first: Soone after a south, to wit, the double of the second: & anon a fift, namely the triple of the third: After that a sixt, to wit, the octuple of the first, and a seventh, which was the first seventy sold. This done he filled the double and triple intervals; cutting from them also certaine parcels from thence, which he interjected betweene these: in such fort as in severy intervall there were two medicties: the one surmounting, and surmounted by the same severy intervall there were two medicties: the one surmounting, and surmounted by the same

portion of the extremites: the other, furmounting by equal number, one of the extremities " and furmounted of another by the like. But feeing the intervals carry the proportions fefquialterall, fesquitercian and sesquioctave : of these ligaments in the first precedent distances, he filledupall the fefquiterces with the intervall of the fefquioctave, leaving of each of them one " part: And this diffance of the part or number being left of number to number, it had for the " tearmes and bonds thereof in proportion to that which is betweene, two hundred fiftic fix, and " two hundred forty three. Here first and formost a question is mooved as touching the quantity " of these numbers: and secondly, concerning the order: and thirdly, of their power. For the quantity and fum: what they be which he taketh in the duple intervals? For the order, to wit, to whether they ought to be fet and disposed all in one range, as Theodorm did? or rather as Crantor, in the figure of the letter lamda, A. fetting upon the point or top thereof unity or the first, & then in one file apart, the duples, and the triples in another, for the use and power, namely what they conferre to the constitution and composition of the soule. As concerning the first, we will reject those who say, that it sufficeth in these proportions to colider of what nature be the intervals, and of what the midieties which fill them up, in what numbers foever a man may suppose that they have places capable betweene of the proportions aforefaid: for that the doctrine goethafter the fame maner. And albeit that which they fay, were true, yet the proofe and demonfiration thereof is but flender without examples, and hindreth another speculation, wherein there is contained a pleafant kinde of learning and philosophy. If then, beginning at unity, we 10 put apart by them felves the numbers duple and the triple as he himfelfe teacheth us, there will be of the one fide two, foure, and eight, on the other, three, nine, and twenty feven; which are in ail feven, taking the unity as common, and proceeding forward in multiplication unto fowre. For itis not in this place onely, but also in many others, where the consent and agreement is very evident, that is betweene the quarternary and the septenary. And as for that quaternity of the Pythagoreans fo much voiced and fo highly by them celebrated, it is of thirty fix, which hath this admirable matter in it above all others, that it is compounded of the fowre first even numbers, & of the fowre first od numbers: and it arises by the fourth couple or conjugation of number, ranged in order one after the other. * * * * * * * * * * * * *

Forthe first is of one and two: the second of one and three which be od. For setting one in the first place, as indifferent and common to both; then taketh he eight, and twenty seven, shewing and as it were pointing with the singer, what place he giveth to the one and the other kinde.

Butto treat hereofaster a more exact and exquisit maner, appertaineth unto others: But that which remaineth is proper to the subject matter in hand. For it was not upon any oftentation of skill and sufficiencie in the Mathematical larts that Plato hath inferted within a treatife of naturall philosophy, this Arethmeticall and harmonicall medieties, but as a discourse verice meet and fit to serve for the composition and constitution of the soule; howsoever there bee some who seeke for these proportions in the swiftnesse more or lesse of the wandring 40 spheres; others rather in their distances; some in the magnitudes of the starres; and others again, after a more curious maner, in the Diamiters of the Epicycles, as if that creatour had in regardthereof, and for this cause applied and fitted the soule distributed into seven parts, unto the celestiall bodies. Many there be moreover who bring hither and accomodate to this matter the Pythagoreans inventions, tripling the distances of bodies from the midst: which they doe after this maner, fetting upon fire unity; and upon the earth opposit unto ours, three; upon the earth nine; upon the Moone twenty feven; upon Mercurie fowre-fcore and one; upon Vemustwo hundred forty three; and upon the Sun himselfe 729. for that it is both quadrat and cube: which is the reason that they call the sun also one while quadrat and another while cube: and after the fame fort they reduce the other starres by way of triplation. But these philosophers 50 doemilcount greatly, and stray farre from reason and proportion indeed, if so be that Geometricall demonstrations do availe ought: yet in comparison of them, well fare they who goe to worke another way; and albeit they prove not their positions exactly, yet (I say) they come necret to the marke, who give out, that the Diameter of the funne, compared to the Diameter of the earth, is in the same proportion that twelve is to one: that the Diameter or Dimetient line of the earth is triple to that of the moone: and the least fixed starre that is to be seene, hath no lesse a Diameter, than the third part of the Diameter of the earth: also that the totall globe of the earth, compared with the sphare of the moone, carieth the proportion of twentie feven to one: The Diameters of Venus and the earth, are in double proportion, but their globes or sphæres beare octuple proportion, to wit, eight for one. Semblably, the intervall of the ecleptory, and the shadow which causeth the eclipse, is triple to the Diameter of the moone, Also the latitude of the moones declination from the Zodiaque on either side, is one twelfth part: likewise that the habitudes and aspects of her to the sunne, in distances triqueter, or quadrangular, take the formes and figurations either of the halfe moone, at the first quarter, or else when the swelleth and beareth out on both fides: but after the hath passed fixe figues of the Zodiaque, the maketh a full compasse, and resembleth a certeine harmonicall symphonic of Diapafon in Hexatonos. And for a finuch as the funne about the folftices or tropicks, as well of fummer as winter mooveth least, & most slowly; but contrariwise, about the two equinoxes to in Spring and Autumne, most swiftly, and exceeding much: the proportion of that which he taketh from the day, and putteth to the night, or contrariwife, is after this maner in the first thirty daies; for in that space after the solftice in winter, hee addern to the day the fixt part of that exuperance, whereby the longest night furmounteth the shortest day and in another thirtie daies following after that, a third part, and fo forward in the rest of the daies one halfe, until you come to the æquinox, in fextuple and triple intervals, to make even the inequality of the times. But the Chaldeans fay, that Spring in regard of Autumne carieth proportion Diateffaron, in respect of winter Diapente, and in comparison of summer Diapason: But if Euripides hath well limited the foure quarters of the yeere when he faid:

> For fummer hot, foure moneths or defined be, For winter colde likewife are other foure: Shorter is rich Autumne by one mottle, And pleaf ant Spring whiles it remaines in floure.

then the seasons doe change after the proportion Diapason. Some attribute to the earth, the place of the muficall note Proflambanomenos; unto the moone Hypate: unto Mercurie and Lucifer Diatonos and Lichanos: the funne they fet upon Mefe(they fay) containing Diapafon in the middes, distant from the earth one fifth or Diapente, and from the sphære of the fixed flarres a fourth, or Diatefferon. But neither the prety conceited imagination of these toucheth the trueth any way, nor the reckoning and account of those other, commeth precisely to the point. Well, those who affirme that these devices agree not to the minde of Plato, are yet of 30 opinion, that those other agree very well to the propositions described in the Tablature of musicians, which consisteth of five tetrachords, to wit, the first Hypaton, as one would say, of base notes; the second, Meson, that is to say, of meanes; the third, Synemmenon that is to say, of conjuncts; the fourth, Diezeugmernon, that is to fay, of disjuncts; & the fift, Hyperbolzon, to wit, of the high and excellent notes: femblably, fay they: The planets be fet in five diffances, whereof the one is from the moone unto the funne, and those which have the same revolution with him, as Mercurie and Venus; a fecond, from these three unto the first planet Mars; the third, from thence to Jupiter; the fourth, from him to Saturne; and the fift reacheth unto the starry skie: so that the founds and notes which determine the five tetrachords, answere to the proportion of the planets or wandring starres. Moreover, we know very well, that the an-40 cient musicians, did set downe no more notes but two Hypates, three Netes, one Mese, and one Parame: fo as their musicall notes were equall in number to the planets: but our moderne maflers of musicke, have added that which is called Proflambanomenos, namely, lower by one note than Hypate, and enclining to the base: and so the whole composition they made Disdiapafon; not keeping and observing the order of the consonances according to nature, for Diapente is before Diatesseron, by adding one note or tone to Hypate toward the base; whereas it is certaine that Phiotooke one note to it toward the treble; for hee faith in his books of Common-wealth: That every one of the eight sphæres hath a firene fitting upon it, caufing the fame to turne about, and that ech one of them hath a feverall and proper voice of their owne: but of altogether there is contempered a certeine harmonie: these strenes being dispo-50 fed to folace themselves, sing for their pleasure divine and heavenly tunes, dauncing withall a facred daunce, under the melodious confent of eight strings: as also there were eight principall tearmes at first of proportions double and triple; counting for one of these tearmes or limits unitie to either part: but the more auncient fort have given unto us nine muses, to wit, eight as Plato himselfe faith, about the celestiall bodies, and the ninth about the terrestriall, called foorth from the rest to dulce and set them in repose, in stead of errour, trouble, and inequality. Consider now I pray you, whether the soule being become most just and most wife, doth not manage the heaven and celestiall things by the accords and motions therein? And thus cudued the is by proportions harmonicall; the images whereof are imprinted upon the bodies and visible parts of the world which are seene: but the first and principall power is visibly inferted in the foule which sheweth herselfe accordant & obeisant to the better & more divine part, all the rest consenting likewise thereto. For the soveraigne creatour, finding a disorder and confusion in the motions of this disordinate and soolish soule, being evermore at discord with her felfe, divided and separated some; reconciled and reunited others; using thereto numbers and proportions; by meanes whereof, the most dease bodies, as blocks and stones, wood, barks of trees, and the very rennets and mawes of beafts, their guts, their galles and finewes, being fra-10 med, contempered, and mixed together in proportion, exhibite into us the figures of statues woonderfull to fee to, and drogues and medicines most effectuall, yea and founds of musicall instruments right admirable. And therefore Zeno the Citiean, called foorth young men to see and beholde minstrels playing upon flutes and hauthoies: That they might heare (quoth he) and learne, what fweet founds and melodious noifes, hornes, pieces of wood, canes and reeds do yeeld, yea and whatfoever matters els muficall inftruments be made of, when they meet with proportions and accords. As for that which the Pythagoreans were woont to fay and affirme. namely, that all things refembled number, it would aske a long discourse for to declare it. But that all the gods who were before at discord and debate, by reason of their diffimilitude, and whatfoever els jarred, grew to accord and confonance one with another, whereof the caufe was 20 the contemperature, moderation and order of number and harmonie, the very Poets were not ignorant of, who use to call such things as be friendly, amiable and pleasing, apoques but adversaries and enemies they terme arapties, as if discord and enmitte were nothing els but disproportion: and verily that Poet whoever he was, that made a funerall dittie for Pindarus, when he faid thus of him, ર્જાન્ભાળ હિંદું દેવારા તામ તેમોર્જી હીર,ક્ષેડ્રાંતિ તેરહોંડ. To strangers kınde he was and affable,

fhewed very well, that he held it for a fingular vertue to be fociable, and to know how to fort and agree with others: like as the fame Pindar in himselfe,

When God did call he gave attendance,

Andnever bragd of all his valiance, meaning and fignifying Cadmus. The olde Theologians and Divines, who of all Philosophers are most ancient, have put into the hands of of the images of the gods, musicall instruments, minding nothing leffe thereby, than to make this god or that a minftrell, either to play on lute or to found the flute, but because they thought there was no greater piece of worke than accord and harmonicall fymphonic could befeeme the gods. Like as therefore, hee that would feeke for fesquitertian, sesquialterall or double proportions of Musicke, in the necke or bridge, in the belly or backe of a lute, or in the pegs and pinnes thereof, were a ridiculous foole (for howfoever these parts ought to have a symmetrie and proportion one to another in regard of 40 length and thicknesse; yet the harmonie whereof we speake, is to be considered in the founds onely.) Even fo, probable it is, and standeth with great reason, that the bodies of the starres, the distances and intervals of sphæres, the celeritie also of their courses and revolutions, should be proportionate one unto the other, yea and unto the whole world, as inftruments of muficke well fet and tuned, albeit the just quantitie of the measure be unknowen unto. But this we are to thinke, that the principall effect and efficacie of these numbers and proportions, which that great and fovereigne Creatour used, is the consonance, accord, and agreement of the soule in it felfe; with which the being endowed, the hath replenithed both the heaven it felfe, when the was fetled thereupon, with an infinite number of good things; and alfo difpofed and ordeined all things upon the earth, by feafons, by changes and mutations, tempered and meafured moft excellently well and with furpaffing wildome, alwell for the production and generation of all things, a sfor the prefervation and lafety of them, when they were created and made.

AN EPITOME OR BREVIARIE

of a Treatise as touching the creation of the Soule, according to Plato in Timaus.

teth to the univerfall world a foule; and likewife to every living creature a foule of the owne by it selfe, which ruleth and governeth it. He bringeth in the faid soule in some fort not engendred, and yet after a fort subject to generation. But hee affirmeth that eternall matter to have bene formed by God; that evill and vice is an impe fpringing from the faid matter, To the end (quoth he) that it might never come into mans thought, That God was the authour or caule of evill.

All the rest of this Breviarie, is word for word in the Treatise it selfe, therefore may be well spared in this place, and not rehearfed a second time.

FATALL NECESSITY.

This little Treatife is so pitiously torne, mained, and dismembred thorowout, that a man may sooner divine and guesse thereat (as I have done) than translateit. Ibeseechthe readers therefore, to holde me excused, in case I neither please my selfe, nor content them, in that which I have written.

Ndevour I will, and addresse my selse to write unto you (most deere 40 and loving friend P1/0, as plainly and compendiously as possible I can) mine opinion as touching Fatall destinie, for to satisfie your request: albeit you know full well how wary and precise I am in my writing. First and formost therefore, thus much you must understand, That this terme of Fatall destinie is spoken and understood two maner of waies: the one, as it is an action, and the other, as it is a substance. In the first place, Plate hath figuratively drawer it forth, & under a type described it as an action, both in his diologue entituled Phadrus, in these words: It is an Adrastian law or inevitable ordinance, which alwaies followeth and accompanieth God. And also in his treatise called 50 Timeus, after this maner: The lawes which God hath pronounced and published to the immortall foules, in the procreation of the univerfall world. Likewife, in his books of Commonwealth, he faith, That Fatall necessitie is the reason and speech of Lachesis the daughter of Neceffitie. By which places he giveth us to understand, not tragically, but after a theologicall maner, what his minde and opinion is. Now if a man (taking the faid places already cited & quoted) would expound the fame more familiarly in other words, he may declare the former description in Phedrus after this fort, namely, that Fatall destinie is a divine reason or sentence intransgresfible and inevitable, proceeding from a cause that cannot be diverted nor impeached. And according to that which he delivereth in Timan, it is a law confequently entuing upon the nature and creation of the world, by the rule whereof all things paffe and are differenced, that be done. For this is it that Lache sis worketh & effecteth, who is in trueth the daughter of Necessity, as we have both alreadie faid, & alfo shall better understand by that which we are to deliver hereafter in this and other treatifes at our leafure. Thus you fee what Deftinie is, as it goeth for an action; but being taken for a fubstance, it feemeth to be the universall soule of the whole world, and admitteth a tripartite division. The first Destiny is that which erreth not; the second seemeth to to erre; and the third is under heaven & conversant about the earth: of which three, the highest is called Clotho; that next under it is named Atropos; and the lowest, Lachesis: and the receiveth the influences of her two celeftiall fifters, transmitting and fastening the same upon terrestriall things, which are under her governmet. Thus have we thewed fummarily, what is to be thought & faid as touching Destiny, being taken as a substance; namely, What it is; what parts it bath; after what fort it is; how it is ordeined; and in what maner it standeth, both in respect of it selfe, and also in regard of us: but as concerning the particularities of all these points, there is another fable in the Politiques of Plato, which covertly in some fort giveth us intelligence thereof; and the fame have we affaied to explane & unfolde unto you, as wel as possibly we can. But to returne unto our Destiny as it is an action, let us discourse thereof, forasmuch as many que-20 flions, naturall, morall and rationall depend thereupon. Now for that we have in some fort sufficiently defined already, what it is, we are to confider confequently in order, the qualitie and maner thereof; howfoever there be many that thinke it very strange and abfurd to search thereinto. Ifay therefore, that Destiny is not infinite, but finite and determinate, however it comprehend as it were within a circle the infinitie of all things that are, and have beene time out of minde, yea and shall be worlds without end : for, neither law, nor reason, nor any divine thing whatfoever, can be infinite. And this shall you the better learne and understand, if you consider the totall revolution and the univerfall time, when as the eight fphæres, as Timam faith, having performed their fwift courfes, shall returne to the same head and point againe, being measured by the circle of The fame, which goeth alwaies after one maner: for in this definite and determi-20 nate reason, all things as well in heaven as in earth, the which doe consist by the necessitie of that above, be reduced to the fame fituation, and brought againe to their first head and beginning. The onely habitude therefore of heaven, which flandeth ordeined in all points, aswell in regard ofitfelfe, as of the earth, and all terrestrial matters, after certaine long revolutions, shall one day returne, yea and that which consequently followeth after, and those which are linked in a continuity together, bring ech one by confequence that which it hath by necessity. For to make this matter more plaine, let us suppose that all those things which are in and about us, be wrought and brought to passe by the course of the heavens and celestiall influences, all being the very efficient cause both of that which I write now, and also of that which you are doing at this prefent, yea and in that fort as you do the fame : fo that hereafter, when the fame cause shall 40 turneabout and come againe, we shall do the very same that now we do, yea and after the same maner; yea we shall become againe the very fame men. And even so it shall be with all other men; and looke whatfoever shall follow in a course or traine, shall likewise happen by a consequent and dependant cause: and in one word, what soever shall be fall in any of the universall revolutions, shall become the same againe. Thus apparent it is, as hath already beene said, That Destiny being in some fort infinite, is neverthelesse determinate and not infinite; as also, that according as we have shewed before, it is evident that it is in maner of a circle: for like as the motion of a circle in a circle, and the time that measureth it is also a circle; even so the reason of those things which are done and happen in a circle, by good right may be esteemed and said to be a circle.

This therefore, if nought els there were, the weth unto us, in a maner fufficiently, what is defliny in generality, but not in particular, nor in ech severall respect: What then is it? It is the generall, in the same kinde of reason, so as a man may compare it with civill law: For first and formost, it commaundeth the most part of things, if not all, at leastwise by way of supposition, and then it comprise thas much as is possible all matters appetteining to a city or publike state, generally: and that we may better understand both the one and the other, let us exemplifie and consider the same in specialty: The civill or politique law speaketh and ordeineth generally of avaliant man, as also of a run-away coward, and so consequently of others: howbeit, this is not to make a law of this or that particular person; but to provide ingenerall principally, and then of particulars by confequence, as comprised under the faid generall; for we may very well favthat to remunerate and recompense this or that man for his valour is lawfull; as also to punish a particular person for his cowardise, and for saking his colours; for that the law potentially and in effect, hath comprized as much, although not in expresse words: like as the law (if I may so fay) of Physicians, and of masters of bodily exercises, comprehendeth speciall and particular points within the generall: and even so doth the law of nature, which first and principally doth determine generall matters; and then particulars fecondarily & by confequence. Semblably, may particular and individuall things in some fort be said to be destined, for that they be so by confequence with the generals. But haply fome one of those who fearch and enquire more cti- 10 rioufly and exactly into these matters will hold the contrary, and say; that of particular & individuall things, proceed the composition of the generals, and that the generall is ordeined and gathered for the particular. Now that for which another thing is, goeth alwaies before that which is for it; but this is not the proper place to speake of these quiddities; for wee are to referre them to some other: howbeit, that deftiny doth not comprehend all things purely and exprefly, but onely fuch as be univerfall and generall, is refolved upon for this prefent, and ferveth for that which we have to fay heereafter, yea, and agreeth alfo to that which hath beene delivered fomewhat before; for that which is finite and determinate, properly agreeable todivine providence, is more feene in univerfall and generall things, than in particular; of this nature is the law of God, and fuch is likewise the civill law, whereas infinity consistesth in parti-20 culars.

After this we are to declare, what meaneth this tearme, By supposition: for surely destiny is to be thought such a thing. We have then called, By supposition, that which is not set downe of it selfe, nor by it selfe, but supposed and joined after another; and this signifiest a sure aconsequence. This is the law or ordinance of Adrassia, that is to say, a decree inevitable; unto which, if any soule can affociate it selfe, the same thall be able to see by consequence, all that willensure, even unto another generall revolution, and be exempt from all evill; which if it may be able alwaies to doe, it shall neither sustein any damage nor doe harme. Thus you see what it is that we call, By supposition & in generall. Now that Fatall destiny is of thiskind evidently appecreth, as well by the substance as the name thereof; for it is called in Greek what is one would say vie when, that is as much as dependant and linked, and a law it is and ordinance, for that things therein be ordeined and disposed consequently, and in maner of those which are done civilly.

Heereunto is to be annexed a treatife of relation, that is to fay, what reference and respect hath Fatall destiny unto divine providence, as also unto fortune : likewise, what is that which is in us; what is contingent; and fuch like things. Moreover, we are to decide, wherein and how it is falle; wherein allo, and how it is true; that all things happen and come to passe by Farall destiny for a it import and imply thus much, That all things are comprised and conteined in Fatall destiny, we must grant this proposition to be true; and say one out thereto all things done among men, upon the earth, and in the very heaven, and place them within Fatall deftiny, let 40 us grant as much for the prefent. But if we understand that this word Fatall (as it rathersee meth)doth import not all things, but that onely which followeth and is dependant, then wee may not grant and fay, that all things be comprehended in Farall destiny; considering all that which the law doeth comprehend, and whereof it speakets, is not lawfull, nor according to law : for why? it comprises treason; it treatest of cowardife; of running away from ones colours and place in battell; of adultery and many things femblable: of which we cannot fay, any one is lawfull: forasmuch as, even to performe valorous service in the wars, to kill tyrants, or to exploit any vertuous deed, I would not tearme lawfull, because properly that is lawfull, which is commanded by the law; and if the law did command those things, how can they avoid to be rebellious and transgressors of the law, who have not done valiant exploits in armes, have not 50 killed tyrants, nor performed any other notable acts of vertue? and in case they be offenders of the law, why are they not punished accordingly? But if to punish such, be neither just nor reafonable, then confesse we must, that these matters be not legall, nor according to law; for legall and according to law is that, which is namely prescribed, set downe, and expresly commanded by the law, in any action whatfoever. Semblably, those things onely be Fatall and according to destiny, which are done by a divine disposition proceeding, so that Fatall destiny may well coprise all things: howbeit many of those which be comprised therein, and in maner all that went before, to speake properly, cannot be pronounced Fatall, nor according to Fatall destiny, which being fo, we ought to declare now in order confequently, how that which is in our owner power, to wit, free will, how fortune, possible, contingent, and other such like things, which be ranged and placed among the premiffes, may fubfill fafely with fatall diftiny; and how fatall diffuny may fland with them: for fatall diffiny comprehendeth all, as it feemeth: and yet thete things happen not by any necessity, but every of them according to there owne nature. The nature of politible is to have a prefublittence as the gender, and to goe before the contingent, and the cottingent as the subject matter ought to be presupposed before the things which are in our power: for that which is in us, as a lord and mafter ufeth the contingent. And fortune is of this to nature, to intercurre betweene our free will and what is in us, by the property of contingencie enclining to the one fide and to the other, which you may more eafily apprehend and underfland, if you confider, how every thing that is produced forth, yea and the production it selfe and generation, is not without a certaine puissance: and no puissance or power there is without a fubstance : as for example the generation of man, and that which is produced and engendred, is not without a power, and the same is about the man, but man himselfe is the substance. Of the puillance or power being betweene, commeth the fubltance which is the puillant: but the production and that which is produced, be both things possible. There being therefore these three, puissance, puissant, and possible : before puissance can be, of necessitie there must be presupposed a puissant, as the subject thereof: and even so it must needs be that puissance also sub-20 fill before that which is possible. By this deduction then, in some fort is declared, what is that which we call poffible; to as we may after a groffe maner define it to be, that which puiffance is able to produce: and to speake more properly of the same, by adjoining thereto thus much, provided alwaies that nothing without forth doc impeach or hinder it, But among possible things, fomethere be that never can be hindred, as namely in heaven, the rifing and fetting of the stars, and fuch like : others may be impeached, as the most part of humane affaires, yea and many meteors in the aire. As for the former, as things hapning by necessitie, they be called necessarie; theother for that they fall out sometime contrariwise, we tearme contingent; and in this sort may they be described. Necessary is that possible thing, which is opposit to impossible: contingent is that possible, whereof possible also is the contrary. For that the sun should go downe, is a 30 thing both necessary & possible, as being contrary unto this impossibility, namely, that the sun should not fet at all : but that when the sun is set, there should come raine or not raine, are both of them possible and contingent. Againe of things contingent, some there be which happen oftentimes and for the most part; others rare and feldome; some fall out indifferently, as well one wate as another, even as it hapneth. And plaine it is, that these be opposit and repugnant to themselves as for those which happen usually and very often, contrary they be to such things aschance but seldome: and these indeed for the most part are subject to nature: but that which chanceth equally, one way as well as another, lieth in us and our will: for examples fake, that under the Dog starre it should be not and colde; the one commonly and for the most part, the othervery feldome, are things both, fubmitted to nature: but to walke or not to walke and fuch 40 things whereof the one and the other be subject to the free will of man, are said to be in us and in our choife and election: but rather and more generally, they be faid to be in us. For as touching this tearme, Tobe in us, it is to be understood two maner of waies, and thereof are two kindes, the one proceedeth from paffion as namely from anger or concupifence; the other from discourse of reason or judgement and understanding, which a man may properly say, to be in our election. And fome reason there is that this possible contingent which is named to be in us, and to proceed from our appetite and will, should be called so, not in the same regard, but for divers: for in respect of future time it is called possible and contingent; but in regard of the present it is named. In us and in our free will: so as a man may thus define and distinguish of thefe things : Contingent is that which both it felfe and the contrary whereof is possible : that so which in us, is the one part of contingent, to wit, that which presently is in doing according to our appetite. Thus have we in maner declared, that by nature possible goeth before contingent, and contingent sublisteth before that which in us; also, what ech of them is, and whereupon they are so called, yea and what be the qualities adjoining thereto: it remaineth now, that we should treat of Fortune and casuall adventure, and of whatsoever besides, that requireth discourse and consideration. First, this is certeine, that Fortune is a kinde of cause: but among causes, some are of themselves, others by accident : as for example, of an house or thip, the proper causes and of themselves, be the Mason, Carpenter or Shipwright; but by accident, the Musician

Musician and Geometrician, yea, and whatsoever incident to the mason, carpenter, or shipwright, either in regard of body or minde, or outward things: whereby it appeareth, that the effentiall cause which is by it selfe, must needs be determinate, certeine in one; whereas the accidentall causes are not alwaics one and the same, but infinit, and indeterminate; for many accidents in number infinit, and in nature different one from another, may be together in one and the fame subject. This cause then by accident, when it is found not onely in such things which are done for some end, but also in those wherein our election and will taketh place, is called fortune: as namely, to find treasure when a man diggeth a hole or grave to planta tree in, or to do and fuffer any extraordinary thing, in flying, purfuing, or otherwise going and marching, or onely in retiring: provided alwaies, that he doeth it not to that end which enfueth to thereupon, but upon some other intention. And heereupon it is, that some of the auncient philosophers have defined fortune, to be a cause unknowen, and not foreseene by mans reason: But according to the Platoniques, who come neerer unto it in reason, it is defined thus: Fortune is an accidentall cause in those things that are done for some end, and which are in our election; and afterwards they adjoine moreover, not foreseene nor knowen by the discourse of humane reason; although that which is rare and strange, by the same meanes, appeareth also in this kinde of cause by accident. But what this is, if it appeare not manifestly by the oppositions and contradictory disputations, yet at leastwife it will be declared most evidently, by that which is writte in a treatife of Plato, entituled Phedon, where these words are found. What Have you not heard how & in what maner the judgement passed? Yes iwis: For one there was, who 20 came and told us of it: whereat we marvelled very much, that feeing the fentence of judgement was pronounced long before, he died a good while after. And what might be the cause thereof, ô Phedon? Surely, there hapned unto him, ô Echecrates, a certeine fortune: For it chanced that the day before the judgement, the prow of the galley which the Athenians fent to ille Delos was crowned: In which words it is to be noted, that by this tearme; There hapned, you must not understand, There was; but rather, it so befell, upon a concourse and meeting of many causes together, one after another. For the priest adorned the ship with coronets for another end and intention, and not for the love of Socrates; yea, and the judges had condemned himalfo for some other cause: but the event it selfe was so strange & admirable, as if it had hapned by fome providence, or by an humane creature, or rather indeed by some superior nature. And 30 thus much may fuffice as touching fortune, and the definition thereof: as also, that necessarily it ought to fubfill together with some one contingent thing of those which are meant to some end; whereupon it tooke the * name: yea, and there must be some subject before of such things which are in us and in our election.

But casuall adventure reacheth and extendeth farther than fortune: for it comprises both it, and also many other things which may chance aswell one way as another: and according as the very etymologie and derivation of the word do toputato, sheweth it is that which hapneth for and in fread of another, namely, when that which was ordinary fell not out, but another thing in lieu thereof: as namely, when it chanceth to be colde weather in the Dog daies; for fometimes it falleth out to be then colde: and not without cause. In summe, like as that which is in us and 40 arbitrary, is part of contingent; even so is fortune a part of casuall or accidental adventure; and both these events are conjunct and dependant one of another; to wit, casual adventure hangeth upon contingent, and fortune upon that which is in us and arbitrarie; and yet not fimply and in generall, but of that onely which is in our election, according as hath beene before faid. And hereupon it is, that this casuall adventure is common aswell to things which have no life, as to those which are animate; whereas fortune is proper to man onely, who is able to performe voluntarie actions. An argument whereof is this, that to be fortunate, happie and bleffed, are thought to be all one; for bleffed happineffe is a kinde of well doing; and to doe well, properly belongeth to a man and him that is perfect. Thus you fee what things are comprised within fatall destiny, namely, contingent, possible, election, that which is within us, fortune, castiall acci- 50 dent or chance & adventure, to gether with their circumstant adjuncts, signified by these words, haply, peradventure or perchance: howbeit, we are not to inferre, that because they be conteined within destinie, therefore they be fatall.

Itemaineth now to discourse of divine providence, considering that it selfe comprehendeth fatall destinie. This supreame and first providence therefore, is the intelligence and will of the sovereigne god, doing good unto all that is in the world; whereby all divine things universally and thorowout, have bene most excellently and wifely ordeined and disposed. The second providence, is the intelligence and will of the fecond gods who have their courfe thorow the heaven; by which, temporall and mortall things are ingendred regularly and in order; as also whatfoever perteineth to the prefervation and continuance of every kinde of thing. The third, by all probabilitie and likelihood may well be called the providence and profpicience of the Damonds or angels, as many as be placed and ordeined about the earth as superintendents, for to obleve, marke and governe mens actions. Now albeit there be feene this threefolde providence, yet properly and principally that first and supreame is named Providence : so as we may beholde, and never doubt to fay, howfoever herein we feeme to contradict fome Philosophers, That all things are done by fatall deftinie, and by providence, but not likewife by nature : howto beit, some by providence; and that after divers sorts, these by one, and those by another: yea and some also by fatall destinie. As for fatall destinie, it is altogether by providence; but providence inno wife by fatall destinie: where; by the way, this is to be noted, that in this present place I understand the principall and sovereigne providence. Now whatsoever is done by another (be it what it will) is evermore after that which causeth or maketh it; even as that which is erected by law is after the law; like as what is done by nature, must needs succeed and come after nature. Semblably, what is done by farall deftiny, is after farall deftiny, & of necessity must be more new &moderne: and therfore the supreme providence is the ancientest of all, excepting him alone, whole intelligence it is or wil, or both twaine together, to wit, the fovereigne authour, creatour, maker and father of all things. And for what cause is it, Taith Timeus, that he hath made & framed this fabricke of the world? co for that he is all good, and in him being all good, there can not be imprinted or engendred any a envie: but seeing he is altogether void and free from it, his will was, that as much as possibly as might be, all things should resemble himselfe. He then who shall receive and admit this for the se moltprincipall and and proper originall of the generation and creation of the world, fuch as see wifemen have delivered unto us by writing, is in the right way, and doeth very well. For God a willing that all things should be good, and nothing at all (to his power) evill, tooke all that was co visible, restlesse as it was, and mooving still rashly, confusedly, irregularly and without order, se which he brought out of confusion, and ranged into order, judging this to be every way farre as better than the other: for neither it was, nor is convenient and meet, for him who is himselfe as 30 right good, to make any thing that should not be most excellent and beautifull. Thus there- sc fore we are to esteeme that providence (I meane that which is principall and soveraigne) hath se conflituted and orderned these things first, and then in order such as ensue and depend thereof, so even as farre as to the foules of men. Afterwards having thus created the universall world, hee ac ordeined eight sphæres, answering in number to so many principall starres; and distributed to ac every one of them a feverall foule; all which he fet, ech one (as it were) within a chariot over the se nature of the whole, shewing unto them the lawes and ordinances of Fatall destiny * * * * ca What is he then who will not believe, that by these words he plainly sheweth and declareth Fatall destiny, and the same to be (as one would fay) attribunall, yea, & a politicke constitution of civill lawes, meet and agreeable to the foules of men whereof afterwards he rendreth areason. 40. And astouching the fecond providence, he doeth after a fort exprelly fignifie the fame in thefe words, faying: Having therefore prescribed all these lawes unto them, to the end that if afterwards there should be any default, he might be exempted from all cause of evill: he spred and fowedfome upon the earth, others about the moone, and fome againe upon other organs and instruments of time: after which distribution, he gave commandement and charge to the young gods for to frame and create mortall bodies, as also to make up and finish that which remained and was wanting in mans foule; and when they had made perfect all that was adharent and confequent thereto, then to rule and governe after the best and wifest maner possible, this mortall creature, to the end that it felfe should not be the cause of the owne evils and miseries: for in these words where it is said: That he might be exempt, and not the cause of any evill enso fuing afterwards, he sheweth cleerely and evidently to every one the cause of Fatall desting. The order also and office of these petie-gods declareth unto us the second providence, yea, and it seemeth that in some fort it toucheth by the way, the third providence, in case it be so, that for this purpose these lawes and ordinances were established, because he might not be blamed or accused as the author of any evill in any one afterwards: for God himselfe being cleere & exempt from all evill, neither hath need of lawes, nor requireth any Fatall destiny : but ech one of these petie-gods, led and haled by the providence of him who hath engendred them, doth their owne devoir and office belonging unto them. That this is true, and the very minde and opinion of Plato, appeareth manifestly in my conceir, by the testimonie of those words which are reported by the law-giver in his books of lawes in this maner: If there were any man(quoth he) fo by nature sufficient, or by divine fortune so happily borne, that he could be able to comprehend this, he should require no lawes to command him: for no law there is, nor ordinance of more woorth and puiffance, than is knowledge and science: neither can he possibly be a fervile flave or subject to any, who is truely and indeed free by nature, but he ought to command all. For mine owne part thus I understand and interpret the sentence of Plato: For whereas there is a triple providence: the first, as that which hath engendred Faralldestiny, in some fort comprehendeth it: the second being engendred with it, is likewise wholly comprised in it: the third engendred after Fatal destiny, is comprised under it, in that maner, as, That which is in us, to and fortune, as we have already faid: for those whom the affistance of the power of our Dæmon doth aid (according as Socrates faith) expouding unto Theages what is the inevitable ordinance of Adraftia, thele (I fay) are those whom you understand well enough; for they grow and come forward quickly with speed, so as, where it is said, that a Dæmon or angell doth favourany, it must be referred to the third providence; but that suddenly they grow and come to proofe, it is by the power of Fatall destiny: And to be short, it is very plaine and evident, that even this alfo is a kinde of destiny. And peradventure it may feeme much more probable, that even the second providence is comprehended under destiny; yea, and in summe, all things whatsoever be made or done, confidering that deftiny according to the fubffance thereof, hath benerightly divided by us into three parts. And verily that speech as touching the chaine and concarenation, comprehendeth the revolutions of the heavens, in the number and raunge of those things which happen by supposition: but verily of these points I will not debate much, to wit, whether we are to call them, Hapning by Supposition, or rather conjunct unto destiny; considering that the precedent cause and commander of destiny it selfe, is also fatall. And thus to speake fummarily, and by way of abridgement, is our opinion: but the contrary fentence unto this ordeineth all things to be not onely under deftiny, but also according to destiny, and by it. Now all things accord unto the other, and that which accordeth to another, the same must be granto be the other: according then to this opinion, contingent is faid to be the first; that which is in us the fecond; fortune the third; accident or cafuall chance and adventure the fourth, together with all that dependent thereupon, to wit, praife, blame, and those of the same kindes the fifth and last of all, may bee said to be the praiers unto the gods, together with their services of and ceremonies. Moreover, as touching those which are called idle, and harvest arguments, as also that which is named beside or against destiny, they are no better than cavils and sophistics according to this opinion; but according to the contrary sentence, the first and principal conclusion is, that nothing is done without cause, but all thing depend upon precedent caufes: the fecond, that the world is governed by nature, which conspireth and is compatible with it selfe; the third may seeme rather to be testimonies unto these; whereof the first is divination, approved by all nations, as being really and truely in God; the fecond the æquanimite and patience of wife men, taking and bearing well all accidents and occurrents whatfoever, as comming by divine ordinance; the third, which is fo common a speech, and divulged in, 40 every mans mouth, namely, that every proposition is either true or falle. Thus have in we drawen this discourse into a small number of short articles, to the end that we might remember and comprise in few words, the whole matter and argument of Destinie. All which points, both of the one and the other opinion, are to be discussed and examined with more diligent inquisition, whereof particularly we will treat afterwards.

COMPENDIOVS RE-

VIEW AND DISCOURSE,

The Summaric.

Petie declaration this is against the feet of the Stoicks, which briefly and in a word is makethodious; giving out in plaine tearmes, that (uch per sons be the loudest liers in the world; and that their opinion as touching the change and alteration of that party who rangeth himselfe unto them, is so monstrous and rediculous, that the discovery only thereof is a sufficient resutation.

A COMPENDIOUS REVIEW and discourse, That the Stoicks deliver more strange opinions, than do the Poets.

Indar us was reprooved, for that after a strange maner, and without all sense and probabilitie hee fained Caneus one of the Lapitha, to have had a bodie fo hard, as it could not be pierced by any weapon of iron and steele, but that he remained unhurt, and so afterwards

Went under earthwithouten wound, When with stiffe foot he cleft the ground.

But this Lapith of the Stoicks, to wit, their imagined wife man, being forged by them of impaffibilitie, as of a mettall harder than the diamond, is not fuch an one as is not otherwhiles wollded, difeated and affailed with paine: howbeit, as they fay , he abideth still feare-

40 lesse and without forrow and heavinesse; he continueth invincible, he susteineth no force nor violence, howfoever he be wounded, what paine foever he fuffereth, be he put to all tortures, or fee his native countrey facked and destroied before his face, or what calamities els beside be presented to his eies. And verily, that Caneus whom Pindarus describeth, notwithstanding hee were finitten, and bare many ftroakes, yet was unwounded for all that: but the wife man whom the Stoicks imagine, although he be kept enclosed in prison, yet is not restreined of libertie; say he be pitched downe from the top of a rocke, yet fusteineth no violence; is he put to the strappado, to the racke or wheele, yet for all that is he not tormented; and albeit he frie in the fire, yet he hath no harm; nay, if in wreftling he be foiled and take a fall, yet he perfifteth unconquered; when he is environed within a wall, yet is he not befreged; and being folde in port fale by the e-

50 nemies, yet is he no captive, but remaineth impregnable; refembling most properly for all the world, those ships which have these goodly inscriptions in their poups, Happie voyage, Luckie navigation, Saving providence, and Remedie against all dangers : and yet the same neverthelesse be toffed in the feas, fplit upon the rocks, cast away and drowned. Iolius, as the Poet Euripides hathfained, by a certeine praier that he made unto the gods, of a feeble and decrepit olde man, became all of a fudden a yong and luftic gallant, ready for to fight a battell; but the Stoicks wife man, who longer agoe than yesterday, was most hatefull, wretched and wicked, all at once to day is changed into a good and vertuous person; he is of a rivelled, pale, leane and poore sillie aged man, and as the Poet Aeschylus saith,

become, a lovely, faire, beautifull, and personable youth, pleasant both to God and man, Manerva in Homer rid Uliffes from his wrinkles, his baldnesse, and ill fovoured deformity, that he might appeare full of favour and amiable: but this wife man of there making, albeit withered olde age leave not his body, but contrariwife increase still and grow more and more with all the discommodities that followit, continuing still for example sake bunch backt, if he were so before, one eied, and toothleffe, yet for footh is not for all this, foule, deformed and ill favoured to For like as by report the bettils fly from good and sweet odors, seeking after stinking sents, even fo the Stoicks love (converting with the most foule ilfavoured and deformed, after that by their fapience and wisdome they be turned into all beauty and favor) departeth and goeth from them. With these Stoicks he who in the morning haply was most wicked, will proove in the evening a right honest man: & who went to bed foolish, ignorant, injurious, outragious, intemperat, yea a very flave, a poore & needy begger, will rife the morrow morning, a king, rich, happie, chafte, just, firme and constant, nothing at all subject to variety of opinions: not for that he hath all on a fuddaine put forth abeard, or become under growen, as in a yoong and tender body: butrather engendred in a weake, soft, effeminate and inconstant soule, a perfect minde, perfect underftanding, foveraine prudence, a divine disposition, comparable to the gods, a settled and affirm 22 fcience, not wandring in opinions and an immutable and stedfast habitude: neither went that leawd wickednesse of his away by little & little, but all at once (I may well neere say) he was transmuted from a most vile beast into a demy god, adæmon, or avery god indeed. For so some once as a man hath learned vertue in the Stoicks schoole, he may say thus unto himselfe:

Wish what thou wilt, and what thou list to crave, All shall be done; doe thou but aske and have.

This vertue brings riches, this carieth with itroialty, this giveth good fortune, this makes men happie, standing in need of nothing, contented in themselves, although they have not in all the world so much as a single drachme of silver, or one grey groat. Yet are the sales of Poets device with more probability and likelihood of reason: for never doe they leave Hercules altoge 30 ther destitute of necessaries: but it seemeth that he hath with him alwaies one living source or other, out of which there runneth evermore fois on and plenty for himselse and the companyabouthim. But he who hath once gotten the goat Amalthea by the head, and that plential horne of abundance which the Stoicks talke of, he is rich incontinently, and yet beggeth his bread and victuals of others; he is a king, although for a peece of mony he teacheth how to resolve fyllogismesshe onely possessed things, albeit he pay rent for his house, buieth his meale and meat with the silver that many times he takethup of the usurer, or essential their hands who have just nothing of their ownetto give. True it is indeed, that usifes the king of Ithus begged almes, but it was because he would not be knowen; counterfaiting all that he could whereas he that is come out of the Stoicks schoole, crying aloud with open mouth, I onely amaking, I am rich and none but I, is seene often times at other mens doores standing with this note,

Give Hipponax a cloke, his naked corps to folde, For that I quake and shiver much for colde.

ly to any speciall order, but proposing matters according as they come into his remembrance, or were presented to his eies. Moreover, in the recitall of their resugnancies and contradictions, he intermingleth certain expositions, to aggravate the absurdaty of this sect of his adversaries, and to withdraw the reader from them: which his avery proper and lingular maner of declaming and disfluting against inviterate errors, and such as have a great name in the world: for instructing that these who are reputed most able to the above a great name in the world: for instructing that these who are reputed for and sufficient to teach and maintemethem, know not what they say, and do consound the sufficient of the most of the most of the imparation, that his is deprived of common sense, in receiving that for a certaine verity, wherein their very masses are not well resolved, or admitting that which they practise, otherwise than they say.

THE CONTRADICTIONS of Stoicke philosophers.

Irst above all things, I would have to be seene a conformitie and accord betweene the opinions of men and their lives: for it is not so necessary, that the oratour, according as Lysics faith, and the law, should sound the same note, as requisite that the life of a philosopher should be conformable and confonant to his words and doctrine: for the speech of a philosopher is a voluntary and particular law which hee imposeth upon himselse, if it beso as men efterme, that philosophie is (as no doubt it is) the profession of that which is serious, grave, and of weighty importance, and not a gamesome sport, or vaine and toysth pratting, devided onely for to gaine glory. Now we fee, that Zeno himfelie hath written much by way of disputation and discourse; Cleanthes likewise, and Chrysppus most of all, concerning the politique government of common-wealth, touching rule and obedience, of judgement also and pleading at the barre; and yet looke into all their lives throughout, you shall not finde that ever any of them were cap; to tain and commanders, neither law-givers, nor senatours, & counsellers of State, ne yet orators or advocates pleading judicially incount before the judges; nay, they were not so much as emploied in any warre, bearing armes, and performing martiall service for the desence of their countries; you that not find (I say) that any of them was ever sent in embassage, or bestowed any publicke largesse or donative to the people; but remained all the time of their life (and that was not thort, but very long) in a strange and forren country, seeding upon rest and repose, as they had tasted of the herbe Lotus in Homer, and forgotten their native soile, where they spent their time in writing books, in holding discourses, and in walking up and downe. Heereby in manifestive manifestly appeareth, that they lived rather according to the sayings and writings of other, than answerable to that which themselves judge and confesse to be their duty, having passed the whole course of their life in that quiet repose, which Epicurus and Hieronymus so highly praise and recommend. And verily to proove this to be a trueth, Chrysppus himselfe in his fourth booke entituled, Of Lives, is of opinion, and so hath put downe in writing, that a scholasticall life, to wit, that of idle students, differeth not from the life of voluptuous persons. And to this purpose I thinke it not amisse to alledge the mans speech word for word: They (quoth he) who thinke that this scholastical and idle life of students even from the first beginning, is most of all befeeming and agreeable to philosophers, in my conceit, feeme much deceived weening as they do, that they are to philosophize for their pastime or recreation, and so to draw out in 10 length the whole course of their life at their booke in their studies, which is as much to say in plaine tearmes, as to live at ease and in pleasure. Neither is this opinion of theirs to be hidden and diffembled; for many of them give out as much openly, howfoever others, and those not a few deliver the fame more obscurely; and yet where is he who grew old and aged more in this idle scholasticall life, than Chrysippes, Cleanthes, Diogenes, Zeno and Antipater? who forfooke and abandoned even their native countries, having no cause or occasion in the world to complaine of or to be discontent; onely to this end, that they might lead their lives more sweetly at their pleasure, studying and disputing with case, and letting out their girdle slacke as they lift themselves. To approove this that I say, Aristocreon the disciple of Chrysippes, and one of his familiar friends, having caused a statue of braffe to be erected for him, set over it these elegant 20 verses in maner of an epigram:

This image, Arittocreon erected fresh and new For Chrysip, Academicke knots who like an ax did hew

Lo, what maner of perfon was Chrysppus, an aged man, a philosopher, one who praised the life of kings, and of those who are conversant in weale publike, and he who thought there was no difference betweene the idle scholasticall life, and the voluptuous. And yet others among them as many I meane as deale in state affaires, are found to be more repugnant and contradictory to the resolutions of there owne sect: for they bearerule as chiefe magistrates, they are judges, 30 they be Senatours and set in counsell, they ordaine and publish lawes, they punnish malefactours, they honour and reward those that doe well; as if they were cities indeed wherein they governe and manage the state; as if those were senatours, counsellers and judges, who yearly alwaies are by lot created or otherwise to such places; captaines and commanders who are cleated by the suffrages and voices of citizens; and as if those were to be held good lawes which Clistheres, Lyeurgus & Solonmade: and yet the same men they avow and maintaine to have bene witessed fooles, and seawd persons. Thus you see how albeit they administer the common weale, yet they be repugnant to their owned of time.

In like maner Antipater, in his booke of the diffention, betweene Cleanthes, and Chryfippu reporteth, that Zeno and Cleanthes would never be made citizens of Athens, for feare for footh 40 left they might be thought to offer injurie to their owne country. Now if they herein did well, let Chrysppu goe, and say wee nothing of him that he did amisse, incausing himselfe to been rolled and immatriculated in the number of Athenian citizens; for I will not stand much upon this point: onely this I holde, that there is a strange and woonderfull repugnance in their deeds and actions, who referve still the bare names of their native countries, and yet bereave the same of their very persons and their lives, conversing so farre off in forraine lands: much like as if a man who hath cast off and put a way his lawfull wedded wife, should dwell, live and lie ordinary with another as his concubin, yea and beget children of her body, and yet will in no wife espoule her and contract marriage with her, left for footh he might feeme to doc wrong and injurie to the former, Furthermore Chrysppus in his treatise that he made of Rhetoricke writing thus, that 50 a wifeman will in fuch fort plead, make orations to the people, and deale in state matters, as if riches reputation and health were fimply good things, teftifieth hereby and confesset that his precepts and resolutions induce men not to goe forth of doores nor to intermedle in politicke and civill affaires, and so by consequence that their doctrines and precepts cannot fort well with practife, nor be agreeable unto the actions of this life.

Moreover, this is one of Zenoes quodlibets or positions: that we ought not to build temples to the honour of the gods; for that a temple is no such holy thing, nor so highly to be este-med confidering it is the workemanship of masons, carpenters and other attificers: neither can any worke of such artifans be prifed at any woorth. And yet even they who avow and approve this as a wife speech of his, are themselves professed in the religious mysteries of those churches; they mountup to the castle and frequent there the sacred temple of Minerva; they adore the shrines and images of the gods; they adorne the temples with chaplets and guarlands; notwithstanding they be the workes of masons, carpenters and such like mechanicall persons. And will she men seeme indeed to reproove the Epicureans as contrary to themselves, who denying that the gods be occupied or imploied in the government of the world, yet offer facrifice unto them, when as they checke and refute themselves much more in facrificing unto the gods to within their temples and upon their altars, which they maintaine that they ought notto stand at all, nor once to have benebuilt?

Zeno putteth downe & admitteth many vertues according to their feveral differences, like as plate doth, to wit, prudence, fortitude, temperance & justice; faying that they be all in very deed and in nature infeparable nor distinct a funder: howbeit in reason divers and different one from another. And againe when he would feemer to define them feverally one after a nother, he faith That fortitude is prudence in the execution of matters: justice is prudence in the distribution of things, &c. as if there were no more but one fole vertue; which according to divers relations, unto affaires and actions, feemeth to differ and admit distinction. So you see, that not Zeno alone seemeth to be repugnant unto himselfe in these matters, but Chryspopus also, who to reprooveth Ariston faying, that all vertues are nothing else but the divers habitudes and relations of one and the same, and yet defendeth Zeno when he define the ch vertue in this wise by itselfe.

As for Clearches in his commentaries of nature, having fet this downe, that the vigour and firmitude of things, is the illifton and firmiting of fire, which if it be in the foule fo fulficient, that it is able to performe the duties prefented unto it, is called firength and power, he annexethafterward these words: And this very power and firength (quoth he) when as it is emploied insuch objects wherein aman is to persist, and which he ought to conteine, is called Continency; if in things to be endured and supported, then it is named Fortitude; if in estimation of worthinesse and defert, beareth the denomination of Justice; if in choises or resultals, it carieth to the name of Temperance. Against him who was the authour of this sentence,

For beare thy sentence for to passe, and judgement see thou stay, Untill such time as thou hast heard what parties both can say.

Zeno alledged fuch a reason as this on the contrary side. Whether the plaintife who spake in the first place hath plainly proved his cause or no, there is no need at all to heare the second, for the matter is at an end already, and the question determined; or whether he hath not proved it, all is one; for it is even the same case, whether he that is cited be so stubburne as not to appeare for to be heard, or if he appeare, doe nothing els but cavill and wrangle: so that proove he or 40 proove he not his cause; needlesse it is to heare the second plead. And yet even he who made this Dilemma, and wrote against the books of Policie and common wealth that Plato composed, taught his scholars how to associate and avoid such Sophisticall arguments, yea and exhorted them to learne Logicke with all diligence, as being the art which thewesh them how to performe the same. Howheit a man might come upon him by way of objection in this maner: Cettes, Plato hath either proved or els not proved those points which he handled in his Politicks: but whether he did or no, there was no necessitie at all to write against him as you did; for it was altogether vaine, needlesse and superstuous. And even the same may be said of Sophisticall arguments and cavillations.

Chrysppw is of opinion, that yong scholars and students should first learnethose arts which so concerne speech, as Grammar, Logicke and Rhetoricke; in the second place, morall sciences; in the third, naturall philosophie; and after all these, in the last place, to heare the doctrine as touching religion and the gods: which Being delivered by him in many passages of his ritings, it shall be sufficient to alledge that onely which he hath written thus word for word in the third booke of his Lives. First and formost (quoth he) it seemeth unto mee, according to the doctrine of our ancients, that of Philosophicall speculations there be three kinds; Logicall, as touching speech; Ethicall, concerning maners; and Physicall, belonging to the nature of things: of which, that which is respective unto speech ought to precede and be ranged first; secondly, that which treateth of maners; thirdly, that which handleth naturall causes. Now of these Physicks and naturall arguments, the last is that which treateth of God: and this is the reafon that the precepts and traditions of divine matters and of religion, they called TRASTRIS, as one would fay, the very last and comming in the end. Howbeit, this treatise of the gods, which by his faying ought to be fet last, himselfe in the very same booke, rangeth above maners, and serteth before all other morall questions. For neither feemeth he to speake of the ends, nor of juflice, nor of good and evill things, nor of marriage, nor of the nouriture and education of childrenane yet of law nor of the government of the Common wealth in any fort; but as they who propose and publish decrees unto cities and States, make some preamble before of good licke or happic fortune; so he useth the preface of Jupiter, of Fatall destinie, of Divine providence: alfo, that there being but one world, the fame doth confift and is mainteined by one mightie power. Which points, no man doth firmly believe nor can be refolutely perfwaded in unleffe he wade deeply into the profoundest secrets and discourses of natural Philosophie, Buthearken I befeech you, a little, to that which he faith of these matters, in his third booke of the gods: It is not possible (quoth he) to finde out any other fountaine and original beginning of justice. than from Fapiter and common nature : for from hence it must needs be, that every such thing is derived, if that we meane to discourse of good things and evill. Againe, in his Treatise of naturall politions, there is no other way, or at leastwife not a better, of proceeding to the discourse of good things and bad, nor of of vertues, nor of fovereigne felicitie, than from common nature, and the administration of the world. Moreover, as he goeth forward in another place, We 20 are to annex and adjoine hereunto (quoth he) a treatise of good and evill things, considering there is not a better beginning thereof, nor yet a reference and relation more proper: neither is the speculation and science of nature in any other respect requisit or necessarie to be learned, but onely for to know the difference of good and evill. And therefore according to Chrysippus, this naturall science both goeth before and also followeth after morall things; orto fay a trueth at once in more expresse termes, it were a strange and difficult inversion of order, to holde, that it is to be placed after them, confidering that without it it were impossible to comprehend any of the other: and a very manifest repugnance it were to affirme, that science naturall is the beginning of morall, which treateth of good and evill, and yet ordeine nevertheleffe, that it should be taught not before, but after it. Now if any man fay unto me, that Chryfip-30 pus in his booke entituled, Theuseof speech, hath written, that he who first learneth Logicke, I meane the knowledge and philosophie concerning words, ought not altogether for to forbeare the learning of other parts, but that he ought to take a tafte of them, according as he hath meanes thereto, well may be speake a trueth, but withall, confirme he shall my accusation still of his fault: for he fighteth with himfelfe, in ordering one while that a man should learne in the last place and after all, the science that treateth of God, as if that were the reason why it was called TEAST, which is as much as TEASUTUED, that is to fay, Finall; and another while teaching cleane contrarie, that the fame is to be learned even with the very first, and at the beginning: for then farewell all order for ever, and welcome confusion, if we must learne all things hudled together at all times. But yet this is not the woorst, for having set this downe for a reasolution: That 40 the doctrine as touching good things and evill, ought to begin and proceed from the knowledge of God; yet, he will not have them who fettle themselves and enter into the studie of morall philosophic, to take their beginning there: but that in learning this, to catch somewhat of that by the way, even as much as they have easie meanes to come by; and afterwards to repasse from morall philosophy unto Theologie, without which (he saith) there can bee neither entrance nor progreffe in the knowledge of maners.

Moreover (he faith) that, To dispute of one and the same question, pro & contra, to and fro, he difalloweth not fimply and in generality: but his advice is, to use the same so warily and with such discretion, as otherwhiles oratours doe in pleading, when they alledge the reasons of their adverfaries, not to uphold and mainteine the same, but onely for to refute and disproove that 50 likelihood and probabilitie which they pretend: For otherwife (quoth he) thus to doe, is the maner of those Skepticks, who be alwaies doubtfull, and withhold their consent in every thing: a meere shift that serveth their turne, for whatsoever they hold: but as for those who would worke and establish in mens hearts, a certeine science, according to which they might undoubtedly guide and conduct themselves, they ought to found and search the contrary, and from point to point by stepmeale, to direct their novices newly entred, even from the beginning to the very end: wherein there falleth out otherwhiles fit opportunity to make mention of contrary fentences and opinions, for to refute and refolve that which might feeme to have apparence of trueth; asthe maner is in pleading before judges: for these be the very words and proper tearmes that he useth. Now what an abfurd and impertinent a thing it is, that philosophers should thinke they were to put downe the contrary opinions of other philosophers, and not withall, their reasons and arguments, but onely as advocates pleading at the barre to difable and weaken their proofes, and fo to weary their adversaries; as if disputation were onely to win the honour of victory, and not to finde out a trueth: we have elsewhere discoursed against him fufficiently. But that himfelfe not heere and there in his disputations, but oftentimes and in many places hath confirmed with might and maine, yea, and with fo great affeveration and 16 contention, contrary refolutions, unto his owne opinions, that it were a right hard matter for any man to discerne, which of them he approove th most, they themselves in some fort doe fay, who admire the fubrilty of the man, and the vivacity of his spirit, who also both thinke and flickenot to affirme, that Carneades spake nothing of his owne invention, but by the helpe and meanes of which arguments Chrysppus used to proove his owne affertions, hee returned the fame contrariwife upon himselfe to confute his precepts, insomuch as effloores in disputation he would, alluding to a verse in Homer, cry out aloud in this maner:

asificlay open and ministred great advantages and meanes against himselfe, to those who 20 went about for to infringe and calumniate his opinions. But as touching those treatises and discourses which he hath put foorth and set out against ordinary custome, his followers do so glorioully boalt and joy, that they give out, if all the books of the Academiques that ever lived, were laid together, they deferved not to be compared with that which Chrysippus wrote in calumniation of the fenfes: an evident figne either of their ignorance who fay fo, or els of their owneblinde selfe-love. Howbeit, certeine it is, that afterwards being defirous to defend cuflome and the lenfes, he was found much inferior to himselfe, and the latter treatise came farre short of the former, and was nothing at all so pithy; in such fort as he is contradictorie and repugnant to himfelfe: whiles he alwaies prescribeth and willeth to conferre and oppose contrary fentences, not as one patronizing any, but making an oftentation that they be false: and af-30 terwards sheweth himselfe to be a more vehement accuser, than a defender of his owne proper fentences; and counfelling others to take heed of repugnant and contrary disputations, as thosewhich distract and impeach their perception, himselfe is more studious and diligent to addreffe fuch proofes as overthrow perception, than those which are to establish and confirme the same: and yet that he feared no leffe, hee declareth plainly in the fourth booke of his lives, wherehe writeth thus: We are not rashly nor without good respect and advisement to admit and allow repugnant disputations and contrary opinions to be proposed, nor to answere those probable arguments which are brought against true sentences: but heerein we must warily goe to worke, and cary our felves fo, as fearing alwaies lest the hearers being thereby distracted and diverted, let goe this apprehention and conception, and be not of fufficient capacity to 40 comprehend their folitions, but after fuch a feeble fort, as that their comprehensions be ready to faker and shake, considering that even they who customably comprehend sensible objects and other things which depend of fenfes, quickly forgo the fame, being diffracted as well by Megatian interrogatories, as by others more forcible, and in greater number. Now would I gladly demand of these Stoicks whether they thinke these Megarian interrogatories more puissant than those which Chrysippus hath written in fixe bookes; or rather Chrysippus himselse would be asked the question. For marke I pray you, what he hath written of the Megarian disputation in his booke entituled; The use of speech, after this maner: Such a thing as befell in the disputation betweene Stilpo and Menedemus, both renowmed personages for their learning and wisedome; and yet the whole maner of their arguing is now turned to their reprochand 50 Plain mockery, as if their arguments were either very groffe, or else too captious & sophistical: andyet good fir thele arguments which it pleafeth you to scorne and tearme the reproach of those who make such interrogatories, as containing in them notorious leawdnesse, you scare lest they should divert any from perception: And even your owne selfe writing so many books as you doe against custome whereunto you have adjoined whatsoever you could devise and invent, labouring to furmount and furpasse Arcesidam; did you never expect and looke to scare and terrifie any of the readers that should light upon them? For Chrysippus verily useth not onely flender and naked arguments in disputing against custome, but as if he were an advocate pleading pleading at the barre, mooveth affections being paffionate and affectionate himselfe, breaking out efficiences into these tearmes of giving the foole, and imputing vanity and sottishnesses, and to the end that he might leave no place for contradiction at all, but that he delivereth repugnances and speaketh contraries, thus hath he written in his Positions naturall. A man may very well, when he hath once perfectly comprised a thing, argue a little on the contrary side, and apply that defence which the matter it felfe doth affoord; yea and otherwhiles, when he doth comprehend neither the one nor the other, discourse of either of them pro & contra, as much as the cause will yeeld. Also in that treatise of his concerning the use of speech, after he had said, we ought not to use the power and faculty of disputation, no more than armes or weapons, in things that tend to no purpose, and when the case requireth it not, he addeth soone after these to words: For we ought to imploy the gift of reason and speech to the finding out of trueth, and fuch things as refemble it : and not contrariwife; howfoever many there be that are wont fo to doe. And peradventer by these Many, he meaneth those Academicks, who ever doubt and give no affent to any thing : and they verily, for that they comprehend neither the one nor theo. ther, doe argue on both parts to and fro, that it is perceptible: as if by this onely or especiall meanes the trueth yeelded a certeine comprehension of it selfe, if there were nothing in the world comprehenfible. But you who accuse and blame them, writing the contrary to that which you conceive as touching custome, and exhorting others to doe the same, and that with an affectionate defence, doeplainly confesse, that you use the force of speech and eloquence, in things not onely unprofitable, but also hurtfull, upon a vaine ambtious humor of shewing your 20 ready wit, like to fome yoong icholar.

These Stoicks affirme, that a good deed, is the commandement of the law, and sin the prohibition of the law: and therefore it is that the law forbiddeth fooles and leawd folke to doemanythings, but prescribeth them nothing; for that indeed they are not able to doe ought well, And who feeth not that impossible it is for him who can doe no vertuous act, to keepe himselfe from fin and transgreffion? Therefore they make the law repugnant to it selfe, if it command that which to performe is impossible, and forbidthat which men are notable to avoid, Forhe that is not able to live honeftly, cannot chuse but beare himselfe dishonestly; and whoseverhe be, that cannot be wife, must of necessity become a foole; and even them selves doe holde that those lawes which are prohibitive, say the same thing, when they forbid one, and commandlike 10 wise another. For that which faith thou shalt dot steale, faith verily the same, to wit, Steale not, but it forbiddeth withall to steale; and therefore the law forbiddeth fooles and leawd persons nothing, for otherwife it should command them somewhat. And thus they say that the Physician biddeth his apprentise or Chyrurgian to cut or to cauterize, without adding thereto these words, handfomly, moderatly, and in good time. The Musician likewise commandeth his scholar to fing or play upon the harpe a leffon, without putting thereto, in tune, accord and good measure. Howbeit they punnish and chastice those that doe amisse and contrary to the rules of art, for that they were willed and enjoined to doe the thing well, but they did it ill. And even for a wife man commanding his fervant to fay or doe a thing, if he punnish him for doing it untowardly, out of feafon, and not as he ought, certeine it is that he commanded him to performe a 40 good duty, and not a meane and indifferent action. Now if wife men command fooles and lewd persons to doe things indifferent, what should hinder them but that the commandements of the lawes may be femblable?

Moreover, that inftinct or natural motion which is called $\frac{\phi}{\phi}\text{m}$, according to him, is nothing els but the reason of man, inciting him to do a thing, as himself hathwritten in his treatife of the law, $ergo$, that diversion, contratiwise called $\Phi\text{esp}$, can be nothing els but reason withdrawing a man from the doing of a thing: and therefore that inclination is a reasonable inclination: and this warry caution, is as much as the reason of a wise man, forbidding him to doe a thing; forto beware, and to take heed, is the part and property of wise men and not of sooles. If then thereason of a wise man be one thing, and the law another, wise men have this warie caution repugnant 50 unto the law; but in case law, and the reason of a wise man be both one, it will be found that the law forbiddeth wise men to doe those things, which they doubt and be affraid of. To foolish and wicked persons (quoth $Chrys\text{ppw}$) there is nothing profitable, neither bath such an one, is need of ought. Having delivered this sentence in his first booke of persect duties or offices, he commeth afterwardes and saith, that utility or commodious fields and grace perteine and each unto meane and indifferent things, whereof according to the Stoicks doctrine there is not one profitable: and more than that, he saith there is nothing proper, nothing meet and convenient for a foolish leawed man: and so by consequence it followeth upon these words; there is nothing strange; nothing unfitting for a wise and honest man, like as nothing fit and familiar for a leawed foole: for as goodnesse is proper to the one, so is leawed nessent the other. How commeth it then to passe the maketh our heads to ake againe, with tellifig us so often in all his bookes as well of natural philosophy as morall, that presently from our nativity and birth, we be affectionate to our selves, to our proper members, and to the issue descending from us which in the first booke of Justice he faith, that even wilde beasts are propense and affected unto their yoong according as their need and necessary requires, all save fithes: for their yoong fry are nourished by themselves. But there is no sense, where is no sense the sense and proper and familiar: for furely this appropriation seemeth to be the sense and perception of that which is samiliar. And this opinion is conformable to their principles.

Moreover, Christippus, albeit in divers places he write many things contrarily, yet he accordeth to this sentence manifestly, that there is no one vice greater, nor sinne more grievous than another; as also reciprocally, there is not one vertue more excellent, not one vertuous deed (which they call perfect duetie) better than another, confidering that he liath this in the first hooke of Nature: that like as it beforemeth Jupiter well, to magnific and glorific himfelfe and his life, as also if we may fo say, to beare his head aloft, highly to esteeme his owne greatnesse, and to speake big, considering he leadeth a life woorthy of grandeloquence and hautie speech : even fo it befitteth and becommeth all honest men to do the like, confidering that in no respect they 20 be infetior to Jupiter. And yet himselfe againe in the third booke of Justice faith, that those who affirme Pleasure to be the end and sovereigne good of man, overthrow Justice; but who soever fay it is fimply good, do not destroy Justice. And the very words which he useth, be these: Peradventure (quoth he) it may be, that if we leave unto Pleasure this attribute, To be simply and onely good, although it be not the end of all good things, and that honefty and vertue is of the kinde of those things which be eligible for themselves : haply, by this meanes we may fave Juflice, in esteeming Honesty and Justice to be a more perfect and absolute good thing than is Pleasure: but in case it be so, that the thing onely which is honest is good, he erreth much who affirmeth that pleasure is good; howbeit, lesse than he who should say that it is the end of all goodthings; for that as the one doth abolifh and deftroy utterly all Juffice, the other doth fo 30 preserve and mainteine it: for according to the latter of the twaine, all humane societie perisheth, whereas the former referveth yet some place for bountie and civill humanitie. I let passe to relate what he faith in the booke entituled, Of Jupiter, namely, that vertues grow, that they also paffe; because I would not be thought to lie at vantage, and to catch at words; howsoever Chry-Input himselfe in this kind of reprehension dealeth bitterly with Plato and other Philosophers, for taking holde of words: but whereas he forbiddeth to praise all that is done vertuously, he giveinus to understand, that there is some difference in dueties and offices. Now this is the verice text in his treatife of Jupiter. For albeit vertuous acts be commendable, yet we are not to infer thereupon and fay, that we ought to commend all that seemeth to proceed from vertue, as namely, to praise for a valiant act, the stiffe stretching out of the singer; or for temperance and 40 continenencie, the abstinence from an old trot, who hath one foot already in her grave; or for prudence, to understand aright and without errour, that three will not make foure: for he that went in hand to praise and commend a man for such things as these, should shew himselfe to be very bold and abfurd even in the highest degree. And as much as this in a maner writeth he in the third booke of the gods: For I thinke verily (quoth he) that the praises of fuch matters be impertinent and abfurd, although they feeme to depend of vertue, as namely, to forbeare an old trot now at the pits brincke, or to abide a flie-biting. What other accuser should he looke for thenof his opinions, but himselfe: for if it be so, that hee is absurd who commendeth these things, then must be be thought much more abfurd, who suppose thech one of these vertuous deeds to be not onely great, but also most magnificent. For if it be a valiant act to endure the 50 biting of affie; and likewise the part of a chaste and continent person, to abstaine from carnall dealing with an olde woman ready to drop into her grave; then it makes no matter, but it is all one, to praise an honest man aswell for one thing as another. Moreover, in his second booke of Friendship, when as he given a precept, that we ought not to dissolve amities for every fault or defect, he usern these very tearmes: For there be faults (quoth he) which we must overpasse Patte, and make no stay at them; others there be againe, whereat we should a little stand, and take offence; and others befides, which require more chaltifement; but fome there are, which we must thinke sufficient to breake friendship for ever. And more than all this, in the same booke he faith, that we ought to converse and be acquainted with some more, and with others leffe, according as they be our friends more or leffe: which difference and diversitie extendeth very far, infomuch as fome are worthy of fuch an amitie, others of a greater; fome deferve thus much trust and confidence, others more than it : and so it is in other matters semblable. And what other is his drift in all these places, but to put a great difference betweene those things, for which friend hips are engendred? And yet in his booke of Honestie, to shew that there is no. thing good but that which is honest, he delivereth these words: A good thing is eligible and to be defired : that which is eligible and defirable, is also acceptable : that which is acceptable, is likewise commendable: and that which is commendable, is honest withall. Againe, agood thing is joious and acceptable: joious is venerable, and venerable is honeft. But thele speches to are repugnant to himselfe: for beit, that all that is good were laudable (and then chastly to forbeare for to touch an olde riveled woman, were a commendable thing) or fay that every good thing were neither venerable nor joious and acceptable; yet his reason falleth to the ground: for how can it be that others should be thought frivolous and absurd in praising any forsuch things, and himselfe not worthy to be mocked and laughed at, for taking joy and pleasing himfelfe in fuch ridiculous toies as these?

Thus you see how he sheweth himselse in most part of his writings; and yet in his disputation ons which he holdeth against others, he is much more carelesse to be contrary and repugnant to himselfe: for in his treatife which he made as touching exhortation, reproving Plataforsaying, that it was not expedient for him to live at all, who is not taught, nor knoweth not how to 20 live, he writeth in these very tearmes: This speech of his (quoth he) is both contradictory & repugnant to it felfe, and befides, hath no force nor efficacy at all to exhort: for first and formost in showing us that it were expedient for us, not to live at all, and giving us at itwee counsell to die, he exhorteth us to any thing rather than to the practise or studie of philolofophie, because it is not possible for a man to philosophize, unlesse he live: nether can he become wife, survive he never so long, if he lead an evill and ignorant life. And a little after hee faith farther: That it is as meet and convenient also even for leawd and wicked persons to remaine alive. But I care not much to fet downe his very words: First of all, like as vertue brely in it felfe confidered, hath nothing in it, for which we should desire to live: even so vice hath as little, for which we ought to leave this life. What need we now turne over other books of Chr. 30 fippus, and drip leafe by leafe, to proove how contrary and repugnant he is to himfelfe: foreven in these which now we cite and alledge, he commeth out otherwhiles with this saying of Antisthenes, for which he commendeth him, namely, that a man is to be provided either of with understand, or else of a with to under-hang himselse: as also this other verse of Tyrtam:

The bounds of vertue first come nie, Or else make choise before to die.

And what other meaning is there of these words but this, that it is more expedient for solish and lewd persons to be out of the world, than to live: and in one passage, seeming to correct Theognis: He should not (quoth he) have faid xph meritus: ediporta &c.

A man from poverty to flie, (O Cyrnus) ought himfelfe to caft Headlong, from rocks most steepe and hie, Or into sea as deepe and vast.

But rather thus, xpiì nanian odi portu, &c. Aman from sinne and vice to flie,&c.

What other things else seemeth he to doe, than to condemne and scrape out of other mens writings, the fame things, propositions and sentences, which himselfe hath inserted in his own books? For he reprooveth Place when he prooveth and sheweth, that it is better not to live at all, than to lead a life in wickednesse or ignorance: and in one breath hee giveth counsell to Theognis to set downe in his poesie; That a man ought to fling himselfedowne headlong into 50 the deepe fea, or to breake his necke from some high rocke for to avoid finne and wickednesse. And praising as hee did Antishbenes for sending sooles and witlesses like, to an halter wherewith to hang themselves; he blamed him neverthelesse who said, that vice was not a sufficientcaule, wherefore we should shorten our lives. Moreover, in those books against Plate himselfe, concerning justice, he leapeth directly at the very first into a discourse as touching the gods, and faith: That Cephalin did not divert men well from evill dooing, by the feare of the gods: affirming moreover, that the discourse which he made as touching divine vengeance,

Contradictions of Stoicke philosophers. might eafily be infringed and refuted, for that of it felfe it ministreth many arguments and probable reasons on the contrary side; as if the same resembled for all the world the fabulous tales of Acco and Alphio, wherewith women are woont to scarre their little children, and to keepe them from doing firewd turnes. Thus deriding, traducing, and backbiting Plato, hee praifeth essewhere, and in many places essealledgeth these verses out of Euripides:

Well, well, though some this doctrine doe deride, Be fure, in heaven with other gods beside, Sits Jupiter, the deeds of men who fee, And will in time revenged surely bee.

to Semblably, in the first booke of justice, when he had alledged these verses heere out of Hehefaith, that the gods proceed in this wife, to the end that when the wicked be thus punished, others also advertised and taught by their example, might beware how they commit the like, or at leastwife sinne lesse.

What should I say moreover, how in this treatise of Justice, having affirmed, that those who an hold pleasure to be good, but not the soveraigne end of good, may in some fort withall preserve &mainteine justice, for, so much he hath put downe in these very termes: For haply, admitting pleasure to be good although not the supreme good or the end; and honesty to be of the kind of those things, which are eligible and to be defired for their owne fake, wee may by that meanes favejustice, while we permit and allow that which is honest and just to be a greater good than pleasure. Having (I say) delivered the same also in his books of pleasure: yet in his treatise against Plate, reprooving him for raunging health in the number of good things, he affirmeth, that not onely justice, but also magnanimity, temperance, and all other vertues are abolished and perish, in case we hold that either pleasure, or health, or any other thing whatsoever, can be numbred and reputed among good things, unlesse the same behonest. Now as touching the 30 apologie or answer that may be made in defence of Plato, I have elsewhere written against Chrysppus: but even in this very place there is manifestly to be seene a repugnancy and contradiction against himselse: considering that one while hee faith, that justice may stand well enough, if a man suppose pleasure joined with honesty to be good; and another while contrariwife, he findeth fault with all those, who repute any thing else to be good, but onely that which is honeft; as if thereby they abolished and overthrew all vertues. And because he would leave no meanes at all to falve and fave his contradictions, writing of justice against Aristotle, he challengeth him for untrueth, in that hee affirmeth, that if pleasure were granted to bee the foveraigne good, both Justice were overthrowen, and therewith also every vertue besides: For this is certaine (quoth he) that those who are of this opinion, doe indeed abolish Justice; 40 howbeit I fee no let why other vertues may not fland, if not those which be of them selves expetible, yet fuch at leastwife as be good and vertuous really. And thereupon he proceedeth presently to name them every one severally. But it were not a misse to recite his ownelwords as he delivered them: For suppose (quoth he) that by this discourse and reason, Pleasure seeme thevery end of all good things, yet we are not to inferre hereupon, that all is comprised under it: and therefore we must say, that neither any vertue is to be defired, nor vice to be eschued for it selfe, but all these things are to be referred unto a scope and marke proposed: and yet in the meane time what should hinder, but that fortitude, prudence, continence, patience, and other fuch vertues, may be good and expetible, like as their contraries bad and to be avoided. What man therfore was there ever in his speeches and disputations more rash and audacious than he? 50 considering that he charged the two princes of Phylosophers with imputations: the one for abolishing all vertue, in that he confessed not that onely to be good which is honest: and the other, in that if pleasure were supposed and set downe to be the end of good things, he thought not that all vertues except onely justice might subsist and be maintained? what a woonderfull liberty, and monstrous licentiousnefferather is this, in discoursing of one and the same subject matter, to tax and reproove that in Ariflotle, which he setteth downe himselfe: and afterwards in accusing Plate, to subvert and undo the very same ? And yet in his demonstrations, as touching Justice, he affirmeth expresly that every perfect ducty, is a lawfull deed and a just action. Now, whatfoever is performed by continence, by patience, by prudence, or by fortitude is a perfect duty, ergo, it followeth, that it is likewife a lawfull action. How chanceth it then that he leaveth not justice for them, in whom he admitteth prudence, continence, and valour, confidering that all the acts which they performe according to these vertues, be perfect duties, and by confequence just and lawfull operations? Whereas Plato, in a certeine place hath written, that injustice being a certaine intestine sedition and corruption of the foule, never cafteth off and lofeth her power even in those who have it within them: for the caufeth a wicked man to fight with himfelfe, the troubleth, vexeth, and tormenteth him. Chrysippus reproving this affertion of his, faith, that it was fallely and abfurdly spoken, that any one could doe wrong or injurie to himselfe: For (quoth he) all injurie and to outrage must needs be to another: but afterwards forgetting himselfe and what he had said, in that treatife of his entituled, The demostrations of justice, he affirmeth, that who sever doth injustice, wrongeth himselfe, and in offering injurie to another, doth himselfe wrong, in that he is the very cause why himselfe transgresseth the lawes: wherein unworthily he hutteth and woundethhis owne person. Lowhat he said against Plato, discoursing that injustice could not be against a mans selfe, but against another: For to be perticularly and privately unjust, there must (quoth he)be many fuch as speake contrary one unto another; and otherwise this word injustice is taken as if it were amongst many that are in such fort injuriously affected one to another: wheras no fuch matter can properly and fitly argree to one alone, but in as much as he is so difposed and affected to another. But contrary to all this, in his demonstrations he argueth and 20 reasoneth thus, to prove that the injust man doth wrong and injury to himselfe: The law (quoth he) followeth expresly, to be the author or cause of transgression; but to commit injustice is a transgression : he therefore who causeth himselse to doe injury, transgresseth the law of himselse, Now he that trespasses against any one, doth him wrong and injurie: he therefore who wrongeth any other whomsoever, doth injure to himselse. Againe, sinne is of the kinde of huns and dammages that are done; but every man that finneth, offendeth and finneth against himselse : and therefore, whosoever finneth, hurteth also and endamageth himselse unwoorthily; and if he doe to, then by confequence he must needs wrong himselfe. Furthermore, thus also hee reasoneth: Hee that suffereth huit and dammage by another, woundeth and offendeth himfelfe with all unworthily: and what is that elfe but to doe wrong and injury? hethere-30 fore that receiveth injury of any other whatfoever, wrongeth his owne felfe. That the doctrine of good things and evill (which himselfe bringeth in and approoveth) he saith, is most accordant unto mans life, yea and connexed as much as any thing elfe with those prenotions and anticipations which by nature are inbred and ingenerate in us: for, fo much hathhedelivered in his third booke of Exhortations: but in the first booke he affirmeth quite contrary, that this doctrine doth divert and withdraw a man from all things elfe, as if they were of no moment nor helpefull and effectuall any jot to the atteining of happinesse & soveraigne felicity. See how he accorded herein with himfelfe, when he affirmed that doctrine of his which plucketh usaway from life, from health, from indolence and integrity of fenses; and teacheth besides that whatfoever we crave in our praiers at gods hands, concerne us not at all nor appertaine unto us, 40 to be most accordant unto humane life, and the common prenotions & inbred anticipations of knowledge abovefaid. But to the end that no man might denie that he is repugnant and contrary to himselfe, loe what he saith in his third booke of justice. This is it (quoth he) that by reafon of the furpaffing grandure & beauty of our fentences, those matters which we deliver, seeme feined tales and devited fables exceeding mans power and farre beyond humane nature. How can it be that any man should more plainly confesse, that he is at war with himselfe, than he doth who faith that his propositions and opinions, are so extravagant and transcendent, that they refemble counterfeit tales, and for their exclency furmount the condition and nature of man: and yet forfooth for all this, that they accord and agree paffing well with humane life, yea and come neerest unto the said inbred prenotions and anticipations that are in us,

Hee affirmeth that the very essence and substance of infelicitie, is vice; writing and firmly mainteining in all his books of morall and naturall philosophy, that to live in vice, is as much as to live in misery and wretchednesse: but in the third booke of Nature, having said before that it were better and more expedient to live a senselesse foole, yea though there were no hope that ever he should become wise, than not to live at all, he addeth afterwards thus much: For there be such good things in men, that in some fort the very evill things goe before, and are better than the indifferent in the middes betweene. As for this, how he hath written elswhere, that there is nothing expedient and profitable in fooles, and yet in this place fetteth downe in plaine termes, that it is expedient to live foolith and fenfeleffe, I am content to overpaffe; but feeing hee faith now that evill things goe before, and one better than the indifferent or meane (which with them of his feet are neither good nor ill) furely it is as much as if hee affirmed that evil things are better than things not evill: and all are, as to fay that to be wretched is more expedient than not to be wretched; and fo by that meanes, he is of opinion, that not to be miferable is more unprofitable than to be miferable; and if it be more unprofitable, than also it mult be more hutfull and dammageable. But being defitous in some fort to mollifie this abfurditie, and to falve this fore, he fubnexeth as touching evill things, these words: My meaning is not (quoth to he) that they should go before and be preferred, but reason is the thing wherewith it is better to live, although a man should ever be a foole, than not to live at all. First and formost then, hee callethvice an evill thing, as also whatsoever doth participate of vice and nothing els: now is vice reasonable, or rather to speake more properly, reason delinquent: so that to live with reafon if we be fooles and void of wifdome, what is it els, but to live with vice? now to live as fooles, is all one as to live wretched. Wherein is it then, and how commeth it about, that this fhould go before meane and indifferent things? for it was not admitted that happie life should go beforemiferie: neither was it ever any part (fay they) of Chrysppus his meaning to range and countamong good things, To remaine alive; no more than among bad, To depart this life: but he thought that these things were of themselves indifferent and of a middle nature; in which 20 regard otherwhiles it is meet for happy men to leave this life, and for wretches to continue alive. And what greater contrariety can there be, as touching things eligible or refulable, than to fay that for them who are happy in the highest degree, it is fit and beforming to forgoe and for fake the good things that be prefent, for want of some one thing that is indifferent? And yet Chryjippuisof this minde, that no indifferent thing is of the ownenature to be defired or rejected; but that we ought to chuse that onely which is good, and to shun that alone which is bad : so as according to their opinion, it comes to passe, that they never divert their dessignments or actions to the pursure after things desirable, nor the avoidance of things refusable; but another marke it is that they shoot & aime at, namely, at those things which they neither eschue nor chuse, & according thereto, they live & die. Chrysppus avoweth & confesseth that there is as great a dif-30 ference betweene good things & bad, as possibly may be; as needs there must, in case it be true, that as the one fort of them cause those in whom they are, to be exceeding happy, so the other, extreme wretched & miserable. Now in the first booke of the end of good things, he saith that aswell good things as bad, be sensible; for these be his very words: That good and evil things be perceptible by fenfe, we must of necessity acknowledge upon these arguments: for not onely the very passions indeed of the minde, together with their parts and severall kinds, to wir, sadneffe, feare and fuch like, be fenfible; but also a man may have a fenfe of theft, adultery, and femblable finnes; yea and of follie, of cowardife, and in one word, of all other vices, which are in number not a few: and not onely joy, beneficence, and other dependances of vertuous offices, but also prudence, valour and the rest of the vertues, are object to the sense. But to let passe all 40 other abfurdities conteined in these words, who will not confesse, but that there is a meere contradiction in that which they delivered, as touching one that becomes a wife man, and knowes not thereof? for, confidering that the prefent good is fenfible, and much different from that which is evill, that one possibly should of a wicked person proove to be vertuous, and not know thereof, & not have fence of vertue being prefent, but to thinke that vice is still within him; how can this otherwisebe, but most absurd ? for either no man can be ignorant and out of doubt, whether he hath all vertues together; or els he must confesse, that there is small difference and the same hard to be discerned, betweene vice and vertue, felicity and infelicity, a right honest life, and a most dishonest, in case a man should passe from the one to the other, and possesse one for the other, without ever knowing it.

One worke he wrote, entituled, Of lives, and the fame divided into foure books: in the fourth whereof, he faith, That a wife man medleth not with great affaires, but is occupied in his owne bufinesse onely, without being curious to looke into other mens occasions: his very words to this purpose, be these; For mine owne part; of this opinion I am, that a prudent man gladly avoideth a stirring life, intermedseth little, and in his owne matters onely: for to deale simply in a mans owne affaires, and to enter into little businesse; and the properties of civill and laudable persons. And in maner the same speeches or very like thereto, he hath delivered in the third booke of fuch things as be expetible and to be chofen for themselves, in these termes: For in truth (quoth he) it seemeth, that the quiet life should be without danger, and in perfect fecurity, which few or none of the vulgar fortare able to comprehend and understand. Wherein first and formost, it is evident, that he commeth very neere to the errour of Epicarus, who in the government of the world disavoweth divine providence: for that he would have God to rest in repose, idle, and not emploied in any thing. And ver Chrysippus himselfe, in his first booke of Lives faith: That a wife man willingly will take a kingdome upon him, yea, and thinke to make his gaine and profit thereby: and if he be not able to reigne himselse, yet he will at least wise converse and live with a king, yea, goe foorth with him to warre, like as Hydanthyr fus the Scythian did, and Leucon of Pontus. But I will fetdowne his 10 owne words, that we may fee whether, like as of the treble and base strings, there ariseth a confonance of an eight; fo there be an accord in the life of a man, who hath chosen to live quietly without doing ought, or at least wife to intermeddle in few affaires, yea, and yet afterwards accompanieth the Scythians riding on horsebacke, and manageth the affaires of the kings of Bos phorus upon any occasion of need that may be presented? For as touching this point (quoth he) that a wife man will go into warlike expeditions with princes, live, and converfe with them, we will confider againe thereof heereafter; being as it is, a thing that as fome upon the like arguments imagine not, so we for the semblable reasons admit and allow. And a little after: Not onely with those who have proceeded well in the knowledge of vertue, and been efufficiently inflittited and trained up in good maners, as were Hydambyrfus and Leucon above faid. Somethere 20 be who blame Califthenes for that he paffed over the feas to king Alexander into his campe, in hope to reedifie the city Olynthus, as Aristotle caused the city Stagyra to be repaired, who highly commend Ephorus, Xenocrates and Menedemus, who rejected Alexander: But Chrifippus driveth his wife man by the head forward, for his gaine and profit, as fatre as to thecity Panticapeum, and the deferts of Septina. And that this is (I fay) for his gaine & profit he shewed before, by fetting downe three principall meanes, befeeming a wife man for to practile and feeke his gaine by: the first by a kingdome, and the beneficence of kings; the second by his friends; and the third befides thele, by teaching literature: and yet in many places he wearieth us with citing this verse of Euripides:

Onely for things in number * twaine.

But in his books of Nature he faith: That a wife man if he have lost the greatest riches that may be, esteemeth the losse no more than if it were but a single denier of silver, or one grey groat. Howbeit, him whom he hath there so highly extolled and puffed up with glory, heere hee taketh downe and abaseth as much, even to make him a meere mercenary pedante, and one that is faine to teach a schoole: for he would have him to demaund and exact his salary sometime before hand of his scholar, when he enters into his schoole; and otherwhile after a certeine prefixed time of his schooling is come and gone: And this (quoth hee) is the honester and more civill way of the twaine; but the other is the furer, namely, to make him pay his mony aforehand; for that delay and giving attendance is subject to receive wrong and susteine losse; and 40 thus much he attereth in these very termes: Those teachers that be of the wifer fort, cal for their schoolage and minervals of their scholars, not all after one maner, but diversly: a number of them, according as the prefent occasion requireth, who promise not to make them wise men, and that within a yeere; but undertake to doe what lies in them, within a fet time agreed upon betweene them. And foone after, speaking of his wife man: He will (quoth he) know the best time, when to demand his pension, to wit, whether incontinently upon the entrance of his scholar, as the most part do; or to give day, and set downe a certeine time; which maner of dealing is more subject to receive injurie, howsoever it may seeme more honest and civill. And how can a wife man, tell me now, be a despifer of money, in case hee make a contract and bargaine at a price to receive money, for delivering vertue; or if he doe not deliver it, yet require 50 his falary nevertheleffe, as if he he had performed his part fully ? Either how can he be greater than to fulleine a loffe and damage, if it be fo that he stand fo strictly upon this point, and be fo warie, that he receive no wrong by the paiment of his wages ? For furely no man is faid to bee injuried, who is not hurt nor endamaged: and therefore how ever otherwise he hath flatly denied, that a wife man could receive warning; yet in this booke he faith, that this maner of dealing, is expoted to loffe and damage.

Inhis booke of Common-wealth, he affirmeth, that his citizens will never doe any thing for pleasure, no not addresse and prepare themselves therefore, praising highly Euripides for these

What need men, but for two things, onely [winke? Bread for to eat, and water shere to drinke.

And soone after, he proceedeth forward, and praiseth Diogenes, for abusing himselfe, by forcing his nature to passe from him in the open street, and saying withall to those that stood by: Oh. that I could chase hunger as well from my belly. What reason then is there, in the selfesame hookes to commend him for rejecting pleafure, and withall for defiling his owne body as hee to did, to beaftly in the fight of the whole world, and that for a little filthy pleasure? In his books of Nature, having written that nature had produced and brought foorth many living creatures for beauty onely, as delighting and taking pleasure in such lovely varietie, and therewith having adjoined moreover a most strange and absurd speech, namely, that the peacocke was made for his tailes sake, and in regard of the beauty thereof: cleane contrary to himselfe, in his books of Common-wealth, he reprooveth very sharpely those who keepe peacocks and nightingals, as if he would make lawes quite contrary to that foveraigne law-giver of the world, deriding nature for taking delight, and employing as it were her fludy in bringing foorth such creatures; unto which a wife man wil give no place in his city and common wealth. For how can it otherwife bebut monstrous and abfurd for to finde fault with those who nourish such creatures, as if itwere wantonnesse to doe, in case he praise the divine providence for creating them? In his fiftbooke of Nature, afterhe had shewed that wal-lice or punaises serve in good stead to awakenusout of fleepe, as also that mice advertise us to beware and take heed where we lay up and bellow every thing; and that it is probable that nature taketh pleasure in producing faire creatures, and joieth in diversitie, he commeth out with this sentence word for word: This appeerethmost evidently in the peacockstaile: for heere he signifieth that this bird was made for the tailes fake, and not contrariwife; and so when the cocke was once created, the hen followed

In his booke of common-wealth when he had faid, that we are come almost to the painting of dung hils, a little after: There be fome (quoth he) who adorne & embelith their corn-fields, with 20 vines climbing and growing upon trees, ranged directly in order, as also with myrtle rowes; who nourish also peacocks and doves, yea and partridges, for to heare them cal and record unto them, as also nighting ales for their pleasant fong. But I would gladly know of him, what hee thinketh, and what his conceit is of bees and of hony; for it would by good confequence follow, that he who had faid, that punaifes and wal-lice were profitably created; should also inferre that bees were made for no profit. Now if he allowed these a place in his Commonwealth, how is it that he forbiddeth his citizens to enterteine those things which delight the eare. To be briefe, like as he were very abfurd who should find fault with those guests at a feast, who fell to eat comfits, and fweet banketting conceits, to drinke wine also, and to feed of delicate viands; and in the meane while commend the man who invited them to fuch dainties, 40 and provided the same for them: even so, he who praising the divine providence for creating delicate fishes, deinty birds, sweet hony, and pleasant wine, should reproove those who reject not these gifts, nor be content to eat bare bread, and drinke sheere water, things that be ever at hand, and which are sufficient for our food, were as farre our of reason, and makes no reckoning at all how he doth contradict himselfe, and what contrary opinions he holdeth.

Moreover, having in his treatife of Exhortations faid, that it was no reason, that folke should be defamed or blamed, for having to doe carnally with their owne mothers, daughters, or fisters; for cating any kinde of meats whatfoever, for going directly out of the bed from a woman, or from a dead body and mortuarie, unto a temple or facrifice: And heerein (quoth he) we ought to have a regard and cie unto brute beafts, and taking example by them, to collect 50 and conclude, that in all this, there is no abfurdity at all, nor any thing against nature; for fitly and to the purpose very well a man may alledge this, and compare the usage of other creatures, to shew that they neither being coupled together nor engendring, no nor dying in temples, do Pollute and defile the divinitie. Contrary to all this, in the fift booke of nature he faith: That the poet Hesiodus did very well to admonish and forbidus, not to pisse into sountaines, nor running rivers; yea, and much rather to forbeare to make water against an altar, or any image and statue of the gods: neither mattereth, or skilleth it all, if dogs, affes, and yoong children, doe so, seeing they have no discretion nor consideration in such things: and therefore it is Contradictions of Stoicke philosophers. very abfurd to fay in one place: That it is meet to confider the favage example of wilde beafts. and in another, as abfurde to alledge the fame.

Some philosophers there be, who imagine a certeine acceffary motion from without in the principall part of our foule; for that a man feemeth to give the head and liberty unto divers inclinations, when he isforced to a thing by outward causes: which motion appeareth principally in doubtfull and variable things; for when of two objects equall in power, and every way femblable, we are of necessity to chuse one, and there is no cause at all to incline us more to the one than to the other, this forefaid acceffary and adventitious puiffance, comming in otherwise, and seazing upon the inclination of the soule, decideth all the doubt. Against these philosophers , Chrysppus disputing, as if they did violence to nature by the contrary, and by deviling an effect without a cause; among fundry other examples, alledgeth the cockall bone, the balance, and many fuch like things which cannot fall, incline and bend now on one fide, and then on another, without fome cause & difference which is entirely in them.or elie commeth from without forth: for this is generally held; that whatfoever is without cause can have no subfittence, no more than meere hazard and chance : but in these adventitions and acceffarie motions which they suppose, there be certeine hidden irreptitious causes, which secredy moove and induce our appetite and inclination, even without our knowledge to one part or other; and this is that which he often repeateth in the most notable works that he hath pur forth; but that which himselse afterward delivereth cleane contrary, because it is not exposed so openly to the view of the whole world, I will alledge verbatim as he hath delivered it : For inhis 20 treatife concerning the office of a Judge, supposing for example sake, that two curriers who ranne a courfe, were come both rogether unto the goale, he demandeth what the Judge thould doe in this case; namely, whether it were lawfull for him, to give unto whether of them hee pleased, the victorious branch of the date tree? this being supposed withall, that they were both To inward & familiar with him, that he should rather gratific them both, even out of his owne in fome fort, than feeme to defraud either of them of the victorious garland, which feemeth to be common to them both: Whether (I fay) it be lawfull for him to encline unto one or to the other, and so award the victory as if they had drawen lots therefore: To encline (I say) casually & without any reason; like as when two groates are presented unto us, every way semblable one to the other, we incline rather to that which we take. And in the fixt booke of Duties, having faid, 30 that there becerteine things that require no great adoo, nor intentive confideration, heeis of opinion, that in such cases we are to yeeld the choise into the casuall propension of the minde, even as to the adventerous hazard of a lot; as for example; if the question be to make triall of the faid two groates, one faith, this is the better, and another that: but for that we are to take one of the twaine, without more adoo and farther triall of their betterneffe, we take that which comes first; and in another place he saith; in putting this to the aventure of a lot, it fallethout otherwhiles, that wee hit upon the woorfe: in these places the casuall inclination of the minde, to the first object, and the putting of the matter to the hazard of a lot, is nothing elle but to bring in a choise of things indifferent without any cause.

In the third booke of Logique, having premifed thus much, that Plato, Arifforle and their 40 fucceflours and disciples even as farre as to Polemon and Straton, had bestowed great study and travelled much therem: but above all others, Socrates, with this addition, that a man would with with formany and fuch noble personages to erre for company: he commeth in afterwards with these words: If they had (quoth he) treated and discoursed hereof curfarily or by the way, a man haply might laugh at this place well enough: but fince that they have fo ferioufly and exactly disputed of Logique, as if it were one of the greatest faculties and most necessarie sciences, it is not like that they were fo grofly deceived, being men throughout all the parts of philosophy, fo fingular as we repute them to be. How is it then, may a man reply and fay, that you never rest baying and barking at thefe to woorthy and excellent perfonages, and convincing them as you fuppose to have erred? For there is no likelihood that they writing so diligently and exactly 25 50 they have done of Logique, should of the principles and elements, of the end of good things, of Justice and the gods, write carelessely and after a loose maner, howsoever you are disposed to cearme their treatifes and discourses, blinde, repugnant to themselves, and stuffed with an infinit tort of faults and errors. In one place he denieth that the vice im zuperavia, that is to fay a joy to tee evill happen unto another, hath any being or reall subsistence: For that (quoth he) no good man was ever knowen to rejoice at the harme of another: but in his second booke as touching Good, having declared what Envie is, namely a griefe for another mans well-fare : because men are desirous to detract and debase their neighbours, to the end they might be superiours themselves: he addeth afterwards, the joy for another mans harme, and that in these words: Annexed thereunto (quothhe) is the joy for another mans harme, because men are desirous that their neighbours about them, should be brought low for the like causes: but when they decline and turne to other naturall affections, there is engendred Pity and Mercie: In which words it appeareth that he ordaineth emaure works to be a thing really substittent as well as envie and pittie, which notwith standing elsewhere he said had no being at all in the world no more than the hatred of wickednesse or the desire of filthy lucre.

Having in many places affirmed, that men are never a whit more happie, for long continuto ance of felicity, but that they be still as happy who enjoy felicity but one minute of an houre; in as many other places againe he avoucheth the contrary, faying that a man should not so much asput forthhis finger for a transitory and momentany prudence, which endureth but a while, &palleth away like unto the flash and learne of a lightening. But it shal suffice to relate the very words, which he hath written in his fixth booke of morall questions as touching this matter: for when he had premifed thus much, that every good thing doth not cause equall joy, nor all vertuous duties like vantery, he commethafter with these words: For if a man is to have prudence one moment of time, or the last daie onely of his life, he should not so much as hold up orstretch out his finger for a prudence that lasteth so small a while: although no man is faid to bethemore bleffed for long continuance of happinesse, neither is eternall beatitude more 20 expetible or defirable, than that which paffeth away within a minute of an houre. Now if he had thought that prudence were a good thing bringing forth bleffednesse, as Epicurus did, a man could have found fault with nothing elfebut the abfurdity onely of fo strange an opinion and paradox. But feeing that prudence is no other thing than beatitude, of it felfe, and even very felicity, how can it be avoided that herein there should not be a contradiction and repugnancy of speech, namely, to say that transitory happinesse is as eligible and as much to be defired, as that which is perpetuall: and to hold, that the felicity of one moment is worth naughr

He affirmeth that vertues doe follow and accompany one another not onely in this respect. that he who hath one, hath likewife all the rest, but also in this that he who worketh by one, worketh with all according to the other: neither (faith he) is any man perfect, unleffe he be poffef-30 fed of all vertues. Howbeit in the fixt booke of morall questions, Chrysippus faith that neither a goodand honest man doth alwaies beare himselfe valiantly, nor a naughty man behave himselfe cowardly, forthat as certeine objects be presented into mens fantasies, it behooveth one man to persevere and persist in his judgements, and another to for sake and relinquish the same: for probable he faith it is that even the wicked man is not alwaies lascivious. Now in case it be so, that to be a valiant man, is as much as to shew valour, and to be a coward, the same that to use cowardife, they speake contraries who affirme, that a naughty person practifing one vice, workethby all together: and that a valiant man ufeth not alwaies valour, nor a dastard cowardise.

Hedenieth Rhetorique to be an art, as touching the ornament, dispose and order of an oration pronounced: and befides in the first bookehe hath thus written: And in mine opinion re-40 quifit it is to have not onely a regard of an honeft, decent & fimple adorning of words, but alfo acare of proper gestures, actions, pauses and staies of the voice, as also a meet conformation of the countenance and the hands. Being as you fee thus exquisit and curious in this paffage: yet in the same booke cleare contrary, having spoken of the collision of vowels, and hitting one of them upon another: We are not only (quoth he) to neglect this, and to thinke of that which is of greater moment and importance but also to let passe certeine obscurities and defects, folæcismes also and incongruities, of which many others would be ashamed. Now one while to permit and allow such exquisit curiosity in the orderly dispose of a manstongue, even as far as to the decent fetting of the countenance and gefture of the hands: and another while not to balhat the committing of groffe incongruities, defects and obscurities, is the property of a 50 man who cares not what he faith, but speakes what soever comes in his head,

Over and besides in his naturall positions, treating of those things which require the view of the cie and experience, after he had given warning that we should go warily to worke, and notrashly yeeld our affent thereto, he saith, Let us not therefore be of Platoes opinion, to thinke that our liquid food, to wit, our drinke, paffeth directly to the lungs, and our dry nourishment, that is, our meat, into the stomacke; neither let us fall into such like errours as these. For mine owne part, thus I thinke, That for a man to reprehend others, and afterwards to incurre the same faults and errours which he reproved, is the greatest repugnancy and contrariety that may be, and the fouleft and most shamefull fault of all others. And verily himselfe faith, that the connexions which are made by the ten principall Axiomes, that is to fay, Propositions, exceed in number ten hundred thousand 3 when as neither he had by himselfe diligently enough enquired and fearched into the thing, nor by other men well exercised in that art of Arethmeticke, attained to the trueth. And yet Plato had to testifie on his side, the most renowned Phyficians that were, namely, Appearates, Philistion and Dioxippes the disciple of Hippocrates : alio of Poets, Euripides, Alexens, Eupolis and Eratoft benes, who all with one voice affirme, that the drinke passeth by the lungs. And as for all the Arithmeticians well practifed in the knowledge of numbers, they reprove Chrylippus: and Hipparebus among thereft, proving and shewing that in the forefaid speech of his, he cered most grosly in his computation, if it be true that the affir- 10 mative maketh of the faid ten Axiomes to the number of 103049 connexions, and the negative 952, over and above three hundred and ten thousands. Some of the ancients said of Zeno that it befel unto him as unto one who had fowte wine of his owne, which he could not fell and, make away either for vineger or wine: for, that precedent of his which they call semplates her could not put off neither for a thing that is good, nor fo much as indifferent. But Chryfippia hath made the matter farre more intricate and different : for in some passages of his, he saith, that they are starke mad, who make no account of riches, health, voidnesse of paine and integrity of the body, nor care how to attaine thereto; and having alledged this verie out of Hesindus, O Perses, borne of noble race,

o Perfes, borne of noble race, Plie not thy worke in any cafe.

And in his treatife of Lives he writeth, that a wife man will court it with kings and princes, if he may raife his commoditie and gaine thereby; yea, he will keepe a schoole and teach for money, taking of some scholars his minervals aforehand, and bargaining with others for a certeine time. Also in the seventh booke of his offices, he saith, that he will not sticke to tumble downe upon his head; and that three times, so he may be fure to have a talent for his labour. In his field booke of Good things, he permitteth and granteth unto who foever will, to call those works or precedents aforesaid, Good, and the contrary thereto, Bad, in these very tearmes: If aman 20 list (quoth he) according to such premutations as these, he may call one thing good unto himfelfe, and another thing ill; so as he have an eie and regard unto the things, and wander not inconfiderately, nor faile in the understanding of things fignified, but otherwise accommodate himselse to the use and custome of the denomination. Having thus in this place set his Precedent so necre and linked it with Good; in other paffages he faith cleane contrary, that none of all this concerneth us at all, but reason doth divert and pluckeus quite away from all such thinger for, so much hath he set downe in his first booke of Exhortations. But in the third bookeof Nature, he faith, that fomekings and rich persons are reputed blessed and happie; which is as much as if they were to be accounted happy, who made water in golden chamber pots, or fivept the floure with the golden traines of their coilly robes. But a good man, if he loie his whole pa-40 trimonie and all his estate, weigheth it no more than the losse of a grote or single denier, and maketh no greater matter of ficknesse, than of stumbling or tripping alittle with his foot. And therefore, filled he hath with fuch contrarieties, not vertue onely, but also providence. For vertue will appeare exceeding base, mechanicall and foolish, if it be emploied in things so vile and contemptible, commanding a man to faile for them as farre as to Bosporus, yea and to throw himselle upon his head. And Jupiter is very ridiculous, delighting to be called either Ctessius, that is to fay, The enricher and donor of possessions, or Epicar pius, that is to fay, The giver of morts, or Charidotes, that is to fay, The gratifier and authour of favours: for that unto leawd and and perfons he affoordeth golden chamber pots, and robes garded and bordered round anow the skirts with golde; but youch afeth unto good men, traffi hardly woorth a grote, when so they are become rich through the providence of Jupiter. And yet Apollo is much more ridiculous, if it be fo, that he fits giving answeres and oracles as touching golden chamber pots, gards and fringes of gold, yea and the tripping and flumbling of the foot. This repugnance and contransitie they make more evident and apparent still by their demonstration: For that (queth they) which may be well or ill used, is neither good nor bad. Now, certeine it is, that all evill and foolish persons use riches, health and strength of the body, amisse; and therefore none of these may be called Good. If then, God give not vertue unto men, but Honesty commeth of it felfe, and yet bestoweth riches and health without vertue, furely it is upon them who will not use the same well but ill, that is to say, unprofitably, shamefully and mischievously. And verily if the gods can give vertue, they are not good if they doe not: and againe, if they can not make good men, neither are they able to helpe them any way, confidering, that without it, there is nothing good nor profitable. For, to fay that the gods judge those to be good by vertue and by strength, who are otherwise good than by them, is to no purpose, but a vaine conceit : for even fo good men do judge the evill by vertue and by ftrength: fo that by this reckoning, they profit men no more, than they be profited by men. And verily Chrysppus judgeth neither himselfe to be a good man, nor any either of his scholars or teachers. What is their opinion then, think 10 you, of others, if it be not that which themselves say, namely, that they are mad and senselse fooles, that they be miscreants and infidels, lawlesse, and in one word, come to the very heighth and pitch of all infelicitie and miferie? And yet forfooth they hold, that men fo wretched and unhappie as they be, are notwithstanding governed and ruled by divine providence. Now, if the gods, changing their minde, should determine to hurt, afflict, plague, destroy and crush us quite, they could not bring us to a woorfe state and condition, than wherein we are already; according as Chrysppus faith, That mans life can not be brought to a lower ebbe, nor be in woorse plight and case than now it is, infomuch as if it had a tongue and voice to speake, it would pronounce these words of Hercules:

> Of miseries (to say I dare be bold) So full I am, that more I can not hold.

And what affertions or fentences may aman possibly finde more contrary and repugnant one against another, than those of Chrysippus, as touching both gods and men, when he faith, That the gods are most provident over men, and carefull for their best; and men not with standing are

Certeine Pythagoreans there are, who blame himmuch, for that in his booke of Justice he hathwritten of dunghill cocks, that they were made and created profitable for mans use: For (quoth he) they awaken us out of our fleepe, and raife us to our worke; they hunt, kill and devoure scorpions; with their fighting they animate us to battell, imprinting in our hearts an ardent defire to thew valour: and yet eat them we must, for feare that there grow upon us more 30 Pullaine, than we know what otherwife to do withall. And fo farre foorth mocketh he and fcorneththose who finde fault with him for delivering such sentences, that he writeth thus in his third booke of the Gods, as touching Jupiter the Saviour, Creatour and Father of justice, law, equity and peace: And like as cities (quoth he) and great townes, when they be over full of people, deduct and fend from thence certeine colonies, and begin to make warre upon fome other nations; even to God fendeth the causes that breed plague and mortalitie: to which purpose he clieth the testimony of Enripides and other authours, who write that the Trojan warre was railed by the gods, for to discharge and disburden the world of so great a multitude of men wherewith it was replenished. As for all other evident abfurdities delivered in these speeches, I let paffe, for my purpole is not to fearch into all that which they have faid or written amiffe, but 40 onely into their contradictions and contrarieties to themselves. But consider, I pray you, how Chrysippus hath alwaics attributed unto the gods the goodlicft names and most plausible termes that can be devised; but contrariwise, most favage, cruell, inhumane, barbarous and Galatian deeds. For fuch generall mortalities and carnages of men, as the Trojan warre first brought, and afterwards the Median and Peloponnesiacke warres, are nothing like unto colonies that cities fend forth to people and inhabit other places; unleffe haply one would fay, That fuch multitudes of men that die by warre and pestilence, know of some cities sounded for them in hell and under the ground to be inhabited. But Chryfippus maketh God like unto Deiotarus the king of Galatia, who having many fonnes, and minding to leave his realme and roiall efface unto one of them and no more, made away & killed all the rest besides him, to the end that he being lest 30 alone, might be great and mightie: like as if one should prune and cut away all the branches of a vine, that the maine stocke might thrive and prosper the better: and yet the cutter of the vine disbrancheth it when the shoots be yoong, small and tender: and we also take away from a bitch many of her whelps when they be fo yoong as that they can not yet fee, for to spare the damme: whereas Jupiter who hath not onely suffered and permitted men to grow unto their perfect age, but allo given them himfelfe their nativitie and growth, punisheth them and plagueth them afterwards, devifing fundry meanes, and preparing many occasions of their death and destruction, when as indeed he should rather have not given unto them the causes and principles XXXX 3

ciples of their generation and birth. Howbeit, this is but a small matter in comparison; and more grievous is that which I will now say: for there are no warres bred among men, but by occasion of some notable vice; seeing the cause of one is stelly pleasure; of another, avarice; and of a third, ambition and desire of rule. And therefore, if God be the authour of warres, he is by of a third, ambition and desire of rule. And therefore, if God be the authour of warres, he is by of a third, are sufficiently and the second booke of the Gods, writeth that it stands felfe in his treatise of judgement, yea and his second booke of the Gods, writeth that it stands for no sense and reason that God should be the cause of any wicked and dishonest things. For like as the lawes are never the cause of breaking and violating the lawes, no more are gods of impiete: so that there is no likelihood at all that they should move and cause men to commit any pietie: so that there is no likelihood at all that they should move and cause men to commit any foule and dishonest fact. Now what can there be more dishonest, than to procure and raise to some to worke the ruine and perdition of others, and yet Chrysppus saith, that God ministreth the occasions and beginnings thereof. Yea, but he contrarrivise (will one say) commendeth Euripides, for saying thus:

If Gods do ought the blewd and filthy is, They are no more accounted Gods, iwis.

And againe, Soone said that is: Mens faults t'excuse, Nothing more ready than Godst' accuse.

as if for footh we did any thing els now, but compare his words and sentences together that be opposit and meere contrary one unto another. And yet this sentence which now is heere commended, to wit, we may alledge against Chrysppu, not once, nor twice nor thrice, but ten thousand times. For we may alledge against Chrysppu, not once, nor twice nor thrice, but ten thousand times. For first, in his treatise of Nature, having likened the eternity of motion to a drench or potion made consused in the state of Nature, having likened the eternity of motion to a drench or potion made consused in the government and adasterone fort and some after another, thus he faith, Seeing it is so, that the government and adasterone fort and some after another, thus he faith, Seeing it is so, that the government and adasterone for the universall world proceedeth in this fort, necessary it is that according to inministration of the universall world proceeded in that maner as we are; whether it be that we are diseased against our ownenature, mainted or dissinguistic form a surface of Missing in the season Musicians. And against, soone after, accerting to this reason, we may say the like of our vertue or vice, and generally of the knowledge or 30 ignorance of arts, as I have already said. Also within a little after, cutting off all doubt and ambiguity: There is no particular thing, not the very least that is, which can otherwise happen than according to common nature, and the reason thereof: now that common nature, and the reason of it is stall destine, divine providence and supiter, there is not one, search even as sareas to the Antipodes, but he knoweth: for this sentence is very rife in their mouthes: And as for this verse of Homer,

And as echthing thus came to paffe,

The will of Jove fulfilled wis. he faith that well and rightly he referred all to deftiny, and the univerfall nature of the world, whereby all things are governed. How is it possible then, that these two positions should sub. 40 fift together, namely, that God is in no wife the cause of any dishonest thing; and, that there is nothing in the world be it never so little that is done, but by common nature, and according to the reason thereof? For furely, among all those things that are done, necessarily there must be things dishonest: and yet Epicurus turneth and windeth himselfe on every side, imagining and deviling all the fubrill thifts that he can to unloofe; fet free, and deliver our voluntary free will from this motion eternall, because he would not leave vice excuseable & without just reprehension; whereas in the meane while he openeth a wide window unto it, and giveth it libertie to plead: That committed it is not onely by the necessitie of destiny, but also by the reason of God, and according to the best nature that is. And thus much also moreover is to be seene written word for word: For confidering that common nature reacheth unto al causes; it cannot 50 otherwise be, but all that is done, howsoever, and in what part soever of the world, must be according to this common nature, and the reason thereof, by a certeine stint of consequence without impeachment; for that there is nothing without, that can impeach the administration thereof, neither mooveth any part, or is disposed in habitude otherwise, than according to that common nature. But what habitudes and motions of the parts are these? Certeine it is that the habitudes be the vices and maladies of the minds, as covetous fnesse, lecherie, ambition, cowardife, and injuffice: as for the motions, they be the acts proceeding from thence, as adulteries, thefts, treasons, manslaughters, murders, and particides, Chrysippus now is of opinion. That none of all these, be they little or great, is done without the reason of Jupiter, or against law, justice, and providence: infomuch as to breake law, is not against law; to wrong another, is not against justice; nor to commit sinne against providence. And yet he affirmeth, that God punisheth vice, and doth many things for the punishment of the wicked. As for example, in the second booke of the gods: Otherwhiles there happen (quoth he) unto good men grievous calamities, not by way of punishment, as to the wicked, but by another kinde of economy and disposition, like as it falleth out usually unto cities. Againe, in these words: First, we are to understand, evill things and calamities as we have faid heeretofore; then to thinke, that distrito buted they are according to the reason and dispose of Jupiter, either by way of punishment, or else by some other occonomie of the whole world. Now surely, this is a doctrine hard to bee digeiled, namely, that vice being wrought by the disposition and reason of God; is also puniflied thereby: howbeit, this contradiction he doeth still aggravate and extend in the second booke of Nature, writing thus: But vice in regard of grievous accidents, hath a certeine peculiar reason by it selfe: for after a sortit is committed by the common reason of nature, and as I may so fay, not unprofitably in respect of the universall world: for otherwise than so, there were no good things at all: and then proceeding to reproove those who dispute pro & comra, and discourse indifferently on both parts, he (I meane) who upon an ardent defire tobroch alwaies and in every matter some novelties & exquisite singularities above all other, saith, It is not un-20 profitable, to cut purfes, to play the fycophants, or commit loofe, diffolute, and mad parts: no more than it is incommodious, that there should be unprofitable members, hurtfull and wretched persons : which if it be so, what maner of god is Jupiter, I meane him, of whom Chrysippus speaketh, in case (I say) he punish a thing, which neither commeth of it selfe, nor unprofirably: for vice according to the reason of Chrysippus were altogether irreprehensible, and Jupiter to be blamed, if either he caused vice, as a thing unprofitable, or punished it when he had made it not unprofitably. Moreover, in the first booke of Justice, speaking of the gods, that they oppose themselves against the iniquities of some: But wholly (quoth he) to cut off all vice, isneither possible nor expedient, isit is it were possible, to take away all injustice, all transgreffion of lawes, and all folly. But how true this is, it perteineth not to this prefent treatife for 30 to enquire and discourse. But himselfe taking away and rooting up all vice as much as lay in him, by the meanes of philosophy, which to extirpe, was neither good nor expedient, docth herein that which is repugnant both to reason and also to God. Furthermore, in saying that there be certeine finnes and iniquities, against which the gods doe oppose themselves, he givethcovertly to understand, that there is some oddes and inequality in sinnes. Over and besides, having written in many places, that there is nothing in the world to be blamed, nor that can be complained of, for that all things are made and finished by a most singular and excellent nature: there be contrariwife, fundry places, wherein hee leaveth and alloweth unto us certeine negligences reprooveable, and those not in small and trifling matters. That this is true, it may appeare in his third book of Substance; where having made mention, that such like negligences 40 might befal unto good & honest men: Commeth this to passe (quoth he) because there be some things whereof there is no reckoning made, like as in great houses, there must needs be scattered and lost by the way some bran, yea and some few graines of wheat, although in generality the whole befides, is well enough ruled and governed? or is it because there be some evill and malignant spirits, as superintendents over such things, wherein certeinly such negligences are committed, & the fame reprehensible? and he faith moreover, that there is much necessitie intermingled among. But I meane not hereupon to stand, nor to discourse at large, but to let passe what vanity there was in him, to compare the accidents which befell to fome good and vertuous persons, as for example, the condemnation of Socrates, the burning of Pythagoras quicke by the Cylonians, the dolorous torments that Zeno endured under the tyrant Demylus, or 50 those which Antiphon suffred at the hands of Dionysius, when they were by them put to death, unto the brans that be foilt and lost in great mens houses. Butthat there should becsuch wicked spirits deputed by the divine providence, to have the charge of such things, must needs redound to the great reproach of God, as if he were fome unwife king who committed the government of his provinces unto evill captaines and rash headed lieutenants, suffering them to abuse and wrong his best affected subjects, and winking at their rechlesse negligence, having no cate or regard at all of them. Againe, if it be fo, that there is much necessity and continant mingled among the affaires of this world, then is not God the foveraigne lord and omnipotent master of all, neither be all things absolutely governed and ruled by his reason and counsell. Moreover he mightily opposeth himselse against Epicurus and those who take from the administration of the world divine providence, confuting them, principally by the common notions and conceptions inbred in us as touching the gods, by which perswaded we are that they be gracious benefactours unto men. And for that this is so vulgar and common a thing with them, needleffe it is to cite any expresse places to proove the same : And yet by his leave, all nations doe not beleeve that the gods be bountifull and good unto us. For doe but confider what opinion the Jewes and Syrians have of the gods: looke into the writings of Poets, with how many superstitions they be stuffed. There is no man in maner to speake of who imaginethor conceiveth in his minde, that god is either mortall and corruptable, or hath bene begotten: And 10 Antipater of Tarsis (to passe others over in silence) in his booke of Gods, hath written thus much word for word. But to the end (quoth he) that this discourse may be more perspicuous and cleare, we will reduce into few words the opinion which we have of God. We understand therefore by God a living nature or fubstance happie, incorruptible, and a benefactor unto men : and afterwards in expounding each of these tearmes and attributes, thus he faith: And verily all men doe acknowledge the gods to be immortall. It must needs be then, that by Antipaters faying, Chrysippus of all those, is none. For he doth not thinke any of all the godstobe incorruptible fave Jupiter onely: but supposeth that they were all engendred a like, and that one day they shall all likewise perish. This generally throughout all his bookes dott he deliver: howbeit one expresse passage will I alledge out of his third booke of the gods. After a divers 20 fort (quoth he) for some of them are engendred and mortall : others not engendred at all. But the proofe and demonstration hereof, if it should be fetched from the head indeed, appertement more properly unto the science of Naturall Philosophy. For the Sunne and Moone and other gods of like nature, were begotten : but Jupiter is sempiternall. And againe somewhat after: The like shall be said of Jupiter and other gods, as touching their corruption and generation: for fome of them do perith: but as for his parts they be incorruptible. With this I would have you to compare, a little of that which Antipater hath written: Those (quoth he) who deprive the gods of beneficence and well doing, touch but in some part the prenotion and anticipation in the knowledge of them: and by the same reason they also who thinke they participate of generation and corruption. If then he be as much deceived and as abfurd, who thinketh that the 30 gods be mortall and corruptible, as he who is of opinion that they beare no bountifull and loving affection toward men, Chrysippus is as farre from the trueth as Epicurus, for that as the one bereaveth God of immortallity and incorruption, so the other taketh from him bounty and liberality. Moreover Chrysppus in his third booke of the gods speaking of this point, and namely how other gods are nourished, saith thus: Other gods (quoth he) use a certaine nourishment, whereby they are maintained equally: but Jupiter and the world after a nother fort, than those who are engendred, and be confumed by the fire. In which place, he holdeth, that all other gods be nourished, except Jupiter and the world. And in the first booke of Providence, he saith that Jupiter groweth continually untill such a time, as all things be consumed in him. For death being the 40 Teparation of the body and foule, feeing that the foule of the world never departeth at all but augmenteth continually, untill it have confumed all the matter within it, we cannot fay that the world dieth. Who could speake more contrary to himselfe, than he who saith that one and the fame god is nourished and not nourished ? And this we need not to inferre and conclude by necessary consequence, considering that himselse in the same place hath written it plainly. The world onely (quoth he) is faid to be of it selfe sufficient: because it alone hath all in it selfe whereof it standers in no need, of it selfe it is nourished and augmented, whereas other parts are transmuted and converted one into another. Not onely then is he contradictorie and rupugnant to himselfe in that he saith, other gods be nourished, all except the world and Jupiter, but also here in much more, when he saith that the world groweth by nounfling it selfe: whereas 50 contratiwise there had bene more reason to say, the world onely is not augmented, having for foode the distruction thereof: but on the contrary side, other gods doe grow and increase, in as much as they have their nourishment from without: and rather should the world be confumed into them, if it be true that the world taketh alwaies from it selfe, and other gods from it. The fecond point conteined in that common notion and opinion imprinted in us as touching the gods, is that they be bleffed, happie and perfect. And therefore men highly praife Eurspides for faying thus.

If God be God indeed and really, He needs none of this poets verily; His praise in hymnes and verses for to write: Such ditties wretched are which they endite.

Howbeit our Chrysppu here, in those places by me alledged faith, that the world alone is of it felfe sufficient, as comprehending within it all that it hath need of. What then ariseth upon this proposition, that the world is sole-sufficient in it selfe, but this, that neither the Sun nor the Moone, nor any other of the gods whatfoever is fufficient of it felfe, and being thus infufficient,

Chrifippus is of opinion, that the infant in the mothers wombe, is nourished naturally, no otherwise than a plant within the earth; but when it is borne, and by the aire cooled and hardned (as it were) like steele, it mooveth the spirit, and becommeth an animall or living creature; and therefore it is not without good reason, that the soule was called 4%, in regard of 48%, that is to fay, refrigeration. But not forgetetting to be contrary unto himfelfe, he supposeth that the foule is the more fubtile, rare, and fine spirit of nature: For how is it possible that a subtile thing should be made of that which is groffe, and that a spirit should be rarefied by refrigeration and aftriction or condensation? Nay, that which more is, how commeth it about, that affirming as he doth the foule of an infant to be engendred by the means of refrigeration, he should thinke the fun to become animar, being as it is of a firy nature, & engendred of an 20 exhalation transmuted into fire? For thus he faith in his third booke of Nature: The mutation (quoth he) of fire is in this maner; by the aire it is turned into water, and out of water having earthunder it, there exhale thaire, which aire comming to be fubtilized, the fire is produced and environeth it round about 3& as for the stars, they are set on sire out of these, together with the funne; what is more contrary, than to be fet on fire and to be cooled? what more opposite to fubilization and rarefaction, than infpiffation and condenfation? the one maketh water and earth, of fire and aire; the other turneth that which is moift and terrestriall, into fire and aire. And yet in one place he maketh kindling of fire, and in another refrigeration, to beethe cause of quickning and giving foule unto a thing: for when the faid firing and inflammation comes generall throughout, then it liveth and is become an annimal creature; but after it commeth 30 to be quenched and thickned, it turneth into water and earth, and fo into a corporall substance. In the first booke of Providence, he writesh thus: For the world being throughout on fire, presently it is with all, the soule and governour of itselfe; but when it is turned into moisture and the foule left within it, and is after a fort converted into a foule and body, fo as it feemeth compounded of them both, then the case is altered: In which text he affirmeth plainly, that the very inanimat parts of the world by exustion and inflammation, turne and change into the soule thereof; and contrariwise by extinction, the soule is relaxed and moistned againe, and so returnethinto acorporall nature. Hecreupon I inferre that he is very abfurd, one while to make of fenfeleffethings, animat and living, by way of refrigeration; and another while to transmitte the most part of the soule of the world into insensible and inanimat things.

40 But over and above all this, the discourse which he maketh as touching the generation of the foule, conteineth a proofe & demonstration contrary to his owne opinion; for he faith: That the soule is engendred after that the infant is gone out of the mothers wombe; for that the spirit then is transformed by refrigeration; even as the temper is gotten of steele. Now to prove that the foule is engendred, and that after the birth of the infant, hee bringeth this for a principall argument; Because children become like unto their parents in behaviour and naturallinclination; wherein the contrariety that he delivereth is foevident, as that a man may fee it by the very eie; for it is not possible that the soule which is engendred after birth, should be framed to the maners and disposition of the parents before nativity; or else we must say (and fall out it will) that the foule before it was in effe, was already like unto a foule; which is all one, as

50 that it was by fimilitude and refembiance, and yet was not, because as yet it had not a reall substance: Now if any one doe say, that it ariseth from the temperature and complexion of the bodies, that this similitude is imprinted in them, howbeit when the soules are once engendred, they become changed, he shall overthrow the argument and proofe, whereby it is shewed that the foule was engendred; for hereupon it would follow, that the foule although it were ingenerable, when it entreth from without into the body, is changed by the temperature of the Chrysippus sometime saith, that the aire is light, that it mounteth upward on high; and other-

whiles for it againe: that it is neither heavy nor light. To prove this, see what he faith in his second booke of Motion, namely, that fire having in it no ponderofity at all, ascendethaloft: semblably the aire; and as the water is more conformable to the earth, fo the aire doth rather resemble the fire. But in his booke entituled Naturall arts, he bendeth to the contrary opinion, to wit, that the aire hathneither ponderosity nor lightnesse of it selse: He affirmeth that the aire by nature is darke, and for that cause by consequence it is also the primitive cold; and that tenebrosity or darknesse is directly opposite unto light and cleerenesse, and the coldnesse thereof to the heat of fire. Mooving this discourse in the first booke of his Naturall questions, contrary to all this in his treatise of Habitudes, he saith: That these habitudes be nothing else but aires: For that bodies (quothhe) be contined by them, and the cause why every body contei- 10 ned by any habitude is fuch as it is, is the continent aire; which in iron is called hardnesse, in stone, spissitude or thicknesse; in silver whitenesse; in which words there is great contrariety, and as much false absurditie: for if this aire remaine the same still as it is in the ownenature, how commeth blacke in that which is not white, to be called whitenesse; softnesse in that which is not hard, to be named hardnesse; or rare in that which is not solide and massie, to be called solidity? But in case it be said, that by mixture therein it is altered, and so becommen femblable, how then can it be an habitude, a faculty, power, or cause of these effects, whereby it felfe is brought under and fubdued? for that were to fuffer rather than to doe; and this alteration is not of a nature conteining, but of a languithing impotencie, whereby it loseth all the properties and qualities of the owne: and yet in every place they hold, that matter of it felfe so idle and without motion, is subject and exposed to the receit of qualities, which qualities are spirits, and those powers of the aire, which into what parts soever of the matter they get and infinuate themselves, doe give a forme and imprint a figure into them. But how can they mainteine this, supposing as they do, the aire to be such as they say it is; for if it be an habitude and power, it will conforme and shape unto it felfe, every body, so as it will make the same both blacke and foft: but if by being mixed and contempered with them, it take formes contrary unto those which it hath by nature, it followeth then, that it is the matter of matter, and neither the habitude, cause, nor power thereof.

Chrylippes hath written often times, that without the world there is an infinit voidneffe; and that this infinitie hath neither beginning, middle, nor end. And this is the principall reason 30 whereby they refute that motion downward of the Atoms by themselves, which Epicurus hath brought in : for in that which is infinit, there are no locall differences, whereby a man may understand or specific either high or low. But in the fourth booke of Things possible, he suppofeth a cetteine middle space and meane place betweene: wherein he faith the world is sounded. The very text where he affirmeth this runneth in these words. And therefore we must say of the world that it is corruptible: and although it be very hard to proove it, yet me thinks rather it should be forthan otherwise. Nevertheleffer this maketh much to the inducing of us to believe that it hath a certeine incorruptibility, if I may fo fay, namely the occupation or taking up of the middle place, wherein it standeth, because it is in the mids: for if it were thought otherwise to be founded, it were altogether necessarie that some corruption should take holde of it. And a- 40 gaine, a little after: for even fo in fome fort hath that effence bene ordeined from all eternity, to occupie the middle region, being prefently at the very first such as if not by another maner, yet by attaining this place, it is eternall and fubject to no corruption. These words conteine one manifest repugnance and visible contrariety, considering that in them he admitteth and alloweth in that which is infinit a middle place. But there is a fecond also, which as it is more darke and obscure, so it impliethalso a more monstrous absurditie than the other: for supposing that the world can not continue incorruptible, if it were feated and founded in any other place of the infinitie, than in the mids; it appeareth manifellly that he feared, if the parts of the fubstance did not moove and tend toward the mids, there would ensue a dissolution & corruption of the world. But this would be never have feared, if he had not thought that bodies naturally 50 from all fides tend to the middes not of the fubftance but of the place that conteineth the fubstance; whereof he had spoken in many places, that it was a thing impossible and against nature, for that within voidnesse there is no difference, by which bodies can be said to move more one way than another: and that the construction of the world is cause of the motion to the center, as also that all things from every side do bend to the mids. But to see this more plainly, it may fuffice to alledge the very text in his fecond booke of Motion : for when he had delivered thus much, That the world is a perfect body, and the parts of the world not perfect, because they are respective to the whole, and not of themselves. Having also discoursed as touching the motion thereof: for that it was apt and fitted by nature to moove it felfe in all parts; for to conteine and preferve, and not to breake, diffolve and burne it felfe, he faith afterwards, But the univerfall world tending and mooving to the fame point, and the parts thereof having the fame motion from the nature of the body; like it is, that this first motion is naturally proper to all bodies, namely, to encline toward the mids of the world, confidering that the world mooveth fo in regard of it felfe; and the parts likewife, in that they be the parts of the whole. How now my goodfriend, may fome one fay, what accident is befallen unto you, that you should forget to pronounce these words withall, That the world, in case it had not fortuned for to settle in the no mids, must needs have bene subject to corruption and diffolution ? For if it be proper and naturall to the world to tend alwaies to the same middle, as also to addresse the parts thereof from all fides thereto, into what place foever of the voidnesse it be carried and transported, certes thus containing and embracing (as it were) it felfe, as it doth, it must needs continue incorruptible, immortall, and past all danger of fracture or dissolution: for to such things as be broken, bruifed, diffipated and diffolved, this is incident, by the division and diffolution of their parts, when ech one runneth and retireth into their proper and naturall place, out of that which is against their owne nature. But you fir, supposing that if the world were seated in any other place of voidnesse but in the mids, there would follow a totall ruine and corruption thereof; giving out alfo as much, and therefore imagining a middle in that where naturally there can be none, to 20 wit, in that which is infinit, have verily quit cleane and fled from these tensions, coharences and inclinations, as having in them no affured meanes for to mainteine and holde the world together, and attributed all the cause of the eternall maintenance and preservation thereof, unto the occupation of a place. And yet, as if you tooke pleafure to argue and convince your felfe, you adjoine to the premisses, thus much: In what fortevery severall part moveth, as it is coherent to the rest of the body, it stands with good reason, that after the same maner it should moove by itselsealone; yea, if for disputation sake we imagine and suppose it to be in some void part of this world: and like as being kept in and enclosed on every fide, it would move toward the mids, foit would continue in this fame motion, although by way of disputation we should admit, that all on a fudden there should appeare some vacuity and void place round about it. And is it so 30 indeed, that every part what ever it be, compaffed about with voidnesse, forgoeth not her naturall inclination to move & tend to the mids; and should the world it selfe, unlesse some fortune &blind chance had not prepared for it a place in the mids, have loft that vigor & power which conteineth and holdeth all together, & so some parts of the substance of it moove one way, and fome another? Now furely heerein there be many other maine contrarieties repugnant even to natural reason; but this particularly among the rest, encountreth the doctrine of God & divine providence, to wit, that in attributing unto them the least and smallest causes that be, he taketh from them the most principall and greatest of all other. For what greater power can there be, than the maintenance and prefervation of this univerfall world, or to caute the fubfiance united together in all parts to cohere unto it felfe? But this according to the opinion of Chrysp-40 Pm, hapneth by meere hazzard and chance: for if the occupation of a place, is the cause of worlds incorruption and eternity, and the fame chanced by fortune, we must inferre thereupon, that the fafety of all things dependeth upon hazzard and adventure, and not upon fatall deftiny and divine providence. As for his doctrine & disputation we of Mundator, that is to say of things possible, which chrysippus hath delivered directly against that of fatall destiny, how can it chuse butberepugnant to it felfe: for if that be not possible, according to the opinio of Diodor w, which either is or shall be true, but whatsoever is susceptible naturally of a power to be, although the lamenever come into act or effe, is to be counted possible; there will be a number of things posfiblewhich never (hal have being, by destiny invincible, inexpugnable, & furmouting althings. And therefore either this doctrine overthroweth al the force and puissance of destiny or if it be 50 admitted as Chrysippes would have it that which potentially may be, wil fal out oftentimes to be impossible; & whatfoever is true, shall be also necessary, as being comprised & contained by the greatest and most powerfull necessity of all others; and whatsoever is false, impossible, as having the greatest and most puissant cause withstanding and impeaching it ever for being true. For looke whose destiny it is to die in the sea, how can it possible be, that he should be susceptible of death upon the land? And how is it possible, that he who is at Megara should come to Athens, being hindred and prohibited by fatall deftiny?

fatall destiny: For intending to proove that fantasse is not an entire and absolute cause of affent he saith, that Sages and wise men will prejudice and hurt us much, by imprinting in our mindes false imaginations, if it be so that such standards doe absolutely cause affent. For many times wise men use that which is false, unto leawd and wicked persons, representing unto them a santassic that is but onely probable, and yet the same is not the cause of affent: for so also should the cause of salse opinion and of deception. If then a man would transferre this reason and argument from the said wise men unto stall destiny, saying that destiny is not the cause of affents ment from the said wise men unto stall destiny, saying that destiny is not the cause of affents ons, yea and men should be endamaged by destiny) certes the same doctrine and reason which exempteth a wise man from doing but at any time, sheweth withall that destiny is not the cause of all things. For if they neither opine nor receive detriment by destiny: certeinly they doe no good, they are not wise, they be not firme and constant in opinion, neither receive they any good and profit by destiny: so that this conclusion which they hold for most affured, salleth any good and profit by destiny: so that this conclusion which they hold for most affured, salleth any good and profit by destiny: so that this conclusion which they hold for most affured, salleth on the ground and comment to nothing, namely, that stall destiny the eause of all things.

folute cause of all things, but only a procatar dicall and antecedent occasion, here againe will he discover how he is contradictorie to himselfe, whereas he praiseth Homer excessively for saving

thus of Jupiter:
Take well in worth therefore what he to each of you shall send;
And whether good or bad it be,
doe not with him consend.

As also where he highly extolleth Euripides for these verses:

O Jupiter what caufe have I to far, That mortall wretches we (hould prudent be? Depend we doe of thee, and nothing may Bring to effect, but that which pleafeth thee.

Himselfe also writeth many lentences accordant hereunto, and finally concludeth, that nothing doth rest and stay, nothing stirre and moove, be it never so little, otherwise than by the counsell and minde of Jupiter, whome he faith to be all one with fatall destiny. Moreover the antecedent 30 cause is more feeble and weake than that which is perfit and absolute, neither attaineth it to any effect, as being subdued & kept down, by others mightier than it selfe, rising up & making head against it. And as for fatall destiny Chrysopus himselfe pronouncing it to be a cause invincible, inflexible, and that which cannot be impeached, calleth it Atropos & Adrastia, as one would say, a cause that cannot be averted, avoided or undone. Likewise necessity and Pepromene, which is as much to fay as fetting downe meas that is to fay, an end and limit unto all things. How then? whether doe we not fay, that neither affents, vertues, vices, nor well or ill doing, lie in our free will and power: if we affirme fatall destiny is to be maimed or unperfect and mocration, that is to fay, a fatality determining all things, to be ampurants, that is to fay, without powerto finish and effect ought: and fothe motions and habitudes of Jupiters will to remaine imperfect and 40 unaccomplified? for of these conclusions the one will follow, if we say that destiny is an absolute and perfect cause: and the other, in case we hold that it is onely a procatarcticall or antecedent occasion. For being an absolute and all sufficient cause, it overthroweth that which is in us, to wit, our free will: and againe, if we admit it to be only antecedent it is marred for being effectuall and without the danger of impeachment. For not in one or two places onely but every where in maner throughout all his commentaries of naturall philosophy he hath written; that in particular natures and motions there be many obstacles and impediments, but in the motion of the univerfall world there is none at all. And how is it possible that the motion of the univerfall world should not be hindred and disturbed, reaching as it doth unto particulars, in case it be so, that they likewise be stopped and impeached. For surely the nature in generall of the whole 50 man is not at liberty and without impediment, if neither that of the foot nor of the hand, be void of obstacles: no more can the motion or course of a ship be void of let and hinderance, if there be some stay about the sailes, & oares, or their works. Over & besides all this, if the fantastes and imaginations, are not imprinted in us by fatall deftiny, how be they the cause of affents? Or if because it imprinteth fantasses that lead unto assent, thereupon all assents are said to be by fatall defliny, how is it possible that destiny should not be repugnant to it selfe? considering that in matters of greatest importance, it ministreth many times different fantasies; and those which diftract the minde into contrary opinions? whereas they affirme that those who settle unto one of the faid fantafies, and hold not of their affent and approbation doe erre and finne: For if they yeeld (fay they) unto uncertaine fantafies they stumble and fall: if unto false, they are deceived: if to fuch as commonly are not conceived and understood, they opine. For of necessity it must be one of these three : either that every fantasie is not the worke nor effect of destiny ; or that every receit & affention of fantalie is not void of error; or elle that deltiny it selfe is not irreprehenfible. Neither can I fee how it should be blamelesse, objecting such fansies & imaginations as it doth: which to withfland and refift, were not blameable, but rather to give place and follow them : and verily in the disputations of the Stoicks against the Academicks, the maine point a-10 bout which both Chrysippus himselfe, and Antipater also contended and stood upon, was this: That we doe nothing at all, nor be enclined to any action, without a precedent confent; but that these be but vaine fictions and devised fables, and suppositions, that when any proper fantaffe is presented, incontinently we are disposed, yea, and incited thereto, without yeelding or giving consent. Againe, Chrysppu faith: That both God and the wise man doe imprintfalse imaginations, not because they would have us to yeeld or give our consent unto them, but that we should doe the thing onely, and incite our selves to that which appeareth: As for us, if wee be evill by reason of our infirmity, we condescend to such fansies and imaginations. Now the repugnance and contrarietie in these words is easily seene; for hee who would not have us to consent unto the fantasses which he presenteth unto us, but onely to worke and doe them, be he 20 God or wife man, knoweth well enough that fuch fantafies are sufficient to cause us to fall to operation, and that those affents are altogether superstuous; and so if he knowing that the fantafic imprinteth no inflinct into operation without confent, ministreth unto us false or probable fantafies: wilfull and voluntary is the cause that we stumble, erre, and offend, in giving our asfentto fuch things as are not perfectly understood and comprehended.

OF COMMON CON-CEPTIONS AGAINST THE STOICKS.

The Summaric.

Aving shewed in my former discourse, that the Stoicks are contradictory to them-Colores in all the principal articles of their doctrine, and so consequently that he needed no more but their owne words to condemne them: In this dialogue he joineth more closely to them, disputing against their rules and precepts, which he examineth and refuteth; whereas before he was content to oppugne them by their owne selves. For to make an entrance into this dialogue, he bringeth in Lamprias, requesting Diadumenus to rid him of those scruples that certeine Stoicks had patinto his bead: Whereunto the other accordeth, and so they enter into the matter. The summe of whose whole discourse throughout is this: That the Stoicks would by their principles abolish mans senses, and the common conceptions proceeding from 50 thence, thereby more easily to establish their owneparadoxes : whom herefutes b, dividing his dialogue into three principall parts: in the first where of is considered, the morall; in the second, the naturall; in the third, the metaphy licall or supernatural philosophy of the Stoicks: Howbeit, he observeth no exact order nor method, in the disposation of his matters, but entrethout of one discourse into another, according as things were presented unto him, and came fust into his minde, yet in such sort, as there is sufficient to content the reader, who is desironato know what was the feet and doctrine of the Stoicks, and the maner of the auncient Academicks in their disputations: which being referred to the true marke and scope indeed of all that which we may learne in the world, teacheth every man to humble himselfe before the majestion of him who is onely wise, and out of whose sacred word we ought to setch the resolution of the questions debated heere in this dialogue, but of those above the rest, which treat of maners, religion, and divinity.

OF COMMON CONCEPTI

Thould feeme verily that you Diadumenus passe not much what any man either thinks or faies of you & other Academicks, such as your selfe, in that you do philosophize cleane contrary to the common notions and conceptions, consessing as you doe, that you make no great account of the five naturall senses, from whence proceed the most part of the sid common conceptions, having for their soundation and seat, the beliefe and assurance of the imaginations which appeare unto us. But I pray you for to assay and goe in hand to cure me, either by some words, or charmes and enchant to ments, or by what other meanes and kinds of physicke that you know, comming as I doe unto you, full in mine owne conceit of great trouble and strong perturbation, fo exceedingly troubled Havebeene, and held in perplexed suspense, I may tell you, by certeine Stoicks; men otherwise the best in the world, and I may say to you, my inward and familiar friends: howbeit, over bitterly bent, and in holfile maner fet against the Academic, who for very finall matters uttered by me, modefly and in good fort, with all respect and reverence, have(I will not lie unto you) reprooved, checked, and taken me up very unkindly, with some hard words, and breaking foorth in heat of choler, called our auncient Philosophers, Sophisters, corrupters, and perverters of good sentences in Philosophy, yea, and seducers of those who otherwise walked in the true path and traine of doctrine surely established; withma- 30 ny other more strange termes, both speaking and thinking of them very basely; untill in the end as if they had beene driven with a tempest, they fell upon the Common conceptions, reproching those of the Academie, as if they brought in some great confusion and perturbation in the faid notions: and one among them there was, who stucke not to fay; That it was not by fortune, but by some divine providence that Chrysippus was borne and came into the world, after Arcesslaus, and before Carneades: of which twaine, the one was the great authour and promoter of the injury and outrage done unto cultome; and the other flourished in name and renowmeabove all other Academicks. Now Chrysppus comming as he did betweene them, by his writings contrary to the doctrine of Arcefilaus, stopped up the way also against the powerful eloquence of Carneades, and as he left unto the fenfes many aides and fuccours, as it were to 40 hold out a long fiege; so he removed out of the way, and fully cleered all the trouble and confusion about anticipations and common conceptions, correcting ech one, and reducing them into their proper place; infomuch, as who foever afterwards would feeme to make new troubles, and violently disquiet matters by him fetled, should not prevaile nor gaine ought, but incutre the obloquic of the world, and be convinced for malicious persons, and deceitfull sophilters. Having thus (I fay) by these wordsbeene chased and set on fire this morning among them, I had need of some meanes to quench the heat as it were of an inflammation, and to rid me of these doubts, which are risen in my minde.

It fareth haply with you, as with many of the vulgar fort; but if you believe the poets who 50 give out; that the ancient citie Sipplus in Magressa, was in old time destroiced and overthrowen by the providence of the gods, when they chastised and punished Tamalus; you may as well be perswaded by our old friends the Stoicks to believe, that nature hath brought foorth into the world, not by chance and fortune, but by some special divine providence, Chrysspu, when she was minded to pervert and overturne the life of man and course of the world, turning all things up side downe, and contrariwise downessed en : for never was there man better made and and framed for such a matter than he. And as Cato said of that Iulius Casar Dictator, that before him there was never knowen any to come sober and considerate to manage affaires of thate with a purpose to worke the ruin of the common weale; even so this man in mine opinion, with most diligence, greatest eloquence, & highest conceit of spirit seemeth as much as lieth in him to destroy and abolish custome. And there witnesse against him no lesse even they who magnifie the man otherwise: namely, when they dispute against him as touching that sophisme or iyllogisme which is called Pseudomenos, for to say my good friend, that the augmentation coposed of contrary positions is not notoriously salle, and againe to affirme, that syllogismes having their premisses true, yea and true inductions, may yet have the contrary to their conclusions to true, what conception of demonstrations, or what anticipation of beleefe is there, which it is not able to overthrow?

It is reported of the Pourcuttle or Pollyp fish, that in winter time he gnaweth his owne cleics and pendant hairy feet, but the Logicke of Chrysppus, which taketh away and cutteth off the principall parts of it, what other conception leaveth it behinde but that which well may be suspected? For how can that be imagined steady and sure which is built upon foundations that abide nothine, but wherein there be so many doubts and troubles? But like as they who have either doubt or durt upon their bodies, if they touch another therewith or rub against him, doe not so much trouble and molest him, as they doe begrime and beray themselves so much the more and seeme to exasperate that ordure which pricketh and is offensive unto them; even so, some there be who blame and accuse the Academicks, thinking to charge upon them those imputations, wherewith themselves are found to be more burdened. For who be they that pervert the common conceptions of the senses more, than do these Stoicks? But if you thinke so good, leaving off to acuse them, let us answere to those calumniations and slanders which they would seeme to fasten upon us.

LAMPRIAS.

Me thinks Diadamense that I am this day much changed, and become full of variety: me thinks I am a man greatly altered from that I was ere while: for even now I came hither much difmated and abafhed, as being deprefled, beaten downe and amazed, as one having need of fome advocate or other to fpeake for me and in my behalfe: whereas now I am cleane turned 30 to anhumor of accufation, and disposed to enjoy the pleasure of revenge, to see all the packe of them detected and convinced, in that they argue and dispute themselves against common conceptions and anticipations, in defence whereof they seeme principally to magnifie their owne seed, * * * faying that it alone doth agree and accord with nature.

DIADUMENUS

Begin we then first, with their most renowmed propositions, which they themselves call paradoxes, that is to say, strange and admirable opinions: avowing as it were by that name & gently admitting such exorbitant abstractions is sor example that such Sages as themselves are onely kings, onely tich and faire, onely citizens, and onely Judges: or pleaseth it you that we fend all this stuffe to the market of olde and stale marchandise, and goe in hand with the examination of 40 these matters which consists most in action and practise, whereof also they dispute most seriously?

For mine owne part. I take this to be the better. For as touching the reputation of those paradoxes, who is not full thereof, and hath not heard it a thousand times?

Consider then in the first place this, whether according to common notions, they can possibly accord with nature, who thinke naturall things to be indifferent: and that neither health, nor good plight and habitude of body nor beawty, nor cleane strength be either expecible, prositable, expedient, or serving in any stead to the accomplishment of that perfection which is actording to nature: nor that the contraries hereunto are to be avoided, as hurtfull, to wit, maines and mutilations of members, deformities of body, paines, thannefull diffraces and diseases. Of which things rehearsed, they themselves acknowledge that nature estrangeth us from some, and acquainteth us with other. The which verily is equite contrary to common intelligence, that nature should acquaint us with those things which be neither expedient nor good, & alienate us from such as be not hurtfull nor ill: and that which more is, that the should cither traineus to them or withdraw us from them so farre forth, as if men misse in obtaining the one, or fall into the other, they should with good reason abandon this life, and for just cause depart out of the world. I suppose that this also, is by the affirmed against common sense, namely, that nature her felfe is a thing indifferent; and that to accord and confent with nature hath in it fomepart of the foveraigne good. For neither to follow the rule of the law nor to obey reason is good and honest, unlesse both law and reason be good and honest. But this verily is one of the least of their errors. For if Chrysppus in his first booke of exhortations hath written thus: A bleffed and happie life confifteth onely in living according to vertue: and as for all other acceffaries (quoth hee) they neither touch nor concerneus at all, neither make they any whit to beatitude: hecannot avoid but he must avow, that not onely nature is indifferent, buralfo which is more, senselesse and foolish, to affociate and draw us into a league with that which in no respect concerneth us, and we our selves likewise are no better than fooles, to thinke that the foveraigne felicity, is to confent and accord with nature which leadeth and conducteth us to that which serveth nothing at all to happinesse. And yet what agreeth and sorteth sooner to common sense, than this, that as things eligible are to be chosen and desired for the profit and helpe of this life; so naturall things serve for to live answerable to nature ? But these men say otherwise: for although this be their supposition that to live according to nature is the utmost end of mans good, yet they hold, that things according to nature be of themselves indifferent. Neither is this also lesse repugnant to common sense and conception, that a well affected, sensible and prudent man, is not equally enclined and affectionate to good things that be equall and alike: but as some of them he waigheth not, nor maketh any account of, so for others again he is prest to abide and endure all things, although I say the same be not greater or lesse, one than 20 another. For these things they hold to be equall, namely, for a man to fight valiantly in the defence of his country, and chaftly to turne away from an olde trot, when for very age the is at the point of death: for both the one and the other doe that alike which their duty requireth. And yet for the one, asbeing a worthie and glorious thing, they would be prest and ready to lose their lives, whereas to boast and vaunt of the other were a shamefull and ridiculous part. And even Chrysppus himselfe, in the treatise which he composed of Jupiter, and in the third bookeof the Gods, faith that it were a poore, abfurd and foolish thing to praise such acts, as proceeding from vertue, namely to be are valiantly the biting of a flie, or iting of a wespe, and chastly to abstaine from a crooked old woman, stooping forward & ready to tumble into her grave. Donot these Philosophers then teach and preach even against common sense and notion, when those 30 actions which they are ashamed to commend, they avow and consesse to be excellent, and nothing in the world better? For where is that expetible, or how can that be approovable, which deserveth not that a man should praise and admire it, but is such as who soever doe commend and admire the fame, they are reputed no better than fots and abfurd fooles? And yet I suppose you will thinke it more against common sense and reason, that a wise and prudent man should not care nor regard a jot whether he enjoy or enjoy not the greatest goods in the world, but carty himselfe after one and the same maner in things indifferent, as he would in the management and administration of those good things which are so singular. For weall,

As many as on fruits do feed,

Which for our use the carth doth breed. are of this judgement, that the thing which being present bringeth us helpe and profit, and ifit be away, we defire to have, and find a miffe of it, is good, expetible and profitable butthat which a man paffeth not for neither in carnelt nor in game, and whereof he maketh no account either for his sport, pastime or commodity and ease, the same is indifferent: for by no other marke do we diftinguith a diligent, painfull and industrious man in deed, from a vaine busiebody, and a cutions medler in many matters, than by this, That as the one travelleth and troubleth himselfe in unprofitable trifles or things indifferent, fo the other laboureth for such as be commodious and expedient. But these Philosophers do quite contrary : for according to their doêtrine, a wife and prudent man, although he meet with many conceptions and the memories of 50 the faid comprehentions, yea and remember divers things whereof he hath a certeine and perfeet knowledge; thinketh some few of them to concerne him; and as for the rest, making no reckoning of them, he supposeth that he neither loseth nor winneth, by remembring that hee had the other day the comprehension, that is to say, the certeine knowledge either of Dion sneefing or Theon playing at tennis. And yet every comprehension in a wife man, and all memory that is firme and furely fetled, is prefently science, yea and a great good thing, nay the greatest that is. How then? for I would gladly know, whether a wife man were fecure and careleffe alike, when his health faileth, when fome one of his fenfes decaieth or is amisse, and when he loseth his goods, thinking none of all this to touch him; sor whether when he seeleth himselfe sicke, giveth unto Physicians their sees when they come unto him; and for to gainer iches, saileth to Leucon a great prince and potentate about Bosporus, or travelleth as farte as to Indathyrsus the Scyhian king, as Chryspopus saith; and of his senses, if he lose some, he will not endure to live any longer? How is it then, that these men doe not acknowledge and confesse that they deliver doctrine even against common notions, who about things indifferent, carke, care and travell so much; and yet take the matter indifferently, and reake not much whether they enjoy or be with to out great good things? Moreover, this also is an opinion of theirs, even against common conceptions, That he who is a man, feeleth no joy when out of the greatest evils and most grievous calamities he entreth into a world of good things and a most bleffed and happy state. And yet thus doth their wife man; for passing from extreame vice, unto exceeding great vertue; escaping also out of a most miserable life, and atteining unto the happiest condition that is, he sheweth no figne or token atall of joy: neither doth fo great a change lift up his heart, or once move him, feeing himselfe how he is delivered out of the greatest miserie and wickednesse that may be, and arrived now to a most firme affored accomplishment of all felicitie and goodnesse. Againe, contrary it is to common fense, That this should be the greatest good of a man, namely, a constant judge-20 mentand immutable resolution; and yet that he who is mounted up to the heigth and pitch of all hath no need hereof, neither careth for it when it is come; infomuch as many times he will not once put forth his finger for this affurance and stability, notwithstanding they esteeme it to be the fovereigne and perfect good. Neither do these Stoicks stay here, but still broch more paradoxes & strange opinions, namely, that continuance of time be it never so long, augmenteth not any good thing: but if a man chance to be wife and prudent but the minute onely of an houre, he is nothing inferior in felicity to him, who all his time hath lived in vertue, and led his whole life bleffedly therein. Howbeit, as bravely and as floutly as they deliver these positions, yet on the other fide, they flicke not to fay, that transitory vertue which continueth but a while, isworth nothing: for what would it availe or benefithim who incontinently is to fuffer ship-30 wracke and to perish in the sea, or otherwise to be throwen headlong downe from some steepe rocke, if he were possessed of wisdome a while before? And what would it have booted Lychas being flung by Hercules as it were out of a fling into the mids of the fea, if fuddenly he had bene changed from vertue to vice? These positions therefore savour of these men, who not onely philolophize against sense and common notions, of the whole world, but also consusedly huddle their owne conceits, making a mish-mash of them and contradicting themselves, if it be fo that they thinke, that the holding and pofferfing of vertue a fhort time, wanteth nothing of fovereigne felicity, & withall, make no account of fo thort a vertue, as if in deed it were nothing worth. And yet this is not it that a man would wonder most at in their strange doctrine, but this rather, that they efficience give out and fay: That when this foveraigne vertue & felicity is pre-40 fent, he that is poffeffed of it, hath no fente nor feeling thereof; neither perceiveth he how being erewhile most miserable and foolish; he is now all at once become both wise & happy: for not onely it were a pretie jest, and ridiculous conceit to fay; That a wife and prudent man is ignorant even of this one point, that he is wife; and knoweth nor that he is now past ignorance, and want of knowledge: but also to speake all in a word; they make goodnesse to be of no moment, norto cary any weight and poile with it, they make it I fay very obscure, enervat and seeble, in cale when it commeth, a man is not able to feele and perceive it: for according to them, it is notby nature imperceptible; and even Chrylippus himfelfe hath expresly written in his bookes entituled, Of the end, That good is perceptible by fenfe; and as hee thinkerh, to hee maketh proofe and demonstration thereof. It remaineth therefore that it is long either of weakenesse 50 or imalnesse that it is not perceived, when they who have it present, feele it not, nor have any knowledge thereof. Moreover, it were very abfurd to fay, that the eie fight should perceive and differne things that be but whitish a little, or middle colours betweene, and not bee able to see those that be exceeding white in the highest degree; or that the sense of feeling should apprehend that which is meanly hot or warme, and yet have no fenfe at all of fuch things, as be exceeding hor. But there is more abfurdity in this, that a man should comprehend that which mean-ly and commonly is according to nature, to wit, health, or the good plight of the body; and be ignorant againe of vertue, when it is present, considering withall, that they hold it to be principally and in highest degree accordant to nature; for how can it otherwise be, but against common sense, to conceive well enough the difference between health and sicknesse, and to be ignorant of that diffinction which is betweene wiledome and follie; but to thinke the one to be present when it is gone, and when a man hath the other, not to know so much, that he hath it? Now forasmuch as after that one advanced and proceeded forward as farre as may be, he is changed into felicity and vertue, one of these two must of necessitie follow; that either this estate of progresse and profit, is neither vice nor infelicity; or else that there is no great difference and distance between e vice and vertue; but that the diversitie of good things and evill is very finall and unperceptible by the fense, for otherwise men could not be ignorant when they to had the one or the other, or thinke they had the one for the other: fo long then as they depart not from any contrariety of fentences, but will allow, affirme, and put downe all things whatfoever, to wit, That they who profit and proceed are still fooles and wicked; that they who are become wife and good, known ot so much themselves, but are ignorant thereof; that there is a great difference betweene wisedome and folly: Thinke you, that they shew a woonderfull constance and uniformity in the maintenance of their fentences and doctrines?

Well, if in their doctrine they goe against common sense, and are repugnant to themselves; certes, in their life, in their negotiations and affaires, they doe much more: for pronouncing flatly, that those who be not wife, are all indifferently and alike, wicked, unjust, disloiall, faithleste, and foolish; and yet forfoorth, some of them they abhorre and will not abide, but be 20 ready to fpit at them; others, they will not vouchfafe for much as to falute if they meet with them upon the way; and some againe they will credit with their monies, nominate and elect by their voices to be magistrates, yea and bestow their daughters upon them in mariage. Now in case they hold fuch itrange and extravagant positions in sport and game, ler them plucke downe their browes, and not make fo many furrowes as they doe in their foreheads: but if in earnest, and as grave Philosophers, furely, I must needs tell them, that it is against common notions, to reproove, blame, and raile upon all men alike in words, and yet to use some of them in deeds as honest persons, & others hardly to intreat as most wicked; and for example, to admire Chrysipput in the highest degree, & make a god of him; but to mocke and scorne Alexinus, although they thinke the men to be fooles alike, and not one more or leffe foolish than the other. True 30 it is fay they; and needs it must be so. But like as he who is but a cubit under the top of the water, is no lette strangled and drowned than he who lies five hundred fathom deepe in the bottom of the fea: even fo they that be come within a little of vertue, are no leffe in vice still than those who are agreat way off: and as blinde folke be blinde ftill, although haply they shall recover their eie-fight shortly after; even so they that have wel proceeded and gone forward, continue sooles still and sinfull, untill such time as they have fully attained to vertue; but contrary to all this, that they who profit in the schoole of vertue, resemble not those who are starke blinde, but such ratheras fee not clerely; nor are like unto those who be drowned, but unto them that swimme, yea and approch necre unto the haven; they themselves do beare witnesse by their deeds, and in the whole practife of their life; for otherwife they would not have used them for their counsellors, 40 captaines, and lawgivers as blinde men do guides for to lead them by the hands, neither would they have praised and imitated their deeds, acts, sayings and lives of some as they did, if they had feene them all drowned alike and fuffocated with folly and wickedneffe.

But letting that goe by, confider these Stoicks, that you may woonder the more at them in this behalfe, that by their owne examples they are not taught to quit and abandon these wise men who are ignorant of themselves, and who neither know nor perceive, that they cease to be stifled and strangled any longer, and begin to see the light, and being risen alost, and gottenabove vice and finne, take their winde and breath againe. Also it is against common sense, that for a man furnished with all good things, and who wanteth nothing of perfect bliffe and happinelle, it (hould be meet and befitting, to make himfelfe away and depart voluntarily out of this 50 life; yea, and more than fo; that he who neither prefently hath, nor ever shall have any good thing; but contratiwife, is continually haunted and perfecuted with all hortible calamities, miferies, and mishaps that can be, should not thinke it fit and covenient for himselfe to leave and for fake this life, unleffe fome of those things which they hold be indifferent, be presented, and doe befall unto him. Well these be the goodly rules and trim lawes in the Stoicks schoole; and verily many of their wife men they canfe indeed to go out of this life, bearing them in hand, that they shall be more bleffed and happie; although by their faying a wife man is rich, fortunate, bleffed, happy every way, fure, and fecured from all danger: contrariwife, a foole and leawd man is able to fay of himfelfe,

Of wicked parts (to fay I dare be hold) So full I am, that unneth I can hold.

And yet forfooth, they thinke it meet and feemely for fuch as thefe to remaine alive, but for those to forgo this life. And good cause why, quoth Chrysippus, for we are not to measure our life by good things or evill, but by fuch as are according to nature. See how these Philosophers mainteine ordinary custome, and teach according to common notions. Say you so (good sit) to ought not he who maketh profession of looking into the estate of life and death, to search also and confider

What rule at home in house, what worke there is; How things do stand; what goes well, what amis.

Should not he (I say) ponder and examine as it were by the ballance, what things incline and bend more to felicity and what to infelicity, and thereby to chuse that which is profitable? but to lay his ground and make his reckoning to live happily or no by things indifferent, which neither do good nor hurt? According to fuch prefuppolitions and principles as these, were it not convenient for him who wanteth nothing of all that is to be avoided, to chuse for to live: & contratiwife, for him to leave this life, who enjoieth all that is to be wished for and defired? And al-20 beit (my good friend Lamprias) it be a fenfeleffe abfurdity, to fay that those who taste of no evill, fhould for fake this life: yet is it more abfurd and befide all reason, that for the not having of fome indifferent thing, a man should cast away and abandon that which is simply good; like as these men doe, leaving felicity and vertue, which they presently enjoy, for default of riches and health, which they have not. And to this purpose we may well and fitly alledge these verses out of Homer:

And then from Glaucus, Jupiter all wit and fenfe did take, When he with Diomedes would a foolish bargainemake; For brasen armour to exchange his owne of golde most fine, An hundred * oxen richly worth, for that which went for nine.

"Or pieces of

And yet those armes made of braffe, were of no leffe use in battell, than the other of golde: the forme of whereas the decent feature of the bodie and health, according to the Stoicks, yeeld no profit at ped upon all, nor make one jote for felicity. Howbeit, these men for all that, are content to exchange wish them. dome for health, in a fmuch as they holde that it would have become Heraclitus well enough and Pherecydes, to have cast off their wildome and vertue, had it beene in their power so to do, in case thereby they might have bene rid of their maladies, the one of the lowfie difease, and the other 40 of the dropfie. And if Circe had filled two caps with severall medicines and potions, the one making fooles of wife men, and the other, wife men of fooles, uly//es ought to have drunke that of folly, rather than to change his humane shape into the forme of a beast, having in it wildome withall, and by confequence felicity also. And they say, that even wisdome and prudence it selfe teacheth as much and commandeth in this wife: Let me alone, and fuffer me to perifh, in cafe I must be caried to and fro in the forme and shape of an affe. But this wisedome and prudence will some man say, which prescribeth such things, is the wisedome of an asse; if to be wise and happy is of it felfe good, and to beare the face of an affe indifferent. There is (they fay) a nation of the Aethiopians where a dogge is their king; he is faluted by the stile and name of a king, and hath all honours done unto him, and temples dedicated, as are done unto kings. But men they so be that beare rule and performe those functions and offices which apperteine unto governours of cities and magistrates. Is northis the very case of the Stoicks? for vertue with them hath the name, and carieth the shew and apparence of good, it alone they say, is expetible, profitable, and expedient; but they frame all their actions, they philosophize, they live and die, according to the will, prescript, & commandement as it were of things indifferent. And yet there is not an Aethiopian so hardy as to kill that dog their king; but he sitteth upon a throne under a cloth of estate, and is adored of them in all reverence: but these Stoicks destroy this vertue of theirs, and cause it to perish whiles they are wholly possessed of health and riches. But the corollarie which Chrysppus himselfe, hath for a finiall set unto these their doctrines, easeth me of farther paines, that I need not to stand more upon this point: For whereas (quoth he) there be in nature things good, things bad, and things meane or indifferent; there is no man but hee would chuse rather to have that which is good, than the indifferent, or that which is bad; and to proove the truth hercof, let us take with effe of the very gods, when as we doe crave of them in our praiers and orifons, principally the possession and fruition of good things; if not, yet at leastwife the power and grace to avoid evils; but that which is neither good nor evill, we never defire for to have in flead of good; mary we can be content and with to enjoy it, in lieu of evill. But this Chry/ppu heere inverting and perverting cleane the order of nature, transposeth and 10 transferreth out of the middle place betweene, the meane and indifferent into the last, and reducing the last bringeth it backe into the mids; giving as tyrants doe to wicked persons, the preeminence of fuperior place, with authority and credit unto evill things; enjoining us by order of law, first to seeke for that which is good; secondly, for that which is evill; & last of all to repute that woorft, which is neither good nor evill: as if a man should next unto heaven fet hell, and reject the earth and all the elements about it into the pit of Tartarus beneath:

The gulfe that lies, no man can found. Having then faid in his third booke of Nature: That it is better for a man to live in the state of a foole, yea though henever should become wife, than not to live at all; he added thus much 20 moreover word for word: For fuch are the good things of men, that even the evill things after a fort are preferred before those which are meane and in the mids betweene; not that these go before, but reason, with which jointly to live, availeth more although we should continue sooks all the daies of our life: yea and to be plaine, albeit we should be wicked, unjust, breakers of the lawes, enemies to the gods, and in one word, wretched and unhappie; for all these concurrein those that live sooles. Is it better then to be unhappy, than not unhappie; to suffer harme, tather than not to fuffer harme; to commit injustice, than not to commit injustice; to transgresse the lawes, than not to transgresse the lawes: which is as much to say, as is it fit and expedient to do those things which are not fit and expedient; and beseemeth it to live otherwise than it befeemeth? Yeaforfooth: For worfe it is to bee without reason and senslesse, than to be soolish, 30 What aile they then, and what takes them in the head, that they will not avow and confessethat to be evill, which is woorfe than evill? And why do they affirme that we are to avoid folly alone, if it be meet to flieno leffe, nay rather much more, that disposition which is not capablenot fusceptible of folly? But wherefore should any man be offended and scandalized hereat, if hee call to mind that which this philosopher wrote in his fecond booke of Nature, where he avoicheth: That vice was not made without fome good use and profit, for the whole world? But it will be better to recite this doctrine, even in his owne words, to the end that you may knowin what place they range vice, and what speech they make thereof, who accuse Xenoerates and Speufippus for that they reputed not health to be an indifferent thing, nor riches unprofitable. As for vice (quoth he) it is limited in regard of other accidents beside: for it is also in some fort accor- 40 ding to nature; and if I may fo fay, it is not altogether unprofitable in respect of the whole, for otherwise there would not be any good; and therefore it may be inferred, that there is no good among the gods, in as much as they can have none evil: neither when at any time Jupiter having refolved the whole matter into himselse, shall become one, & shall take away all other differences, wil there be any more good, confidering there will be no evill to be found. But true it is, that in a daunce or quier, there wil be an accord & measure, although there be none in it that singeth out of tune & maketh a discord: as also health in mans body, albeit no part thereof were pained or diseased: but vertue without vice can have no generation. And like as in some medicinable confections there is required the poylon of a viper or fuch like ferpent, and the gall of the beaft Hyana; even so there is another kind of necessarie convenience between the wickednesse of 50 Mehten, and the justice of Socrates; betweene the dissolute demeanor of Cleon, and the honest catriage of Pericles. And what meanes could Jupiter have made, to bring foorth Hercules and Lieurgus into the world, if he had not withall made Sardanapalus and Phalaris for us? And it is a great marvell if they say not also, that the Phthisicke or ulcer of the lungs, was fent among men for their good plight of bodie, and the gout for fwift footmanship: and dehilles hadnot worne long haire, unlesse Thersates had beene bald. For what difference is there betweene those that alledge these doting fooleries or rave so absurdie; and such as say that loosenesse of life and whoredome were not unprofitable for continence; and iniuffice for juffice? So that we had need to pray unto the gods that there might be alwaies finne and wickednes, Falle leasing smooth and glosing tongue, in case when these be gone, vertue depart and perish withal. But will you see now and behold the most elegant devise and pleasantest invention of his? For like as Comædies (quoth he) carrie otherwhiles ridiculous Epigrams or inferiptors, which confidered by themselves, are nothing woorth, howbeit they give a certaine grace to the whole Poeme : even fo, a man may well blame to and detell vice in it felfe, but in regard of others it is not unprofitable. And first to fay that vice was made by the divine providence, even as a lewd Epigram composed by the expresse will of the Poet, surpasseth all imagination of absurditie: for if this were true, how can the gods be the givers of good things, rather than of evill? or how can wickednes any more been emie to the gods, or hated by them? or what shall we have to say and answere to such blasphemous sentences of the Poets, founding foill in religious eares, as these:

God once diffos' à some houseto overthrow. Twixt men some cause and seeds of strife doth sow. Againe:

Which of the gods twixt them did kindle fire, Thus to contest in termes of wrath and ire.

Moreover, a foolish and leawd epigram doth embelish and adorne the Comedie, serving to that end for which it was composed by the Poet, namely, to please the spectatours, and to make them laugh. But Jupiter whom we furnamed, Paternall, Fatherly, Supreame, Sovereigne, Just, Righteous, and according to Pindarus, despreyeas, that is to fay, the best and most perfect artisan, making this world as he hath done, not like unto some great Comedic or Enterlude, full of varietie, skill, and wittie devices, but in maner of a city common to gods and men, for to inhabit together with justice and vertue in one accord and happily, what need had he, to this most holy and venerable end, of theeves, robbers, murderers, homicides, parricides and tyrans? for furely vice and wickednesse was not the entry of some morisque-dance or ridiculous care-sport, carry-30 ing a delectable grace with it and pleasing to God; neither was it set unto the affaires of men for recreation and pastime, to make them sport, or to move laughter, being a thing that carrieth not so much as a shadow, nor representeth the dreame, of that concord and convenience with nature, which is so highly celebrated and commended. Furthermore, the said lewed epigram, is but a small part of the Poeme, and occupieth a very little roome in a Comedie: neither do such ridiculous compositions abound overmuch in a play, nor corrupt and marre the pleasant grace of fuch matters as feeme to have beene well and pretily devifed; whereas all humane affaires are full thorowout of vice: and mans life even from the very first beginning and entrie as it were of the prologue unto the finall conclusion of all and epilogue, yea and to the very plaudite, being difordinate, degenerate, full of perturbation and confusion , and having no one part thereof 40 pure and unblamable, as these men say, is the most filthy unpleasant and odious enterlude of all others, that can be exhibited. And therefore gladly would I demaund and learne of them, in what respect was vice made profitable to this universall world: for I suppose he will not say it was for divine and celestiall things: because it were a mere reciculous mockery to affirme that unlesse there were bred and remained among men vice, malice, avarice, and lesing, or unlesse we robbed, pilled and spoiled, unlesse we slandered and murdered one another, the sun would not run his ordinary course, nor the heaven keepe the set seasons and usual revolutions of time, no yet the earth feated in the midst and center of the world, yeeld the causes of winde and raine. It remaineth then, that vice & fin was profitably engendred for us and for our affaires: and haply this is it which they themselves would seeme to say. And are we indeed the better in health for 50 being finfull? or have wethereby more plenty and aboundance of things necessary? availeth our wickednesse ought to make us more beautifull and better favoured, or serveth it us in any flead to make us more firong and able of body? They answere No. But is this a filent name onely, and a cretaine blinde opinion and weening of these night-walking Sophisters, and not like indeed unto vice which is conspicuous enough & exposed to the view of the whole world, in fuch fort as it is not possible that it should bring any detriment or ought that is unprofitable, and least of all, o good god, of vertue, for which we were borne. And what absurdity were it to fay, that the commodious instruments of the husband man, the mariner or the carter, should ferve their turnes for to attaine unto their purpose and entended end: but that which hathbene created by God for vertue, should corrupt, mar, and destroy vertue? But peradventure it is more than time now, to passe unto some other point, and to let this goe.

Nay I befeech you good fir of all loves and for my fake doe not fo: For I defire to know and understand how these membring in evill things before the good, and vice before vertue.

DIADUMENUS.

You say well, and certes my friend this is a point worth the knowledge: much vaine jangling and printle prattle verily doe these men make, but in the end they come to this conclusion, that reprudence is the science of good things & evil together: for that otherwise it could not standbut must needs altogether fall to the ground: For like as if we admit that there be truth, it cannot otherwise be but that fallity and untruth should be likewise hard by: so it is meet and stands to good reason, that if there be good things, the evill also must have their being.

To grant the one of these not to be amisse said, yet me thinks I see of my selfe, that the other is cleane contrary. For I discerne very well the disterence: because that which is not trueth, must immediatly be saids: but that which is not evill, is not by and by good: For betweene true and saids there is no meane: but betwixt good and evill there is: to wit, indifferent. Neither followeth it necessarily, that both good and evill things should have their substance together, and that 20 sithe one be, the other likewise should ensure. For it may be that nature had good, and required not the evill, so that it might have that which was neither good nor evill. But as touching the former reason, if your Academicks say ought of it. I would gladly heare from your mouth.

DIADUMENUS. Yes mary (quoth he) much there is alledged by them, but for this present relate I will, that which is most necessarie. First and formost, a mere folly it is to thinke that good things and evill have their subfiftence for prudence sake. For contrariwise, when good and evill was before, then prudence followed after: like as phylicke enfued upon things holfome and breeding difeafes, which are supposed to have bene before. For surely the good and the evill came not up nor were brought forth, to the end that there should be prudence; but that faculty or power whereby 30 we judge and discerne betweene evill and good is called prudence: like as the fight is a sense which lerveth to diftinguish blacke from white, which colours had not their being first, to the end that we should have our seeing, but contrariwise need we had of our seeing for to discerne the faid colours. Secondly when the world in that generall conflagration, which they hold and talke of, 'fhall be all on a light fire and burnt, 'there will remaine behind nothing that evill is, but all shall then be wife and prudent : And therefore confesse they must, will they nill they, that there is prudence although there be no evill, neither is it necessary, that if wildome be, evillalso should have a being. But fay it were absolutely so, that prudence were the science of evill and good, what harme or abfurdity would follow, if upon the abolifhing & annulling of evill things there were no prudence any more, but some other vertue in lieuthereof, which were not the 40 science of evill and good together, but onely of good? Like as among colours, if the blacke were quite perished and gone for ever, who will force us to confesse that the sense of seeing is likewise lost? And who would impeach or debarre us for saying that fight is not the sense of differning blacke and white: Surely if any man would force upon us the contrary, what inconvenience and abfurdity were there to answere him thus, Sir if we have not that sense that you fpeake of, yet we have another sense and naturall power insteed of it, whereby we apprehend colours that be white and not white. And verily for mine owne part I doe not thinke that if there were no bitter things in the world, our tafte should be therefore utterly lost, or the sense of seeling in cafe all dolour and paine were gone: no moream I perswaded that prudence should be abolifhed, if all evil were rid out of the way. But like as those senses would remaine to appre-50 hend fweet favours and pleafant objects of feeling, fo this prudence also would continue to be the sciences of things good and not good. As for thosewho are of another opinion, let them take the name to themselves, so they leave us the thing indeed. But over and besides all this, what should hinder us to fay, that the evill is in cogitation and intelligence; but good in reality and essence ? like as, I suppose the gods enjoy the reall presence of health, where as they have the intelligence of the fever and pleurifie: confidering that we also, albeit we were pessed with all the evils in the world, and had no affluence at all of good things as these men say, yet we want not the understanding what is prudence, what is good and what is selicity.

And this is a woonderfull thing, if there being no vertue prefent, yet fome there are who teach what vertue is, and enforme us in the comprehension thereof; whereas if there were no fuch thing, it is impossible to have the intelligence of it; for doe but consider what they would perfivade us to, who reason philosophically against common conceptions, namely, That by foolifhnesse and ignorance, wee comprehend wisdome and prudence; but prudence without follie and ignorance, cannot conceive so much, as ignorance it selfe. And if nature had necesfarily need of the generation of evill, certes, one example or two at the most of evill were suffito cient; or if you will have it fo, requifit it was that there should be brought foorth ten wicked persons, or a thousand, or ten thousand, and not such an infinit multitude of vices, as the sands of the fea, the dust, or the feathers of divers plumed birds, could not affoord so great a number: but of vertue not so much as a bare dreame or vaine vision. They that were the wardens and maflers at Lacedamon, of those publike halles or dining places called Phiditia, were woont to bring foorth and shew openly unto their youth, two or three of their flaves called Helot a, full of wine, and starke drinken, that they might know thereby, what a shamefull and foule thing it was tobe drunken, and fo take heed of that vice, and learne to be fober. But in this life there be many fuch examples of vice in our actions; for there is not fo much as one fober unto vertue, but we all trip and stumble, nay we wander as if our braines turned round about, living shamefully in 20 milery; and so farre foorth are we intoxicate with our owne reason and selfe conceit, filled with fo great perturbation and folly, that wee may be well and fully likened to those dogs which as despote tels the tale, seeing certeine skinnes floting above the water, gaped so greedily for to have them, that they would needs drinke up all the sea before them, for to be sure of the said skinnes; but ere they could come by them, they drunke fo much as they burft againe: and even we hoping by reason to acquire glory and reputation, and thereby to attaine unto vertue, are spoiled, marred, and destroied therewith, before we can reach thereunto, being before hand loden with a mighty deale of meere, heady, and bitter vice, if it be fo, as these men give it our, that even they who have made good progreffe and proceeded to the end, feele for all that no eale, no alteration, no remission or breathing time at all from folly and inselicity. But marke I 30 pray againe, how he who faith, that vice was not produced and brought foorth into the world unprofitably, depainteth it unto you what maner of thing hee describeth it to be, and what an heritage it is for him who hath it ? For in his treatife of Duties or Offices he faith: That the vicious and finfull person, hath no want nor need of any thing; that nothing is profitable, nothing meet and convenient for him. How then is vice commodious, wherewith neither health it felfe is expedient, nor store of money, ne yet advancement and promotion? And hath a man no need of those things, whereof some are precedent, preeminent, and to be preferred, yea, and believe me, very profitable and commodious; others according to nature, as they themselves terme them? And of all these doeth no man finde need, unlesse he become wise? And so by this reckoning, hath the leawd and foolish man no need to become wise; neither be men thirsty 40 or hungry, before they are made wife? So that if they be dry, have they no need of water, nor if hungry, bread?

Refembling right those gentle guests, who nought else did require,
Eut under rouse to shrowd their heads, andwarme themselves at fire.
And so belike he had no need of covert nor of mantell, who said:

Give Hipponax a cloke his corps to fold, For why, I shake and shiver hard for cold?

But will you pronounce a paradox indeed, fuch an one as is extravagant and fingular by it selfer 50 Say hardly then; That a wife man wanteth nought, and hath need of nothing; he is rich, he is full and fortunate, he is of himfelfe sufficient, blessed, happy, & every way absolute. But what a dizzinesse & giddinessed of the braine is this to say; That he who is indigent of nothing, yet hath need of the good things which he hath; and that the lewd and vicious person is indigent of many things, and yet needeth nothing? for this is the very affertion which Cbrysspa holdesh: That wicked persons have no need, and yet are indigent, tutling, shifting, and transposing the common notions, like unto cockall bones or chessemen upon the boord. For all men deeme thus, that to have need, goeth before indigence, supposing him that standeth in need of things which are not ready at hand, nor easie to be gotten, is indigent. To make this more plaine, no man is faid to be indigent of homes or of wings, for that he hath no need of them; but we fay truly and properly, that fome have need of armour, of monie, and of apparell, when in the penury and want of these things, they neither have them nor can come by them, to supply their necesfity. But these Stoicks are so desirous to be thought alwaies for to broch somewhat against common sense and conception, that many times they forget themselves and slip out of their owne proper opinions, so much affected they are and given to new conceits; like as in this place, if you please to cast your cie unto Chrysippus, and looke somewhat behinde, calling to minde what hath heeretofore beene delivered.

This is one of his politions, affirmed even against common sense, and vulgar opinion, that 10 no evill and foolish man can finde good and profit by any thing; and yet many of them by institution and teaching, proceed forward and profit; many who were flaves, become enfranchized; befieged, are delivered; drunken, are guided and lead by the hand; ficke and difeafed, are cured of their maladies: but for all this forfooth, they are never the better what foever is done unto them; no benefits they receive, no benefactours they have, no nor neglect those who deferve well of them: and fo vicious persons are not unthankfull, no more than are good and wife men. And thus ingratitude is not at all, nor hath any being; for that the good never intervert, nor micognize the favour and benefit which they have received; and the wicked are capable of none at all. But fee (I pray you) what shift they make to falve & answer all this: They say (forfooth) that grace, favour, or benefit is ranged in the number of meane things: and that to 20 helpe or be helped, apperteineth onely to the wife. True it is fay they, that wicked receive also a grace or benefit. What is that? Those who have part in a benefit, have not they also a part of use and commodity? and whereto a grace or benefit reacheth, doth nothing that is commodious and convenient, extend thither? And is there ought elfe that maketh a demerit or pleafine done to be a grace, than that the party who doth the pleasure should in some respect be commodious unto the needy receiver?

LAMPRIAS.

Bur let these matters passe, and tell us what is that ditarie, that is to say, utility, which they prife to highly, and whereof they make to great account? DIADUMENUS.

This is a thing (I may tell you) which they referve and keepe as a great matter and a fingula. 30 ritie for their Sages onely, and yet leave them not fo much as the name of it. If one wife man, fay they, do but put forth his finger prudently, wherefoever it be, all the wife men that are in the whole continent and habitable world find this operate and utility by it. This is the onely gift and worke of the amity that is among them, and in this doe determine and end the vertues of wife men, namely, the entercourse of common profit and utility, passing to and fro betweene them. As for Ariforle, he doted, Xenocrates also doted, who taught and affirmed that men had helpe from the gods, helpe from their parents, and helpe by ther teachers and scholemasters: butnever understood they this wonderfull helpe and commoditie, which these wise men receive one from another, when they be moved to vertue, although they be not together, no nor fo much as 40 know one another. And verily all men do thinke, that to gather, to lay up, to keepe, to difpense and beltow, is condrucible and profitable, when there is received profit and commodity by fuch things. And a good substantial housholder buyes himselfe locks and keies, he keepeth hiscellars, his closets and coffers,

Taking great joy his chamber doore with hand for to unlocke, Where lies of golde and silver both, his treasure and his stocke.

But to gather and lay up, to keepe with great care, diligence and paine, those things which are for nothing profitable, is neither honourable, nor yet feemly and honest. If then us to raught by Circe to make that fast knot, had with it tied fure and sealed up as it were, not the gifts of and prefents which Alcinous gave him, to wit, trefeets, pots, plate clothes, apparell and gold; but fonce trash, as flicks, stones and other pelferaked together, thinking it a great felicity for him to poll-fie and keepe charily such riffe-raffe and trumperie: who would have praised and commended him for it, or imitated this foolifh forecast, witlesse, providence, and vaine diligence? And yet this is the goodly and beautifull honefly of the Stoicks profession in generall, this is their honourable gravity, this is their beatitude; and nothing els is it, but an heaping up, akeeping and preferving of things unprofitable and indifferent. For such be those which they say are according to nature; and much more those outward matters; for almuch as sometime they compare the greatest riches with fringes and chamber-pots of golde, yea and (I affore you) otherwhiles as it falleth out, with oile cruets. And aftewards, like as those who thinke they have most infolently and proudly abused with blasphemous words and polluted the temples, the facred ceremonies and religious fervices of fome gods or divine powers, prefently change their note, and become penitent persons, and falling downe prostrate, or sitting humbly below upon the ground, bleffe and magnifie the heavenly power of the Godhead; even fo they, as incurring the vengeance and plague of God for their prefumptuous follies, arrogant and vaine speeches, to are found puddering and raking againe in these indifferent things, nothing indeed pertinent unto them; fetting out a throat and crying as loud as they can, what a gay matter, what a goodly and honourable thing it is, to gather and lay up fuch commodities, and especially the communion and fellowship of enjoying and using them : also that who soever want the same, and cannot come by them, have no reason to live any longer; but either to lay violent hands on themselves, or by long fasting and abstinence from all viands, to thorten their lives, bidding vertue farewell for ever. And these men verily, howsoever they repute Theognis to be a man altogether of a base and abject minde, for faying thus in verse, themselves meane while in profe give these exhortations, and say, that to avoid a grievous maladie, and eleape exceeding paine, a man ought (if he had not a fword or dagger neere at hand, nor apoisoned cup of hemlocke) to cast himselse into the sea, or els fall headlong and breake his necke from some steeperocke: yet affirme they, that neither the one nor the other is hurtfull, evill or unprofitable; nor maketh those miserable, who fall into such accidents. Whence then shall I begin (quothhe) what ground-worke and foundation of ducty shall I lay, or what shall I make the fubject and matter of vertue, leaving nature, and abandoning that which is according to nature? And whereat (I pray you, good fir) begin Aristotle and Theophrastus? what princi-30 plestake Xenocrates and Polemon? And even Zeno himfelfe, hath he not followed them, in suppoling Nature and that which is according to Nature, for to be the elements of felicitie? But thefe great clerks verily, rested here in these things, as eligible, expetible, good and profitable; adjoining moreover unto them, vertue, which emploieth the same, and worketh by ech of them according to their proper use; thinking in so doing, to accomplish a perfect and entire life, and to confummate that concord and agreement which is in trueth fortable and confonant unto Nature. For they made no confused mith-mash, nor were contrary to themselves, as those who leape and mount on high from the ground, and immediatly fall downe upon it againe, and in naming the fame things, meet to be chosen, and yet not expetible; proper and convenient, and withall not good; unprofitable, and yet fit for good uses; nothing at all pertinent unto us, 40 and yet for footh, the very principles of ducties and offices. But looke what was the speech of thelenoble and famous personages, the same also was their life; their deeds (I say) were answerable and conformable to their words. Contrariwife, the feet of these Stoicks, doth according to that craftie woman whom Archilochus describeth, to cary water in the one hand, and fire in the other: for in some of their doctrines and affertions they receive and admit nature, in another they reject her: or to speake more plainly; in their acts and deeds they adhere and cleave unto those things which are according to nature, as being eligible and simply good; but in their disputations and discourses they refuse and condemne the same as things indifferent and nothing available to vertue for the acquiring of felicitie: nay, that which woorfe is, they give her hard and reprochfull tearmes. And for almuch as all men generally are perswaded in their so minds, that the fovereigne good is a thing joious, exoptable, happie, most honourable, and of greatest dignitie, sufficient of it selfe, and wanting nothing. See now this sovereigne good of theirs, and examine it according to this common opinion: To put forth ones finger like a fage and wife Philosopher, doth this make that joious good? or what exoptable thing I pray you, is a prudent torture? who casteth himselfe downe headlong from an high rocke, so he do it with a colour of reason and honesty, is he happy and fortunate? is that most honourable and of grearest price and dignity, which reason many times chuseth to reject, for another thing that of it felse is not good? is that all-sufficient in it selse, accomplished and perfect, which who so ever do presently injoy, if haply they can not obteine withall, some one of these indifferent things, they will not deigne to live any longer? was there ever knowen any discourse or disputation wherein use and ordinary custome suffered more outrage and abuse, which stealing and plucking from it the true and naturall conceptions, as legitimate children of her owne, putteth in the place, baftards, changelings, of amonthrous and favage kinde, and confirmenth it to love, cherifh and keepe them in lieu of the other? And thus have they done in treating of good things and evill, expetible and to be avoided, proper and strange; which ought to have been more cleerely and plainly diftinguished, than hot from colde, or white colours from blacke. For the apprehensions and conceits of these qualities, are from withoutforth brought in by the senses naturall; but the other are within vs, taking their originall from those good things that we have within us, 10 Now these men entring into the question and common place of sovereigne felicity, with their Logicke subtilities, as if they were to handle the lying sophisme called Pfeudomenos; or that masterfull maner of reasoning named Kyrtton, have not solved one of the doubts and questions which there were, but mooved and raifed an infinite number of others that were not there beforc.

Moreover, there is no man who knoweth not that there being two forts of good things; the one which is the very utmost end, and the other, the meanes to attaine thereto: the one is more excellent and perfect of the twaine. And Chrysippus himselse knoweth well enough this difference, as it may appeare by that which he hath written in his third booke of Good things: for he disagreeth with those who are of opinion, that the end or sovereigne good, is science; and 20 putted this downe in his treatife of Juftice: If there be any who supposeth that pleasure is the end of good things, hee thinketh not that justice can be safe; if not the finallend, but simply good and no more, he is of another minde. Ido not thinke that you would heare me at this prefent to rehearfe his owne words, for his third booke as touching Justice, is extant and to be had everywhere. When as they fay therefore (my friend) elsewere, that no good thing is greater or leffe than another, but that the finall end is equall with that which is not the end, and no better than it, it is evident that they be contrary and repugnant not onely to the common notions, but also to their owne very words. And againe, if of two evils, the one maketh us woorsethan we were when it came unto us; and the other hurteth us indeed, but maketh vs not woorfe: that evillin mine opinion is the greater which maketh us worfe: neither doth that more hurr, which causeth us not to be the woorse. And Chrysippus verily consesseth, that there be certeine searcs, forrowes and deceitful illusions, which well may hurt and offend us, but not make us woorse. But reade over and perufe the first of those books which are written against Plato, as concerning Justice: for in respect of other causes, it were very well done and worth your labour, to note the frivolous babling in that place of this man, where he makes no spare to deliver all matters and doctrines whatfoever indifferently, even those aswell of his owne sect as of other strangers, flat opposit to common sense: as for example, That it is lawfull to propose two ends and two fcopes of our life, and not to referre all that ever we do unto one end. And yet more than that, is this also a common notion, That the end verily is one, but every thing that is done, ought to have a relation to another; and yet of necessitie, they must abide the one or the other. For if 40 the first things according to nature be not expetible for themselves and the last end; but rather the reasonable election and choise of them; and if every man doth what lies in him, to have and obteine those things which are first according to nature, and all actions and operations have their reference thither, namely, to acquire and enjoy the principall things according to nature: if (Ifay) they thinke fo, it must needs be that without aspiring and aiming for to get and atteine those things, they have another end to which they must referre the election and choise of the faid things, and not the things themselves: for thus will be the end, even to know how to chuse them well and to take them wifely; but the things themselves and the enjoying of them, will be of small moment, being as a matter and subject which hath the dignity and estimation : for thus 50 I suppose they use and put downe in writing this very word to shew the difference.

Certes you have passing well and woorthily reported unto us, both what they say, and how they deliver it.

DIADUMENUS.

But marke I befeech you, how they fare like unto those who will needs streine themselves to leape over and beyond their owne shadow; for they leave not behinde, but carie evermore with them some absurdity in their speech, and the same farre remote alwaies from common fense: for as if one should say, That an archer doeth all that lieth in him, not to hit the marke, butto doe all that ever he can; he might be justly taken for a man, who spake anigmatically & by darke riddles, and uttered strange and prodigious words: even so doe these old dotting fooles, who with all their power endevour to maintaine, that to obteine the things according to nature, is not the end of aiming and aspiring to things according to nature; but for sooth to take and chuse them; and that the defire of health and seeking after it in any man, endeth not in health of ech one, but contrariwife, that health is referred to the appetite and feeking after it: faying moreover, that to walke, to read, or speake aloud, to endure sections or incisions, yea and to take purging medicines, so all be done by reason, are the ends of health, and not it, the 10 end of those meanes. Certes, these men dote, rave, & speake idly, as well as they who should fay; let me goe to supper, that we may facrifice, bath, or sweat in the stough. Nay (that which more is) that which these men say, perverteth order and cultome, and conteineth a confusion, shufling & turning upfide downe of all our affaires whatfoever: We study not say they, to walke in due time, for toconcoct & digeft our meats well; but we concoct and digeft our meat, because we might walke in due feason. Why? Hath nature given us health for Ellebore, or rather brought foorth Ellebor for health sike? For what could be uttered more strange and absurd, than such propositions as thefer and what difference is there betweene him who faith, that health was made for medicinable drogues, and not drogues medicinable for health? and another who holdeth, that the gathering, the choife, the composition and use of such medicines, is to be preferred before 20 health it felfe? or rather he thinks that health is not in any respect expetible; but hee setteth downe the very end in the penning and handling of those medicines, affirming for footh that appetite is the end of fruition, and not fruition of appetite: And why not (quoth he) all while there be added thereto these termes; considerately and with reason. True will we say againe, if aman have regard unto the obteining and enjoying of the thing which he purfueth; for otherwish that consider a te reason is to no purpose, in case all be done for to obtaine that, the fruition whereof is neither honorable nor happy.

And fince we are fallen upon this discourse, a man may fay, that any thing else whatsoever, is according to common fense rather, than to hold, that without having notice or conception 10 of good, a man may defire and pursue after it; for you see how Chrysppus himselfe driveth Ariflorinto these streights, as to imagine and dreame of a certaine indifference in things tending to that which is neither good nor ill, before that the faid good and ill is sufficiently knowen and understood; for so it might seeme that this indifference must needs subsist before if it be so, that a man cannot conceive the intelligence of it, unlesse the good were first understood, which isnothing elfe but the onely and foveraigne good indeed.

DIADUMENUS.

But confider I pray you, and marke now this indifference *taken out of the Stocks schoole, * inpublish. and which they call outhorian, after what maner, and whereby it hath given us the meane to ima-not appears. gine and conceive in our minde that good? for if without the faid good, it is not possible to 40 conceive and imagine the indifference respective to that which is not good; much leffe the intelligence of good things yeeldeth any cogitation unto them, who had not before fome prenotion of the good. But like as there is no cogitation, of the art of things which be holfome or breeding fickneffe in them who had not a precogitation before of those things: even so it is impossible for them to conceive the science of good and evill things, who had no fore conceit whatwere good and what were evill? What then is good? nothing but prudence; and what is Prudence, nothing but science: and so according to that old common proverbe * Data Kieger Pers, * A by word that is to fay, Jupiters Corinth; is oftentimes applied unto their maner of reasoning. For let which noteth be I pray you, the turning of the pestill round about, because you may not be thought to scoffe the paralogical property of the paralogical pr and laugh at them, although in trueth their fpeech is much after that maner; for it feemeth that in arguing, 50 for the intelligence of good, one hath need to understand prudence: & againe, to seeke for pru-called Paint deuce in the intelligence of good; being driven to purfue the one alwaies for the other, and so as do the to faile both of the one and the other, which implieth a meere contrariety, in that we must alturning also waies understand the thing before, which cannot be understood apart. Befides, there is another of the pession way, whereby aman may perceive and see, not the perversion and distortion, but the very everthe morter, fion and destruction of all their reasons.

They hold that the very substance of good, is the reasonable and considerate election of that which is according to nature; now this election is not confiderate which is directed to some end, as is before faid: And what is this? Nothing else fay they, but to discourse with reason in the elections of those things which be according to nature. First and formost then, the conception of the soveraigne good, is perithed and cleane gone; for this considerate discoursing in elections, is an operation depending of the habitude of good discourse; and therefore being compelled to conceive this habitude from the end, and the end not without it, we come short of the intelligence of the both. And againe, that which yet is more, by all the reason in the world, it must needs be that the said reasonable and considerate election, was the election of things good, profitable, and cooperant to the atteining of the end. For to chuse such things, which be neither expedient, nor honourable, nor yet any way eligible; how can it stand with reason: for suppose it were as they say; that the end were a reasonable election of things which have to some dignity and worthinesse, making unto felicitie. See Theseech you how their discourse and disputation ariseth unto a trim point and goodly conclusion in the end: For the end (say they) is the good discourse, in making choise of those things which have dignity, making unto happinesse. Now when you heare these words, thinke you not my good friend, that this is a very strange and extravagant opinion?

LAMPEIAS.

Yes verily; but I would willingly know, how this hapneth?

Then must you lay your care close, and harken with great attention, for it is not for every one to conceive this anigmaticall riddle: But heare you sir, and make me answer: Is not the 20 end by their saying, the good discourse in elections according to nature?

DIADUMENUS.

That is their faying.

LAMPRIAS.

And thefe things which be according to nature, they chuse (doe they not) as good, or having some dignities and preferences inducing to the end, or to some other thing else.

Diadumenus.

I thinke not fo : but furely, to the end.

LAMPRIAS

Having discovered thus much already, see now to what point they are come, namely, that 30 their end is to discourse well of selicity.

DIADUMENUS.

They say directly, that they neither have nor conceive any other thing of selicity, but this precious rectitude of discourse touching the elections of things that are of worth. Howbeit some there be who say that all this refutation is directed against Antipater alone, and not the whole seed of the Stoicks, who perceiving himselfe to be urged & hardly pressed by Carneades, fell into these vanities and soolith shifts for his evasion.

Moreover, as touching that which is discoursed and taught in the Stoicks schoole, Of Love, ven against common notions, it concernethall the Supposts in generall of that sect, who have every one of them their hand in the abfurdity thereof: for they avouch that yong youths, are 40 foule and deformed, if they be vicious and foolish: but the wife onely are beautifull: and yet of these that are thus faire and beautifull, there was never any one yet either beloved, or lovely and amiable. And yet this is not so absurd: but they say moreover, that such as are in love with those who be foule, cease to love them when they are become faire. And who hath ever seene or knowen fuch a kinde of love which should kindle and shew it selfe presently upon the discovery of the bodies deformity and the foules vice: and incontinently, be quenched and vanish away after the knowledge of passing beauty, together with justice and temperance? And verily such I fuppose doe properly resemble these gnats, which love to settle upon vineger, source wine or the fome thereof: but the good and pleasant potable wine they care not for but flie from it. As for that emphaticall apparence of beauty (for that is the terme they give it) which they fay is the al-50 luring & attractive bait of love: first and formost it carieth no probability with it nor likelihood of reason. For in those who are most soule and wicked in the highest degree there can be no fuch emphaticall apparence of that beauty: in case it be so as they say that the leawdnesse of maners the weth in the face and infecteth the vilage: for there be fome of them who expound this strange position as strangly, saying that a foule person is worthy to be loved, because there is some hope and expectance that one day he will become faire: mary when he hath gotten this beauty once, and is withall become good and honest, then he is beloved of no man. For love fay they, is a certaine hunting as it were after a yong body, as yet rude and unperfect, howbeir framed by nature unto vertue.

LAMPRIAS.

And what other thing do we now, my good friend, but refute the errors of their feet, who do thus force, pervert and deftroy all our common conceptions with their actions which be fenseless, and their words and termes as unusuall and strange? For there was no person to hinder this love of wise men toward yong folke if affection were away: although all men and women to, both thinke and imagin love to be such a passion, as the woers of Penelope in Homer seems packnowledge, o Whose heat of love was such that in their hart They wish in bed to lie with her apars.

Like as Jupiter also said to Juno in another place of the said poet:

Come let monow to be a both goe, and there with sweet delight Solaceour selves: for never earst before remember I

That any love to women faire no nor to Goddeffe bright

Thustam'dmy hart, or prict me so, with them to company.

Thus you fee how they expell and drive morall philosophy into such matters as these, Somrieate and tortwow,

So winding quite throughout That nothing found is therein found,

But all turnes round about. And yet they deprave vilipend, difgrace and flour all others, as if they were the men alone who reflored nature and custome into their integrety as it ought to be, instituted their speech accordingly: But nature of it selfe doth divert and induce, by appetitions, pursuits inclinations and impulsions, ech thing to that which is proper and fit for it. And as for the custome of Logicke being so wrangling and contentious as it is, it receiveth no good at all nor profit : like as the eare diseased by vaine sounds is filled with thickenesse and hardnesse of hearing. Of which it youthinke fo good we will begin anew and discourse else were another time: but now for this 30 present let us take in hand to run over their naturall philosophy, which no lesse troubleth and confoundeth common anticipations and conceptions in the maine principles and most important points, than their morall doctrine as touching the ends of all things. First and formost this is apparently abfurd and against all common sense, to say, that a thing is, & yet hath no beingnor effence: and the things which are not, yet have a being: which though it be most abfurd, they affirme even of the univerfall world: for putting downe this supposition that there is round about the faid world a certaine infinit voidnesse, they affirme that the universall world is neither body nor bodileffe: whereupon enfueth that the world is, and yet hath no existence. For they call bodies onely, existent : for as much as it is the property of a thing existent, to doe and fuffer somewhat: And seeing this universall nature hath no existence; therefore it shall nei-40 ther doe nor fuffer ought: neither shall it be in any place, for that which occupieth place is a bodie, but that universall thing is not a body. Moreover that which occupieth one and the same place is faid to remaine and rest: and therefore the faid universall nature doth not remaine, for that it occupieth no place: and that which more is, it mooveth not at all, first because that which mooveth ought to be in a place and roome certaine. Againe, because what soever mooveth, cither mooveth it felfe, or elfe is mooved by another: now that which mooveth it felfe, hath certeine inclinations either of lightnesse or ponderosity: which ponderosity and lightnesse, be either certeine habitudes, or faculties & powers, or else differences of ech body: but that universaand fo by good confequence hath in it no principle or beginning of motion; neither shall it so be mooved of another, for without & beyond it there is nothing; so that they must be forced to say, as they doe indeed, that the said universall nature doth neither rest normoove. In sum, for that according to their opinion, we must not say in any case that it is a body, and yet the heaven, the earth, the suring creatures, plants, men and stones bebodies: that which is no body it selfe shall by these reckonings have parts thereof, which are bodies and that which is not pronderous, shall have parts weightie, and that which is not light; shall have parts light: which is as much against common sense and conceptions, as dreames are not more; considering that there is nothing so evident and agreeable to common sense than this distinction, If any thing be not a lity, is no body: whereupon it must of necessity follow that the same is neither light nor heavy,

nimate, the fame is inanimate: and againe, if a thing be not inanimate, the fame is animate. And yet this manifest evidence they subvert and overthrow, affirming thus as they do, that this univerfal frame is neither animate nor inanimate. Over and befides, no man thinketh or imaginorth that the fame is unperfect, confidering that there is no part thereof wanting: and yet they holde it to be unperfect : For (say they) that which is perfect, is finite and determinate; but the whole and univerfall world, for the infinitenesse thereof is indefinite. So by their faying, fomething there is, that is neither perfect not unperfect. Moreover, neither is the faid univerfall frame apart, because there is nothing greater than it; nor yet the whole: for that which is whole, must be affirmed likewise to be digested and in order; whereas being as it is, infinite, it is indeterminate and out of order. Furthermore, 7 he other, is not the cause of the universall 10 world, for that there is no other beside it; neither is it the cause of Theother, nor of it selfe, for that it is not made to do any thing : and we take a cause to be that which worketh an effect, Now fet case we should demand of all the men in the world, what they imagine Nothing to be, and what conceit they have of it, would they not fay (thinke you) that it is that which is neither a cause it selfe, nor hath any cause of it; which is neither a part, nor yet the whole; neither perfect nor unperfect; neither having a foule, nor yet without a foule; neither moving nor stil & quiet, nor substitting; and neither body nor without body? For what is all this, but Nothing? yer, what all others do affirme and verifie of Nothing, the fame doe they alone of the universall world: so that it feemeth they make All and Nothing, both one. Thus they must be driven to say, that Time is nothing, neither Prædicable, nor Proposition, nor Connexion, nor Composition, 20 which be termes of Logicke, that they nfe, no Philosophers so much; and yet they say, that they have no existence nor being. But (that which more is) they holde that Trueth, although it be, yet it hath no being nor subsistence, but is comprehended onely by intelligence, is perceptible and beleeved, although it have no jote of effence. How can this be falved and faved, but that it must surpasse the most monstrous absurdity that is ? But because it may not be thought that all this smelleth overmuch of the quirks and difficulties in Logicke, let us treat of those which are more proper unto Naturall philosophie. Forasmuch therefore, as they themselves give out, they of all men especially ought to have reformed, rectified redressed 30 and reduced to the best order, the common conceptions of men as touching the Gods, is haply there had crept into them any errour and perplexed doubt; or if not so, yet at least wife, to have let every man alone, and left them to the opinion which the lawes and customes of the countreys wherein they were borne, prescribed unto them as touching religion and divinitie.

For neither now nor yesterday These deepe conceits of God began, Time out of minds, they have beene ay, But no man knowes, where, how, nor whan.

But these Stoicks having begunne even from the domesticall goddesse Pessa date proverbe saith) to alter and change the opinion established and received in every countrey, touching re-soligion and the beliefe of God, they have not left so much as one conceit or cogitation that way found, syncere and incorrupted. For where is or ever was the man, besides themselves, who doth not conceive in his minde, that God is immortall and eternall? what is more generally acknowledged in our common conceptions as touching the Gods, or what is pronounced with more affent and accord than such sentences as these?

In heavenly blisse, without annoy.
Also,
In heaven the Gods immort all ever be:
On earth below, poor emort all men walke we.
Againc,
Exempt from all diseose and crasse age,
The Gods do live in joy, and paine seele none:
They seare no death nor dread the darke passage.

Over the Frith of rearing Acheron.

There may peradventure be found fome barbarous and favage nations, who thinke of no God at all; but never was there man having a conception and imagination of God, who efteemed him him not withall to be immortall and everlafting. For even these vile wretches called 3360, that isto say, Atheists, fitch as Diagoras, Theodorus, and Hippon, godleffe though they were, could never finde in their hearts to fay and pronounce, That God was corruptible. Onely, they could not believe and be perswaded in their minde, that there was any thing in the world not subject to corruption. Thus howloever they admitted not a subsistence of immortality & incorruptibility, yet reteined they the common anticipation of the Gods: but Chrysppus & Cleanthes, having made the heaven, the earth, the aire and fea to ring againe, as a man would fay, with their words, and filled the whole world with their writings of the Gods, yet of so many Gods, they make not one immortall, but Jupiter onely; and in him they fpend and confume all the rest : fo to that this propertie in him, to refolve and kill others, is never a jote better, than to be refolved and destroied himselfe. For as it is a kinde of infirmitie, by being changed into another for todie; to it is no leffe imbecillitie to be mainteined and nourished by the resolution of others into it felfe. And this is not like to many other abfurdities collected and gathered by consequence out of their fundamentall suppositions, or inferred upon other affertions of theirs; but even they themselves crie out with open mouth expresly in all their writings, of the gods, of providence, of destiny and nature, that all the gods had a beginning of their effence, and shall perish and have an end by fire, melted and resolved, as if they were made of waxe or tinne. So that to fay that a man is immortall, and that God is mortall, is all one, and the one as abfurd and against common sense as the other: nay rather I cannot see what difference 20 there will be betweene a man and God, in case God be defined, a reasonable animall, and corrapible: for if they oppose and come in with this their fine and subtile distinction, that man in deed is mortall, but God not mortall, yet subject to corruption; marke what an inconvenience doth follow and depend thereupon: for of necessity they must say, either that God is immortall and corruptible withall; or elfeneither mortall nor immortall: then which a man can not (if he would of purpose study for it) devise a more strange and monstrous absurdity. I speake this by other; for that these men must be allowed to say any thing, neither have there escaped their tongues and pens, the most extravagant opinions in the world.

Moreover Cleanthes minding still to fortific and confirme that burning and conflagration of his, faith: That the funne will make like unto himfelfe, the moone with all other starres, and 30 turne them into him. But that which of all others is most monstrous, the moone and other starres, being for footh gods, worke together with the funne, unto their owne destruction, and conferre somewhat to their owne inflammation. Now surely this were a very mockerie, and ridiculous thing for us to powre out our praiers and orasons unto them for our owne safety, and to repute them the faviours of men, if it be kinde and naturall for them to make hafte unto their owne corruption and diffolution. And yet these men cease not by all the meanes they can to infultover Epicurus, crying, Fie, fie for shame, & redoubling, Outupon him, for that by denying the divine providence, he troubled & confounded the general prenotion and conception in our minds of the gods; for that they are held and reputed by all men, not onely immortall and happy, but also humane and benigne, having a carefull eie, and due regard to the good and welfare 40 ofmen, as in trueth they have. Now if they who take away the providence of God, doe with all abolish the common prenotion of men as touching God; what doe they then, who avouch that the gods indeed have care of us; but yet are helpefull to us in nothing, neither give they us any good things, but such onely as be indifferent; not enduing us with vertue, but bestowing upon ustiches, health, procreation of children, and fuch like, of which there is not one profitable, expedient, eligible or availeable. Is it not certeine that these over throw the common conceptions that are of the gods? neither rest they heere, but fall to flouting, frumping, and scotling, whiles they give out that there is one god, furnamed Emissions, that is to say, the superintendent over the fruits of the earth; another produces, that is to fay, the patron of generation; anothe thran, was, that is to fay, the protectour of plants; another much, and warmers, that is to fay, 50 the prefident of physicke and divination; meane while neither is health simply good, nor generation, ne yet fertilitie of the ground and abundance of fruits, but indifferent, yea and unprofitable to those who have them.

The third point of the comon conception of the gods is, that they differ in nothing so much from then, as in selicity and vertue: but according to Chrysppen, they are in this respect nothing superior to men: for he holdeth, that for vertue superior is no better than Dion; also that superior to men in the holdeth, that for vertue superior is no better than Dion; also that superior to men; and then wise, doe equally and reciprocally helpe one another: for this is the good that the gods doe unto men, and men likewise unto the gods, namely, when they proove wife and prudent, and not otherwife. So that if a man be no leffe vertuous, he is not leffe happy; infomuch as he is equall unto Jupiter the faviour in felicitie, though otherwise infortunate. and who for grievous maladies and dolorous difmembring of his body, is forced to make himfelfe away, and leave his life, provided alwaies that he be a wife man. Howbeit, such an one there neither is nor ever hath bene living upon the earth: whereas contrariwife infinit thousands and millions there are and have beene of miserable men and extreme infortunate under the rule and dominion of Jupiter, the government & administration wherof is most excellent. And what can there be more against common sense, than to say, that Jupiter governing and dispensing all things paffing well, yet we should be exceeding miserable? If therefore (which unlawfull is once to speake) Jupiter would no longer be a faviour, nor a deliverer, nor a protectour, and sur- 10 named thereupon Soier, Lyfius, and Alexicacos, but cleane contrary unto these goodly and beautifull denominations, there can not possibly be added any more goodnesse to things that be, either in number or magnitude as they fay; whereas all men live in the extremitie of miserie and wickednesse, considering that neither vice can admit no augmentation, nor misery addition: and yet this is not the woorst nor greatest absurdity : but mightily angry and offended they are with Menander for speaking as he did thus bravely in open theater:

I hold, good things exceeding meane degree,

The greatest cause of humane miserie. For this (fay they) is against the common conception of men; meane while themselves make God, who is good and goodnesse it selfe, to be the author of evils: for matter could not verily 20 produce any evill of it felfe, being as it is without all qualities; and all those differences and varicties which it hath, it received of that which moved and formed it, to wit, reason within, which giveth it a forme and shape, for that it is not made to moove and shape it selfe. And therefore it cannot otherwise be, but that evill if it come by nothing, should proceed and have being from that which is not; or if it come by some mooving cause, the same must be God. For if they thinke that Jupiter hath no power of his owne parts, nor uleth ech one according to his owne proper reason; they speake against common sense, and doe imagine a certeine animall, whereof many parts are not obeifant to his will; but use their owne private actions and operations, whereunto the whole, never gave incitation, nor began in them any motion. For among those creatures which have life and foule, there is none foill framed and composed, as that against the 30 will thereof, either the feet should goe forward, or the tongue speake, or the horne push and ftrike, or the teeth bite; whereof God of necessity must endure & abide the most part, if against his will, evil men being parts of himselfe doe lie, doe circumvent and beguile others, commit burglary, breake open houses, to rob their neighbors, or kill one another. And if according as Chrysppus faith, it is not possible that the least part should behave it selfe otherwise than it pleafeth Jupiter, and that every living thing doeth rest, stay, and moove, according as he leadeth, manageth, turneth, flaieth and disposeth it:

Now well I wot, this voice of his, Sounds worfe and more mischeivous is.

For more tolerable it were by a great deale to fay, that ten thouland parts, through the impoten-40 cie and feeblenesse of Jupiter, committed many absurdities perforce even against his nature and will, than to avouch that there is no intemperance, no deceit and wickednesse, whereof Jupiter is not the cause

Moreover feeing that the world by their faying is a city, and the Sarres citizens: if it be fo, there must be also tribes and magistracies; yea and plaine it is, that the Sunne must be a Senatour, yea & the evenning starre, some provost, major or governor of the city. And I wot not well whether he who taketh in hand to confute such things, can broch and set abroad other greater absurdities in naturall matters than those doe, who deliver and pronounce these doctrines. Is not this a position against common sense to affirme, that the seed should be greater and more than that which is engendred of it? For we see verily that nature in all living creatures, and 50 plants even those that be of a wilde and savage kinde, taketh very small and slender matters, such as shardly can be seen, for the beginning & the generation of most great and huge bodies. For not onely of a graine or corne of wheat it produceth a stalke with an eare, and of a little grape shone it bringesth forth a vine tree, but also of a pepin, kernill, akorne or bery escaped and stallen by chance from a bird, as if of some sparkle it kindled and set on fire generation, it send that the stocke of some bush or thorne or essential and mighty body of an oake, a date or pinetree. And hereupon it is that genetall feed is called Empea, in Greeke, as one would say also nature taketh the name of evers, as it were experiences, that is to say, the inflation and design of proportions and numbers, which are opened & loosened under it. And againe, the fire which they say is the feed of the world, after that generall conflagration, shall change into the owner feed, the world, which from a smaller body and little masse is extended into a great inflation and design on, yea and moreover occupieth an infinite space of voidnesse which it silles has augmentation; but as it is engendered, that huge greatnesse retirementation. We may heare them dispute, and reade many of their books, and discourses, wherein they argue and crie out at loud against the Academicks, for consonning all things with their Aparalixies, that is to say, indistinguishe identities striving and forcing to make in two natures, one endued with the like quality. And yet what man living is their who conceives and knoweth not as much? or suppose thou the contrary, namely, that it were a mervellous strange thing & a very absurdity, if neither slocke-dove to stocke-dove, beet o bee, wheat-corne to wheat-corne, and as the common proverbe goeth, one sigge unto another hath bene at all times alike and semblable.

But this in very deed and trueth is cleane contrary to all common fenfe, that these men holde and affirme: how in one fubstance, there be properly and particularly two qualified, and how the fame substance having particularly one qualified, when there commeth another to it, receiveth and keepeth them both, the one as well as the other. For if we admit two, I avouch it may 20 as well have three, fowre, five and as many as one will name, in one and the fame fubstance, I say not in divers parts, but all equally and indifferently, though they were infinit, even in the whole. Now Chry sippus faith, that Jupiter, as also the world, resembleth a man, and providence the soule: when as then that conflagration of the world shall be, Jupiter, who onely of all the gods is immortall, shall retire unto providence, and both twaine shall remaine together in the substance of theskie. But leave we now the gods for this prefent, and pray we unto them that they would vouchfafe to give unto the Stoicks, a common funce and understanding according with other men, and let us fee now what they fay as touching the elements. This first and formost standeth not with the received conceit and opinion of the world, that a bodie thould be the place of a body, and that one body should enter and pierce through another bodie, considering that nei-30 ther the one nor the other containeth vacuity: but that which is full entereth into that which is full, and that which hath no diffance receiveth into it felfe that which is mingled with it, but that which is full and folid, hath no void distance in it selfe by reason of continuity. And these men verily not thrusting one into one, nor two nor three, nor ten together, but cast all parts of the world cut peece-meale, into one, which they first meet with, even the least that is by sense perceptible: faying moreover that it will containe the greatest that shall come unto it. Thus in abraverie after their old maner in many other things, make of that which convince thand refelleth them, one of their fentences and resolutions, as they who take for suppositions, those things which be repugnant to common sense. And thus upon this supposall, there must needs enfue many monstrous and prodigious positions when they once confusedly mingle whole bo-40 dies with whole : and among those absurd paradoxes this also may goe for one, That three be fowce. For even that which others bring in & alledge for an exfample of that which cannot fall into mans imagination, they holde for an undoubted trueth: faying, that when one cyath of wine is mingled with two of water, it wanteth not but is equall in the whole, and thus confounding them together, they bring it so about, that one is made twaine, by the equal mixture of one with two: for that one remaineth, and is fored as much as twaine, making that which is equalto a duple. Now if by the mixture with two, it taketh the measure of two in the desusion, this must need sbe the measure together, both of three and of fowre: of three because one is mingled vith twaine: and of fower, for that being mingled with twaine, it hath as much in quantity, as those wherewith it is mingled. This fine device hapneth unto them, because they put bo-

3º dies within a body, and for that it cannot be imagined how they cause one to containe another. For, of necessity it must be that bodies making a penetration one within another by mixture, that he one should not containe and the other be contained, nor the one receive and the other be received within. For so this should not be a commixion but a contiguity and touching of superficies one close to another, whiles one entreth within forth, and the other enclose th without, when the other parts remaine pure and entire without mixture, and so thall be one of many divers and differing a sunder. But it cannot otherwise be as they would have it, that when there is a mixture, the things mingled, should not be mixed one within another: and that one selse fame thing being within should not withall be contained; and likewife in receiving, containe as nother : and possible it is not, that either the one or the other should be : but fall out it will, that the two which be mingled, should pierce one within the other; neither can fo much as one part of the one or the other remaine by it felfe apart, but necessarily they be all full one of another. And heere arifeth that legge of Arcefilam, fo much talked of in the schooles, which infulteth and daunceth upon their monstrous absurdities with much laughter; for if these mixtions be through the whole, what should hinder, but that if a legge bee cut off, putrified, cast into the sea, and in processe of time all disfused; not onely the seet of Antigonus might faile in and thorow it, as faid Arcefilaus, but also the 1200, faile of Xerxes, yea and the three hundred gallies of the Greeks might give a navall battell within the faid legge? for faile 10 it never will to be extended and spread more and more, nor the lesse cease within the greater, ne yet will that mixture ever come to an end, no nor the extremitie of it touch where it will end, and so pierce not thorow the whole, but will give over to be mingled; or if it be not mixed thorowout the whole, furely the faid legge will not affoord roome fo much as for the Greekesto give a navall battell in it, but even the fame must need sputrific and be changed. But if a cyash of wine, or no more but one drop, falling into the Aegean or Candiot-fea, paffe directly into the Ocean, or maine Atlantique fea, it shall not touch onely the superficial part of the water loft, but fored throughout, in breadth, depth & length. And verily Chry fopus admitteth fo much in the very beginning of his first booke as touching Naturall questions, faying that one drop of wine will not faile but be mingled throughout the whole fea. And that we should not marvell 20 fo much hereat, he faith moreover, that the faid drop by the meanes of mixture, will extend throughout the whole world: which is so absurd and without all appearance of reason, as I cannot devile any thing more. And is not this also against common sense, that in the nature of bodies, there is no supreame, nor first or last, to conclude & determine the magnitude of the body? but that which is proposed as the subject, runneth on still infinitely without end, so as whatfoever is added, yet form what more feemeth may be put thereto? for we cannot conceive or comprehend one magnitude greater or leffe than another, if it be incident to both parts thus to proceed in infinitum, which is as much as to take away the whole nature of inequalitie. For of two magnitudes that be underflood unequall, the one commeth first thort of the last parts, and the other goeth beyond and furpaffeth; but if there be no inequalitie of length in them, it follow- 30 eth that there will be no unevennesse in the upper superfices nor asperitie; for this unevennesse is nothing elfe, but the inequalitie of the superficies with it selfe; but asperitie is an inequalitie of the superficies with hardnesse. Of which qualities they allow none, who determine no bodie in an extreme or utmost part, but draw out all still by a multitude of parts infinitly: and yet who knoweth not evidently, that man is compounded of a greater number of parts, than is his finger, and the world more than a man? for all men know and thinke as much, unleffe they become Stoicks: but proove they once to be Stoickes, they both fay and opine the contrarie; namely, that man is not composed of more parts than is his finger, nor the world of more than is man: for fection reduceth bodies into infinitum; and in things infinite there is neither more nor leffe; neither is there any multitude that surpaffeth; neither shall the parts of that which is less, 40 cease to be alwaies subdivided still, yea and to furnish out a multitude of themselves. How then do they wind out of these difficulties and untie these knots? certes, with great slight, veriesubtilly and valiantly: for Chrysippus faith, that when we be demaunded, if we have any parts, and how many there be? also whether they be compounded of other, and of how many? we are to flic unto this diffinction; supposing and setting downe, that the whole entire bodie, consisted of head, breaft and legges, as if this were all that was demanded and doubted of. But if they should proceed in their interrogatories to the extreme parts: then saith he, no such answere is to be made, but we are to fay, neither that they confift of any certaine parts, nor likewise of how many? neither of infinite nor determinate. But I thinke it were better if I alledged his verice owne words, to the end you may fee how he keepeth and observeth the common conceptions, 50 forbidding us as he doth, to thinke, imagine or fay, of what parts, and how many ech bodie is compounded, and that it confilteth neither of finite or infinite. For if there were a meane be tweene finite and infinite, like as there is betweene good and bad, to wit, indifferent; he should pronounce what the fame was, and so falvethe difficultie. But, if as that which is not equall, incontinently becommeth unequall; and that which is not corruptible, prefently is incorruptible; so that which is not finite, is immediately infinit, I suppose, that to say, A bodie is composed of parts neither finit or infinite, is all one as to say, that an argument is composed neither of true nor of false propositions, and a number neither of even nor odde. But after all this, younting himselfe youthfully, he letteth not to say, that whereas a pyramis consisteth of triangles, the fidesinclining to the commission or joint, are unequall, and yet exceed one another, in that they be bigger. Thus you fee how trimly he kept and observed common conceptious; for if there be any thing greater, and yet furpaffeth not, there must be also somewhat leffe, and yetthe fame faileth not, and fo there shall be also for thing unequall, that neither exceedeth nor wanteth, which is as much to fay, as it shall be equall and yet unequall, not greater but yet greater, not leffe and yet leffe. See moreover I pray you a little, how he answereth unto Democritus disputing and doubting physically and earnestly, if a cone or round pyramis be cut at to the base thereof by the plumb or level, what we ought to conceive and judge as touching the superficies of the fections whether they be equal or unequal; for if they be unequal, they wil make the faid cone or pyramis uneven; and admitting many deepe rabbotted incifions, and rough afperities in maner of steps and grees: and if they be equall, then the sections also must be equall, and so it will be found that the round pyramis or cone shall have the same befall unto it that a cylinder hath, namely, to confift of circles equall and not unequall, which were very abfund, Herein, making Democritus to be an ignorant person and one who knew not what he said, he commeth in with this, and faith, that the superficies be neither equal nor unequal, but that the bodies be unequall, in that the superficies be neither equall nor unequall. Now to set downe by way of ordinance and to affirme, that allowing the superficies to be unequall, it may fall out, 20 that bodies should not be unequall, were the part of a man who permitteth himselfe to have a woonderfull libertie to write and speake whatsoever comes into his head. For both reason and manifest evidence, giveth us to understand quite contrary, namely, that of unequal bodies the superficies also be unequall, and the bigger that a body is, the greater is the superficies, unleffe the exceffe whereby it furpaffeth the fmaller, be altogether devoid of a fuperficies: for if the superficies of greater bodies exceed not those of the lesser, but rather faile before they come to an end, then we must of necessitie say, that a part of that bodic which hath an end, is without end, and not determinate: for if hee alledge and fay that hee is driven perforce thereunto, lest the inequalitie of superficies might seeme to make unequall incisions, there is no such cause why hee should seare: for those rabbotted incisions which hee suspecteth in 30 a cone or round Pyramis, it is the inequalitie of the bodies, and not of the superficies that causeth them. So that it were a ridiculous follie, by taking away the superficies, for to be convinced to leave an inequalitie and unevennesse of the bodies. But to perfit still in this matter, what can there be more contrary to common conception, than to faine and devife fuch stuffe? for if we admit that one superficies is neither equall nor unequall to another, wee we may confequently affirme, that neither magnitude is equall or unequall, nor number either even or odde; confidering that we can not fet downe nor conceive in our minde, any meane betweene unequall and unequall, which is neuter. Moreover, if there were any superficies neither equall nor unequall, what should let but that we may imagine circles also neither equall nor unequall? for verily these superficies of the sections of cones or round Pyramides, be circles: and 40 if we allow thus much in circles, then we may aswell admit so much of the Diameters of circles, namely, that they be neither equall nor unequall. And if this goe for good, of angles likewife and triangles, of Parallelograms, and of superficies parallel or equally distant. For if longitudes be neither equall nor unequall one to another, then shall not weight, nor percussion, no nor bodies be equall or unequall. Furthermore, how dare they reproove those who bring in vacuities, and certeine indivisible bodies mainteining combat one against another, supposing that they neither stirre nor stand still; when as they themselves mainteine that such propositions as these be falle? If any things be not equall one to the other, the same be unequall one to the other: and these things here be not equall one to the other; neither are they unequall one to the other. But forasimuch as he saith, that there is something greater, which notwithstanding surpasseth 50 not; it were good reason therefore to doubt and demand, whether the same be agreeable and fitting one to the other? and if they agree, how then can either of them be the bigger? Now if it be not fortable, how is it possible that the one should not exceed, and the other come short? for these things can not hang together, to say, that neither the one nor the other surpasseth: and it agreeth not with the greater: or it agreeth, and yet the one is greater than the other. For ofnecessitie it must follow, that those who reteine not nor observe common conceptions, be troubled with fuch perplexities.

Over and befides, it is against all common sense, to say that no one thing toucheth another:

as alfo, that bodies touch one another, and yet do in no part touch. Now it must needs be, that they admit this, who allow not the least parts of a body, and so they suppose alwaies something before that which feemeth to touch, and never cease to passe on farther still which is the thing that they principally object against those, who defend & maintein the indivisible parcels called Atoms, namely, that there is no totall touching, but that it is a mixture, confidering that fuch indivisible bodies have no parts. How is it then, that they themselves fall not into the like inconvenience, seeing they admit no part to be either first or last? for that they say, bodies doe touch one another mutually in the whole by a certeine terme or extremity, and not by a part, and the faid terme or point is no body. Then a body shall touch a body, by athing which is no body: and contrariwife, shall not touch, the incorporall being betweene. And if it touch, it to shall do likewise and suffer somewhat, being it selfe a body, by that which is incorporall and no body. For the propertie of bodies, is to do and fuffer somewhat mutually, yea, and to touch one another : and if the body have a touching in part by the meanes of that which is incorporall, it shall likewise have a generall and totall connexion, even a mixtion and incorporation. Againe, in these connexions and mixtures, necessarie it is that termes or extremities of bodies, either continue or not continue, but perith: but both the one and the other is against common sense. For even they themselves allow not corruptions and generations of things incorporall : and impossible it is, that there should be a mixtion or totall touching of bodies reteining still their proper termes and extremities. For it is this terme or extremity that determine thand conflituteth the nature of a body: and as for mixtions (if there were no approching nor application of 20 parts to parts) they confound all things wholly which are mixed. And as these men fay, we must admit the corruption of extremities in mixtures; and likewife againe, their generations, in the distractions & separations of them, But no man there is able to comprehend this easily: for in regard that bodies touch one another, they also are pressed, thrust and crushed one by the other, And impossible it is, that a thing incorporall should suffer or do thus; neither can we imagine fo much : yet would they constraine us to thinke no lesse. For if a sphære or boule touch a flat orplaine bodie onely by a point, certeine it is, that it may be trained and rolled along the faid plaine or flat body, by a point. And if the foresaid boulebe painted in the superficies theref with vermillion, it shall imprint a red line onely upon the same plaine body; and being yellow, or of a firie colour, it shall likewife give the same tincture to the superficies of the slat bodie, 30 Now that a thing incorporall should either give or take a colour, is against all commonsense. And if we imagine aboule of earth, of Crystall or glaffe, to fall from on high upon a smooth bodic of stone, it were against all reason to thinke that it would not breake the same into pieces, namely, when as it shall light upon that which is solide, hard, and able to make resistance : but more unreasonable it were to say, that it were broken by a terme or point that is incorporall: in fuch maner, as in every fort, their anticipations & common conceptions as touching thingsincorporall and bodies, must needs be troubled and confounded, or rather utterly abolished, in supposing thus many things impossible.

Against common sense it is to say, that there is a future time, and a time past, but noneatall prefent; as alfo, that the time which was crewhile and not long fince, hath a fubliftence, whereas 40 that which now is hath no being at all. And yet this is an ufuall and ordinary matter with these Stoicke philosophers, who admit not the least time that is betweene, and will not allow the prefent to be indivisible; but of all that which a man doeth thinke and imagine as present, they affirme the one part to be of that which is already past, and the other of the future; infomuch as there remaineth and is left in the mids no piece at all of the time prefent; in case of that which is faid to be the very inflant, part is attributed unto things past, and part to things to come; whereupon of necessitie one of these twaine must follow, that either in admitting the tense, It was; or It shalbe; the tense It is, must wholly be abolished, or in admitting the present time, It is, one part thereof is past, and the other to come: as also to say, that of that which is, part is yet suture, and part already past: likewise of that which now is present, one parcell is before, and ano-50 ther behinde; in such fort as present, is that which yet is not present, and not present any more; for that is not present any longer, which is already past; nor present at all, which is yet to come: And thus in dividing the prefent, they must also needs say, that of the yeere and of the light, part was of the yeere palt, and part of the yeere to come; likewise of that which is together and at once, there is some before, and some after: For no lesse troubled are they, in hudling and confounding after a strange maner these termes, Not yet, Already, No more, Now & not now, as if they were all one; whereas other men doe conceive and thinke, that their tearmes, Ere while, or not long fince, & a while after or anon, are different parts from the prefent time, fetting the one before, & the other after the faid present. And among these, Archidemus who affirmeth that the present Now, is a certeine beginning, joint or commissione of that which is already past and necre at hand to come, feeth now how in fo faying, he utterly abolisheth all time; for were it true that Now is no time, but onely a terme of extremity of time & that every part of time is as it were Now, it would feem then, that this present Now, hath no part at al, but is resolved wholy into ends & extremities, joints, commiffures, & beginnings. As for Chrylippus willing to thew himselfe witty & artificial in his divisions, in that treatise which he composed as touching voidneffe, and in other places affirmeth, that the Paft and the Future of time fublifteth not, but hath to fiblified; and that the prefent onely hath being: But in the third, fourth, & fift books of Parts, he avoucheth, that of the inftant or prefent, part is Future, & part Past; in such fort as by this means he divideth the substance of time, into those parts of subsistent, which are not subsistent, or to speake more truely, he leaveth no part at al subsistent, if the instant & present hath no part at al. which is not either past or to come : and therefore the conceit that these men have of time. refembleth properly the holding of water in a mans hand, which runneth and sheddeth the more, by how much harder it is preffed together. Come now unto actions and motions, all light and evidence is by them darkned, troubled, and confounded; for necessarily it ensueth, that if the Inflant or present is divided into that which is past, and to come, part of that which now moovethatthis inflant; should partly be moved already, and in part to remoove afterwards, and 20 withall, that the beginning and end of motion should be abolished: also that of no worke there shouldbe any thing first or last, all actions being distributed and dispersed together with time: for like as they fay, that of the present, some is past, and some to come : even so of every action indoing, fome part is already done, and other resteth to be done. When had then beginning, or when shall have end, To dine, to write, & to go, if every man who dineth, hath dined already, and shall dine; and who soever goeth, hath gone and shall go? and that which is (as they fay) of al ablurdities most monstrous, if it be granted, that he who now liveth, hath lived already, & shall live, life had neither beginning, nor ever shall have end; but every one of us as it should seeme by this reckoning, was borne without beginning of life, & shall die without giving over to live: for if there be no extreme part, but ever as one that now liveth shall have somewhat of the pre-30 sentremaining for the future, it will never be untruely faid; Socrates shallive, so long as it shall be muely faid, Socrates liveth; fo that as often as it is true, Socrates liveth, fo often it is falfe, Socrates isdead. And therefore if it be truely faid in infinit parts of time, Socrates thall lives in no part of time shalit ever be truly faid, Socrates is dead. And verily what end shal there be of any worker& where shall any action stay &cease, in case as often as it shall be truly said; a thing is now doing, fo often likewise it shall be truly faid, It shall be done : for lie he shall who faith, This is the end of Plate writing or disputing; for that one day Plate shall cease to write or dispute: if at no time it be alieto fay, of him that disputeth, He shall dispute; or of him who writeth, He shall write. Moreover, of that which is done, there is no part, which either is not finished already, or shall be finished, and either is past or to come. Besides, of that which is already done, or of that which 40 shal bedone, of that which is past or future, there is no fense. And so in one word, and to speake simply, there is no sense of any thing in the world; for we neither see nor heare that which is past or to come; ne yet have we any sense of things which have bene or which shall be; no nor although a thing should be present, is it perceptible & subject to sense, in case that which is prefent, be partly to come, and in part past already; if I say one part thereof hath beene, and another shall be : and yet they themselves cry out upon Epicurus, as if he committed some great indignitie, and did violence to common conceptions, in mooving as he doeth all bodies with equall celerity, and admitteth no one thing swifter than another: But farre more intolerable it is, and farther remot from common sense to hold, that no one thing can reach or overtake another: 50

according as we fay in our common proverbe: which must of necessity sall out, if things move according to Before and Behind; and in case the intervals which they passethrough, be divisible into infinit parts, as these men would have them: for if the tortoise be but one surlong before the horse, they who divide the said interval or space between einto infinit parts, and moove both the one and the other according to Prima and Posterim, shall never bring the swiftest close unto the slowest, for that the sloweralwaies winner the some space or interval, before that which is A a a a a divisible.

divisible, into other infinit intervals. And to say, that water which is powred forth out of a cup orboll, shall never be powred all cleane out; how can this chuse but be against common sense: & docth not this confequently follow upon those things that these men avouch? for never shall a man comprehend or conceive that the motion of things infinitly divifible, according to be. fore, bath fully performed the whole intervall; but leaving alwaies forme space divisible, it will evermore make all the effusion, all the running foorth or thedding of the liquor, all the motion of a folid body; or the fall of a weighty poife, to be imperfect. I let paffe many abfurdities delivered in their doctrine; and touch those onely, which are directly against common sense.

As for the question touching augmentation, it is very auncient: For according as Chrysto. pus faith; it was by Epicharmus put foorth. And for that the Academicks thought it to be not to very easie and ready all of a sudden to be cleered; these men come with open mouth against them, acculing them for overthrowing all anticipations, whereas they themselves keepe not at all the common conceptions: and that which more is, pervert the very fenfes. For whereas the question is plaine and simple; these men grant and allow such suppositions as these, that al particular fubitances flow and runne, partly by yeelding and fending foorth fomewhat out of themselves, and in part by receiving other things from without; and that by reason of themim. ber and multitude of that which comes in, or goes out, things continue not one and the fame. but become altered and divers by the foresaid additions and detractation, fo as their substance receiveth a change. Also that contrary to all right and reason, custome hath so farre prevailed. that fuch mutations be called augmentations and diminutions: whereas rather they ought to be 20 termed generations, and corruptions, for that they force an alteration of one prefent state and being, into another; but to grow and diminith are passions and accidents of a body, and subicet that is permanent. Which reasons and affertions being after a fort thus delivered intheir schooles, what is it that these desenders of Perspicuity and Evidence, these canonicall reformers (I fay) of common notions would have ? namely, that every one of us should be double like twinnes, or of a two-fold nature: not as the poets feigned the Molionides, to be in some parts conjunct and united, and in other fevered and disjoined, but two bodies, having the same colour, the same shape, the same weight and place: a thing that no man ever saw before: mary these Philsosophers onely have perceived this duplicity, this composition and ambiguitie; whereby every one of us are two subjects, the one being substance, the other the one of them runneth and floweth continually, and yet without augmentation and diminution, or remaining in the fame state such as it is; the other continueth still, and yet groweth and decreafeth, and yet fulfreth all things quite contrary to the other, wherewith it is concorporate, united, and knit, leaving to the exteriour fense no shew of distinct difference. And yet verily it is faid of that Lyncess, how in old time hee had fo quicke and piercing an eicfight, that he was able to fee through stocks and stones. And one there was by report, who sto ting in Sicily, could from a watch-tower fenfibly different the shippes failing out of the haven of Carthage, which was distant a day & a nights failing with a good forewind. And as for Callins tes and Myrmecides, they have the name to have made chariots fo final, as that the wings of ally might cover them; yea & in a millet graine or fefam feed to have engraven Homers verfes. But 40 furely this perpetual fluxion & diverfity in us, there was never any yet that could divide & diflinguish : neither could we our selves ever find that we were double, & that partly weranneout continually, and in partagaine remained alwaies one and the fame, even from our nativity to our end. But I am about to deale with them more fimply and plainly; for whereas they devide in every one of us foure subjects, or to speake more directly, make ech of us to be foure, it shall fuffice to take but two, for to flew their abfurditie. When we doe heare Pembess in a tragedy faying, that he feeth two Sunnes, and two cities of Thebes, we deeme of him, that he feeth not two, but that his ejes doe dazzell and looke amiffe, having his difcourfe troubled, and underflanding cleane transported. And even these persons, who suppose and set downe, notone city alone, but all men, all beafts, all trees, plants, tooles, veffels, utenfils, and garments, 10 be 50 double, and composed of two natures; reject wee not and bid farewell, as men who would force us not to understand any thing a right, but to take every thing wrong? Howbeit, hap ly hecrein they might be pardoned and winked at, for feining and deviling other natures offubjects, because they have no meanes else, for all the paines they take, to mainteine and preserve their augmentations: But in the foule, what they should alle, what their meaning might be, and upon what grounds and suppositions, they devised to frame other different forts and formes of bodies, and those in maner innumerable, who is able to say? or what may be the cause, unless they ment to displace, or rather to abolish and destroy altogether the common and familiar conceptions, inbred in us, for to bring in and fet up new fangles, and other strange and forren novelties? For this is woonderfull extravagant and abfurd, for to make bodies of vertues and vices, and besides of sciences, arts, memories, fansies, apprehensions, passions, inclinations and affents: and to affirme that these neither lie, nor have any place substitting in any subject, but to leave them one little hole like a pricke within the heart, wherein they range and drawin, the principall part of the foule, and the discourse of reason, being choked up as it were with such a number of bodies, that even they are not able to count a great fort of them, who feeme to know best how to distinguish and discerne one from another. But to make these not onely bodies, 10 but also living creatures, and those endued with reason, to make (I say) a swarme of them, & the fame not gentle, mild, & tame, but a turbulent fort & rable by their malicious shrewdnesse, opposit & repugnant to al evidence, & usual custome, what wanteth this of absurdity in the highest degree, And these men verily do hold that not onely vertues & vices be animall and living creatures, nor passions alone, as anger, wrath, envy, griefe, forrow & malice, nor apprehensions onely, fantafies, imaginations, and ignorances, nor arts and myfteries, as the shoomakers & smithscraft: but also over and besides al these things, they make the very operations and actions themfelves to be bodies, yea and living creatures: they would have walking to be an animall dancing likewife, shoing, faluting, and reprochfull railing: and so consequently they make laughing & weeping to be animall. And in granting these, they admit also, coughing, sneesing and groa-20 ning, yea and withall, spitting, reaching, snitting and snuffing of the nose and such like actions, which are as evident as the rest. And let them not thinke much and take it grievously, if they be driven to this point by way of particular reasonning, calling to minde Chrysippus, who in his thirdbooke of Naturall questions faith thus : What fay you of the night, is it not a body: evening morning, midnight, are they not bodies? Is not the day a body? The new moone is it not abodie? the tenth, the fifteenth, the thirtieth day of the moone, the moneth it felfe, Summer, Autumne, and the whole yeere, be they not bodies? Certes all these things by me named they hold with tooth and naile, even against common prenotions: But as for these hereafter, they maintaine contrary to their owne proper conceptions, when as they would produce the hottelt thing that is by refrigeration, and that which is most subtile by inspissation. For the soulc is a 30 substance most hot and confisting of most subtill parts: which they would make by the refrigeration and condensation of the body, which as it were by a certaine perfusion and tincture it hardeneth & altereth the spirit, from being vegetative to be animate. They say also that the Sun is become animate, by reason of the moisture turned into an intellectuall and spirituals fire. See how they imagin the Sun to be engendred and produced by refrigeration? Xenophanes, when one came upon a time and tolde him that he had seene Eeles to live in hot scalding water, Why docwenot feethe them then (quoth he) in colde water? If therefore they will cause heat by refrigeration, and lightnesse by altriction and condensation: it followeth on the other side againe, by good consequence, that by keeping a certaine proportion and correspondensie in absurdity, they make heat by colde, thickning by diffolving, and waighty things by rarefaction. As for 40 the very substance and generation of common conception and sense, doe they not determine it even against common sense it selse? For conception is a certaine phantase or apprehension: and this apprehension is an impression in the soule. The nature of the soule is an exhalation, which by reason of the rarity thereof can hardly receive an impression: and say that it did receive any, yet impossible it were to keepe and retaine it. For the nutriment and generation of it confifting of moist things, holdeth a continuall course of succession and consumption. The commerce also and mixture of respiration with the aire, engendreth continually some new exhalation turning and changing by the flux of aire comming in and going forth reciprocally. For a man may imagin rather that a river of runing water keepeth the formes, figures & images imprinted therein, than a spirit caried in vapours & humors, to be mingled with another spirit 50 or breath from without continually, as if it were idle and strange unto it. But so much forget they or mifunderstand themselves, that having defined comon conceptions to be certaine intelligences laid up apart: memories to be firme permanent, & habituall impressions having fixed sciences likewise, every way fast and sure, yet within a while after they set under althis a foundation and base, of a certaine slippery substance, easie to be dissipated, caried continually, and ever going and comming to and fro. Moreover this notion and conception of an element and Principle, all men have imprinted in their minde, that it is pure, simple, not mingled nor com-

poled: for, that which is mixed, cannot be an element nor a principle, but rather that, whereof it is mixed and composed.

Howbeit these men devising God the principle of all things to be a spiritual bodie, and a minde or intelligence feated in matter, make him neither pure nor fimple, nor uncompound but affirme that he is composed of another and by another. As for matter, being of it selfe without reason and void of all quality, it carieth with it simplicity, and the very naturall propertie of a principle: and God, if it be true, that he is not without body and matter, doth participate of matter as of a principle. For if reason and matter, be all one and the same, they have not done well to define matter for to be reasonlesse: but if they be things different, then doth God consist of both twaine, and not of a fimple effence, but compounded, as having taken to his intellectuall fubtiance a bodily nature out of matter. Furthermore, confidering, they call these fower primitive bodies, to wit, earth, water, aire and fire, the first elements, I cannot seehow they thould make some of them simple, and others mixed or compound: for they hold, that the earth and water cannot containe either themselves or any other, and that it is the participation of spirit and fellowship of fire, whereupon dependeth the preservation of their unity: as for the aire and fire by their owne power they fortifie themselves, which being medled with the other two, give them their force vigor and firmitude of substance. How is it then, that either earth is an element or the water, feeing neither of them both is simple, first, or sufficient to keepe and preserve it selfe, but having need of another without to containe them alwaies in their being and to fave them? for they have not left fo much as any thought that they be a fubstance. Bur furely 20 this reason of theirs as touching the earth, that it consistent of it selfe, containeth much confufion and great uncertainty, for if the earth be of it selfe, how commeth it to passe that it hath need of the aire, to binde and conteine it? for so it is no more earth of it selfe, nor water; but the aire hath by thickning & hardning matter, made thereof the earth: and contrariwife, by diffolving and mollifying it, hath created the water: and therefore we may inferre thus much that neither of these is an element, seeing that some other thing bath given them their essence and generation. Over and befides, they affirme, that fubstance and matter are subject to qualities, and fo in maner doe yeeld their limit and definition : and then on the other fide, they make the faid qualities to be bodies; wherein there is a great confusion: for if qualities have a certeine proper fibstance, whereby they are termed and be really bodies indeed, they require no other fibstance, for that they have one of their owne: but if they have this onely under them which is common, and which they call effence or matter, certeine it is, that they doe but participate of the bodie; for bodies they are not. For that which is in the nature of the subject and doethreceive, must of necessitie differ from those things which it receiveth, and whereof it is the subject. But these men see by the halfe; for they terme the matter wandow, that is to say, without qualities: but they will not name the qualities auras, that is to fay, void of matter. And yet how is it possible to make a body without quality, but wee must imagine a quality without a bodie ? for that reason, which coupleth a body with all maner of qualities, permitteth not the thought to comprehend any body without some qualitie. Either therefore he that fighteth against a bodilesse qualitie, seemeth to resist likewise a matter void of qualitie; or if he separate the one from theo ther, hee parteth and divideth them both as under . And as for that reason which some of them 1 feemeto pretend, as touching a fubstance which they name amount, not because it is void of all qualitie, but because it is capable for footh of every qualitie; it is contrary to common notion, and nothing fo much. For no man taketh or imagineth that to be amour, that is to fay, unqualified, which is participant of al qualities and uncapable of none; nor impaffible, that which is apt to receive and fuffer every paffion; nor immoovable, which is moovable every way. And as for this doubt, it is not folved, that howfoever we alwaies understand matter with some quality, yet we conceive with all, that matter and qualitie be different one from the other.

The Summarie.

BE have in many places before, but principally in two feverall Treatifes of the former tome, perceived how Plutarch is quite contrary unto the Epicureans, and namely, in one of those Treatises he dealeth with a certaine booke (which he now expressly refutesh) where Colotes endevoured to proove, that a man can not possibly live well, according to the opinions of other Philosophers , Plutatch sheweth on the contrarie side, that impossible it is to leade a joifull life after the doctrine of Epicurus, and that it is accompanied with 20 overweening, impudency and flanderous calumniation. And not contenting himfelfe thus to have confused them of purpose once or twice, he sesteth upon them in this discourse, and particularly he copethwith Colotes, whose flouth, filthinesse and impiette be heere describeth. The summe of all which declamation is this, That these Epicureans are not any way worthy the name of Philosophers: who contranswife tread and trample under foot all the parts of true Philosophie, discovering in their writings aswell as thorowout all their lives, meere beastly brutalitie. But all that is delivered in this Treatise may be reduced well to two principall points: The one conteineth a defence or excuse of the doctrine taught by Democritus, Empedocles, Parmenides, Socrates, and other ancient Philosophers, flandered by Colotes, who extolled farre above them, the traditions and precepts of his master. The other discovereth divers absurdities and strange opinions of the Epicureans, even by their owne testimonies: 30 whom Plutateh refelleth foundly; handling in this disputation many articles of Philosophie, Naturall. Morall and Supernaturall: and particularly of the Senses, of Nature, of the Atomes of the Universall world of the Knowledge of man, of the Opinion of the Academicks, of the Apprehensions, faculties, passions and affections of the soule: of the certeintie of things sensible of the falsitie and trueth of imaginations, of the use of Lawes, of the profit of Philosophie, of the sovereigne good, of religion, and of other suchmatters, the principles whereof the Epicureans abolished, bringing in paradoxes woonderfull strange, for to shuffle things confusedly, and make all uncerteine. All which is marked particularly in the traine and course of the authours owne words, and therefore needlesse it is to specific thereof any more because I would a void tantologies & unnecessary repetitions. True it is, that in certaine resutations Plutarch is not so firme as were to be desired; but that may be imputed to bisignorance of the true 40 God. As for the rest, it may suffice & serve, to know the misery & wretchednes of the Encureans: and that other Philosophers hadmany good parts, and delivered many beautifull speeches, whereof all vertuous persons may reape and gather great fruit in applying and referring the same to their right use. And for to close up all, he maketh a comparison betweene true Philosophers and the Epicureans, proving in very many places, that Colotes and his fellowes like himfelfe, are people not onely unprofitable, but also most permicious, and so by consequence unworthy to live in the world.

AGAINST

AGAINST COLOTES THE Epicurean.

Olotes, whom Epicurus was wont (ô Saturninus) to call by way of flattering diminution, Colataras and Colatarius, composed and put forth a little booke, which he entituled, That there could be no life at all according to the opinions of other Philosophers: and dedicated the said booke unto king Ptolemans. Now what came into 10 my minde to speake against this Colores, I suppose you would take pleasure to reade the same in writing; being as you are, a man who loveth elegancie and all honest things, especially such as concerne the knowledge of antiquity, & besides, esteemeth it the most prince like exercise and roiall study, to beare in minde and have alwaies in hand, as much as possibly may be the discourses of auncient Sages. Whereas therefore of late this booke was in reading, one of our familiar friends, one whom you know well enough, Aristodemus by name, an Aegian borne, a man exceeding passionate, and of all the Academicks a most franticke sectary of Plato, although hee carie not the ferula like unto the madde supposts of Plato, I wot not how contrary to his usuall maner, was very patient and silent to all the while, giving eare most civilly even to the very end. But so some as the lecture was done: Goe to now my masters (quoth he) whom were we best to cause for to arrise and sight with this fellow in the quarrell and desence of Philosophers? For I am not of Nesson minde, neither doe I greatly praise him, for that when there was to be chosen the most valiant warrior of those nine hardy knights who were presented, to enter into combat with these hand, committed the election unto fortune, and put all to the lot: But you see also (quoth I) that even he referred himselfe to be ordered by the lot, to the end that the choise might passe according to the dispose and ordinance of the wisest man:

The lot out of the helmet then did fall,
Of Ajax, whom themfelves wift most of all,
And yet if you command me to make election,
How can lever put out of mind,

Divine ulyffes, a prince fo kind? Confider therefore and be well advised how you may be able to refell this man. Then Aristode. demus: But you know full well (quoth he) what Plato formetime did, who being offended with his boy that waited upon him, would not himselfe swindge him, but caused Speusippus to doe so much for him, faying withall, That he was in a fit of choler. And even fo, I say as much to you, Take the man to you I pray, and entreat him at your pleafure; for my felfe am very angry with him. Now when all the rest of the company were instant with me, and praied me to take this charge in hand: Well I fee (quoth I) that I must speake, seeing you will needs have it so : but 40 I am affraid lest I may seeme my selse to be more earnestly bent against this booke than it deferveth, in the defence and maintenance of Socrates, against the incivility, rudenesse, fourtility, and infolence of this man, who prefenteth (as one would fay) unto him hay, as if he were a bealt, and demaundeth how he may put meat into his mouth, and not into his care: whereas haply the best way were to laugh onely at him for such railing, especially considering the mildnesse and gentle grace of Socrates in fuch cases. Howbeit in regard of the whole host beside of other Greeke Philosophers, namely, Democritus, Plato, Empedocles, Parmenides, and Melissus, who by him are foully reviled, it were not onely a shame to be tongue-tied and keepe filence, but also meere facriledge and impiety, to remitany jot, or forbeare to fpeake freely to the utmost in their behalfe, being such as have advanced philosophy to that honour and reputation which it 50 hath. And verily our parents together with the gods have given us our life: but to live well, we suppose and that truely, that it commeth from the philosophers, by the meanes of that doctrine which we have received from them, as cooperative with law and justice, and the very bridle that doth chaftice and restraine our lusts. Now to live well, is to live sociably, friendly, temperately, and justly: of which good qualities and conditions, they leave us not so much as one, who cryout with open mouth, that the foveraigne good of man lieth in his belly, and that all the vertues in the world if they were put together, they would prize no better woorth than one crackt brasen piece of coine, without pleasure, and in case all maner of delights were quite remoored from them. Also the annex heere to their discourses, as touching the soule & the gods, wherein they hold that the foule perifficth, when it is once feparate from the body: and that the gods meddle not with our affaires. Moreover the Epicureans reproch other Philosophers, for that by their wisdome and sapience, they undoe mans life: and they againe object unto them, that they teach men to live loofely, basely, and beastly. And verily such matters as these be mingled in all the writings of Epicurus, and spred throughout his whole philosophy. But this Colores here having made an extract of certaine words or voices void of matter and substance, and drawen some pieces and broken fragments without reasons and arguments for to proove and to confirme his doctrines, or to give light for their understanding and credit, hath made his booke in maner of a shop full of all fort of wares; or of a table or stall representing strange showes and monsters: which you (Isay) know best of all others, for that you have continually in your hands and docreade the works of ancient writers. So he feemeth unto me that like to the Lydian, he openeth not one gate and no more upon him, but enwrappeth Epicurus in very many doubts & difficulties, and those of all other, the greatest : for he beginnes with Democrium, who no doubt received at his hands a goodly falary and reward for his apprentiffage, being a thing certainly knowen, that for a long time Epicurus called himfelfe a Democritian, like as others alfodoe fay, and namely Leontew, one of the scholars and disciples of Epicurus, in the highest forme: who in a letter which he wrote unto Lycophron, faith, that Epicurus honored Democri-20 100, for that he attained before him to the true and found understanding of the truth: and that in generall the whole treatife of naturall things, was called Democritian, because hee light first upon the principles, and met with the primitive fountaines and foundations of nature. And Metrodorus faid directly and openly of Philosophy, That if Democritus had not led the way, Epicurus had never arrived to wifdome and learning. Now if it be true as this Colotes faith, That to live according to Democritus and other philosophers opinions, is no life ... all, Epicarus was a very foole for following Democritus as he did, leading him to that doctrine whereby a man could not live. And first he reprooveh him, for that in faying that every thing is no more fuch than fuch, he made a confusion of mans life. But so farre off was Democritus from holding the faid opinion, namely, that nothing is rather fuch than fuch: that he oppugned Pro-30 tagoras the Sophister for faying to, against whom lie wrot many elegant commentaries, full of good arguments concluding the contrary : which our Colotes never feeing, nor fo much as dreaming of, was much deceived in the right understanding of the mans words, and namely in one place where he discretly faith and determineth that whisis no more than which which placehenameth a body sir, and voidneffe unsir: meaning thereby and giving us to understand, that voidnesse had a proper nature and subfishence of the owne, as wel as a body. But he who is of opinion, that nothing is more fuch than fuch, followeth one of the decrees & fentences of Episurus, wherein he delivered, that all apprehenfions and imaginations that come by fenfe, are true. For if when two men give out and fay, the one, that the wine is hard : the other, that it is fweetand pleasant, neither of them is deceived in his sense but speaketh true, why should the 40 wine be rather harsh than sweet. And yet it is scene oftentimes that one and the same bath, some find to be hot, & others cold: for that, as these command cold water, so those bid hot water to be powered in. It is faid that a certaine dame or good wife of Lacedamon went upon a time to vifit Berronice the wife of king Deiotarus, but when they approached nere together, they turned away immediatly one from the other: the one, as it should seeme abhorring the finell of ranke butter, and the other offended with the perfume of a fweet ointment or pomander. If then the fense of one be not more true than the fenfe of another, probable it is and very like that both water is not more cold than hot, and that the ointment and the butter no more fenting pleafantly than stinking strongly. For if a man fay, that it seemeth thus to one, and so to another, he affirmeth before he is aware, that they be both the one and the other. And as for these symmetries, propor-50 tions and accords of the pores or passages in the organs of the senses, whereof they talke so much: as also the divers mixtures of seeds, which they say being differninate and dispersed throughout all favors, odors and colours, do move the fense; doe they not directly drive them to this point, that things are no more one than another? For fuch as thinke that the fense is deceived, for that they fee contrary events and passions doe proceed from the same objects, they Pacific againe and falve this objection, by teaching that whereas all things be mingled and confounded together, yet nevertheleffe this is more fortable and fitting to one and that to another: whereby there is northe contractation and apprehension of one and the same quality, neither doth the object move all indifferently at once and alike in all parts, but every one meeting with those qualities onely, whereunto they have all sense proportionate, they doe not well to stands stifly upon this, that a thing is coloured or not coloured, white or not white, thinking to fortisse and establish their owne senses by destroying those of others. Whereas it behoves the either to oppugne the senses, for they all souch and reach one quality or other (each one drawing as our of a lively and large sountaine, from this confused mixture, that which is sit and sutable nor accuse and blame the whole, in touching onely the parts 3 ne yet thinke that all ought to suffer the fame thing, considering that one suffereth by one qualitie and power of it, and another by another. So that now we are to consider and search, what men they be, who bring in this opinion, as touching things that be not such rather than others, rather than these who hold, that whatso to ever is sensible is a confused mixture of all qualities together, like unto a wind-instrument composed for all kinds of melodious musicke? But they confesse that all their rules are lost, and their judgement quite gone, if they admit any object in some sort pure and syncere, and allownot ech one thing to be many.

See moreover in this place, what discourse and disputation Polyanus held with Epicurusin his banquet as touching the heat of wine. For when he demanded in this maner, How now Epicurse, fay you not that wine doth heat? one made answere, That he affirmed not universally, that wine did cause heat : and a little after; For it seemeth that wine is not universally a heater, but rather, that fuch a quantitie of wine may be faid to enchafe and fet fuch an one in heat. And then adjoining the cause, he alledgeth the concurrences, compressions and dispersions of the 20 Atomes; the commixtions and conjunctions of others, when the wine commeth to be mingled with the body: and then he addeth this conclusion; And therefore generally we are not to fay that wine doth heat; but so much wine may well heat such a nature, and so disposed : whereas another nature it cooleth in fuch and fuch a quantity. For in fuch a maffe, there be those natures and complexions, of which, cold if need were, may be composed, and being joined with others as occasion serveth, may cause a vertue refrigerative. And hereupo it is, that some are deceived, faying that wine univerfally is hot, and others againe, affirming it to be univerfally colde. He then who faith that the multitude and most part of men do erre, in holding that to be simplie hot, which doth heat, and that likewife to be cold, which doth coole, is deceived himselfe, ithe thinketh not, that it followeth by good consequence upon that which hee hath said, that one 30 thing is more such than such. And afterwards he inferreth this speech, that many times wine entring into the body, bringeth with it neither a calefactive nor a refrigerative vertue; butthat when the maffe of the body is moved and stirred, so as there is a transposition made of the parts, then the Atomes which are effective of heat, concurre together one while into one place, and through their multitude, fet the body into an heat and inflamation; but another while by difperfing and fevering themselves afunder, inferre coldnesse.

Moreover he diffembleth not but that he is proceeded thus farre, as to fay, that whereas wee take things to be, and doe call them bitter, sweet, purgative, soporiferous, and lightsome, none of them all have any entier quality or perfect property to produce such effects, nor to be active more than passive, all while they be in the body, but that they be susceptible of fundry tempera- 40 tures and differences. For even Epicurus himselfe, in his second booke against Theophrasius, in faying that colours are not naturall unto bodies, but are engendred according to certeine fituations and politions, respective to the cie-sight of man, saith by this reason, that a bodie is no more destitute of colour, than coloured. And a little before, word for word he writeth thus: But over and befide all this, I know not how a man may fay, that these bodies which be in the darke, have any colour at all; and yet oftentimes when the aire a like darke is fored round about, some there be who can diffinguish the diversity of colours, others perceive nothing at all, by reason of their feeble & dim-fight. Againe when we goe into a darke house, we see not at our fiest entrance, any colours, but after we have beene there a pretie while, we perceive them well enough: And therefore we are to fay, that ech body is not rather coloured than not coloured. If then co-50 lour be a relative, and hath being in regard of fome other things, white also is a relative, and blew likewise: if these, then sweet and bitter semblably: so that a man may truely affirme of every quality, that it is not more fuch, than not fuch. For to those who are so disposed, a thing shall be such, and to them that are not so affected, not such. So that Colores doeth all to dash and beray both himselfe and his master also, with the same mire and dirt, wherein he saith those doe flicke who hold that things are not more fuch than fuch. What then doth this egregious clerke heerein onely flew himfelfe, according to the old proverbe:

Aleech professing others for to cure, Whiles he himselfe is full of sores impure?

Noverily : but much more yet in his fecond reprehension, he chaseth ere he is aware Epicurus together with Democritus out of this life: for he giveth out that Democritus faid, The atomes are unto the fenses by a certeine law and ordinance colour, by the said law sweet, and by the fame law bitter: Also that he who useth this reason, and holdeth this opinion, knoweth not himselfe, if he be a man? nor whether he be dead or alive? To contradict these speeches I wor not well how: but thus much I fay, that this is as much inseparable from the sentences and doctrine of Epicurus, as figure and weight by their faying from the Atomes: for what faith Demo-10 critus? That there be substances in number infinite, which are called Atomes, because they cannot be divided: howbeit different, without qualitie and impaffible, which doe moove and are caried, differfed to and fro in the infinit voidnesse, which when they approch one another, or concur and meet together, or else be enterlaced & enfolded one about another, then appeereth of these thus heaped and hudled together, one thing water, another fire, another a plant, and another a man: That all these be Atomes still, termed by him Idea, and nothing else. For there can be no generation of that which is not; no more than that which once was can become nothing, by reason that these Atomes are so firme and solid, that they can neither change nor alter, nor fuffer. And therefore neither can there be colour made of those things which have no colour, nor nature or foule of fuch as be without quality and are impaffible. Whereupon 20 Democritus is to be blamed in that he confesseth not those things that be accident unto principles, but supposeth those to be principles, whereto these happen: For he should not have put downe principles immutable : or at leaftwife, when he had supposed them to be such, not to see withall, that therewith the generation and breeding of all qualities periffieth. And to denie an abfurdity when one feeth it, is impudence in the highest degree. As for Epicurus, he faith verily, that he supposeth the same principles that Democritus doth, but he saith not, that colour fweet, white, and other qualities are by law and ordinance. Now if he confesse not that he faith, which nevertheleffe he faid, it is no other but an old cuftome of his, & that which he is woont to doe. For much like it is to this, that he will feeme to take away divine providence, and yet hee faith, that he alloweth piety and religious devotion toward God: And albeit he giveth out that 30 for pleasure, he maketh choise of amity and friendship, yet for his friends sake he willingly endureth most grievous paines: also for all he supposeth the universall world to be infinit, yet hee taketh not away, above and beneath. But this is not like unto the maner of drinking one unto another at a table, where a man may take the cup in hand and drinke what he will, and fo give backe the rest. But in this disputation especially, it behooved to remember well the notable Apophthegme or faying of the wife man. Of what things the beginnings are not necessarie, the ends and confequences fall out to be necessary. Necessary it was not therefore to suppose, or (to speake more truely) to wring from Democritus thus much, That Atomes be the principles of the whole and univerfall world : or when he had supposed and set downe this doctrine, and withall made a glorious shew of the first probabilities and faire apparences thereof, he should 40 likewise have swallowed that which was troublesome therein, or shewed how those bodies which have no quality, could give unto others all forts of qualities, onely by meeting and joining together. As for example, to speake of that which is next to hand, this that we call fire, whence came it, and how groweth it to these indivisible bodies called Atomi? if they neither had heat when they came, nor became hot after they met together? For the former presupposeth that they had some quality, and the latter, that they were fit to receive the same, and to suffere But neither of them twaine ye say, fitteth well with the Atomes, in that they be incorruptible. How then ? did not Plato, Aristotle and Xenocrates produce golde, of that which was not golde; and stone of that which is not stone; yea, and many other things out of the source simple bodies called elements? Yes Iwis: but to gether with the faid bodies there concurre immediatly at the 50 first, the principles also, to the generation of every thing, bringing with them great contributions, to wit, the first qualities which be in them: afterwards, when there come to meet in one and Joine together, dry with moift, cold with hear, folid and firme with that which is gentle and foft, that is to fay, active bodies with fuch as be apt to fuffer, and to receive all change and alteration, then enfueth generation, which is the paffage from one temperature to another: whereas this Atome or indivisible bodie being of it selfe naked and alone, is destitute of all qualitie and generative facultie; but when it hapnesth to run upon others, it can make a found and noise onely; by reason of the hardnesse and solidity thereos, but no other accident els: for strike they doe, and are stricken againe continually: and so farre be they off from composing and making by this meanes a living creature, a soule, or a nature, that they are not able so much as to raise a round masse of themselves together: for that as they jurte and beat one upon another, so they rebound and slie backe againe a sunder. But Colotes verily, as if hee dealt with some king that was ignorant and unlettered, falleth againe upon Empedocles, breathing out these verses:

One shing will sfay more to thee:
there is no true nature
Of mortall wights: of grifty death, no seed nor geniture.
A mixture onely first there is of things, then after all,
The same grow to disumion:
and this men Nature call.

For mine owne part, I doe not see how this is repugnant and contrary unto life, among them especially who are of opinion that there is no generation of that which is not at all, nor comp. tion of that which is and hath being: but the meeting and union of fuch things as be, is called Generation; the diffolution likewise and disunion of the same, is termed Death and corruption. For that he taketh Nature for Generation, and that he meaneth fo, himselfe hath declared. when he fet Nature opposite unto Death. And if those live not nor can live, who put generalion in union, and death in difunion; what thing els doe these Epicureans? And yet Empedales, to fodering as it were and conjoining the elements by heats, fofmeffe and humidities, given them in some fort a mixtion and composition unitive : but they who drive together the Atomes which they fay to be immutable, flurdy and impaffible, compose nothing that proceedeth from them, but rather make many and those continuall percussions of them. For their interlacing which impeacheth diffolution, doth stil augment their collision: in such fort, as this is no mixion nor conglutination, but a certeine troublesome striving and combat, which according to them is called Generation. And these Atomes or indivisible bodies which meet together but a moment, if one while they recule and frart backe for the refistance of the shocke which they have given, and another while returne againe and recharge after the blow past, they are more than twice fo long apart one from another without touching or approching, fo as nothing can 30 be made of them, not fo much as the very body without a foule, But fenfe, foule, understanding and prudence, there is no man able to thinke and imagine, would be never fo faine, how they can be formed of voidnesse and of these Atomes: which neither of themselves apart have any qualitie, nor yet passion or alteration whatsoever, when they are met together, confidering that this meeting is no incorporation nor fuch a coition as might make a mutuall mixture and conglutination, but rather jurts and reciprocall concussions: in such maner, as according to the do-Etrine of these folke, supposing as they doe, such void, impassible, invisible, undivine and unhelpful principles, yea & fuch as will not receive any mixture or incorporation whatfoever, To live and to be a creature animall, falleth to the ground and comes to nothing. How commeth it then, that they admit or allow Nature, Soule and Living creature? For footh, even as they do 40 an oth, a vow, praier, facrifice and adoration of the gods, to wit, in word and mouth onely; pronouncing and naming in femblance and outward appearance, that which by their principles and doctrines they quite abolish and anull. And even so, that which is borne, they terme Nature, and that which is engendred, Generation: like as they who ordinarily call the frame of wood and timber, Wood it felfe, and those voices or instruments that accord together, Symphonie. And what should be meane to object such speech against Empedocles ? Why trouble we and weary our felves (quoth he) in being fo busie about our owne felves, in defiring certeine things as we doe, and avoiding others? for neither are we our felves, neither live we by uling others. But be of good cheere (may one haply fay) my loving and sweet Colorarion: haveno feare man: no man hindreth you, but that you may regard your felfe, teaching that the nature 50 of Colotes, is Colotes himselse and nothing els : neither that you need or defire to use certeine things. As for these things among you, they be pleasures: shewing withall, that it is not the nature of tarts, cakes and marchpanes, nor of odors, nor of love sports that you defire, but tarts and marchpanes themselves, sweet perfumes and women they be that you would have. For the Grammarian who faith, the force and firength of Hercules is Hercules, denieth not thereby that Hercules is : nor those who say that symphonies, accords or opinations are bare prolations or pronunciations, affirme not therewithall, that there be no founds, nor voices, nor opinions:

forafmuch as there be fome, who abolifhing the foule and prudence, feeme not to take away either to live or to be prudent. And when Epicaria faith, The nature of things that have being, are the bodies and the void place of them, doe we take his words, as if he meant that nature were formwhat els than the things that befor that things being, do fhew their nature and nothing els? even as for examples fake, the nature of voidneffe, he is wont to call voidneffe it felfe: yea, and I affure you, the univerfall world it felfe, the nature of all. Now if a man fhould demand of him: How now Epicaria, fay you indeed that this is voidneffe, & that is the nature of voidneffer year yerly, will heanswere againe, but this communication of names the one for another, is taken in and in use. And in trueth, that the law and custome warranteth this maner of speech, and last one in the law and custome warranteth this maner of speech, and last one in the law and custome warranteth this maner of speech, and last one in the law and custome warranteth this maner of speech, and last one in the law and custome warranteth this maner of speech.

And what other thing I pray you hath Empedocles done than taught that nature is nought else but that which is bred and engendred, nor death any thing but that which dieth? But like as Poets otherwhiles by a trope or figurative speech representing as it were the image of things

Even so the common fort of men doe use the termes of generation and corruption in things that are contracted together and dissolved. And so farre was he from stirring or remooving those things that be, or opposing himselfe against things of evident apperance, that he would not formuch as cast one word out of the accustomed use: but so far forth as any figurative frawd might hurt or endammage things, he rejected and tooke the same away, rendring against the usuall and ordinary fignification to words, as in these verses:

And when the light is mixed thus with aire in heavenly sky,
Some man is made or wilde beafts kinde,
or bir hs aloft that flie:
Or elfe the shrubs: and this rightly is cleap'd their geneture, But death, when as dissolved is the foresaid salt someture.

And yet I say my selse, that Colotes having alledged thus much, knew not that Empedocles did not abolish men, beasts shrubs or birds in as much as he saith that all these are composed and sinished of the elements mixed together: But teaching and shewing them how they were deceived, who finde fault with naming this composition a certaine nature or life: and the dissolution unhappy fortune and death to be avoided, he annulled not the ordinary and usuall use of words in that behalfe. For mine owne part I thinke verily that Empedocles doth not alter in these places the common maner of pronouncing and using the said words: but as before it was related, did really as of a different minde as touching the generation of things that had no being, which some call nature. Which he especially declareth in these verses.

Fooles as they be of finall conceit, for farr et they cannor fee, Who hope that things which never were, may once engendred be, Or feare that those which are shall die, and perish utterly.

For the fe verses are thundred out and do sound aloud in their hearing who have any eares at all, that he doth not abolish generation absolutely, but that alone which is of nothing: nor yet corruption simply, but that which is a totall destruction, that is to say, a reduction to nothing. For unto a man who were not willing, after such a savage, rude and brutish maner but more gently 50 to cavil, the verses following after might give a collourable occasion to charge Empedaeles with the contrary, when he saith thus:

No man of fenfe and judgement found, would once conceive in minde Thas whiles we living here on earth, both good and bad doe finde, So long onely we being have: (yet this men life doe sall) And birth before, or after death, we nothing are at all.

Which words verily are not urtered by a man, who denieth them their being who are borne and live, but rather by him who thinketh that they who are not yet borne, as also those that be alredy dead have their being. And even so Colotes doth not altogether reproove him for this : but he faith that according to his opinion we shall never be ficke nor wounded. And how is it possible that he who faith that men before life and after life, are accompanied with good and bad indifferently, should not leave for them, that be alive the power to suffer ? What be those then, good Colotes, who are accompanied with this immunity; that they can neither be hurt nor difeafed? E. ven your felfe and fuch as you are, who be altogether made of an Atome and voidnesse, forby to your owne faying, neither the one nor the other hath any fense. But no force. For I here of no harmeyet. Mary here is the griefe, that by this reason you have nothing in you to cause delight and pleasure, seeing that an Atome is not capaple of such things as moove pleasure: and void. nesse is unapt to be affected by them. But for as much as Colotes for his part would needs immediatly after Democritus feeme to interre and bury Permenides for ever, and my felfe in putting off a little and paffing over the defence of Parmenides, have betweene both taken in hand the maintenance of that which was delivered by Empedocles, because me thought they did more properly adhere and hang to those first imputations, let us now come againe to Parmenides. And whereas Colores chargeth him with fetting abroad certaine shamefull sophistries yet hath the man thereby made friendship nothing lesse honourablenor, voluptuousnesse and sensuallity 20 more audacious and unbrideled. He hath not bereft honesty of that attractive property to draw unto it selfe, nor of the gift of being venerable of it selfe: neither hath he troubled & confounded the opinions as touching the gods. And in faying that Allis One, I fee not how he hath himdered our life. For when Epicurus himselfe faith, that [All] is infinite, ingenerable and incorruptible, that it cannot be augmented nor diminished, he speaketh and disputeth of All, asof fome one thing. And in the beginning of his treatife concerning this matter, having delivered that the nature of All things being, confifteth in small indivisible bodies which he termeth Acomes, and in voidnesse: hee made a division as it were of one thing into two parts: whereof the one in trueth is not subfiftent, but termed by you impalpable void and bodilesse: whereby it commeth to passe, that even with you, All commeth to be but One: unlesseyou will use vaine 30 words and void of sense, speaking of voidnesse, and sighting in vaine, as with a shadow, against those attacient Philosophers.

But these Atomes you will say, are according to the opinion of Epicurus in number infinite, and every thing that appereth unto us, arifeth from them. Beholde now what principles you put downe for generation, to wit, infinity and voidnesse: whereof the one is without action, impaffible and bodileffe: the other, namely, infinity, diforderly, void of reason, incomprehensible, diffolving and confounding it felfe, for that by reason of multitude it cannot be circumscribed nor contained within limits. But Permenides hath not abolished either fire or water, or any rocke, no nor the cites (as Colores faith) inhabited as well in Europe as in Asia, confidering that he hath both *instituted an orderly dispose & digestion : and also tempering the elements to- 40 gether, to wit, light and darke, of them and by them absolutely finisheth all things visible in the world, for written he hath at large of Earth, of Heaven, of Sunne, Moone and starres : as also, spoken much of mans generation: and being as he was a very ancient Philosopher, he hathleft nothing in Physiologie unfaid, and whereof he hath not delivered both by word and writing his owne doctrine not borrowedelse where, paffing over the repugnancie of other received principall opinions. Moreover he of all others first, and even before Socrates himselfe observed and understood, that in nature there is one part subject to opinion, and another subject to intelligence. And as for that which is opinable, inconstant it is and uncertaine, wandring also and carried away with fundry passions and mutations, apt to diminish and paire: to increase also and growe, yea and to be diverfly affected, and not ever after one fort disposed to the same in so fente alike. As for the intelligible part, it is of another kinde:

as he himfelfe faith, alwaies like to it felfe & perdurable in the owne nature& effence. But colores like a fycopath, cavilling at him, & catching at his words, without regard of the matter, not arguing against his reasons indeed, but in words onely, affirmeth stally, that Parmenides overthroweth all things in one word, by supposing that All is One. But he verily on the contrary side about the supposing that the contrary side about the supposing that the supposing the supposing that the supposing the supposing that the supposing the supposing the supposing the supposing that the supposing t lishesh neither the one nature nor the other, but rendreth to ech of them that which is meet, and apperteineth thereto. For the intelligible part he rangeth in the Idea of One, and of That which is, saying that it is and hath being, in regard of eternity and incorruption: that it is one: because it alwaies resembleth it selfe, and receive th no diversity. As for that part which is Sensible, he placeth it in the ranke of that which is uncerteine, disorderly and ever mooving. Of which two, we may fee the diffinet judgement in the foule, by these verses:

The one reteins to truth which is syncere Perswassve, breeding science pure and cleere.

For it concerneth that which is intelligible, and evermore alike and in the fame fore.

The other rests on mens opinions vaine, Which breed no true beleefe but uncertaine.

For that it is converfant in such things as receive al maner of changes, passions, & mutabilities. And verily how possibly he should admit and leave unto us sense and opinion, and not withall allow that which is sensible and opinable, a man is not able to shew. But for a smuch as to that which is existent indeed, it appertaines to remaine in being, and for that things sensible, one while are, and another while are not, but paffe continually from one being to another, and alter their estate, infomuch as they deserve rather some other name than this, of being: This speech astouching All, that it should be one, is not to take away the plurality of things sensible, but to thew the difference betweene them and those that be intelligible, which Plato in his treatise 20 of Idea minding to declare more plainly, gave Colotes fome advantage for to take holde of him. And therefore me thinks it good reason to take before me all in one traine, that also which he hathspoken against him. But first let us consider the diligence, together with the deepe and profound knowledge of this Philosopher Plato, considering that Aristotle, Xenocrates, Theophrastus, and all the Peripateticks have followed his doctrine. For in what blinde corner of the world unhabitable wrot he his booke? that you Colotes in heaping up together these criminations upon fuch personages, should never light upon their works, nor take in hand the books of Aristotle as touching the heaven and the soule: nor those compositions of Theophrassus against the Naturalists, nor that Zoroastres of Heraclitus, one booke of Hell and infernal spirits, another of Doubts and questions Naturall: that also of Dicearchus concerning the soule. 30 In all which books they are contradictory and repugnant, in the maine and principall points of Naturall philosophy unto Plato? And verily the prince of all other Peripateticks, Strato, accordethnot in many things with Ariflotle, and mainteineth opinions cleane contrary unto those of Plato, as touching Motion, Understanding, the Soule, and Generation. And in conclusion, heholdeth that the very world is not animall: and what foever is naturall is confequent unto that which is cafuall, and according to fortune. As for the Idea for which Aristotle every where feemeth to course Plato, and mooveth all maner of doubts concerning them in his Ethicks or morall discourses, in his Physicks, in his Exotericall dialogues, he is thought of some to dispute and discourse with a more contentions and opinative spirit than became a Philosopher, asif he propounded to himselfe for to convell and debase the Philosophy of Plato, so farre 40 was hee from following him. What impudent and licentious raffineffe therefore is this, that one having never knowen nor feene what thefe learned clerks had written, and what their opinions were, should coine and devise out of his owne fingers ends, and fallly charge upon them, those things which never came into their heads, and in perswading himselfe that he reprooveth and refuteth others, to bring in a proofe and evidence written with his owne hand, for to argue and convince himselfe of ignorance, or rash and audacious impudence, saying, that those who contradict Plato, agree with him, and they that repugne against him doe follow him? But Plato (quoth he) hath written: That horfes are in vaine counted by us horfes, and menlikewise. And in what odde corner of Platoes works hath Colores found this hidden? As for us wee reade in all his books, that horfes behorfes, and men be men, and that fire even 50 by him is efteemed fire; for hee holdeth every one of these things to be sensible and opinable, and so he nameth them. But this our trim man Colotes, as though hee wanted never a jot of the highest pitch of sapience and knowledge, presumeth for sooth and taketh it to be all one and the fame, to fay, Aman is not, and Aman is that, which hath no being. But Plato thinketh that there is a woonderfull great difference betweene these termes, Not to be at all, and To be that which is not: for the former importeth a nullity and abolifisment of all fubstance; and the other sheweth the difference of that which is participated and that which doth ВЬЬЬЬ participate:

* Indone flow manufactures, four divide this & reade Aid noo gov, that is to fay, hath made Jupiter the world.

participate: which diffinction and diversity they who came after, have reduced onely unto a different raunge, of kinds, formes, and of certaine common and proper qualities or accidents. but higher than fo they mounted not, falling downe upon some doubts and difficulties more reasonable: for the same reason and proportion there is betweene the thing participated and participating, as is between the cause and the matter, the original and the image, the power and the passion. Wherein principally different that which is by it selfe, and ever the same, from that which is by another, and never keepeth one state: for that the one never shall be, nor ever was not existent: and for this cause, it is truely and altogether subsistent; whereas the other hath not so much as that being constant, which it hapneth to participate from another, but doth degenerate and grow out of kinde, through imbecilitie; in that the matter doth glide and flide a- 10 bout the forme, receiving many passions and mutations bending toward the image of substance. in fuch fort, as continually it mooveth and fhaketh to and fro. Like as therefore he who faith. that Plato is not the image of Plato, taketh not away the fenfe and substance of an image, but sheweth the difference betweene that which is of it felfe, and the other which is in regard of it: even fo they abolish not the nature, the use nor sense of men, who say, that every one of us by participating the Idea of a certeine common substance, is become the image of that which giveth similitude and affinity unto our generation. For neither he who faith, that iron red hot is not fire, or the Moone, the Sunne, but (to use the very words of Parmenides)

Wandring about the earth by night. doth take away the use of a burning gleed, or the nature of the moone: but if he should affirme, that it were no bodie nor illuminate, then he went against the fenses, as one who admitted neither body nor living animall, nor generation nor fenfe. But he that by opinion imagineth these things to have no substiftence but by participation, and withall, how farre they are short and difrant from that which hath alwaies being, and which gave them the power to be, confidereth not amiffe the fenfible, but is dim-fighted in the intelligible : neither doth he annihilate andoverthrow the passions which arise and appeare in us, but sheweth unto them that are docible and follow him, that there be other more firme and flable things than these, as touching essential that they neither are engendred nor perish, nor yet suffer ought; but teacheth more clerely & purely, noting and touching the difference by the very termes and names, calling the one fort 30 existent, & the other breeding or ingendred. The same usually befalleth also to our late modern writers, who deprive many great and weighty things of this denomination of subfiftence, as namely, Voidneffe, Time, Place, and generally, the whole kinde of those speeches wherein are comprised all things true. For these things being, they say are not; and yet they say some are; yea and use the same aswel in their life as their doctrine and philosophy, as having subfistence & being. But I would gladly demand of this acculer of ours himfelfe, whether he and his fellowes in their affaires perceive not this difference, whereby fome things be permanent and immutable in their fubliances, like as they affirme of their Atomes, that they be at all times and continually after one and the same fort, by reason of their impassibility and stiffe soliditie? whereas all things compounded and compact of them, be flexible, pliable, mutable, breeding and periffi- 40 ing: for that an infinite number of images doe paffe and flow from them evermore, yea and an innumerable fort of other things, by all likelihood, from out of the ambuent aire do reflowand have recourse unto them, for to supply and fill up the heape still, which masse is become much altered, diversified and transvased as it were by this permutation, in that the Atomes which are in the bottome of the faid maffe can never cease nor give over stirring, but reciprocally heat one upon another, as they themselves affirme. So there is in things such a difference of substance as this: and yet Epicurus is more wife and learned than Plate, in that he tearmeth all things equally subsisting, Voidnesse impalpable, the Body solid and resisting, the Principles, things composed: and for that hee thinketh that the eternall doeth not so much as participate in the common substance with that which is ingendred; the immortall with that which doth perish 350 the natures impaffible, perdurable, immutable, which never can fall or be deprived from their being, with those which have their effence in suffering and changing, and never can continue in one and the same state. Now were it so, that Plato had most justly of all men in the world deferved to be condemned for his error heerein, yet my good friend, there should no imputation be charged upon him by these our great masters heere, who speake purer and finer Greeke and more exquifiely than he, but onely for confounding fome words and speaking improperly; nor to be blamed for abolishing the matters themselves, or taking us out of this life, because he termed them ingendred, and not existent, as these mendo.

But feeing wee have paffed over Socrates after Parmenides, wee must now take his defence in hand. Colores then began directly at the first (as we say in the common proverbe) to remoove him from the facred line or tribe : and having related how Charephon had brought an antwere from the Oracle at Delphos, as touching Socrates, which we all know to be so, faith thus: As for this discourse and narration (quoth he) of Charephon, for that it is altogether odious, captious, fophiliticall, and full of untrueth, we will overpaffe. Then is Plato likewife (to fay nothing of others) odious and abfurd, who hath put the faid answere downe in writing. Then are the Laceto demonians more odious and intolerable, who keepe that Oracle delivered, as touching Lyeur. em, among their most ancient writings and authenticall records. Semblably, the discourse and natration of Themistocles was a sophisticall and counterfeit device, whereby he perswaded the Athenians to abandon their citie, and fo in a navall battell defaited the barbarous prince Xerxes. And even so all the noble lawgivers and sounders of Greece are to be counted odious and intolerable, who established the most part of their temples, their factifices and solemne feasts, by the answere from the Oracle of Apollo. But if it be so, that the Oracle brought from Delphi as touching Socrates, a man ravilhed with a divine and heavenly zeale to vertue, whereby he was declared and pronounced wife, were odious, fained and fopficall; by what name shall we truely and justly call your cries, your shours, your hideous noises, your applauses and clapping of 20 hands, your adorations and canonizations wherewith you exalt and celebrate him, who incited and exhorted you to continuall pleafures one after another, who in one of his letters fent unto Anaxarchus hath written thus: As for me, I invite and call you to continual pleasures, and not to these vaine and unprofitable vertues, such as have nothing but turbulent hopes of uncertaine fruits. And yet Metrodorus writing unto Timarchus, faith thus unto him, Come on (quoth he) let us do some goodly and honest thing for those who are faire and beautifull, so that we be not plunged in these semblable and reciprocall affections, but retiring anon out of this base and terreltriall life, let us advance our felves to thefe true, holy and divine ceremonies and mysteties of Epicurus. And even Colotes himselfe hearing Epicurus one day discoursing of Naturall things, fell downe at his feet immediatly, and tooke holde of his knees, as if hee had beene a 20 god. And Epicurus likewife taking no small pride and gloric heerein, writeth thus unto him againe: For as if you adored that which then was delivered by mee, there came upon you fuddenly adefire and zeale proceeding from no cause in nature, to come toward mee, to proftrate your felfe upon the ground, to clip and claspe my knees, and to use those gestures unto me, which ordinarily they doe, who worthip the gods and pray unto them: So that you have (quothhe) made mee also reciprocally to deific and adore you. Certes I could finde in my heart to pardon them, who fay they would not spare for any cost, but give they cared not what for a table or picture, wherein they might fee lively represented to the eie this story depainted; namely, how the one lieth proftrate at the others feet, and embraceth his knees: who mutually againe adoreth him, and maketh his devout praiers unto him. And yet this devotion 40 and service of Colotes, how well soever it was by him ordered and precisely observed, reaped not the condigne fruit thereof: for he was not by him declared A wife man: onely this bleffing he had from him againe, Goe thy waies and walke immortall, and repute us also semblably immortall. These men knowing full well in their owne consciences that they use such toolithwords, ridiculous jestures, and fond passions, yet for footh they are so bold as to call other men odious. And Colores verily having given us a taste of his goodly first fruits, & wife positions as touching Naturall senses, namely, That we do cate our viands and cates, not hay or forage, and that when the rivers be high, wee ferry over them in botes, but when they be low and passable, we wade easily on foot through the fourd, exclameth and crieth out afterwards: You use ô Socrates vaine speeches, you interteine those who come and speake unto you with one thing in word, and do practife others cleane contrary in deed. And fay you fo Colotes? First I would gladly know wherein the words of Socrates were vaine & arrogant, confidering that he was wont ordinarily to fay, that he knew nothing at all, but was a learner continually, and went to fearch and finde out the trueth? But if haply you should light upon such speeches from Socrates his mouth, as those were which Epicurus wrote unto Idomeneus, send us then the first fruits, for the furniture of our facred body, for us (I fay) & our children: For thus it comes upon me to speake, what more infolent and sottish words could you devise to speake? And yet, that Socrates never faid otherwife than he did, he hath given us marvellous proofes in the battell of

Delium, and in that of Potidea: That which he did during the time of the thirty tyrants against Archelaus and against the people of Athens: his poverty; his death; his carriage and demeanour in all these times and occasions, be they not answerable every way to the sayings and doctrines of Socrates? This had beene a true proofe indeed, to have shewed that heelived and did otherwise than he spake and taught, in ease he had proposed the end of man to be a joifull and pleafant life, and then lived ashe did. Thus much as touching the reprochfull termes that hee hath given Socrates. Moreover, he perceiveth not how himselfe is attaint even in those points * Sec 1917 cress- which he reproove thand objected as touching things * evident and apparent. For one of the positions and decrees of Epicurus is this, That no person ought irrevocably to beleeve orbe perlwaded to a thing, but onely the wife man. Now feeing that Colores became not one of the 10 Sages, for all that adoration & worship which he performed unto Epicurus, let him demand first and formost these questions, Howit is, that he falleth to cates, and not to hay, when he hath need of victuals? and why he casteth a robe about his owne body, and not upon a pillar? confidering that he is not affuredly perswaded, that cates be cates, or that a robe is a robe: But ifhe doe fo, namely, feed upon viands, and weare arobe: if he venture not to wade through rivers when they be rifen and high; if he flie from ferpents and woolves, being not in a fure beleefe that any thing is such as it seemeth, but doing every thing according as it appeareth unto him; the opinion as touching fenfes, would not hinder Socrates at all, but that he might likewife use that which seemeth not him. For bread seemed not bread unto Colotes, nor hay to be hay, because he had read those holy canons and facred rules of Epicurus which fell from heaven 20 out of Impiters lap: and Socrates upon a vaine arrogance of his owne, conceived an imagination of bread that it was hay, and of hay that it was bread. For these wise men heere, have bener opinions and rules to goe by than we. But to have fende, and to receive an impression in the imagination of things evident, is common as well to ignorant persons as to Sages, for that it proceedeth from causes that need no discourse of reason. But that position, that our natural fenses are not certeine nor sufficient enough to proove a thing, and cause beliefe, is no hinderance, but that every thing may appeare unto us: but when we use the senses in our actions, according to that which appeareth, it permitteth us not to trust the, as if they were every way true and without error: for that sufficeth in them, which is necessary and commodious for use, because there is nothing better. As for Science, knowledge, and perfection, which the soule of 30 a Philosopher desireth to have of every thing, the senses have just none. But of these matters which Colores hath charged upon many others, he will give us occasion else where to discourse thereof.

Furthermore, that wherein he doth vilipend and mocke Socrates most, in that he demaundeth the question, What is man? and in a youthfull bravery, and childishly as he faith, affirmeth that he knoweth not, it is evident that even hee who derideth him, never came himfelfe where it was, nor atteined thereto: whereas Heraelitus contrariwife, as one who had done a great and worthy matter, faid thus, I have beene feeking out my felfe. And of all those sentences which are written over the gates of Apolloes temple at Delphos, this was thought to be most heavenly and divine, Know thy felfe: which gave unto Socrates occasion first to doubt and en- 40 quire thereof; according as Arifforle hath fee downe in his Platonique questions. But this forfooth feemeth unto Colotes to be a foolish and ridiculous thing. I marvell then why hemocketh not his mafter likewise for doing so, as often as he writeth and discourseth as touching the fubstance of the foule, and the beginning of that confused masse: for if that which is compounded of both, as they themselves doe teach, to wit, of such a body & soule, be man, he who searcheth the nature of the foule, fearcheth confequently the nature of man, even from his principall & chiefe principle. Now that the fame is hardly by reason to be comprehended, but by the outward sense altogether incomprehensible, let us learne not of Socrates, a vaine glorious man & fophisticall disputer, but rather of these wise men here, who doe forge & frame the substance of the soule so farre onely as to the faculties extending to the flesh, whereby she giveth heat, 50 foftnesse & strength to the bodie, of I wot not what heat and aireous spirit, never wading so far as to that which is the principall, but faint & give over in the way. For that faculty whereby the judgeth, whereby the remembreth, whereby the lovethor hateth, and in one word, that reason which wifely foreseeth & discourseth, he saith, is made of a certaine quality which is nameless. Now that this nameles thing is a mere confession of shameful ignorance, in them that say they cannot name that, which indeed they are not able to comprehend and understand, we know well enough. But this also may well deserve pardon, as they are wont to say, For it seemeth that this is no small and light matter neither a thing that every one can finde out and reach unto, being deeply fettled in the bottom of some by-placefar remote and in some obscure and hidden corner, feeing that among fo many words and termes which be in use, there is not one fignificant enough and sufficient to declare and explaine the same. And therefore Sorrates was no foole nor lob, for feeking and fearching what himfelfe was, but they rather be dolts who go about enquiring after any other thing before this, the knowledge whereof is fo necessary and hard to be found. For hardly may he hope to attaine unto the knowledge of any other thing, who is not able to understand the principall part of himselfe. But say we should graunt and yeeld thus much unto him, as to confesse that there is nothing so vaine, so unprofitable and so odious, as 10 for a man to feeke himfelfe, we will be fo bolde as to demaund, what confusion of mans life this should be, or how it is that a man cannot continue in life, when he comes to discourse & reason thus with himselfe, Who and what mought I be ? Am I after the maner of some composition, confected and mingled of foule and body? or rather a foule making use of the body, as the horfman doth of his horse? and not a subject composed of horse and man? or whether the principall part of the foule whereby we understand, we discourse, we reason and doe every action, is every each one of us? and all the parts befides both of foule and body, be nothing but the organs and inftruments ferving to this puiffance and faculty ? Orto conclude, whether there be no substance of the foule apart, but onely a temperature and complexion of the body, so disposed, that it hath power to understand and to live. But Secrates herein faith he doth not over-20 throwthe life of man, confidering that all naturall philosophers doe handle this argument, Mary they be those monstrous questions that trouble the common-wealth, and turne all upside downe, which are in the Diologue Phedras, wherein he thinketh that he ought to examine and confider himfelfe, namely whether he be a beaft more favage, more fubtill, cautelous and furiousthan ever was that Typhon: or rather fome animal more tame and gentle by nature, and endued with a portion more divine, and a condition nothing proud and infolent. But yet by these discourses and reasonings he overturneth not the life of man, but he chaseth out of it prefumption & arrogance, proud and puffed up opinions and vaine overweenings of a mans felfe: For this is that fell Typhon, which your good mafter and teacher hath made to be fo great in you, warring as he doth both against the gods and all good and godly men.

30 After he hath done with Socrates and Plato, he falleth in hand with the Philosopher Stilpo. As for the true doctrines and good discourses of the man, whereby he ordered and governed himfelfe, his native country, his friends, & those kings and princes who affected him and made good account of him, he hath not written a word: neither what gravity and magnanimity was in his heart and the same accompanied with mildenesse, moderation, and modesty: but of those little sentences or propositions which Stilpo was wont to use & cast forth in meriment against the Sophisters, when he was disposed to laugh and play with them, he made mention of one: and without alledging any reason against it or solving the subtilty thereof, he made a trageedie, and kept a foule stirre with him about it, faying that by him the life of man and the whole course of this world was subverted: because he said, that one thing could not be affirmed and ve-40 rified of another. For how should we live (quoth Colotes) if we may not say a good man, or a man is a captaine, but we must pronounce apart, man is man, good is good, and captaine is a captaine: neither ten thousand horsmen, nor a fensed city, but horsmen be horsmen, ten thoufand be ten thousand, and so of the rest? But tell me I pray you, what man ever lived the worse for faying thus? And who is he who having heard these words and this maner of arguing, did not conceive and understand straight waies that it was the speech of a man disposed to make some game and disport learnedly, or to propose unto others this Logicall quillet for exercise fake? It is not Colotes, fuch agreivous scandall and hainous marter as you would make it, to say man is not good or horimen be not ten thousand: marry to affirme that god is not god as you and the rest doe, who will not confesse that there is a Jupiter president over generation, or a Ce-50 res that giveth lawes, or a Neptune superintendent over plants, is a dangerous point. This is the separation of names and words that is pernicious, this filleth our life with contemptuous impiety, Athisme & dissolute audaciousnesse: For when you plucke from the gods these attributes & appellations that effentially be linked & tied to them, you abolish therewithall holy sacrifices, divine mysteries, sacred processions and solemneseasts: for untowhome shall we performe the nuptiall facrifices called Proteleia; unto whom shall we offer the oblations for health named Soteria? How shall we accomplish the rites of Phosphoia, the Bacchanals, and the ceremonies going before mariage, if we leave not any priests of Bacehow, if we admitte not Phosphori Procress, and the faving gods Soteres? For I tel you, this toucheth the maine & principal points, this bree. deth error in the things themselves & not about certaine bare voices in the Syntaxes and construction of words or use of termes. Now if these be matters that trouble and subvert this life of ours, who be they that offend and be delinquent more in their phrase & language than you? who making prepositions to be the only substance of speech, abolish altogether all simple voices. & admitting fuch as come next hand, you abolifh in the meane while the things by them fignified; whereby all discipline, doctrines, erudition, anticipations, intelligences, inclinations and asfents are performed, and holde generally that all these be just nothing. But as for Stilpo thus the case standeth : If we affirme of an horse, to runne : he doth not say that the thing affirmed which the Logicians call Predicatum, is all one with the Subjectum, of which it is affirmed; but 10 that the effential definition of a man is one, and that of good is another; as also, to bean horse is different from to be running: For if we asked the definition of the one and the other, we will not give the same for both, and in that regard, they doe amisse who affirme the one of the other, For if a man and Good were all one: likewife, an horse, and to runne were both one: how commeth it to paffe that the terme Good is affirmed of some meate, drogue, or medicine, and to run likewife, of a lion and a dog? But if the Predicatum or thing affirmed be different, then we doe not well, to fay, Good man, or the horse runneth. Now if Stilpo in these matters doe exorbitate and be fouly deceived, admitting no copulation at all nor connexion of fuch things as are faid to be in or about the fubject, together with the faid subject it selfe: but every one of them if it be not absolutely the very same with that unto which it hapneth, hee thinketh not that the same 20 ought to be faid and affirmed thereof as an accident: and if therein he be offended with some termes, and go against the ordinary custome of speech, he doth not therefore streightwaics subvert and overthrow mans life, nor humane affaires, as all the world may fee well enough.

Colotes now having done with the ancient Philosophers, turneth himselfe to those of his owne time, and yet he nameth not one. Howbeit, he should have done better to have argued aswell against these moderne as those ancients, by name, or not at all to have named those of old time. But he who so often hath pricked Socrates, Plato & Parmenides with his pen, sheweth plainly, that it was for meere cowardife that he durft not be feene to deale with the living; and not upon any modesty or reverence that he spared their names, considering that he used them, who were farre more excellent than they, in no good fort and respect. His meaning was as I 20 fuspect and gueffe, to affaile the Cyrenaiques first, and then in a second place the Academicks, sectaries of Arcefilaus: for as these were the Philosophers who doubted of all things and yeelded their affent in nothing at all; fo the other reposing passions and imaginations in themfelves, thought that the beliefe proceeding from thence, was not sufficient to affure & confirme things, but faring like unto those who are besieged within a citie, abandoning and forfaking all without, they keepe themselves thut within their passions, using this word ordinarily, It seemeth: and of things without, affirming and pronouncing, It is. And therefore (quoth Colotes) they cannot live nor have the use of things. And then, playing his part as it were in a Comedie: These men (saith he) denie that a man, a horse and a wall are; but they say, that they become walles, horses and men; abusing first and formost cautelously and wickedly these termes, like 40 flanderous and foule mouthed fycophants: for furely this is an ordinary cast and usuall with these men. But it behooved to declare the thing it selfe, according as they teach : for they affirme, that things become fweet, wax bitter, prove lightfome, or grow darke, when ech of these hath the proper efficacie of these passions in it selfe naturally inbred, and such as can not be distracted from it. But if honie be faid sweet, an olive branch bitter, haile colde, meere wine hot, the aire of the nightdarke; therebe many beafts, many things, and many men, that will tellific the contrary: whiles forme arc offended with honic and abhorre it, others are delighted with the tafte of the olive branch; some are burnt and findged by haile, others cooled with wine; some can not abide the light of the Sun but their fight therewith is dazled and dimmed, others again fee well enough by might: And therefore opinion perfifting still and abiding in the passions, 50 keepeth it felte from offence and errour : but going foorth once, and builly judging or pronouncing of things exterior, it troubleth many times it felfe, and repugneth with others, who of the same objects receive contrary passions, and different imaginations. And as for Colores, he resembleth for all the world young children who newly begin to learne their A. B. C. for beinguled to pronounce and name the letters which they fee engraven in their owne battleders, when they finde them written elswhere, they slicke at them, and are much troubled: and even so the very words and fayings which he approoveth, praifeth and embraceth in the writing sof $\pm pi$

curis, hee will not understand nor acknowledge, when they are uttered by others. For when there is prefented unto us one image round and another broken, they who fay that the fenfe verily is truely informed and hath a true impression, but will not fusfer us to pronounce that the tower is round, but the oare broken, furely they confirme thereby that their paffions be their owne fanfies and imaginations, but they will not avow and confesse, that the things without are fo affected. But as they before are to fay, that they be not horse or wall, but become horse and wall; even to of necessitie we must say, that the fight is imprinted with a round figure or triangular with three unequall fides, but not that a tower is necessarily either triangular in that fort or round: for that the image wherewith the fight is affected may well be broken, but the oare 10 from whence proceedeth the image is not broken. Seeing then there is a difference betweene the passion and the subject without, either we must say that the beliefe abideth in the passion, or elsthat the being which is affirmed by the apparence is convinced of untructh, and not found to be fo. And whereas they cry out and be offended and angry about the fenfe, they doe not fay that the thing without is hot, but that the paffion in the fenfeis fo: is t not all one with that which is spoken as touching the taste, as if one should say, that the thing without is not fweet, but that it is some passion and motion about the sense, that is become such? And he who faith, that hee apprehendeth the imagination of a mans forme, but perceiveth not that it is a man, whereupon hath he taken occasion to fay so? Came it not from them who say that they receive an imagination and apprehension of a bowing forme and figure, but the fight 20 doth not affirme that it is bowing and bending, neither that it is round, but some imaginationand impression about the sense is become round? True it is will some one say: but as I approch neere unto a tower, or else touch an oare, I will pronounce and affirme, that the the one is streight, and the other hath many angles and many faces: But he when he shall come neere, will confesse and fay that it seemeth so and that it appeareth such unto him, butno more. O yes good fir, and more than so, when hee feeth and observeth the consequence heereupon, namely, that every fantafie and imagination is femblably of it felfe fufficientto procure beleefe, and none at all, in regard of another, but be all of equal condition. Butthis your opinion is come just to nothing, namely, that fantafies be all true, and none falle and incredible, in case you thinke that these ought to pronounce affirmatively of that 30 which is without, and believe not the othera farre off no farther than in that which they fuffer: for if they be of equal condition and beleeved alike, when they are neere, and when they be far off, meetit is and just, that either all indifferently or else not these, should have the affirmative judgement following upon them, to pronounce, that a thing is. But if there be a difference of pallion in things that be nere, & those which are farther off, then is it false that neither imagination nor fenfe is one more expresse and evident than another: like unto those which they call attellations which are nothing to the fense, but unto the opinion: so that in following the, they would have their followers to affirme and pronounce of exteriour things, attributing to opinion the judgement, that a thing is, and to lense, the passion that appeareth: whereby they transpor the judgement from that which is alwaiestruc, unto that which fulleth often times to be fo, 40 But what need is there at this time to shew, the contustion and contradiction that is herein? But it seemeth that the reputation of serefilaus, who rufi all Philosophers in his time was best beloved and most esteemed, was into suball thorne in Epicurus his cies, but troubled him beyond all measure : For he giveth out of him; that delivering as he did nothing of his owne invention he imprinted in the minds of ignorant and unlettered men a certaine opinion and conceit of him, that he was a despecidence and very well feened in adikinde of literature. But fo far was Arcefilaus, from affecting any glorie & replication in shell world by broching novelties or strange opinions and derogating from the aunquants brafcribing anything of theirs to hunfelfe, that the Sophifters in his daies reprooved and charged him for flathering upon Socrates, Plato, Parmenides and Heracht withe opinions as touching the retention of affent and the incoprehensibility of things 30 who indeed never fought nor defited formuch at his hands, onely because he would referre the same unto such famous personages; the betterno be confirmed by the authority of their name, Howbeit for this; thanks be to calores audiencypione who faith that the Academicke doctrine was more ancient than Arresslans ; and was derived from others before his time unto him. But as for the retention of affent, & the doubting of all things, not for much as they verily who have greatly travelled in the matter and have Arived to that purpose for to write many great bookes and large treatifes, could ever remoove or overthrow; but bringing in at the last out of the very schoole and doctrine of the Stoicks, the cessation from all actions, as it were the fiend

Gorgon to scare folke withall, were weary and gave over in the plaine field, after they saw once, that what attempt soever they made, & which way soever they turned themselves their instinct and appetition was never so obeisant as to become a consent and approbation, neither received sense for the beginning of propension and inclination, but seemed to present it selfe to actions, as having no need to be joined with others. For surely with these men the combate is lawfull and the conslict just.

For looke what words then doest to others give, The like thou maist be sure to heare, believe.

And verily to speake unto Colores, as touching instinct and appetition, is all one as to sound the harpe before an affe. But this point of learning would be delivered unto those who can give re care and conceive, that there be in our foule three kindes of motions, Imaginative Appetitive and Affenting. As for the Imaginative, we cannot take it away, would we never fo faine; for as things approch and objects be prefented, we cannot chuse but be informed and receive asit were an impression and suffer by them. The Appetitive being stirred up by the imaginative, moveth a man effectually to those things which are proper and convenient for him, as if in the principall and reasonable part thereof there were some propension and inclination. And verily this motion do not they overthrow and anul who hold off, and keepe in their affent, doubting of every thing, but make use of this appetition or instinct, conducting naturally every man to that which is proper and meet for him. What is the onely thing then that the Academicks flie and avoid? even that wherein alone there is engendred leasing, deceit and falshood, to opine, to to apply the affent, which is a yeelding through imbecillity to that which appeareth, and hath no true profit. For our action requireth two things, to wit, the apprehension or imagination of that which is convenient and familiar: and the inftinct or appetition driving unto the fame; whereof neither the one nor the other is repugnant to the cohibition of affent. For the difcourse of reason withdraweth us from opinion, and not from appetition or imagination. When as therefore that which is pleasant and delectable seemeth unto us to be proper for us and familiar, there is no need at all of opinion forto move and carry us to it, but appetition immediatly presenteth it selfe, which is nothing else but a motion and incitation of the minde. Now for that there must be a sense as it were of these things, and the same confisting of selh and blood, the fame pleafure and delight likewife will appeare good. And therefore it will tem joblably feeme good unto him who holdeth off his affent, for furely he hath fenfes, and is made of flesh, blood and bone, and so soone as he hath apprehended the imagination of good, he hath an appetite and defire thereto, doing all that ever he can, not to miffe it nor leefe the fruition thereof: but as much as is possible to cleave and adhere continually to that which is proper unto him, as being driven and drawen thereto, by Naturall and not Geometricall constraints. For these goodly, pleasant, gentle and tickling motions of the flesh, be of themselves without any other teacher attractive enough, as they themselves sorget not to say, and are able to draw and traine him who foever he be, that will not confesse nor be knowen, but stoutly denieth that he is made fost and pliable by them. But paradventure you will aske me how it comes to passe that one of these that are so retentive and deinty of their assent, climeth not up some hill , but to 40 the baine or hot house: or when hee riseth and purposeth to goe into the market place, why hee runneth not his head against a post or the wall, but taketh his way directly to the dore? And aske you me this question indeed, you that holde all fenses to bee infallible, the apprehensions also and imaginations to bee certaine and true ? Forfooth it is because the baine feemeth unto him a baine and not a mountaine, the dore also appeareth to be a dore, and not the wall: And so is it to be faid likewise of such other things everie one: For the doctrine delivered as touching this cohibition of affent, doth not pervert the fenfe, nor worke in it by strange passions and motions any such change and alteration as may trouble the imaginative faculty. Onely it taketh away and subverteth opinions, but useth all other things, according to their nature. But impossible it is not to yeeld consent unto apparent eviden so ces. For to denie those things which wee are verily perswaded of and doe believe, is more abfurd, than neither to deny nor affirme any thing at al. Who be they then that deny fuch things as they believe, and goe against things evidence; even they who overthrow divination, and denie that there is any government by divine providence: they who say that neither the sunisanimall nor the moone, which all men honour and adore, to which they make their praiers and offer facrifice. As for you, doe yee not anull that which is apparent to the whole world, to wit, that naturally infants & yongones, are conteined within their mothers and dams? and that betweene paine and pleasure there is no meane, even against the sense and experience of all men? saying that not to be in paine, is to have pleasure; and not to do, is to suffer; as also, not to joy, is to be sorowfull? But to let passe all the rest, what is more evident, and so sully believed generally, than this, that those who have their braines troubled, and their wits distracted, or otherwise sicke of melancholicke diseases, weene they see and heare those things which they neither heare no see? namely, when their understanding comes to be in such fort affected and transported, as so breake out into these speeches?

These women here in habit blacke yelad, hold in their hands, To dart at me and burne mine eies, torches and firy brands. Also:

Loe how she in her armes doth beare My mother deare, who did me reare.

These verily, and a number besides of other illusions more strange and tragicall than these, resembling the prodigious monsters that Empedacles describeth like anticks, which they make sport and laugh at,

Ειλίπολι, * Κειτόχεια, η Βυγμίη, Ανδεύτρωρα.

*Orrathee Ketogeta,

That is to fay, With erooked shanks and winding feet, resembling rammes in pace, In bodie made like ox or cow, like man before, in face. And all other forts of monstrous shapes and strange natures, mixed together all in one, setched from troublesome dreames and alienations of the minde. But these men say, that none of all this is any deception or errour of the fight, or vaine apparition, but be all true imaginations of bodies and figures, which passe to and fro out of the inconstant aire about them. Tell me now. what thing is fo impossible in nature, that we need to doubt, if it be possible to believe these? For fuch things as never any conceited maske-maker or devifer of vifards, any inventive potter, 30 glaffe-maker, or curious painter and drawer of woonderfull shapes, durst joine together, either to deceive the beholders, or to make them fport for their pastime: these men supposing verily and in good earnest that they be really subsistent; and that which more is, affirming all firme and constant beliefe, all certitude of judgement and of trueth, to be quite gone for ever, if such things have not their subfishence, these men I say be they, which involve all in obscuritie and darknesse, who overthrow all apparence, and bring into our judgement seare and terrour, into ouractions doubtfull fuspition; in cale our ordinary and usual actions, and such affaires of ours which are dayly ready at hand, be caried in the fame imagination, beleefe and perswasion, that these enormious, abfurd, and extravagant fansies: for the equalitie which they suppose in all, plucketh away more credit from things ordinary, than it addeth unto fuch as be uncouth 40 and unufuall: which is the cause that we know Philosophers not a few, more willing to avouch, that no imagination is true, than that all be true without exception; and who diffrust all men whom they had not converfed withall, all things which they had not tried, generally all speeches which they had not heard, rather than beleeve fo much as one of these imaginations and illustons which madde and franticke folke, fanaticall persons possessed with a surious spirit, or dreamers in their fleeps doe apprehend. Seeing then, fome imaginations we may utterly abolish, and others not, lawfull it is to reteine our affent and doubt of things whether they be or no, if there were no other cause els but this discordant, which is sufficient to worke in us suspition of things, as having nothing affured and certeine, but all incertitude and perturbation. As for the diffentions and differences about the infinite number of worlds, the nature of the Atomes, be-50 ing indivisible bodies, and their declinations to a side, although they trouble and disquiet many men, yet this comfort there is and confolation, that in all this there is nothing neere at hand to touch us, but rather every one of these questions be farre remote, and beyond our senses; wheras this diffrust and diffidence, this perturbation and ignorance about sensible things and imaginations, presented to our cies, our eares and our hands, this doubt, I say, whether they be true or falle, what opinion is it that they doe not shake and make to waver, what judgement and asfent do not they turne up-fide downe? For if men, being not drunke nor intoxicate, nor otherwife troubled in their braines, but fober, well in their wits and found of judgement, profeshing to punish those who transgresse the law divine. For they that despise and contemne these in-

also to write of the trueth, and of the canons and rules to judge by, in the most evident passions and motions of the sense, set downe that for true which can not possibly subsist, and for fallethat which substitteth, it is not to be marvelled nor thought incredible, if they give no judgement of fuch things which evidently appeare, but rather be of contrary judgements. For a man may lesse woonder at one for affirming neither the one nor the other, and keeping himselfein a meane betweene two opposits, than for putting downe things repugnant and meere contrary. For he that neither affirmeth nor denieth, but holds himselfe quiet, is lesse repugnant both unto him who putteth downe his opinion, than he who denieth it; and also to him that denieth it. than he who puts it downe. And if it be possible to make doubt and sticke at these things, it is not impossible then to doe so of others; at leastwise according to you who are of opinion, that there 10 is no difference at all betweene sense and sense, betweene imagination and imagination: and therefore this doctrine as touching the retention of beliefe and affent, is not as Colotes faith, a vainefable, nor a captious toy of rash and light-headed yong men, that love to jangle and prate, but a settled resolution and habituall disposition of stated men, who be wary and take heed that they mistake not any thing, and fall into inconvenience, or abandon at aventure their judgment to the fenles, so conjecturall and doubtfull, and not fuffring them to be deceived and caried away with those, who hold that things uncerteine, if they seeme and appeare, ought to be beleeved as well as if they were certeine, notwithstanding they see so great obscurity and incertitude in imaginations and apparent things: But rather the infinity that you put downe, and the images which you dreame of be fables. And as for heady rashnesse and a vaine humour of much 20 babble, hee engendreth in yoong students who writeth of Pythocles being not fully eighteene yeeres of age, that there was not in all Greece a better or more towardly nature; as being one who with admiration was able most excellently to expresse the conceptions of his minde; and that his case was much like to the incomparable beauty of women, withing and praying therefore, that all those surpassing gifts and most rare parts might not worke the young man hatred

But busic Sophisters they be, and vaine fellowes, who against so great and excellent personages, dare write fo impudently and proudly: And yet I confesse, Plato, Aristotle, Theophrafin, and Democritus gainfaied and contradicted those who wrote before them: Howbeit there was never manknowen but himselfe so bold, as to make a booke against all indifferently, and 20 with such a proud inscription as he did: And than afterwards for sooth, like unto those who have offended and displeased the gods: in the end of the saidbooke, as one confessing his saults, he faith: That they who have citablished lawes and ordinances, who have erected roiall governments and politickerule of cities and states, have set the life of manin great quiet, safety, and fecurity, yea and delivered it from dangerous troubles: which if they were abrogated and put downe, we should lead a savage life like wilde beasts; one would eat another as they met together; for these be the very words that he useth, though unjustly and untruly: For say a man did abolish lawes, and yet withall leave behind unrepealed and uncondemned the doctrines and books of Parmemdes, Socrates, Heraelitus, and Plato, we should be farre for all that from devouring one another, or living a favage life; for we should feate and forbeare dishonest things, we 40 should even for vertue and honesty, honour justice, believe that the gods, good magistrates, and the angels or spirits have the guarding, keeping, and superintendance of mans life, thinking all the gold that is both above and under the ground, not able to counterpeize vertue, and doing willingly by reason and learning as Xenocrates was woont to say, that which now wedge perforce for feare of the lawes. But when shall our life become beastly, savage, and insociable? Mary when, the lawes being taken away, there shall be left remaining, books and discourses, inciting and foliciting men unto pleafure: when it shall be thought and beleeved, that the worldis not ruled and governed by Gods providence, when they shall be deemed Sages and wife men, who spit against honesty and vertue, unlesse it be joined with pleasure, and when they shall deride and mocke fuch fentences as thefe,

In Justice is an eie, Which all things doth effic. Godneere doth stand. And (ees all at hand.

As also this old said sawe; God having in his power the beginning, mids, and end of the whole world, paffeth directly throughout all nature, and goeth round about, attended upon by Justice, fructions as idle fables, and suppose that the sovereigne good consisteth in the belly and other patts, whereby we enjoy pleasure, be those who had need of the law, they ought to seare the whip, and stand in awe of some king, prince, and magistrate, who hath the sword of justice in his hand, to the end that they might not devour their neighbour by infatiable gluttony, which upon Atheisme and impiety, would grow to excessive outrage: For verily such is the life of brute beafts, for that they know nothing better than pleasure, they have no sense of Gods justice, they neither honour nor regard the beauty of vertue: But if nature hath endued them with any hardineffe, craft, and industrious activity, they employ the same, to satisfie their flethly pleasure, 10 and accomplish their lusts. And therefore Metrodorus is reputed a great wife man, for faying, that all the fine, fubtill, witty, and exquisit inventions of the foule, have been devised for to please and delight the slesh, or else for the hope to obteine and enjoy the same; and looke what art foever tendeth not thereto, is vaine & to no purpofe, By fuch difcourfes and Philosophical reasons as these, downe goe holsome lawes, and in place thereof enter in lions pawes, woolves teeth, oxespaunches, and camels necks and throates: and for want of writings and speech, the very beafts doe preach and teach fuch doctrines and opinions as these, with their bleating, bellowing, neighing, and braying: For all the voice that they have, is nothing but belly cheere, and the pleasure of the flesh, which they either embrace presently, or joy in the expectation thereof; unleffe haply there be some kind of them that delighteth naturally in gagling, cack-²⁰ ling, and garrulity. So that no man is able to praise those sufficiently, and to their full defert, who to represse such furious and beastly affections, have set downe law, established policie and government of State, instituted magistrates, and orderned holfome decrees and edicts. But who bee they that confound, yea, and utterly abolish all this? Are they not those, who give our that all the great empires and dominions in the worlde are nothing comparable to the crowne and garland of * feareleffe tranquillity and repose: Are they not those, who say, that to be a king and to reigne is to sinne, to erre and wander out of the true way hardy anger leading to felicity: yea and to this purpole write difertly in these termes, we are to show, how asilianis to tomaintaine in best fort and to keepe the end of nature: and how a man may avoid at the very saydisader first notto enter willingly and of his owne accord into offices of state and government of the son, multitude. Over and befides, these speeches also be theirs, there is no need at all henceforth for a man to labour and take paines for the prefervation of the Greeks, nor in regard of wildome and learning to feeke for to obtaine a crowne at their hands, but to eate and drinke, ô Timocrates, without hurt doing to the body, or rather withall contentment of the flesh. And yet the first and most important article of the digests and ordinance of laws and policie which Colotes so highly commendeth, is the beleefe and firme perswasion of the gods: whereby Lyeurgus in times past fanctified the Lacedemonians, Numa the Romans, that ancient Jon the Athenians, and whereby Deucation brought all the Greeks univerfally to religion: which noble and renowmedpersonages made the people devout & affectionate zealously to the gods in praices, othes, oracles and prophefies, by the meanes of hope and feare together, which they imprinted in their hearts: In fuch fort, that if you travell through the world, well you may finde cities without wals, without literature, without kings, not peopled and inhabited, without honsen, monthesse, and fuch as defire no coine, which know not what Theaters or publicke hals of bodily exercise meane: but never was there nor ever shall be any one city steme, without temple, thursh or chappell, without fome god or other, which ufeth no praides nor other, no prophetics and divinations, no facrifices either to obtaine good bleffings or to avertheavy eurles and calamities: nay, methinks a man should fooner finde a city built in the aire without any plot of ground wheronit is feated, than that any common wealth altogether void of religion & the opinion of the gods should either be first established, or afterwards preserved and maintained in that offare. This is it that containeth and holdeth together all humane fociety, this is the foundation, prop and flay of all lawes which they subvert and overthrow directly, who godnor round about the bulh as they fay, nor fecretly and by circuit of coverespeeches, but openly, and even at the first asfault set upon the principal point of all, to wit, the opinion of God, and religion : and then afterwards as if they were haunted with the furies, they confesse how greivously they have finned, in fluffling and confounding thus, all rights and lawes, and in aboliffling the ordinance of justice and pollicy, to the end that they might obtaine no pardon, for to slip and erre in opinion, although it be not a part of wife men, yet it is a thing incident to man: but to impute and objest those faults unto others which they commit themselves, what should arman call it if he for-beare to use the proper termes & names that it deserveth? For if in writing against Antidorus or Bion the Sophister, he had made mention of lawes, of pollicy, of justice and government of common weale, might not one have said unto him as Electra did to her furious brother Orestes, Poore soule, be quiet feare none ill Deare hart, in bed see thou be still.

cherishing and keeping warme thy poore body ? As for me, let them argue and exposulate with me about these points, who have lived economically or politickly. And such are they all whom Colotes hath reviled and railed upon. Among whom Democritus verily in his writings admonisheth and exhorteth, both to learne military science, as being of all others the greatest, and also to take paines, and endure travels. Whereby men attaine to much renowmeand ho- 10 nour. As for Parmenedes hee beautified and adorned his owne native countrey with most excellent lawes which he ordained: in so much as the magistrates every yeere when they newly enter into their offices, binde the citizens by an oth to observe the statutes and lawes of Parmenides. And Empedocles not onely judicially convented and condemned the principal persons of the city wherein he dwelt, for their infolent behaviour and for distracting or embelelling the publicke treasure, but also delivered all the territorie about it from sterility and pestilence, whereunto before time it was subject, by emmuring and stopping up the open passages of a certaine mountaine, through which the fouthern winde blew and overspred all the plaine country underneath. Socrates after he was condemned to death, when his frends had made meanes for him to escape, refused to take the benefit thereof, because he would maintaine and confirme the 10 authority of the lawes; chusing rather to die unjustly, than to save his life by disobaying the lawes of his country. Melifin being pretor or captaine generall of the city wherein he dwelt, defaited the Athenians in a battell at lea. Plato left behinde him in writing many good difcourses of the lawes and of civill government: but much better imprinted he in the hearts and minds of his disciples & familiars, which were the cause that Dion freed Sieily from the tyrany of Dionysius; and Thrace likewise was delivered by the meanes of Python and Heracledes, who killed king Cotys. Chabrias and Phocion, worthy commaunders of the Athenians armie, cameboth out of the schoole Academia. As for Epicurus he sentas farre as into Asia certaine persons of purpose to taunt and revile Timocrates, yea and caused the man to be banished out of the kings court, onely for that he had offended Metrodorus his brother. And this you may read written 30 in their owne books. But Plato fent of those friends which were brought up under him Arifunimus to the Arcadians, for to ordeine their common wealth, Phormio to the Elians Menedamus to those of Pyrrha, Eudoxus to the Cnidians, and Aristotle to those of Stagira, who being all his disciples and samiliars, did pen and set downe lawes. Alexander the Great requested to have from Xenocrates rules and precepts as touching the government of a kingdome. And he who was fent unto Alexander from the Greeks dwelling in Asia & who most of all other fer himon a light fire and whetted him on to enterprife the warre against the barbarous king of Persu, was Delius an Ephefian, one of Platoes familiars. Zenonalso ascholar of Parmenides undertooke to kill the tyrant Demylus, and having no good fuccesse therein, but missing of his purpose, maintained the doctrine of Parmenides to be pure and fine golde tried in the fire from all basemet 40 tal, shewing by the effect, that a magnanimous man is to feare nothing, but turpitude and dishonour and that they be children and women, or else esseminate and heartlesse men like women, who are affraid of dolor and paine: for having bitten off his tongue with his owne teeth, he fpit it in the tyrants face. But out of the schoole of Epicurus, and of those who follow his rules and doctrines, I doe not aske what tyrant killer there was or valiant man and victorious in feats of armes, what lawgiver, what counfellour, what king or governour of flate, either died or fuffied torture for the upholding of right and justice : but onely which of all these Sages didever so much as imbarke and make a voiage by fea in his countries fervice and for the good thereof? which of them went in embassage or disbursed any mony thereabout? or where is there extant upon record any civill action of yours in matter of government. And yet because that Metrodo- 10 ru went downe one day from the city, as far as to the haven Pyr aeum, & tooke a journey of five or fix miles to aide Mythra the Syrian one of the king of Perfias traine and court, who had bene arrested and taken prisoner, he wrot unto all the friends that he had in the world, of this exploit of his : and this doubty voiage Epicurus hath magnified & exalted in many of his letters. What a doe would they have made then, if they had done such an act as Aristotle did who reedified the city of his nativity Stagira, which had bene destroied by king Philip ? or as Theophrasius, who twice delivered and freed his native city being held and oppressed by tyrants? Should not thinke you the the river Nilus have fooner given over to beate the popyr reed, than they bene weary of discribing their brave deeds. And is not this a grievous matter and a great indignity, that of so many fects of Philosophers that have bene, they onely in maner enjoy the good things and benefits that are in cities, without contributing any thing of their owne unto them? There are not any Poets Tragedians or Comedians, but they have endevoured to doe or fay alwaies fome good thing or other for the defence of lawes and policie: but these here, if peradventure they write ought, write of policie, that we should not intermeddle at all in the civill government of flate: of Rhetoricke, that we should not plead any causes eloquently at the barre : of Roialty, that we should avoid the converting and living in kings courts: neither doe they name at any time 10 those great persons who manage affaires of common weale, but by way of mockerie for to debale and abolish their glorie. As for example of Epaminondas they fay that he had indeed some good thing onely in name and word, but the fame was but warry that is to fay, as little as might be, for that is the very terme that it pleafeth them to use. Moreover they name him heart of yron demaunding why hemarched up and downe through out all Peloponnesus with his armie as he did, and fat not rather quiet at home in his owne house with a dainty chaplet upon his head given wholly to make good chere, and to fleepe with his belly full in a whole skin. But me thinks I should not for any thing omit in this place to rehearle what Metrodorus hath written in his booke of philosophy, wherein abjuring all dealing in government of state, he saith thus, Somethere be of these wisemen (quoth he) who being full of vanity and arrogancy, had to 20 deepe an infight into the bufineffe thereof, that in treating of the rules of good life and of vertue they fuffer themselves to be carried away with the very same defires that Lyeurgus and Solon fell into. What? was this vanity indeed and the aboundance of vanity and pride, to fet the city of Athens free, to reduce Sparta to good policy, and the government of holfome lawes, that young men should doe nothing licenciously nor get children upon curtifans and harlots? and that riches, wanton delicacie, intemperance, loofenesse & dissolution should beare no sway nor have the commaund in cities, but law onely and justice; for these were the desires of Solon. And thus Metrodorus by way of scorne and contumelious reproch addeth thus much more for a conclufion to the reft, And therefore (quoth he) it is well beforming a gentleman, to laugh a good and right heartly at all other men, but especially at these Solones and Lyeurgi. But verily such an one 30 were not a gentleman Metrodorus, nor well borne, but fervile, base, unruly and diffolute and who described to be scurged not with the whip which is for free borne persons, but with that whip Aftragalote, wherewith the maner was to whip and chaftice those gelded facrificers called Gally when they did amiffe in the cerimonies and facrifices of Cylore the great mother of the gods. Now, that they warred not against the lawgivers but the very lawes themselves, a man may heare and learne of Epicurus; for in his questions he demandeth of himselfe, whether a wife man being affured that no man ever should know, would doe and commit any thing that the law forbiddeth? and he maketh an answere which is not full nor an open, plaine and simple affirmation, faying, doe it I will, marry confesse it and be known thereof I will not. Againe, writing as I suppose unto Idomeneus, he admonisheth him not to subject and enthrall his life unto lawes and 40 theopinions and reputations of men: unlesse in this regard onely that otherwise there is prepared odious whipping chere and that neere at hand. If then it be so, that they who abolish lawes, governments and policies, do with all subvert and overthrow mans life: if Metrodorus and Epicurus doe no leffe, withdrawing and averting their friends and followers from dealing in publicke affaires, and spitefully hating those who doe meddle therein, miscalling and railing at the chiefe and wifeft lawgivers that ever were, yea and willing them to contemne the lawes, so that they keepe themselves out of the searce of the whip and danger of punnishment, I cannot fee that Colores hathin any thing fo much belied others, and raifed false imputations against them, as he hath indeed and truely accused the doctrine and opinions of Epicurus.

The Summarie.

🏹 His Dialogue is more dangerous to be read by yoong menthan any other Treatife of Plutarch, for that there be certeine glaunces heere and there against honest marriage, to upholde indirectly and underhand, the cursed and detestable filthinesse coversly couched under the name of the Love of young boyes. But minds guarded and armed with true chastitie and the feare of God, may see evidently in this discourse the milerable estate of the world, in that there be found patrons and advocates of so detestable a cause; such I meane as in this booke are brought in under the persons of Protogenes and Pisias. Meane n hile ther may perceive likewise in the combat of matrimonial love against unnatural Pæderastie not to be na- 20 med, that honeflie hathalwaies meanes sufficient to defend it selfe for being vanquisted, yea and in the end to go away with the victorie. Now this Treatife may be comprised in four principal points: of which, the first (after a briefe Preface wherein Autobulus being requested to rehear feunto his companions certeine reports which before time hee had heard Plutarch his father to deliver as touching Love . entreth into the discourse) conteineth the historie of Ismcnodora , enamoured upon a young man named Bacchon; whereupon arose some difference and dispute : of which, Plutarch and those of his companie were chosen arbitratours. Thereupon Protogenes seconded by Pilias, (and this with (econd point) setting himselfe against Ismenodora, disgraces hand discredites the whole sex of woman kinde, and prufeth openly enough the love of males. But Daphnaus answereth them so fully home and pertinently to the purpose, that he discovereth and descetch all their fithinesse, and confu-30 teth them as behoovefull it was, (hewing the commodities and true pleasure of conjugall love. Inthis defence, assifted he is by Plutarch, who prooveth that neither the great wealth, nor the forward affection of a woman to a man, caufeth the mariage with her to be culpable or woorthy to be blamed, by divers examples declaring that many women even of base condition, have beene the occasion of great evils and calamities. But as he was minded to continue this discourse, newes came how Bacchon was caught up and brought into the house of Isinchodora, which made Protogenes and Pisiasto dislodge; insomuch as their departure gave entrie into the third and principall point concerning Love what it is? what be the parts, the causes, the sundry effects and fruits thereof, admirable in all sorts of persons, in altering them so as they become quite changed and others than they were before: which is confirmed by many notable examples and similitudes. In the last point Plutarch discourseth upon this 40 argument, and that by the Philosophy of Plato and the Aegyptians, conferring the same with the doctrine of other Philosophers and Poets. Then having expresty and flatly condemned Padetrine of other Philolophers and Poets. Then having exprelly and flatly condemned Paa rastie, as a most vule and abhominable thing, and adjoined certaine excellent advertisements for the ensertening of love in wedlocke, betweene husband and wife, of which herelateth one proper example, bis speech endeth by occasion of a messenger who came in place, and drew them all away to the wedding of Isimenodora and Bacchon,

T was at Helicon (ô Autobulus) was it not, that those discourses were held as touching Love, which you purpose to relate unto us at this present, upon our request and intreaty, whether it be that you have put them downe in writing, or beare them well in remembrance, considering that you have so often required and demanded them of your father?

Autobulus.

Yes verily, in Helicon it was (ô Flavianus) among the Muses, as what time as the Thespians solemnized the seast of Cupid: for they celebrate certain games of prise every five yeeres, in the honour of Love, aswell as of the Muses, and that with great pompe and magnificence.

FLAVIANUS.

And wot you what it is that we all here that are come to heare you, will request at your hands?

A u r o B u L u s.

No verily, but I shall know it when you have tolde me.

FLAVIANUS.

Mary this it is: That you would now in this reherfall of yours, lay afide all by-matters and needlefte preambles, as touching the descriptions of faire medowes, pleasant shades; of the crawling and winding Ivie; of rils is fluing from fountaines running round about, and such like common places, that many love to insert, descriptions of the tiver suffer, of the Chast-tree, and the sine greene grasse and prety herbs growing daintily upon the ground, rising up alittle with a genule assent, and all after the example of Plato in the beginning of his Dialogue Phedrus, with more curiositie iwis and affectation, than grace and elegancie.

Aurotulus. What needs this narration of ours (my good friend Flavianus) any fuch Proceme or Pie face? for the occasion from whence arose and proceeded these discourses, requireth onely an affectionate audience, and calleth for a convenient place as it were a stage and leastfold, for to relate the action: for otherwife, of all things els requifit in a Comedie or Enterlude, there wantethnothing: onely let us make our praiers unto the Muses Mother, Ladie Memorie, for to be propice unto us, and to vouchfafe her affiltance, that we may not miffe, but deliver the whole nattration. My father long time before I was borne, having newly elpouled my mother, by occalion of a certeine difference and variance that fell out betweene his parents and hers, tooke a journey to Thefpie, with a full purpose to facrifice unto Cupid the god of Love; and to the feath heehad up with him my mother also, for that it principally apperteined unto her to performe 40 both the praier & the facrifice. So there accompanied him from his house, certeine of his most familiar friends. Now when he was come to Thefpia; he found Daphnaus the fonne of Archidamu, and Lyfander who was in love with Simons daughter, a man who of all her woers was best welcome unto her and most accepted: Sociarin also the sonne of Aristion, who was come from Tithora: there was besides, Protogenes of Tarlos, and Zeuxtopus the Lacedamonian, both of them his olde friends and good hofts, who had given him kinde enterteinment: and my father faid moreover, that there were many of the best men in Beatin there, who were of his acquaintance. Thus as it should seeme, they abode for two or three daies in the citie, enterteining one another gently at their leafurewith diffcourfes of learning, one while in the common empaled parke of exercises, where she youth used to wrestle, and otherwhiles in the Theaters and Shew-50 places, keeping companie together. But afterwards, for to avoid the troublefome contentions of Minitrels and Mulicians, where it appeared that all would go by favour, such labouring there was before hand for youces, they diflodged from thence for the most part of them, as out of an enemies countrey, and retired themselves to Helicon, and there sojourned and lodged among the Muses: where, the morrow morning after they were thither come, arrived and repaired unto them Amhemon and Pifes, two noble gentlemen, allied both and affectionate unto Barchon, furnamed The Faire, and at some variance one with another by reason of I wot not what jealoufie, in regard of the affection they bare unto him. For there was in the city of The spice, a certaine

Dame named If inendars, descended of a noble house and rich withall: yea and of wise and honest carriage besides in all her life: for continued shee had no small time in widowhood without blame, reproch or touch, notwithstanding shee was yoong, and therewith beautifull.

This fresh widow whiles she treated of a mariage to be made betweene Bacchon a yoong gentleman, a neighbours childe, whose mother was a very familiar friend of hers; a certeine yoong maiden a kinswoman of her owne, by often talking with him, and frequenting his company much, fell herselfe in some fancie with the yoong man: Thus both hearing and speaking much good and many kinde speeches of him, and seeing besides a number of other gentlemen and persons of good woorth to be enamoured upon him; by little and little she also fell to bee inhot love with the youth: howbeit, with a full intention and resolution to doe nothing that to should be dishonest, or unbesceming her place, parentage, & reputation, but to be wedded unto Bacchon lawfully in the open fight of the world, and so to live with him in the estate of wedlocke. As the thing it felfe feemed at the first very strange, so the mother of the yoong man of one side doubted and suspected the greatnesse of her state, and the nobility & magnificence of her house & linage, as not meet & correspondent to his codition, for to be a lover or to be matched there; and on the other fide, some of his companions who used to ride forth a hunting with him, confidering that the yoong age of Bacchon was not answerable to the yeeres of Ismenodora, buzzed many doubts in his head, and frighted him from her what they could, faying: That the might be his mother, and that one of her age was not for him; and thus by their jesting and scoffing, they hindered the mariage more, than they who laboured in good earnest to breake it : for hee 20 began to enter into himselfe, and considering that he was yet a beardlesse youth, and scarcely undergrowen, he was abashed and ashamed to mary a widow. Howbeit in the end, shaking off all others, hereferred himselfe to Anthemion and Pissas, for to tell him their minds upon the point, and to advise him for his best: Now was Anthemion his cousen german, one of good yeeres, and elder than himselfe farre; and Pissas of all those that made love unto him, most auftere : and therefore he both withstood the mariage, and also checked Anthemion, as one who abandoned and betraied the yoong man unto Ismenodora. Contrariwise, Anthemion charged Pissa and said he did not well: who being otherwise an honest man, yet heerein imitated leawd lovers, for that he went about to put his friend beside a good bargaine, who now might besped with fo great a mariage, out of fo worthipfull an house, and wealthy besides; to the end that he 30 might have the pleature to fee him a long time stripped naked in the wrestling place, fielh still, and smooth, and not having touched a woman. But because they should not by arguing thus one against another, grow by little and little into heat of choler, they chose for umpiers and judges of this their controversic, my father and those who were of his company; and thither they came; affiftant also there were unto them, other of their friends, Daphnaus to the one, and Protogenes to the other, as if they had beene provided of fet purpose to plead a cause: As for Protogenes who fided with Pisias, he inveighed verily with open mouth against dame Ismenodo. ra: whereupon Daphnaus: O Hercules (quoth he) what are we not to expect, and what thing in the world may not happen; in case it be so that Protogenes is ready heere to give defiance and make warre against love, who all his life both in earnest and in game, hash beene wholy in love, 40 and all for love, which hath caused him to forget his booke, and to forget his naturall country, not as Lains did, who was but five daics journey diftant: for that love of his was flow and heavy, and kept still upon the land: whereas your Capid, Protogenes from out of Cilicia to Abens, to fee faire boies, and to converse and goe up and downs with them (forto say a trueth, the chiefecause why Protogenes made a voiage out of his owna country, and became a traveller, was at the first this and no other) Heerearthe company tooke up a laughter, and Protogenes: Thinke you (quoth he) that I warre not against love, and not rather stande in the desence of love against lascivious wantonnesse, and violent intemperance, which yo most shameful acts and sitchy passions, would perforce chalenge and breake into the fairest, most shonest, and evenerable names that be? Why(quoth Daphness then) do you terme mariage and the secret of mariage, to wit, the lawfull conjunction of man and wise, most vile and dishonest actions, than which there can be no knot nor linke in the world more facred and holy? This bond in trueth of wedlocke (quoth Protogenes) as it is necessary for generation, is by good right praised by Polititians and law givers, who recommend the same highly unto the people and common multitude: but to speake of true love indeed, there is no jot or part theros in the socie.

rie and felowship of women: neither doe I thinke that you and such as your selves, whose affections stand to wives or maidens, do love them no more than a flie loveth milke, or a bee the hony combe; as caters and cookes who keepe foules in mue, and feed calves and other fuch beafts fatte in darke places, and yet for all that they love them not. But like as nature leadeth and conducteth our appetite moderately, and as much as is sufficient to bread and other viands; but the excesse thereof, which maketh the naturall appetite to be a vicious passion, is called gourmandife, and pampering of the flesh: even so there is naturally in men and women both a desire to enjoy the mutuall pleafure one of another: whereas the impetuous luft which commeth with a kinde of force and violence, fo as it hardly can be held in, is not fitly called love, neither deto fervethit that name: For love if it feife upon a yoong, kinde, and gentle heart, endeth by amity in vertue: whereas of these affections and lusts after women, if they have successed and speed never fo well, there followeth in the end the fruit of some pleasure, the fruition and enjoying of youth and a beautifull body, and that is all. And thus much tellified Aristippus, who when one went about to make him have a diffaste and mislike of Lais the curtifan, faying, that she loved him not, made this answer: I suppose (quoth he) that neither good wine, nor delicate fish loyeth me, but yet (quoth he) I take pleasure and delight in drinking the one, and eating the other. For furely the end of defire and appetite, is pleasure and the fruition of it. But love if it have once lost the hope and expectation of amity and kindnesse, will not continue nor cherish and make much for beauty fake, that which is irkfome and odious, beit never fo gallant and in 20 the flower and prime of age, unleffe it bring foorth and yeeld fuch fruit which is familiar unto it, even a nature disposed to amity and vertue. And therefore it is that you may heare some husband in a comcedie, speaking tragically thus unto his wife:

Thou hatest me: and I againe, thine hatred and distaine Will eas'ly beare: and this abuse turne to my proper gaine.

For furely, more amorous than this man is not hee, who not for lucte and profit, but for the flethly pleafure of Venus, endureth a curft, shrewd and froward wife, in whom there is no good nature nor kinde affection. After which maner Philippides the Comicall Poet scoffed at the 30 Oratour Stratocks and mocked him in these verses:

She winds from thee, she turnes away unkind,

Hardly thou canst once kisse her head behinde. Butif we must needs call this passion Love, yet furely it shall be but an esseminate and bastard love, fending us into womens chambers and cabinets as it were to Cymofarges at Athens, where no other youthes do exercise but misbegotten bastards : or rather, like as they say, there is one kinde of gentle faulcons or roiall eagles bred in the mountaines, which Homer calleth the Blacke eagle for game: whereas other kinds there be of bastard hawks, which about pooles and meres eatch fifh or feaze upon heavie winged birds and flow of flight; which many times wanting their prey, make a piteous noise and lamentable cry for very hunger and famine: even so the true and naturall love is that of yoong boies, which sparkleth not with the ardent heat of concupifcence, as Anacreon faith the other of maidens and virgins doeth: it is not befinered with fweet ointments, nor tricked up and trimmed, but plaine and fimple alwaies a man shallsee it, without any intifing allurements in the Philosophers schooles, or about publicke parks of exercise and wreftling places, where it hunteth kindly and with a very quicke and piercingeie after none but yoong striplings and springals, exciting and encouraging earnestly unto vertue, as many as are meet and woorthy to have paines taken with them: whereas the other delicate and effeminate love, that keepeth home and stirreth not out of dores, but keepeth continually in womens laps, under canapies or within curtaines in womens beds and fort pallets, feeking alwaies after daintie delights, and pampered up with unmanly pleafures, wherein there 30 is no reciprocall amitie, nor heavenly ravishment of the spirit, is worthy to be rejected and chafed farre away: like as Solon banished it out of his common wealth, when he expresly forbad all flaves and those of servile condition to love boies or to be anointed in the open aire without the baines, buthe debarred them not from the companie of women. For amitie is an honelt, civill and laudable thing: but fleshly pleasure, base, vile, and illiberall. And therefore that a servile flave should make love to a sweet youth, it is neither decent, civil nor commendable: for this is no carnall love nor hurtfull any way, as that other is of women. Protogenes would have continued his speech and said more, but Daphnaus interrupting him: Now furely, you have done it Ccccc 3 very well (quoth he) and alledged Solon trimly for the purpole; and wee must belike, takehim for the judge of a true lover, and the rule to go by, especially when he saith:

Thoushalt love boies, till lovely downe upon their face doth spring,

Catching at mouth their pleasant breath, and soft thighs cherishing.

Adjoine also unto Salon (if you thinke good) the Poet Aeschylos, whereas he faith:

Umbankfull man, unkindet bou art. For kiffes (weet which thou hast found, Regarding not of thy deare bart, The thighs so streight and buttocks round.

Here are proper judges indeed of love. Others I wot well there be, who laugh at them, because they would have lovers like to facrificers, bowel-priers and soothsaiers, to calt an cie to the hanches and the loines: but I for my part, gather from hence a very good and forcible argument in the behalfe of women: for if the companie with males that is against kinde, neither taketh a way nor doth prejudice the amitie and good will of lovers, farre more probable it is that the love to women which is according to nature, is performed by a kinde of oblequious savour, and endeth in amity: for the voluntarie submission of the semale to the male, was by our ancestos in oldetime, of Protogenes, termed years, that is to say, Grace or Favour: which is the reason that Pindarus saith Vulcane was borne of Jano and years with the state of the Craces. And 20 Sappho the Poetresse speaking to a yoong girle not as yet for her tender yeeres marriageable:

Too yoong (my childe) you seeme to me,

Withouten Grace also to be.

And Hercules was asked the question of one in these termes:

What did you force the maiden by compulsion,

Or win her grace and favour with per svasion.

whereas the submission in this kinde of males to males, if it be against their will, is named violence and plainer ape: but if it be voluntarie, and that upon an effeminate weaknesse they be so farre beside their right wits as to yeeld themselves to be ridden as it were and covered, for those be Platoes words, in maner of source socied beasts; I say such love is altogether without Grace, 30 without decencie, most unseemly, fishly and abominable. And therefore I suppose verily, that solon powered out those verses when he was a suftiey onker, ranke of blood and full of natural seed, as Plato saith: for when he was well stept in yetes he sung in another tune and wrote thus:

The sports of Venus Lady bright, And Bacchus now aremy delight: In Musicke eke I pleasure take: For why? these three menjoies domake.

when he had retired and withdrawen his life as it were out of a trouble some sea and tempessuous storme of Paderassium, into the quiet calme of lawfull marriage and studie of Philosophie.

Now if we will consider better, & looke never into the truth, the passion of Love (o Frotoge- 40 nes be it in one fex or another, is all one & the same : but if upon a froward and contentious humor you will needs divide and diffinguish them, you shall finde that this love of boics dothnot conteine it selfe within compasse, but as one late borne and out of the seasonable time of age and course of this life, a very bastard and begotten secretly in darknesse, it would wrongfully drive out the true legitimate natural love, which is more ancient. For it was but yesterday or two daies ago as one would fay my good friend, and namely, fince yong lads began in Greece to difrobe & turne themselves naked out of their clothes, for the exercise of their bodies, that it crept into these impaled places, where youthes prepared themselves for to wrestle: & there closely setling it felfe, lodged and was enftalled; where by little and little when the wings were full growen it became so insolent, that it could not be held in, but offer injury and outrage to that nuptial 50 love, which is a coadjutteffe with nature, to immortalize mankind, in kindling it immediately againe by generation according as the same is extinguished and put out by death. But this Protogenes heere would seeme to deny that the faid love tendeth to any pleasure: The truth is this, he is afhamed to confesse, and afraid to avow so much. But there must needs be devised some pretie reason, and cleanly excuse, for the touching, feeling, and handling of these faire yoong boies. Wel the pretence and colour to cover al, is amity and vertue. He best reweth himselsewith dust against he should wrestle, he doth bath and wash in cold water, he knitteth & bendeth his browes full gravely, he giveth it out and maketh his boalt that he fludieth Philofophie, that he is chafte and continent: and all this is abroad and before folke, for feare of the lawes; but when the night comes, and that every man is retired to his reft,

And if as Protogenes faith this Paderastium aimeth not at carnall conjunction, how then can is be love, if Venue be not there? confidering that of all other gods and goddeffes, her alone Cupid is destined and devoted to serve and attend upon, having neither honour, power nor authoritie, no farther than the will impart and bestow upon him. And if you say unto mee, that there may 10 be some love without Venue, like as there is drunkennesse without wine, for a man may drinke of a certein decoction of figs, or barly made into malt, & be drunke therewith: I answer you, that as this is but a flatulent exagitation, so the motion of such love is fruitlesse, unperfect, bringing lothsome satietie, and wearisome sulnesse soone. Whiles Daphnaus thus spake, it appeared evidently, that Pifias found himselfe galled, and was enchassed against him. Therefore so soone as he had made an end of his speech, after some little pause: O Hercules (quoth hee) what intollerable impudency and inconfiderate rafhnesse is this, that men should confesse and avow, that like dogs they be tied to women by their naturall parts, and so chase and banish this god Cupid, out of the publicke places of exercise, out of the open galleries and walks; from the pure conversation in open aire, sunne-shine, and before the whole world for to be ranged and brought, 20 to little spades, hatchets, drogues, medicines, charmes and sorceries of these wanton and lascivious women? For to speake of chaste and honest dames, I say, it is not beforming that they should either love or be loved. And heereat verily my father faid, that himselfe tooke Protogenes by the hand, reciting this verse out of the Poet:

Suchwords as these no doubt will make

The Argives, armes anon to take. For furely Pifias through his infolencie, caufath us to fide with Daphnaus, and undertake to mainteine his part, seeing he so farre exceedeth the bonds of all reason, as to bring into mariage and wedlocke, a fociety without love, and void of that divine instinct of amity, and inspired from heaven above: which we see how we have enough to doe for to mainteine and hold with al 30 the yokes, bittes and bridles, offeare and shame, if this hearty affection and grace be away. Then Pifias, I paffe little (quoth he) for all these words: and as for Daphnaus me thinks I see how itfareth with him, as it doth with a piece of braffe, which melteth not fo much by force of fire, as it doth by another piece of braffe melted, if a man power the same upon it, for then anon it will be liquefied and runne together with it. And even so, the beauty of Lysandra doth not so greatly affect and trouble him, as this that converfing along time with one that is enflamed and full of fire, by touching her he is himfelfe all fire: and evident it is, that unleffe hee retire with fpeed unto us, he will melt and runfall to liquor: But I perceive (quoth he) that I do that which Anthemion should most defire and wish, namely, that I am offensive both to the judges and to my selfe; wherefore I will hold my peace & say no more: You say true indeed (quoth Anthemi-40 00) you do me a great pleafure, for you should at the very first have said somewhat to the point, and upon the particular matter now in question: I fay therefore (quoth Pissas, but I protest beforehand, & that aloud, that for mine owne part I will be no hinderance, but that every woman may have her lover) that this yoong man Bacchon had need to take heed and beware of the riches and wealth of Ismenodora; otherwise if wee match him with such an house of so great state and magnificence, we shall ere webe aware consume him to nothing, like a piece of tinne among braffe. For a great matter I may tell you it were, if being so yoong as he is, and espousing a wife of meane and simple degree, he should in such a mixture hold his owne, and keepe the predominance as wine over water. But we may fee that this gentlewoman heerel feemeth alreadie to looke for to commaund and be his mafter: otherwife The would never have refused and rejec-50 ted fo many husbands as she hath done of such reputation, so nobly descended, and so wealthy withall, for to woo and follicite as the doth a very boy new crept out of the shell, no better than apage but the other day, one iwis that had more need to goe to schoole still, and be under a tutour and governour. And hecreupon it is, that those husbands who are of the wifer fort, doe of themselves cast away, or else clip and cut the wings of their wives, that is to say, their goods and riches, which cause them to be proud and insolent, sumptuous and wasteful, full of shrewdnesse, vaine, light, and foolish; and with these wings they mount many times, take their flight and away; or if they stay at home, better it were for a man to be bound with fetters of gold, as the maner is to encheine prisoners in Aethiopia, than to be tied with the wealth and riches of his wife: But he hath faid nothing as yet (quoth Protogenes) heereof, nor once touched this flting. namely, how in admitting this mariage, we shall in maner invert and that ridiculously and with abfurdity enough the sentence of Hesiodus who giveth counsell in these words:

At thirty yeares (not much above nor under) of thine age, Wed thou a wife : this is the time, most meet for mariage: At foureteene yeeres a damofell doth signes of ripenesse shew, At fifteene would the maried be,

and her bedfellow know. And we heere cleane contrary almost, will match a yoong man before he be ready for mariage. unto a woman as old againe well necreas himfelfe, as if one should fet dates or figges upon old flocks, to make them ripe. And why not? fome one will haply fay; for the is enamoured upon him, the burnes & is ready to die for love of him, I marvel much who hinders her that the goeth not to his house in a maske, that she sings not lamentable ditties at his dore, & amorous plaints, that the adorneth not his images with garlands and chaplets of flowers, and that the entrethnot into combat with her corrivals, and winne him from them all by fight and feats of activity for these be the casts of lovers; let her knit her browes; let her forbeare to live bravely and daintily, 20 putting on the countenance and habit meet for this passion: but if the be modest, shamefaced, lober, and honest, as that she is abashed so to doe; let her sit womanly and decently as it becomment, at home in her house, expecting her lovers and woers, to come and court her there, For fuch a woman as doth not diffemble, but bewraieth openly that she is in love, a man would avoid and deteft, fo farre would he be from taking her to be his wife, or laying for the ground of his mariage such shamelesse incontinence. Now when Protogenes had made an end of his speech, and paused a while : See you not ô Anthemion (quoth Daphnam) how they make this a common cause againe and matter of disputation, enforcing us to speake still of nuptiall love, who denie not our felves to be the mainteiners thereof, nor avoid to enter into the daunce as they fay, and to shew our selves to be the champions of it? Yes mary do I (quoth Anthemion) & 30 I pray you take upon you to defend at large this love: and withall let us have your helping hand about this point, as touching riches, which Piffus urgeth especially, and wherewith he seemeth to affeight us more than with any thing else: What can we doe lesse quoth my father then; for were it not a reproch offred unto woman kind, and would it not greatly redound to their diference dit and blame, in case we would reject and cast off Ismenodora, for her love and her wealth sake? But the is brave, the is fumptuous, costly, and bearing a great port: What matters that, so long as she is faire, beautifull, and yoong? But she iscome of a noble house and highly descended? What harme of that if the live in good name, and be of good reputation ? for it is not necessary ry that wives to approove their honefly and wildome, should be fower, austere, curft & shrewd: for chafte dames and fober matrons, doe indeed detest bitternesse, as an odious thing and in-40 tollerable. And yet some there be that call them furies, and say they be curst threwes unto their husbands, when they be modelt, wife, diferer, and honest. Were it not best therefore to espouse fome od Abrosonout of Thracia, bought in open market: or fome Bacchis, a Milestan * passing in exchange for raw hides, and prized no deerer: And yet we know there be many men, whom 200 at the mexchange for raw fines, and prize the detection of the mexchange for raw fines, and rule as they lift: For even minstrell wenches of Samos, and such as professed dauncing, as Aristomea, Oenanthe, with her open fale is a tabour and pipe & Agathocleia, have over-toppedkings and princes, year troaden their crownes pawae for all and diademes under foot: As for Semiramis a Syrian, the was at first no better than a poore furance, that week legislated concubing to one of the great king Nime flaves; but after that the king himwench, servant and concubine to one of the great king Ninus slaves : but after that the king him nue and obe- felfe had fet his cie and fancie upon her, he was fo devoted unto her, & she againe so imperious- 50 ly ruled over him, and with fuch contempt, that the was fo bold to require at his hands, that he would permit her to fit one day upon her roiall throne, under the cloth of estate, with the diademe about her head, and so to give audience and dispatch the affaires of the kingdome in stead of him; which when Nines had graunted, & given expresse charge with all, that all his subjects whatfoever should yeeld their loiall obedience to her as to his owne person, yea and personne whatfoever the ordeined and decreed: the caried herfelfe with great moderation in her first commandements, to make triall of the pensioners and guard about her; and when the saw that they gainfaid her in nothing, but were very diligent and ferviceable; the commanded them to arrest and apprehend the body of Nimu theking, then to binde him fast, and finally to doe him to death. Al which when they had fully executed, the reigned indeed, & for a long time in great state and magnificence ruled all Asia. And was not Belestie I pray you a Barbarian woman, bought up even in the very market among other flaves? and yet those of Alexandria have certeinetemples, chappels & altars, which king Ptolomans who was enamoured upon her, caufed to be entituled by the name of Venus Beleftie? And Phryne the famous courtenfan, who both heere and also at Delphos is shrined in the same temple and chappell with Cupid, whose statue all of beaten gold standeth among those of kings and queenes; by what great dowry was it that the to had all her lovers in such subjection under her? But like as these persons through their esseminate foftneffe and pufillanimity, became erethey were aware a very prey and pillage to fuch women: fo on the other fide, we finde others of base degree and poore condition, who being joined in mariage to noble & rich wives, were not utterly overthrowen with fuch matches, nor struck faile or abated ought of their generofitie and high spirit, but lived alwaics loved and honored by those wives, yea and were masters over them to their dying day. But he that rangeth and reduceth his wife into a narrow compaffe and low estate, as if one bent a ring to the slendernesse of his finger, for feare it should drop off, resembleth those for all the world, who clip and shave the maines of their mares, and plucke the haire off their tailes, and then drive them to water, into fomeriver or poole: for it is faid, that when they fee themselves in the water so ill favouredly 20 shorne and curtailed, they let fall their courage, stomacke, and hautic spirit, so as they suffer themselves afterward to be covered by affes. And therefore like as to preferre the riches of a woman above her vertue, or to make choise thereof before nobility of birth were base and illiberall: fo to reject wealth joigned with vertue and noble parentage is meere folly. King Antigonus writing unto a captaine of his whom he put with a garifon into the fortresse Munichia in Athens, the which he fortified with all diligence possible, commanded him not onely to make the collar and cheine strong, but the dogge also weake and leane: giving him thereby to underfland, that he should empoverish the Athenians, and take from them all meanes whereby they might rebell or rife against him. Bur a man who hath taken to wife a rich and beautifull woman, ought not to make her either poore, or foule and ill-favoured; but rather by his discretion, 30 good government & wildome, and by making semblance that he is ravished with no admiration of any thing that she hath, to beare himselfe equall unto her and in no wife subject, giving by his good demeanour and carriage a counterpeife to the balance for to hold her firme, or a waight rather to make her incline and bend that way which is good for them both. Now to returne unto Ismenodora, her yeeres are meet for mariage, and her person fitte for breeding and bearing children, and I heare fay the woman is in the very floure and best of her time; for elder the isnot (and with that he smiled upon Piffus) than any of her suters and corrivals, neither hath the any gray haires, as some of those that be affectionate to Bacchon and follow him. Now if they thinke themselves of a meet age to converse familiarly with him, what should hinder her but the should affect and fancie the yong mans person as well (if not better) as any yong maiden 40 whatloever. And verily these young solke are otherwhiles hard to be matched, united and concorporated together, and much a doe there is but by long continuance of time, to cast aside and shake off wantonnesse and wildenesse: for at the first there is many a foule day and blustring tempest, and binneth will they abide the yoke and drawe together: but especially if there be any inkling or jeloufie of other loves abroad, which like unto windes when the pilot is away do trouble and disquier the wedlocke of such young persons as neither be willing to obey, nor have the skill to commaund. If it be fothen, that a nourfe can rule her little babe fucking at her pap; alchoolemaster the boy that is his scholar; a master of exercises, the yong springall; a lover, the youth whom he loveth; the law and the captaine, a man growen and him that is able to beare armes; infomuch as there is no person of what age soever without government, and at his owne 50 libertie to doe what he lift : what abfurdity is it if a wife that hath wit and differention, and is belides the elder governe and direct the life of a yong man her husband? being as the is profitable unto him in regard the is the wifer, and befides milde and gentle in her government, for that the loveth him? Over and befides, to conclude, we all that are Boeotians (quoth he) ought both to honour Hereules, and also not to be offended with the mariage of those who are in yeeres unequall, knowing as wedoe that he gave his owne wife Megara being thirty three yeeres olde, in mariage to Iolam being then but fixteene yeeres of age. As these words passed to and fro, there came (as my father made report) one of Piffin companions galloping hard one horsebacke from out of the city bringing newes of a very strange and wonderfull occurrent. For Ismenodora, perswading her selfe (as probable it was) that Bacchon missiked not this mariage in his heart but that he held off, for the respect and reverence that he carried unto those who seemed to divert him from it, resolved, not to give over her suit, nor to cast off the yong men. Whereupon the tent for fuch of her friends, as were lufty yong and adventurous gallants, and withall her favourits those that wished well to her love: certaine women also who were inward with her and most trusty: and when she had affembled them all together in her house and communicated her mind unto them, the waited the very houre, when as Bacchon was wont ordinarily to passeby her dores, going well and orderly appointed forth to the publicke place of wrefiling. Now when he approched nere unto her house all enhuiled and anointed as he was, accompanied only 10 with two or three persons, Ismenodora her selfe stepped forth of dores, crossed the way upon him and only touched the mandilion that he had about him : which fignall being given, all at once her friends leapt forth & faire caught up this faire youth in his mandilion and dublet as he was, and gently caried him into her house, and immediatly shut the dores fast locked. No sooner had they gotten him within dores, but the women in the house turning him out of his upper mandilion aforefaid, put upon him a faire wedding robe, & withall the fervants of the house ran up and downe, and adorned with ivie and olive branches the dores and gates not onely of Ismenodora but also of Bacchons house: and with that a minstrill wench also passed along through the street piping and finging a wedding fong. As for the citizens of The spie and the strangers who were there at that time, fome of them tookeupa laughter, others being angry and offended hereat, 10 incited the masters and governours of the publicke exercises (who indeed have great authority over the youth and carry a vigilent eleunto them, for to looke nerely unto all their behavious) whereupon they made no account at all of the prefent exercises then in hand, but leaving the theater, to the dore they came of Ismenodora, where they fell into hot reasoning and debating of the matter one against another. Now when the said friend of Pissas was come in all hasteriding upon the spurre with this newes, as if the had brought some great tidings out of the campe in time of warre, he had no fooner uttered, panting for want of winde and in maner breathleffe, these words, If menodor a hath ravished Bacchon, but Zeuxippus, as my father told the tale, laughed heartily, and out of Euripides (as he was one who alwaics loved to reade that Poet) pronounced this sentence:

Well done faire dame : you having wealth at will, i Are worldly wife , your minde thus to fulfill.

But Pifico, rifing up in great choler, cried out, O the will of God, what will be the end of this licentions libertie, which thus overthroweth our citie? feeing how all the world is growen after dy to this passe, that through our unbrideled audaciousnesse, we doe what we list, and passe for no lawes? but why fay I lawes, for haply it is but a ridiculous thing to take indignation for the transgressing of civill law and right: for even the very lawe of nature is violated by the infolent rashnesse of women. Was there ever the like example seene in the very ille Lemisas & Let ils be gone (quoth he) goe we and quit from hence foorth the wreftling, schooles hand publish place of exercises, the common hall of justice, and the senate house, and commit all to wo 40 men, if the city be so inervate as to putup such an indignitic. So Pifius brake company and departed in these termes, and Protogenes followed after him, partly as angry as he, aridin part appeafing& mitigating his mood a little. Then Anthemon : To lay a tructh (quothib) this was an audacious part of hers, and favouring formwhat of the enterprise of those Demonatiwives in old time, and no marvell; for we out felves know that the woman was exceeding amorous. Here! at Soclarus: Why thinke you (quoth he) that this was a ravishment indeed, and plaine force; and not rather a fubrile devise and stratageme, as it were of a yong man himselfe, who hath wit at will to colour and excuse himselse, in that escaping out of the armes of his other lovers, he is fallen into the hands of a faire, yoong and wealthie Ladie. Neverlay to (quoth Anthemion) nor interreine fuch an opinion of Bacchon: for fay that he were not of a fimple nature (as he is) and go plaine in all his dealings, yet would be never have concealed fo much from me, confidering that he hath made me privie to all his fecrets, and knoweth full well that in these matters I was of all other most ready to second and set forward the sute of Ismenodora. But a hard matter it isto withfland not anger as Heraelitus faith, but love : for whatfoever it be that it would have, compasset the same it will, though it be with the perill of life, though it cost both goods and reputa tion. For setting this thing aside, was there ever in all our citie, a woman more wise, sober and modest than Ismenodora? when was there ever heard abroad of her, any evill report, and when went there so much as a light suspition of any unhonest act out of that house ? Certes we must thinke and fay, that the feemes to have beene furprifed with fome divine inftinct supernaturall and above humane reason. Then laughed Pemptides: You say even true (quoth he) there is a certeine great maladie of the bodie, which thereupon they call facred: is there any marvell then that the greatest and most furious passion of the minde some do terme sacred and divine? But it feemes unto me, that it fares with you here, as I faw it did fometime with two neighbours in Aegipt, who argued & debated one with another upon this point, that whereas there was prefented before them in the way as they went, a ferpent creeping on the ground, they were refolved both of them, that it prefaged good & was a luckie figne; but either of them tooke & challenged it to to himselfe: for even so when I see that some of you draw love into mens chambers, and others into womens cabinets, as a divine and fingular good thing, I nothing wonder thereat, confidering that this paffion is growen to fuch power and is fo highly honoured, that even those who ought to clip the wings thereof, and chace it from them of all fides, those be they that magnifie and extoll it most. And verily hitherto have I held my peace as touching this matter in question, for that I faw the debate and controverfie was about a private cause rather than any publicke matter: but now that I fee how Pifias is departed, I would gladly heare and know of you, whereat they armed and tended, who first affirmed that Love was a God? When Pemptides had propounded this question, as my father addressed himselfe and began to make his answere, there came another meffenger in place, whom Ismenodora had fent from the citie, for to bring Anthemion with 20 him; for that the trouble and tumult in maner of a fedition grewmore and more within the towne, by occasion that the two masters of the publicke exercises, were at some difference one with another, whiles the one was of this minde that Backhon was to be redemanded and delivered, the other against hought that they were to deale no farther in the matter. So Anthemion arose incontinently and went his way with all speed and diligence possible; and then my father calling to Pemptides by name, and directing his speech unto him : You seeme Pemptides (quotin he) in my conceit, to touch a very maine and nice point, or rather indeed to ftirre a ftring that would not be stirred, to wit, the opinion and beleefe that we have as touching the gods, in that you call for a reason and demonstration of them in particular. For the ancient faith and beleese received from our ancients in the country where we are borne is fufficient, than which there can 20 notbe faid or imagined a more evident argument:

For never was this knowledge found,

By wit of man or (enfe profound.

But this tradition being the base and foundation common to all pictic and religion, if the certitude and credit thereof received from hand to hand be shaken and mooved in one onely point, it becomments suspected and doubtfull in all the rest. You have heard no doubt how Euripides was coursed and troubled for the beginning of his Tragoedic Menalippe, in this maner:

28 36 36 46 20 Min 1948, 8c.

Jupiter whose name I know

By heare-fay onely and no mo.

40 And verily he had a great confidence in this Tragoedie, being as it should feeine inagnificently and with exquisit elegancie penned: but for the tumultuous murmuring of the people, hee changed the foresaid verses, as now they stand written:

Zd's એક તેર્દેતિકારમાં મેં હોતામિલીયા પેજાને, &c.

God Jupiter (which name in veritie Doth fort full well to his divinitie.)

And what difference is there by our words and disputation, between e calling the opinion which we have of Tupiter and of Mercurie into question and making doubt of Cupid or Love? For it is not now of late, and never before, that this God begins to call for altars or to challenge facrifices: neither is ite a stranger come among us from some barbarous superstition, like as certeine 50 Atta and I wot not what Admides and Admid, brought in by the meanes of some halfe-men or mungrest Hermaphrodutes and odde women; and thus being closely crept in, hath met with certeine shonours and worships farre unmeet for him, in such sort as he may well be accused of bastadice and under a false title to have beene enrolled in the catalogue of the gods: for my good friend, when you heare Empedocles saying thus, you must understand him, that he writest thus of Love; for that this God is not visible, but apprehended onely by opinion and beleefe, among other Gods which are most ancient. Now if of all them in particular, you seeke for a proofe and demonstration, laying your hands upon echtemple, and making a sophisticall triall by every altar, you shall find nothing void and free from calumniation and envious slander: for not to go farre off, marke but these verses:

And equall to the rest in length and breath, was Amitie; But see in sprit thou it beholde, not with deceit full eie.

But Venus uneth can I fee
How great a goddeffe she should be: S Of Cupid she the mother is,
And she alone that Love doth give:
Whose children we (you wor wel this)
Are all, who on the earth do live.

And verily, Empedoeles called her (sidate) that is to fay, fettile or giving life: Sophoeles, was that is to fay, fruitfull: both of them using most fit and pertinent attributes. Howbeit, this great and admirable worke, to wit, Generation, is wrought principally and directly by Penns, but collaterally and as an acceffary by Love: which if love be present, is pleasant & acceptable; contrariwise, if love be away, and not affistent thereto, surely the act thereforemaineth altogether not experible, difhonorable, without grace and unamiable. For the conjunction of man and woman without the affection of love, like as hunger and thirst which tend to nothing else but 20 fatiety and fulnesse, endeth in nought that is good, lovely and commendable: but the goddesse venus, putting away all lothsome statety of pleasure, by the meanes of love, engendred amitie and friendship, yea and temperature of two in one. And herereupon it is that Parmendes verily affirmeth love to be the most ancient worke of Venus, writing thus in his booke intituled cost mogenia, that is to say, the creation of the world.

But Hessiams seemeth in mine opinion more physically to have made love more ancient than any other whatsoever, to the end that all the rest by it might breed and take beginning. If then we becave this love of the due honours ordained for it, certes those which belong to Venus will 30 not keepe their place any longer. Neither can it be truely said that some men may wrong and reproch love, and sotbeare withall to doe injurie unto Venus. For even from one and the same stage we doe here these imputations, first upon love:

Love idle is it selfe, and in good troth Possesseth such like persons, given to sloth.

And then againe upon Venus:

againe upon rema:
Venus (my children) hath not this onely name
Of Venus or of Cypris: for the fame
Answere right well to many an attribute,
And surname, which men unto her impute.
For hell he is: and also violence
That never ends, but aic dosh recommence
And surious rage, yong solke for to incense

Like as, of the other gods there is not one almost, that can avoid the approbrious tongue of unlettered rusticity and ignorance. For do but consider and observe god Mars, who as it were in an Caldean and Astronomicall table standard in a place diametrally opposit unto love; which is a place diametrally oppositely oppositely oppositely oppositely oppositely opposit

Mats is starke blinde and seeth not (faire dames) but like wilde bore, By turning all things up side downe,

Homer calleth him pumperson, that is to say, imbrued with blood and polluted with murders; likewise apparation, that is to say, variable and leaping from one side to another. As for Chrissphin, by ety mologizing and deriving this gods name, fastneth upon him a criminous accusation, saying that apps, for so he is named, in Greeke, cometh of drappin, that is to say to murder and destroy:

giving thereby occasion unto some, to thinke that the facultie and power in us, prone to warre, ight, debate, quarrell, anger, and fell stomacke, is called Apis, that is to say, Mars. Like as others also will say, that concupiteence in us, is termed Pennu; our gift of speaking, Mercurie; skill in arts and sciences, Muses; and prudence, Minerua. See you not how deepe a pit and downefall of Atheisme and impietie is ready to receive and swallow us up, in case we range and distribute the gods according to the passions, powers, faculties and vertues that be in us?

Of Love.

Ifee it very well (quoth Pemprides:) but neither standeth it with pictic and religion, to make gods to be passions; nor yet contrariwise, to beleeue that passions be gods. How thinke you then (quoth my father) is Mars a god, or a passion of ours? Pemptides answered, Thathe to thought him to be a god, ruling and ordering that part of our foule wherein is feated animofitie, anger and manly courage. What Pemptides, cried out my father then, hath that turbulent. warring, overthwart and quarrelling part in us, a deitie to be prefident over it; and shall this that breedeth amity, focietie and peace, be without a divine power to governeit? Is there indeed, a martiall and warlike god of armes, called thereupon Stratim and Engalism, who hath the superinsendance and prefidence of mutual murders wherein men kill and bekilled, of armour, weapops, arrowes, darts and other thot of affaults and scaling walles, of saccage, pillage and booties? Is there never a god, to be a witneffe, guide, director and coadjutour of nuptiall affection and matrimoniall love, which endeth in unitie, concord and fellowship ? There is a god of the woods and forests, named Agroteros, who doth aide, affist and encourage hunters, in chasing 20 and crying after the roe-bucke, the wilde goat, the hare and the hart; and they who lie in fecret waitfor to intercept woolves and beares in pitfalles, and to catch them with fnares, make their praiers to Aristans,

Who first, as I have heard mensay, Did grinnes and snares for wilde beasts lay.

And Hertules when he bent his bowe, and was ready to shoot at a bird, called upon another god: and as Aefebylus reporteth, Phoebus the hunter, directed by and by, His arrow straight, as it in aire did fly.

And shall the man who hunteth after the fairest game in the world, even to catch friendship and 30 amitie, have no god nor demi-god, no angell to helpe, to favorise, and speed his enterprise and good endevours? For mine owne part, my friend Daphnem, I take not man to be a more base plant or viler tree, than is the oake, the mulberie tree, or the vine which Homer honoureth with the name of Hemeris, considering that in his time and season he hath a powerfull instinct to bud and put foorth most pleasantly, even the beauty both of body and minde. Then (quoth Daphnem) who ever was there, before God, that thought or faid the contrary? Who 2 answered my safter: many even all they verily, who being of opinion, that the carefull industrie of plowing, sowing and planting, apperteineth unto the gods:

For certaine Nymphs they have hight Driades Whose life they say is equall with the trees.

40 And as Pindares writeth.

God Bacchus who the pure refplendent light Of Autumne is, and with his kindeinfluence Doth nourifh trees, and cause to graw upright, And fructifie at length in affluence.

Yet for all this are not perswaded that the nouriture and growth of children, and yong folke, who in their prime and stour of age, are framed and shaped to singular beauty and feature of personage, belongeth to any one of the gods or demy gods. Neither by their saying, any deitie or divine power, hath the care & charge of man, that as he groweth he should shoot up streight, and arise directly to vertue; and that his naturall indument and generous ingenuity should be perverted, daunted and quelled, either for default of a carefull tutour and directour, or through the leawd and corrupt behaviour of bad company about him. And verily were it not a shamefull indignity and ingratitude thus to say: and in this behalfeto drive Godas it were from that bounty and benignity of his to mankinde, which being defused spred and dispersed over all, is desectious in no part, no not in those necessary actions and occasions, whereof some have their end more needfull iwis many times than lovely or beautifull to seet. As for example, even out very birth at first, is nothing sightly at all nor pleasant, in regard of the bloud and bitter pangs that do accompany it, yet hath the same a goddesse to be the president & overfeer thereDdddd of to wit Lucina, called thereupon Lochia and Ilithyia. Befides, better it were for a man never to have bene borne, than to become evill and naught, for want of a good governor and guardian. Moreovor the deitie and devine power, leaveth not man destitute when he is sicke, no nor when he is dead : but some God there is or other, that hath an office and function even then, and is powerfull in those occasions: there is one, I say, that helpeth to convey the soules of such as have ended their life, from hence into another world, and to lay them in quiet repose, who for bestowing and transporting of them in that fort is called Catunastes and Psychopompos according as he faith.

The shady night never bare (The harps to found) a fine musician: Nor prophet (ecrets to declare: Ne yet in cures a good phistian: But for the foules of dead, below, Intheir due place, them to bestow.

And yet in these ministeries and functions many odious troubles and incombrances therebe: whereas contrariwife there can be named no workemore holy, no exercise, game of price or profession of maisteries, whatsoever, whereof it beseemeth a god better, to have the dispose, prefidence and overfight, than is the charge and regard, to order and rule the defires of lovers, aftecting and pursuing beautifull persons in the floure and prime of their age. For herein their is nothing foule, nothing forced nor by conftraint : but that gentle perswasion & attractive grace, 20 which yeelding in trueth a pleafant and sweet labor, leadeth all travell whatsoever unto vertue and amitie; which neither without a god can attaine unto the defired end which is meet and convenient, nor hath any other god, for the guide, master, and conductor, than Love which is the companion of the Muses graces and Venus;

For Cupid fowing fecretly In beart of man a weet defire, And heat of Love, immediatly By kindling milde and gentle fire.

According as Menalippedes faith, tempereth the pleasantest things that be with those that are most faire and beautifull. How fay you Zeuxippus, is it not so? Yes verily (quoth he) I am alto- 30 gether of that minde : for to hold the contrary were very abfurd. Then (quoth my fatheragaine) and were it not as monstrous, that whereas amitic hath foure severall kindes and branches, according as the ancient Philosophers have divided it: The first in nature, then that of propinguity and locall affinity, the third of fociety, and the last this of love, everyone of the rest should have a god to be the president and governour thereof, to wit, surnamed either gino, or ξένο, or ζωρνο, and πακοθ, and this amorous amitic onely or love as accurfed, interdicted and excommunicate, be left without a lord and ruler? confidering that it requiresh more care, folicitude and government than all the rest ? It doth indeed (quoth Zenxippus) and need it hath out of that which is strange but proper and familier, of the owne.

Moreover (quoth my father) a man may here take hold by the way of Plato his opinion and 40 doctrine to this purpose: to wit, that there is one kind of furie transmitted from the body to the foule proceeding from certaine indispositions and malignant distemperatures of ill humours, or elle occasioned by some hurtfull winde or pernitious spirit that passeth and entreth into it, and this furie is a sharpe and dangerous disease. There is another not without some divine inflinct: neither is it engendred at home and within us: but a strange inspiration it is, comming from without, a very alienation of reason, sense, and understanding, the beginning and motion whereof arifeth from some better power and a certaine divine puissance. And this passion in generall is named Enthusiasmus, as one would say, adivine inspiration. for like as, euwir, in Greeke fignifieth repletion with spirit or winde. And weer, that which is full of prudence and wit: Even so saith he an agitation and shaking of the soule is called in Sunan puts by the partici- 50 pation and fociety of fome more heavenly and divine power. Now this enthusia fine is subdevided : for one part thereof is propheticall, and can skill of foretelling naturall things, when one is inspired and possessed by Apollo. A second is Bacchanal sent from Bacchan whereof Sophocks speaketh in one place thus,

And fee you dance. With Corybants.

For those furies of dame Cybele the mother of the gods, as also Panique & terrors frights hold al of the Bacchenall facred ceremonies. The third proceedeth from the Mufes, which meeting with a tender and delicate foule, not polluted with vice, ftirreth up and raifeth a poeticall fpirit, and musicall humour: as for that raging and martiall Enthusiasme (for virinianius it is called) that furious inspiration breathing warre, is well knowen to every man, for to proceed from god Mars; a furie wherein there is no grace, no muficall sweetnesse, hindring the generation and nourishment of children, and inciting people to take armes. There remaineth one alienation more of the understanding ô Daphnau, and an exstacie or transportation of mans fpirit, and the fame not obfcure, nor quiet and calme: concerning which I would demand of Pemptides heere,

What god is he, that shakes the speare In hand, which doth fo faire fruit beare.

Even this ravishment of love, setled as well upon faire and good boies, as honest and sober dames; which is the hottest and most vehement transportation of the minde: for see you not that even the very foldier and warrior himselfe, comming once to be surprised therewith, laide downehis armes prefently, and cast off his warlike furie.

For then his fervants joy did make, And corfelet from his shoulders take.

and himselfe having no more minde to battell, fat still looking upon others that fought. And as for these Bacchanall motions, these wanton skippings and frisks of the Corybantes, they use 20 to appeale and fray by changing, onely in danneing of the measures, the foot Trochaus into Spondæus; and in fong, the Phrygian tune into the Dorique: femblably Pythia the priestresse of Apilla, being once come downe from her three footed fabricke, upon which the receiveth that incentive spirit of furie, remaineth quiet and in calme tranquillity: whereas the rage of love, after it hath once in good earnest caught a man, and set him on fire, there is no musicke in the world, no charme, no lenitive fong, no change of place able to ftay it: for amorous persons when they be present, doe love, if they be absent, doe long; in the day time they follow after their sweethearts, by night they lie and watch at their doores; fasting and sober they call upon their faire paramours, full and drunken, they fing and chant of them: neither are poeticall fancies and inventions, as one sometimes faid for their lively and effectuall expression, the dreams 30 of persons waking; but rather this may be verified of lovers imaginations, who devise and talke with their loves absent, as if they were present, they falute, embrace, chide, and expostulate with them, as if they faw them in place: for it feemeth that our ordinarie fight doth depaint other imagination with liquid and waterish colours, which quickly passe away, are gone and departed out of our minds: but the fancies and visions of Lovers being imprinted in their cogitations by fire or enambled, leave in their memorie lively images furely engraved, which move, live, breath, speake, remaine and continue euer after; like as Cato the Romane said, that the foule of the lover lived & dwelt in the foule of the loved: for that there is fetled fure in him the vilage, countenance, manners, nature, life, and actions of the person whom he loveth, by whichbeing led and conducted, he quickly dispatcheth and cutteth off a long jorney, as the 40 *Cynicks are wont to fay, finding a short, compendious and directway unto vertue: for hee *xupuxot, some palleth speedily from love to amity and friendship, being caried on end by the favour of this read Karpers, that is, Comis-God of Love, with the inftinct of his affection, as it were with winde and tide, with weather call Poets. and water together: in fumme, I fay, that this enthusiasme or ravishment of lovers is not without some divine power, and that there is no other god to guide and governe it, than he whose feast we solemnize, and unto whom we facrifice this very day: howbeit, for that we measure the greatnesse of a god by putissance especially & profit, according as among all humane goods, we holderoialty and vertue to be most divine, and so to call them. It is time now to consider first and formost, whether Love be inferior to any other god in power? And verily Sophocles saith: Venus in power dothmuch availe,

Great also is the pulsance of Mars: and verily we see the power of all other gods to be after a fort divided in these matters two waies, the one is allective, and cause thus to love that which is beautifull and good, the other is adverfative, and maketh us to hate that which is foule and bad, which are the first impressions, that from the beginning are engraven in our mindes, according as Plato in one place speaketh of the Idea. Let us now come to the point, and confider how the very act alone of Venue may be had for a groat or fome fuch small piece of filver, neither was Ddddd 2

Of Love.

there ever man knowen to endure any great travell, or to expose himselfe to any danger, for the enjoying of such a stefnly pleasure, unlesse he were amorous with all and love sicke. And to for he are beere to name such curtisanes as Phryne and Lais were, we shall finde my good friend, that Gnathanium the harlot,

At lanterne light in evening late, Waiting and calling for some mate.

is many time passed by and neglected : but otherwhiles againe

If once some sudden spirit moove,

The raging fit of fervent love. it maketh a man to prize and effeeme the forefaid pleasure which erewhile he reckoned nothing to woorth, comparable in value to all the talents as they fay, of Tantalus treasure, and equall to his great feignorie and dominion; so enervate is the delight of Penus, and so soone bringethic lothlome sacietie, in case it be not inspired with the power of love: which we may see yet more evidently by this one argument; namely, that there be many men who will be content to part with others in this kind of venercous pleasure, yea, and can find in their harts to profitute unto them not only their millresses and concubines, but also their owne espoused wives; as it is reported of that Galba or Cabbas a Romane, who, if I doe not mistake, invited Macenas upon a time unto his house, & seasted him; where perceiving how from him to his wife there passed fome wanton nods and winkings, which bewraied that hee had a minde and fancie to her, he gently rested his head upon a pillow or cushion, making semblance as though he would take a 10 nap and fleepe, whiles they dallied together: in the meane time when one of the fervants which were without fpying his time, came foftly to the table for to steale away some of the wine that flood there; avaunt unhappy knave (quoth Galba) being broad awake, and open cied, knowest thou not that I fleepe onely for Macents fake? But peradventure this was not fo ftrange a matter, confidering that the faid Galba was no better than one of the buffons or pleafants that professe to make folke merry and to laugh. I will tell you therefore another example: At Larger there were two of the principall citizens concurrents, and opposite one to the other in the government of the city, the one was named Philostratus, & the other Phantitus; now it fortuned upon a time thatking Philip came to the towne; and commonly thought it was, that Phaulim plot ted and practifed to atteine unto some absolute principallity and sovereignty in the city, by the 30 meanes of his wife, who was a yoong and beautifull ladie, in case he could bring her once to the kings bed, and that the might lie with him. A icostratus smelling and perceiving as much, walked before Phaulius doore and about his house for the nonce, to see what he would do: who indeed having flood his wife with a paire of high shooes, cast about her a mantle or mandilion, and withall fet upon her head a chaplet or hat after the Macedonian fathion, and dreffed her every way like unto one of the kings pages; fent her fecretly in that habit and attire unto his lodging. Now considering there hath beene in times past and is at this present such a number of amourous persons and lovers, have you ever read or knowen that any one of them hath beene the bawd to profittute his owne love, though he might thereby have gained fovereigne majefly, and obtained the divine honours of Jupiter ? I verily beleeve no: for why ? there is not a person 40 dare quetch to contradict and oppose himselse in government of State against the actions of princes and tyrants? But on the other fide, corrivals they have and concurrents many in love, fuch as will not flicke to beard them in the question of faire, yong and beautifull persons, whom they affect and fancie. For it is reported that Ariflogiton the Athenian, Antileon the Metapontine, and Menalippus of Agrigentum never contended nor contested with the tyrants, for all they faw them to wafte and tuinate the common-weale, yea, to commit many enormious outrages; but when they began once to follicit and tempt their paramors and loves, then they rose up as it were in the desence of their facred temples and sanctuaries, then they stood against them even with the hazzard and perill of their lives. It is faid, that king Mexander wrote unto Theodorus the brother of Protess in this wife: Convey unto me that Musicall wench of thine, 50 that fings fo daintily, and receive for her ten talents, which I fend by this bearer; let me have her, I fay, unleffe thou thy felfe be in love with her. When Antipatrides another of his minions, came in a maske on a time to his house, accompanied with a prety girle that plaied upon the pfaltery, & fung passing well; Alexander taking great delight & contenument in the faid damofell, demanded of Antipatrides, whether he were not himselfe enamoured of her. And when he answered, Yes verily, and that exceeding much. A mischiese on thee (quoth he) leud variet as thouart, and the divell take thee: but the wench he absteined from, and would not so much as touch her. But marke moreover & besides, of what power, even in martiall seats of armes, Love is: Love I say, which is not (as faith Euripides)

Of nature flow, dull, fickle, inconstant, Nor in soft cheeks of maidens resiant.

For a man that is possessed secretly in his heart with Love, needeth not the affistance of Murs when he is to encounter with his enemies in the field; but having a god of his owne with inhim, and prefuming of his presence,

Nost prest he is and resoluse, to passestrough fire and seas; The blasts of most tempestuous windes, he cares not to appease.

And all for his friends fake, and according as he commandeth him. And verily, of those children, as well some sas daughters, of lady W. tobe, who in a Tragocdie of Sophocles are represented to be shot with arrowes, and so killed, one there was, who called for no other to helpe and succor her at the point of death, but onely her paramor, in this wise:

Oh that some god my Love would send,

My life to save, and me defend. Ye all know I am fure, doe ye not? how and wherefore Cleomachus the Theffalian died in 20 combat ? Not I for my part (quoth Pemprides) but gladly would I heare and learne of you. And it is a storie (quoth my father) worth the hearing and the knowledge. There came to aide the Chalcidians, at what time as there was hot warre in Theffalie against the Eretrians, this Cleemathus: now the Chalcidians feemed to be strong enough in their footmen, but much adoc they had, and thought it was a difficult piece of fervice, to breake the cavallerie of their enemies, and to repell them. So they requested Cleomachus their allie and confederate, a brave knight, and of great courage, to give the first charge, and to enter upon the said men of armes. With that, he asked the youth whom he loved most entirely, and who was there present, whether he would beholde this enterprise, and see the conflict: and when the yong man answered Yea, and withall, kindly kiffing and embracing him, fet the helmet upon his head; Cleamachus much 30 more hardy and fuller of spirit than before, affembled about him a troupe of the most valourous hofemen of all the Theffalians, advanced forward right gallantly, and with great refolution fet upon the enemies, in fuch fort, as at the very first encounter he brake the front, disarraied the men of armes, and in the end put them to flight. Which discomfiture, when their infanteriefaw, they also fled: and so the Chalcidians woon the field, and atchieved a noble victorie. Howbeit, Cleomaches himselfe was there slaine, and the Chalcidians shew his sepulchre and monument in their Market place, upon which there standeth, even at this day, a mighty pillar erected. And whereas the Chalcidians before-time held this pæderaltie or love of young boiesan infamous thing, they of all other Greeks ever after affected and honoured it most. But Aristotle writeth, that Cleomachus indeed lost his life after he had vanquished the Erctrians in 40 battell: but as for him who was thus kiffed by his lover, he faith that he was of Chaleis in Thrace, fent for to aide those of Chalcis in Eubars: and hereupon it commeth that the Chalcidian sufe to chant such a caroll as this:

Sweet boies, fair eimpes extract from noble race, Endued besides with youth and beauties grace, Envie not men of armes and bolde courage, Fruition of your prime and slowing age: For here a swell of Love and kinde affection, As of prowesse, we all domake profession.

The lover was named Anton, and the boy whom he loved Philist m, as Diony fine the Poet writeth to inhis booke of Caules.

And in our city of Thebes, & Pemptides, did not one Added give unto a youth whom he loved, a complet armour, the day that he was enrolled fouldier, with the infeription of Added his owne name? And as for Pammenes an amorous man and one well experienced in love maters, he changed and altered the ordinance in battell of our footnen heavily armed, reprooving Homer as one that had no skill nor experience of love; for ranging the Achæans by their tribes and wards, and not putting in array the lover close unto him whom he loveth: for this indeed had beene the right ordinance, which Homer describeth in these words:

The Morians fet so close, and shield to shield So jointly touch'd, that one the other held.

And this is the onely battalion and armie invincible. For men otherwhiles in danger abandon those of their tribe, their kindred also and such as be allied unto them: yea, and beleeve me, they forfake their owne fathers and children : but never was there enemic feene, that could paffe through, and make way of evalion betweene the lover and his darling, confidering that fuch many times, thew their adventerous refolution in a bravery, and how little reckoning they make of life, unto them being in no distresse nor requiring so much at their hands. Thus There the Theffalian laying and clapping his left hand to a wall, drewforth his fword with the right, and cut off his owne thumbe, before one whom he loved, and challenged his corrivall to doe as much, 10 if his heart would ferve him. Another chanced in fight to fall groveling upon his face, and when his enemie lifted up his fword to give him a mortall wound, he requested him to stay his hand a while untill he could turne his body, that his friend, whom he loved, might not fee him wounded in his backe part. And therefore we may see, that not onely the most martialland warlicke nations are most given to Love, to wit, the Boeotians, Lacedamonians, and Candiots. but also divers renowmed princes and captaines, of olde time: as namely, Meleager, Achilles. Aristomenes, Cimon, Epaminondas. And as for the last named, he had two yong men whom he decrely loved, Asopicus and Zephiodorus, who also died with him in the field at Mantinea, and was likewise interred neere unto him. And when Asopicus became hereupon more terribleunto his enemies, and most resolute, Euchnanus the Amphyssian, who first made head against him, 20 refisted his furie, and finote him, had heroique honors done unto him by the Phocæans. To come now unto Hercules; hard it were to reckon and number his loves they were fo many: But among others, men honour and worthip to this day Iolano, because they take him to have been Hercules his derling, in so much as upon his tombe the manner is of lovers to take a corporall oth and affurance of reciprocall Love. Moreover it is reported of Apollo, that being skilfullin Physicke, he faved the life of Alcest is being desperally sicke, for to gratifie Admetus, who ashe loved her intirely being his wife, so he was as tenderly beloved of him. For the Poets doe fable, that Apollo, being inamoured, for pure Love,

Did ferve Admetus one whole yeere As one that his hir'd servant were.

And here it falleth out, in some fort well, that we have made mention of Alcestin: for albeitwomen have ordinarily much dealing with Mars, yet the ravifhment and furious fits of Lovedriveth them otherwhiles to enterprife somewhat against their owne nature, even to voluntation death : and if the poeticall fables are of any credit, and may goe currant for trueth, it is evident *For Alegis by such reports as goe of * Alcesti of Protesidane, and Euridice the wife of Orphem, that Pluto o was reported beieth no other god but onely Love, nor doth what they command. And verily how soever in love of Alme regard of all other gods, as Sophocles faith,

He cannot skill of equity, of favour and of grace. But onely with him Inflice straight, and rigour taketh place.

Yet he hath good respect and reverence to lovers, and to them alone he is not implacable nor inflixible. And therefore a good thing it is, my friend, I confesse, to be received into the religious confraternity of the Eleusinian mysteries : but I fee that the votaries professed in Love, are in the other world in better condition accepted with Pluto: And this I fay as one who neither am too forward in beleeving fuch fables of Poets, nor yet so backward as to distrust and diferedit them all : for I affure you they speake well, and by a certaine divine fortune and good hap they hit upon the trueth, faying as they do, that none but lovers returne from hell unto this light againe: but what way and how they wot not; as wandring indeed and miffing of the right path, which plato of all men first by the meanes of philosophy found out and knew. And yet a 50 mong the Aegyptians fables, there be certaine small slender and obscure shadowes of the truth, dispersed here an there. Howbeit they had need of an expert and well experienced hunter, who by finall tracts knoweth how to trace and finde out great matters. And therefore let us

Andnowthat I have discoursed of the force and puissance of Love being so great as it appeareth, I come now to examine and confider the bountie and liberality thereof to mankinde, not whether it conferre many benefits upon them, who are acquainted with it, and make use thereof (for notable they be and well knowen to all men) but whether it bringeth more and greater commodity to those that are studious of it, and be amorous? For Euripides, how foever he were a great favourit of Love; yet so it is, that he promised and admired that in it, which of all others is leaft, namely when he faid,

Love teacheth Musicke, marke when you will Though one before thereof had no skill.

For he might as well have faid, that it maketh a man prudent and witty, who before was dull and foolish; yea & valiant, as hath beene said, who before was a coward; like as they that by putting into fire burning peeces of wood, make them firme and straight, where as they were before to weake and tender: Semblably, every amorous person becommeth liberall and magnificent, although he had beene aforetime a pinching fnudge: For this base avarice and micheric waxeth foft, and melteth by love, like as iron in the fire, in fuch fort, as men take more pleasure to give away and bestow upon those whom they love, than they doe, to take and receive of others. For yee all know well how Anytus the fonne of Anthenion was inamoured upon Alcebiades, and when he had invited certaine friends and guests of his unto a sumptuous and stately feast in his house, Aleibiades came thither in a maske to make pastime; and after he had taken with him one halfe of the filver cups that flood upon the boord before them, went his waies, which when the guests tooke not well, but said that the youth had behaved himselfe vere proudly and malipertly toward him. Not so (quoth Anytus) for he hath dealt very courteously with me, in that, when he 20 might have gone away withall, he left thus much behinde for me. Zeuxippus taking ioy hereat: O Hercules (quoth he) you want but a little of ridding quite out of my heart that hereditary hatred derived and received from our ancestors, which I have taken against Anytus, in the behalfe of Socrates and Philosophie, in case he were so kinde and courteous in his love. Be it so (quoth my father) but let us proceed: Love is of this nature, that it maketh men otherwise melancholicke, auftere, and hard to be pleafed or converfed withall, to become more fociable, gentle and pleasant: for as ye know well enough, and even fo, a man is more lightforne and jocund, when he is well warmed with the heat of love. 30 But the vulgar fort of men are in this point formewhat perverfly affected and befide all reason; for if they fee a flashing celestiall light in an house by night, they take it to be some divine apparition, and woonder thereat: but when they fee a bafe, vile, & abject mind fuddenly replenished with courage, libertie, magnificence, defire of honour, with grace, favour and liberality, they are not forced to fay as Telemachendid in Homer:

> Certes; some god, I know full well, Is now within, and here doth dwell.

And is not this also, quoth Daphnaus, (tell me, I pray you, for the love of all the Graces) an effectoffome divine cause, that a lover who regardeth not, but despiseth in a maner all other things, I fay nothis familiar friends onely, his fellowes and domesticall acquaintance, but the 40 lawes also and magistrates, kings and princes; who is afraid of nothing, admireth, esteemeth and observeth nothing y and is besides so hardy, as to present himselfe before the stashing shot of piercing lightning, so soone as ever he espieth his faire love,

Like to some cocke of cravain kinde lets fall, Or hangs the wing, and daunted is withall.

Hedroups I say, his courage is cooled, his heart is done, and all his animofitie quailed quite. And heere it were not impertinent to the purpose, to make mention of sappho among the Mufes. The Romans write in their history, that Caess the sonne of Vulcane breathed and flashed flames of fire from his mouth. And in trueth the words that Sappho uttereth, be mixed with fire, andby her verses testifieth the ardent and slaming heat of her heart, as Philoxenus writeth. But Daphnaus; unleffe peradventure the love of Lyfandra have made you to forget your olde sports and delights wherewith you were wont to passe the time away, call to minde (I befeech you) and rehearfe unto us those sweet verses of faire Sappho, wherein the faith, that when her love came in her fight, she lost her voice presently, and was speechlesse, her bodie ran all over into colde sweats, she became pale and wan, she fell a trembling and quaking, her braines turned round, surprised the was with dizzinesse, and fell into a fainting fit of swowning.

Thrice happy do I bolde that wight, Who may eft somes enjoy thy sight, Of thy sweet voice to reape delight, And pleasant smiles: Which kindle in me fuch a fire, That, as I them do much admire, My heart they ravish, and desire Transport the whiles. Thy face no sooner doe I see, But fudden filence comes on me; 10 My tongue strings all dissolved bee, And speech quite gone: Then underneath my skin is fred A firy flush of colour red; With that mine eyes be darkened, And sight yeeld none. Mine eares also do buzze and ring, And yet distinctly heare nothing; Cold drops of sweer un down trickling, Or stand as dew: 20 My joints anon and finewes shake, My heart-root pants, my flesh doth quake; And palenesse soone doth overtake My former hew. And thus full wan I do remaine, As flower in house that long hath laine, Or graffein field, which wanting raine, Doth quickly fade: untill at length in extasie, 30 Withouten sense and breath I lie; As if death of me suddenly Surprize had made.

When Daphnam had recited this fonet: Is not this (quoth my father, in the name of jupiter) befeech you) a plaine possession of the minde by some heavenly power; is not this (I say) an evident motion and a very celestiall ravishment of the spirit? What surious passion satisfies ever so great and strong, that came upon the prophetes Pythia, when she mounted that three-footed fabricke, from whence she deliveredoracles? Who ever was there so farretransposted and caried beside himselse by the pipes and slutes of sanaticall persons supposed to be surprized by some divine spirit of surie, by the tabour and other strange ceremonies in the service of 69-bele the mother of the gods? Many there be, that holde the same body, and looke upon the same 40-beautic; but the amourous person onely is caught and ravished therewith. What should be the reason of it? Certes, there is some cause thereo? Verily, when Menander sheweth it unto us, yet we learne it not, nor understand his meaning by these verses:

There is a malidie of the minde, That it surpriseth fatally: Who smitten is therewith, doth finde Himselse sorewounded inwardly.

And hecreof is god Love the cause, who toucheth one, and spareth another. But that which ought indeed to have been spoken rather at the first,

Since now it comes into my minde,

And way out of mymouth would finde.

as Asfehilus faith, I thinke not good to overpasse in slience, being a matter of so great importance. For of all thingsels (my good friend) in a maner, whereof we take knowledge, not by the ministeric of the five naturall senses; some therebe, that came into credit (at the beginning) and authority, by fables; other, by lawes; and the rest, by doctrine and discourse of reason. Now the constant beleese and full persuassion of the gods, the first masters, teachers and authors also therefore, were Poets, Lawgivers, and in a third ganke, Philosophers, who all with one account in the constant beleese and such or second constant beleese and such or second constant beleese and such or second constant believes as a such or second constant believes and such or second constant believes and such or second constant believes as a such or second constant believes and the second constant believes as a such or second constant believes and second constant believes as a such or second constant jointly did fet this downe as a verity, that Gods there be: howbeit, they are at great diffeord and variance, touching the number, order, nature, effence and power of them. For those whom the Philosophers acknowledge to be gods, are not subject to diseases, nor to age, neither know they what it is to fele paine or endure trauell:

Escape they doe the passage of the firth, Of roaring Acheron, and live in joy and mirth.

And in that regard Philosophers admit not at all the Poeticall icids and Mmi, that is to fay, contentions and reconfiliations: they will not allow Asigues and posses, to be gods, nor confesse them to be the fonnes of Mars: and in many points doe they differ also and differe from lawgivers; 10 as Xenophanes did, who faid unto the Egyptians as touching Ofirm: if you take him for a mortall man, adorehim not; if you account him an immortall god, lament not for him, Againe, the the Poets and lawgivers on the other fide, deigne not, nor will abide fo much as to heare those Philosophers who of certeine Idees, numbers, unities and spirits, make gods; neither can they poffibly conceive and understand such doctrine. In summe, much variety there is & diffonance in their opinions, about this one point: but like as in old time there were three fects or factions in Athens, al adverse, opposite & malicious one unto the other, to wit, of the Paralli, the Epacrii, and Pædiæi: yet notwithstanding, when they were assembled and met together in a generall councell, they gave all their voices and fuffrages to Solon, and elected him with one common affent their peace-maker, their governour, and lawgiver, as one woorthy, without any queftion 20 or doubt at all, to have conferred upon him the principality and highest degree of vertue and honour: even so those three sects differing in opinion about the gods, and giving their voices fome on this fide, and others on that, and not willing to fubfcribe one unto another, nor eafily receiving that which is otherwife delivered than by themselves, be all of one and the same mindeas touching this one god Love; and him the most excellent Poets, the best Law givers, and the principall Philosophers, admit with one voice into the register and kalender of the gods, praifing and extolling him highly in all their writings. and like as Alcase faith, That all the Mitylenæans with one accord and generall consent, chose Pittaem for their soveraigne prince and tyrant; even fo Hesiodus, Plato, and Solon, bring and conduct Love out of Helicon, into the Academie unto us, for our king, prince, and prefident, crowned and adorned gaily 30 with garlands and chaplets of flowers, honored alfo, and accompanied with many thackles and couples professing amitie and mutuall societie: not such as Euripides faith:

With fetters bound and tied was,

Farre stronger than of iron and brasse. Linking them by a cold, heavy, and maffie chaine of need and necessitie; as a colourable vaile and pretence to shame and turpitude; but such as are caried by winged chariots unto the most goodly and beautifull things in the world, whereof others have treated better and more at large. When my father had thus faid: See you not (quoth Soclarus) how being fallen now againe, the second time into one and the same matter, you forced your selfe to turne away from it, I wot not how, avoiding to enter into this holy discourse, and (if I may be so bold to say what I thinke) 40 fhifting off unjustly to pay the debt, which you have promifed us? for having ere while by the way, and against your will made some little mention of the Aegyptians and of Plato; you passed them over then, and even so doe you at this present: as for that which Place hath written, or rather these Muses heere have by him delivered, I know well you will say nothing thereof; although we should request and pray you to doe it: but for that you have covertly signified thus much, that the mythologie or fables of the Aegyptians accord sufficiently with the doctrine of the Platonikes concerning Love: it were against all reason that you should refuse to discover, reveale, and declare it unto us: and content will we be, in case we may heare but a little of such great and important matters. Now when the rest of the companie instantly intreated likewise; my father began againe and said: That the Aegyptians like as the Greeks, acknowledge two 30 kindes of Love, the one vulgar, the other celestiall they believe also that there is a third beside, to wit, the funne; and Venue above all they have in great admiration; as for us we fee a great affinity and refemblance betweene Love and the funne; for neither of them both is (as some doe imagine) a materiall fire, but the heat of the one and the other is milde and generative; for that which proceedeth from the funne, giveth unto bodies nouriture, light, and deliverance from cold winter; that which commeth from the other worketh the same effects in soules: and as the funne betweene two clouds, and after a foggy milt breaketh foorth most ardent: even so Love alter anger, fallings out, and fits of jealoufie; upon attonement and reconciliation made betweene Lovers, is more pleasant and fervent: and looke what conceit some have of the sunne. that it is kindled and quenched alternatively, namely, that every evening it goeth out, and every morning is lighted againe: the fame they have of Love, as being mortall, corruptible, and not permanent in one estate: moreover, that habite or constitution of the body which is not exercised and inured to endure both cold and heat, can not abide the sunne; no more can that nature of the foule which is not well nurtured and liberally taught, be able to brooke Love, without fome paine and trouble; but both the one and the other is transported out of order, yea and indisposed or diseased alike, laying the weight upon the force and power of Love, and not upon their owne impuissance and weaknesse: this onely seemeth to be the difference betweene them; that the funne exhibiteth and sheweth unto those upon the earth who have their eie- to fight, things beautifull and foule indifferently; whereas Love is the light that representeth faire things onely, causing lovers to be lookers of such alone, and to turne toward them; but contrariwile to make none account of all others. Furthermore, they that attribute the name of Venue to the earth, are induced thereto by no fimilitude nor proportion at all; for that Venus is divine and celestiall, but the region wherein there is a mixture of mortall with immortall, is of it selfe feeble, darke, and shadie, when the funne shineth not upon it; like as Venus, when love is not affiltant unto it: and therefore more credible it is, that the moone should resemble Venus, and the funne Love, rather than any other god; yet are not they therefore all one, because the body is not the fame that the foulcis, but divers; & like as the funne is fenfible & vifible; but Love foirituall and intelligible : and if this might feeme a speech somewhat harsh, a man might say, that the funne doeth cleane contrary unto Love, for that it diverteth our understanding from the speculation of things intelligible unto the beholding of objects sensible, in abusing and deceiving it by the pleafure and brightnesse of the fight, perswading it to seeke in it, and about it, as all other things; so trueth it selfe, and nothing else where, being ravished with the Love thereof,

For that we fee it shine so faire V ponthe earth, amid the aire.

according as Euripides litth, and that for want of knowledge and experience of another life, or rather by reason of forgetfulnesse of those things which Love reduceth into our memorie. For like as when we awake in some great and resplendent light, all nightly visions and apparitions which away and depart, which our soule saw during sleepe: even so resemble that the summer dooth altonish the remembrance of such things as heere happen and chance in this life; yea, and to be witch, charme, and enchant our understanding, by reason of pleasure and admiration, so as it forgetteth what it knew in the former life: and verily there is the true & reall substance of those things; but heere apparitions onely, by which our soule in sleepe admireth, and embrace eith that which is most beautifull, divine, and woonderfull: but as the Poet faith;

About the same are vaine illusions, Dreames manifold, and sools h visions.

And so the mind is perswaded that all things heere be goodly and precious, unlesse haply by good adventure it meet with formedivine, honest, and chaste Love for to be her Physicion and favior; which paffing from the other world by things corporall, may conduct and bring it to the truth, and to the pleafant fields thereof, wherein is feated and lodged, the perfect, pure, and naturall beautie, not sophisticate with any mixture of that which is counterfet and falle; where they defire to embrace one another, and to commune together as good friends, that of long time have had no interview nor entercourse, affisted alwaies by Love, as by a Sextaine, who leadeth by the hand those that are professed in some religion, shewing unto them all the holy reliques and facred ceremonies one after another. Now when they be fent hether againe, the foule by it selfe can not come neere and approach thereto, but by the organe of the body: and like as, because yoong children of themselves are not able to comprehend intelligible things; therefore Geometricians put into their hands visible and palpable formes, of a substance incor- 50 porall and impaffible, to wit, the representations of sphæres, cubes, or square bodies, as also those that be dodecaedra, that is to say, having twelve equall faces: even so the celestial Love doth present and shew unto us, faire mirrors to behold therein beautifull things, howbeit mortall, thereby to admire such as be heavenly and divine; sensible objects, for to imagine thereby those that be spirituall and intelligible. These be the severall favors and beauties, faire colours, pleasant thapes, proportions and seatures of yoong persons in the sloure of their age; which thining and glittring as they doe, gently excite and flirre up our memorie, which by little and little at the first is enflamed thereby: whereby it commeth to passe that some through the folly of their friends and kinsfolke, endevoring to extinguish this affection and paffion of the minde, by force, and without reason, have enjoied no benefit thereof, but either filled themselves with trouble and finoke, or elfe running with their heads forward, into beaftly and filthy pleafures, pined away and were confumed. But fuch as by wife and differet discourse of reason, accompanied with honest and shamefast modestie, have taken from Love the burning furious and firie heat thereof, and left behinde in the foule a fplendeur and light, together with a moderate heat (and not a boiling agitation thereof; stirring, as one faid, a slippery motion of the feed, when as the atomes of Epicarus by reason of their smoothnesse and tickling are driven together) which 10 cauleth a certeine dilatation, woonderfull degenerative, like as in a plant or tree, which putteth foorth leaves, bloffomes, and fruit; for that the receiveth nutriment, because the pores and passages of docilitie, obedience and facilitie, to be perswaded by enterteining gently good admonitions and remonstrances be open, such I say within a small time pierce farther, and passe beyond the bodies of those whom they Love, entring as farre as into their soules, and touch their towardnesse, their conditions and manners, reclaiming their eles from beholding the bodie, and converfing together by the communication of good discourses, behold one another by that meanes; provided alwaies that they have fome marke and token of true beautic imprint ted within their understanding; which if they cannot finde, they for fake them, and turne their Love unto others, after the maner of bees, which leave many greene leaves and faire floures, 20 because they can gather out of them no hony; but looke when they meet with any trace, any influence, or femblance of divine beauty fmiling upon them, then being ravished with delight and admiration, and drawing it unto them, they take joy and contentment in that which is truly amiable, expetible, and to be embraced of all men.

True it is that Poets feeme to write the most part of that which they deliver as touching this god of Love, by way of meriment, and they fing of him as it were in a maske; and little doe they speake in good earnest touching the very truth, whether it be upon judgement and reason, or some divine instance and inspiration; as for example among other things, that which they give out concerning the generation of this god, in this maner:

Dame Itis with faire winged shoes, and golden yellow haire, Conceived by sir Zephyrus, themightiest god did beare, unlesse it be so that you also are perswaded by the Grammarians, who holde that this sable was devised to expresse the variety and gay divertify, as it were of fundry colours represented in this passion of Love. For, what else should in respect (quoth Daphnews.) Listen then said my father, and I will tell you. Forced we are, by manifest evidence to believe, that when we behold the rainbow, it is nothing else but a reflexion of raics and beames, which our eies suffer, when our fight falling upon a cloud formwhat moist but even & smooth withall and of an indifferent and meane *thickenesse, meeteth with the Sunne beames, and by way of repercussion sects the ra- * mage. 40 diant raies thereof, and the flining light about it, and fo imprinteth in our mind this opinion, that such an apparition indeed is settled upon the clowd. And even such is the sophisticall device and subtile invention of that in the generous and toward minds of gentle lovers, it causeth a certaine reflexion of memorie, from beauties appearing here, and so called, in regard of that divine, lovely indeed, bleffed and admirable beautie. Howbeit the common fort, pursuing and apprehending the image onely thereof, expressed in faire persons, as well boies as yong damofels, as it were in mirrors, can reape no fruit more certaine and affured than a little pleafure mingled with paine among; which is nothing elfe as it feemeth, but the error and wandring dizzinesse or conceit of most folke, who in clowds and shadowes seeke and hunt after the contentment of their lust and defire: much like unto yong children who thinke to catch the rainbow in so their hands, being drawen and allured thereto by the deceitfull thew prefented to their cies. Whereas the true lover indeed, who is honest and chast, doth farre otherwise: for he lifteth up his defire from thence to a divine, spirituall and intelligible beauty: and when soever he meeteth with the beauty of a visible bodie, he useth it as the instrument onely of his memoric, he imbraceth and loveth it: by converfing also with it ioifully, & with contentment, his understanding is more and more inflamed. Such amorous persons as these, whiles they hant these bodies here, neither rest so sitting still, in a desire and admiration of this cleare beautie: nor when they are come thither after their death, returne they hither againe as fugitives, for to hover and keepeabout the dores, chambers and cabinets of yong maried wives, which are nothing elfebut vaine dreames and illustons appearing to fensuall men and women given overmuch to voluptuous pleasures of the body, and such as untruely be called lovers. For he, who intructh is amorous, and is thither come where true beauties are, and converseth with them, as much as it is possible and lawfull for a man to doe, is winged anon, mounteth up on high, he is purified and sanctified, continually abiding resident above, dauncing, walking and disporting alwaise about his god, uncontinually abiding resident above, dauncing, walking and disporting alwaise about his god, untill he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, till he come backe again into the greene and faire meddowes of the Moone and of *Penne, where, the moone and the pensure of the moone and the pensure of

When men with honors him profent. And contrariwife, he is no leffe displeased, when abuse or contempt is offered unto him. For most kinde and gracious he is unto them that receive and intertaine him courteously: and againe as curft and shrewd to those who shew themselves stiffe-necked and contumacious unto him. For neither Jupiter furnamed Hofpitall, is for eady to chastice and punish wrongs done unto guests and suppliants, nor Jupiter Genetal so forward to prosecute & accomplish the curses and execrations of parents, as love quickly heareth the praiers of those lovers who are unthank- 20 fully requited by their loves, being the punisher of proud, rude, and uncivill persons. For what should one speake of Eucheyntus and Leucomantis, her I meane, who even at this day is called in Cypres, Paracyptula? And peradventure you have not heard of the punishment of Gings in Candia, who was served much after the maner of the said Paracyptusa, save onely that she was turned into a stone, when she would needs looke out at a window, and put forth her body to see the corps of her lover enterred. But of this Gorgo there was formtime one inamoured, whose name was Afander, a yoong gentleman, honest, and of good parentage descended, who having beene before time of worthipfull and wealthy estate, was decaied much and brought to poveny: howbeit his minde a bated not fo withall, that he thought himselfe unworthy of the belt forune that might be. Whereupon he fued unto this Gorgo a kinfewoman of his, by way of mariage, 30 notwithstanding that for her goods and riches she was much fought unto & wooed by many others: and albeithe had divers great and wealthy competitors and corrivals, yet he had wrought and gained all the guardians, tutours and necreft kinffolke of the damofell to ferve his fuit.

Moreover those things which are named to be the causes that engender Love, be not proper and peculiar to the one fex or to the other, but common to them both. For those images 40 which from without perce and enter into amorous perfons, according to the Epicureans opinion, running to and fro, stirring and tickling the masse of the whole body, gliding and flowing into the generall feed, by certaine other dispositions of the atomes, it cannot be that they should fo doe from yong boies, and impossible altogether from women: unlesse also these taire and sa cred recordations we call and referre unto that divine, true and celestiall beautie, according to the Platoniques, by the meanes of which rememorations as with wings the foule is mounted and carried up. What should hinder then, but that such recordations may passe as well from yong boies as damosels or women? especially when as we see a good nature, chast and honest, appeare iointly in the flower of favour and beauty, like as, according to Ariftoile, a straight and well fashioned thoe, sheweth the good forme and proportion of the foot: which is as much to 50 fay, as when under beautifull faces and in neat and faire bodies, they, who are skilfull in the knowledge and judgement of fuch things, perceive the cleare and evident traces of a fincere minde not corrupt nor counterfait. For it is no reason that a voluptuous person being demanded this question,

For wanton Love how stands thy minde? To male more, or to semale kinde? and answering,

Neither of twaine to mee can come a misse.

Should feeme to have made fit and pertinent answere according to his ownecarnall concupificance: and that an honest and generous person should not direct his affections to the beautiful and toward disposition of a youthes nature, but to the naturall parts that make difference of sex. Certes he that loveth horses and is skilfull in good horsmanship, will love no lesse the generosity and swiftnesse of the horse Podergus, then of Aetha the mare of Agamemnon. And the huntsman, taketh not pleasure onely to have good doggs and hounds of the male kinde, but also keeps peth the braches and bithes of Candie and Laconia. And shall he who loveth the beauty and sweet favour of mankind, not be indifferently affected both to the one sex and to the other, but make a difference as in divers garments, betweene the love of men and women? And verily mensay, that beauty is the flower and blossome of vertue. Now to say, that the ferninnessex doth not slower at all, nor shew any apparence and token of a good and towardly disposition to vertue, were very absurd: for Aeschylus went to the purpose, when he wrote these verses:

A damfell yoong, if she have knowen and sasted man once carnally, Her eie doth it bewray anon, it sparkles stre suspiciously.

20 Go to then: are there evident marks & fignes to be feene upon the vilages of women, to tell file amalapert, bold, wanton, and corrupt nature; and contrariwife, shall there be no light shining in their faces, to give tell timony of their modestie and pudicitie? Or rather, shall there be divers demonstrative evidences in many of them, but yet such as will not firre up and provoke any person to love them? Surely it is neither so nor so; there is no trueth nor probabilitie in any of them both: but every thing is common indifferently, as we have shewed.

Here also there is another want in the originall.

O Daphneus, let us impugne and confute thosereasons, whereupon Zeuxippus erewhile difcoursed, supposing that Love is all one with concupiscence, which is disordinate, and leadeth the soule into all loosenesse and dissolution. And yet do I northinke, that he is so perswaded indeed, and of that beliefe; but for that he hath heard often times odious persons, and such as have no lovelinesse in them, so to say; of whom, some holde under their hands, and have at command, poore filly women, whom they have gotten for fome petie dowries fake, and whom togsther with their moneys they put to the managing of domesticall affaires, and to make base, vile, and mechanicall accounts, quarrelling and brawling with them every day; and others againe, 40 having more minde and defire to get children, than to love espoused wives, like unto grathoppers, which cast their feed upon squilles, sea onions, or such like herbs, having discharged their lustin all the haste upon any body that first comes in their way, and reaped the fruit onely that they fought for, bid mariage farewell, and make no farther account of their wedded wives, or if they tary and stay with them still, they regard them no more than their olde shoes, making no count either to love them, or to be loved reciprocally of them. And verily, stepper and steppeds. which fignifie, to love and to be loved againe dearely, which differ but in one letter from the verbestian, that is to fay, to conteine and holde together, feeme unto me at the first fight, directly to import and shew a mutuall benevolence, by long time and acquaintance tempered with a kinde of necessity. But looke what person soever love settleth upon in mariage, so as he be inspi-50 red once therewith, at the very first, like as it is in Platees Common wealth, he will not have these words in his mouth, Mine and Thine: for simply all goods are not common among all friends, but those only who being severed apart in body, conjoine and colliquate, as it were perforce, their foules together, neither willing nor beleeving that they thould be twaine, but one: and afterwards by true pudicity and reverence one unto the other, whereof wedlocke hath most need. As for that which commeth from without, carying with it more force of lawe, than voluntary obsequence and reciprocall duty, and that in regard of seare and shame, Apiece of worke, that needs the guide Of many bits and helmes beside.

requireth alwaies to have ready at hand a carefull regard among those that are coupled in matrimonie: whereas in true love there is so much continency, modesty, loyalty and faithfulnesse. that although otherwhile it touch a wanton and lascivious minde, yet it diverteth it from other lovers, and by cutting offall malapert boldnesse, by taking downe and debasing infolent pride and untaught flubburnnesse, it placeth in lieu thereof, modelt bashfulnesse, filence and taciturnity; it adorneth it with decent gesture, and seemly countenance, making it for ever after obedient to one lover onely. Ye have heard (I am fure) of that most famous and renowmed courtisan Lais, who was courted and sought unto by so many lovers, and ye know well, how she to inflamed and fet on fire all Greece with the love and longing defire after her; or to fay more truly, how two feas strave about her? how after that the love of Hippolochus the Thessalian had seafed upon her, the quit and abandoned the mount Acrocorint hus,

Seated upon the river side,

as one writeth of it; and flying secretly from a great army as it were of other lovers, she retired herselfe right decently within Megalopolis unto him; where other women upon very spight, envie and jelousie, in regard of her surpassing beautie, drew her into the temple of Venus, and floned her to death: whereupon it came, as it should seeme, that even at this day they call the faid temple, The temple of Venus the murdereffe. We our felves have known divers young 10 maidens, by condition no better than flaves, who never would yeeld to lie with their mafter; as also fundry private persons of meane degree, who refused, yea, and disdained the companie of queenes, when their hearts were once possessed with other love, which as a mistresse had the abfolute command thereof. For like as at Rome, when there was a Lord Dictatour once chosen, all other officers of State and magistrates valed bonet, were presently deposed, and laied downe their enfignes of authority; even fo those, over whom Love hath gotten the mastery and rule, incontinently are quit, freed and delivered from all other lords and rulers, no otherwise than fuch as are devoted to the fervice of fome religious place. And in trueth an honest and venuous dame, linked once unto her lawfull spouse by unfained love, will sooner abide to be clipped, clasped and embraced by any wolves and dragons, than the contrectation and bedsellowship of 30 any other man whatfoever but her owne husband. And albeit there be an infinit number of ex-*¿uayageus, amples among youhere, who are all of the *fame countrey, and professed affociats in one dance with this god Love; yet it were not well done to passe over in silence the accidents which befell unto Camma the Galatian lady. This yong dame being of incomparable beauty, was maried unto a tetrarch or great lord of that countrey named Sinnatus; howbeit, one Synorix the mightiest man of all the Galatians was enamoured upon her: but seeing that he could not prevaile with the woman neither by force and perswasion, so long as her husband lived, he made no more ado but murdred him. Camma then having no other refuge for her pudicity, nor comfort and eafement of her hearts griefe, made choile of the temple of Diana, where the became a religious votary, according to the custome of that countrey. And verily the most part of her time shebe 40 ftowed in the worship of that goddesse, and would not admit speech with any suters, many though they were, and those great personages, who sought her mariage: but when Synorix had made meanes very boldly to aske her the question, and to follicite her about that point, she seemed not to reject his motion, nor to expostulate and be offended for any thing past, as if for pure love of her, and ardent affection, and upon no wicked and malicious minde unto Sinnatus, he had beene induced to do that which he did: and therefore Synorix came confidently to treat with her and demand mariage of her: the also for her part came toward the mankindly, gave him her hand, and brought him to the altar of the faid goddeffe; where after the had made an offring unto Diana, by powring forth some little of a certeine drinke made of wine & hony, as it should seeme, empossoned, which she had put into a cup, she began unto Synoria, & dranke up so the one halfe of it, giving the rest unto the said Galatian for to pledge her. Now when she saw that he had drunke it all off, the fetched a grievous grone, and brake forth aloud into this speech, naming withall her husband that dead was: My most loving and decre spouse (quoth she) I have lived thus long without thee in great forow and heavinesse expecting this day; but now receive me joifully (feeing it is my good hap to be revenged for thy death upon this most wicked and ungratious wretch) as one most glad to have lived once with thee, and to die now with him. As for Synorix, he was caried away from thence in a litter, and died foone after; but Camma having furvived him a day and a night, died by report most resolutely and with exceeding joy of spirit. Confidering then, that there be many fuch like examples, as wel among us here in Greece, as the Barbarians, who is able to endure those that reproch and revile Love, as if being affociate and affiftant to love, the should hinder amitie? whereas contrariwife, the company of male with male, a man may rather terme intemperance and difordinate lasciviousnesse, crying out upon it in this maner:

to And therefore fuch filths & baggages as take delight to fuffer themselves voluntarily thus to be abused against nature, we reckon to be the woorst and most slagitious persons in the world; no man reposeth in them any trust, no man doth them any jote of honor and reverence, nor vouchfafeth them woorthy of the least part of friendship : but in very trueth, according to Sophoeles,

Such friends as these, men are full glad and joy when they be gone: But whiles they have them, wish and pray, that they were rid anone.

As for those, who being by nature lead and naught, have been circumvented in their youth, 22d forced to yeeld themselves and to abide this villany and abuse, al their life after, abhorre the 20 fight of fuch wicked wantons, and deadly hate them, who have bene thus disposed to draw them to this wickednesse; yea, and ready they are to be revenged, and to pay them home at one time or other, when soever meanes and opportunity is offered: for upon this occasion Cratenas killed Archelans, whom, in his flower of youth he had thus spoiled: as also Pytholans slew Alexander the tyrant of Phera. And Persander the tyrant of Ambracia demanded upon a time of the boy whom he kept, whether he were not yet with childe: which indignity the youth tooke to to the heart, that he flew him outright in the place: whereas, with women, and those especially that be espouled and wedded wives, these be the earnest penies as it were and beginnings of amity, yea, & the very obligation and fociety of the most facred & holieft ceremonies. As for fleshly pleafure it felfe, the least thing it is of all other: but the mutuall honour, grace, dilection and fidelity 30 that springeth and ariseth from it daily, is highly to be reckoned and accounted of: and thereforeneither can the Delphians be noted for follie, in that they terme Venus differ, that is to fay, a chariot; by reason of this yoke-fellowship: nor Homer, in calling this conjunction of man and wife, whome, that is to fay, amity and friendthip. Solon likewife is deemed by this, to have beene an excellent law-giver, and most expert in that which concerneth mariage; when he decreed expressly, that the husband should thrice in a moneth at the least embrace his wife and company in bed with her; not for carnall pleafures fake, (I affure you) but like as cities and states use, after a cerreine time betweene, to renew their leagues and confederacies one with another, so he would have that the alliance of mariage should effloornes be enterteined anew by such solace and delectation, after jarres, which otherwhiles arife and breed by fome bone cast betweene. 40 Yea, but there be many enormious and furious parts, will fome one fay, that are plaied by fuch as are in love with women. And be there not more (I pray) by those that are enamoured upon boies? do but marke him who uttereth these passionate words:

So often as thefe eies of mine behold That beardlesse youth, that smooth and lovely boy, I faint and fall: then wish I him to hold Within mine armes, and fo to die with joy: And that on tombe were set where I do lie, An Epigram mine end to testifie.

But as there is a furious passion in some men doting upon women, so there is as raging an affec-50 tion in others toward boies, but neither the one nor the other is love. Well, most absurd it were to fay that women are not endued with other vertues: for what need we to speake of their temperance and chattity, of their prudence, fidelity and justice: confidering that even fortitude itielfe, conftant confidence and refolution, yea and magnaminity, is in many of them very evident. Now to holde, that being by nature not indifposed unto other vertues, they are untoward for amitic onely and frendship, (which is an imputation laid upon them) is altogether beside all reason. For well knowen it is that they be loving to their children and husbands: and this their naturall affection, is like unto a fertile field or battell foile, capable of amitie, not unaptfor perfwalion, nor destitute of the Graces. And like as Poesie having fitted unto speech song, meeter and rhime as pleafant spices to aromatize and season the same, by meanes whereof, that profita. ble instruction which it yeeldeth, is more attractive and effectuall, as also the danger therein more inevitable: Even fo nature, having endued a woman with an amiable cast and aspect of the cie, with fweet speech, and a beautifull countenance; hath given unto her great meanes, if she be lascivious and wanton, with her pleasure to decive a man, and if she be chaste and honest, to gaine the good will and favour of her husbaud. Plate gave counfell unto Xenotrates an excellent Philosopher, and a woorthy personage otherwise, howbeit in his behavior exceeding foure and authere, to facrifice unto the Graces: and even fo a man might advise a good matton, 10 and fober dame, to offer facrifice unto Love, for his propitious favour unto mariage, and his refidence with her, and that her husband, by her kind loving demeanour unto him, may keepe home, and not feeke abroad to fome other, and fo be forced in the end to breake out into fuch speeches as these out of the Comædic:

Wretch that I am, and man unhappy I So good a wife to quit with injury.

For in wedlocke, to love, is a better and greater thing by farre, than to be loved; for it keepeth folke from falling into many faults & flips, or to fay more truly, it averteth them from all those inconveniences which may corrupt, marre, & ruinate a mariage: as for those passionate affections, which in the beginning of matrimonial love moove fittes, fomewhat poinant and biting, 10 let me entreat you (good friend Zeuxippus) not to feare, for any exulceration or fmart itch that they have, although to fay a trueth, it were no great harme if haply by fome little wound, you come to be incorporate and united to an honest woman; like as trees that by incision areengraffed and grow one within another: for when all is faid, is not the beginning of conception akinde of exulceration; neither can there be a mixture of two things into one, unleffether mutually fuffer one of the other, & be reciprocally affected. And verily, the Mathematical rudiments which children be taught, at the beginning trouble them, even as Philosophic also at the first is harsh unto yong men: but like as this unpleasantnesse continueth not alwaies with the, no more doeth that mordacity sticke still among lovers. And it teemeth that Love at the first resembleth the mixture of two liquors, which when they begin to incorporate together, boile 30 and worke one with another: for even fo Love feemeth to make a certaine confused tract and ebullition; but after a while that the same be once settled and throughly clensed, it bringesh unto Lovers a most firme and affired habit: and there is properly that mixtion and temperature which is called univerfall, and thorough the whole: whereas the love of other friends converling and living together, may be very well compared to the mixtion which is made by thefe touching and interlacings of atomes, which Epicurus speaketh of; and the same is subject to ruptures, separations, and startings a funder : neither can it possibly make that union which matrimonial love and mutual conjunction doeth: for neither doe there arise from any other Loves greater pleafures, nor commodities more continually one from another, ne yet is the benefit and good of any other friendship so honorable or expetible, as

When man and wife keepe house with one accord, And lovingly agree as bed and bord.

Especially when the law warranteth it, and the bond of procreation common betweene them, is affiftant thereto. And verily nature sheweth that the gods themselves have need of such love: for thus the Poets fay, that the heaven loveth the earth; and the Naturalists hold, that the action with the Moone, which every moneth is in conjunction with him, by whom also the conceiveth. In briefe, must it not follow necessarily, that the earth, which is the mother and breeder of men, of living creatures, and all plants, thall perith and be wholly extinct: when love, which is ardent defire, and inftinct infpired from god, shall abandon the ther the one matter, and the matter likewise shall cease to lust and seeke after the principle and cause of her 50

But to the end that we may not range too farre, nor use any superfluous and nugatory words, your selfe doe know, that these pæderasties are of all other most uncertaine, and such as use them are wont to scoffe much thereat and say, that the amitie of such boies is in manner of an egge divided three waies; and as for themselves, they refemble the wandring Nomades in Seg. shia, who having encamped in the spring time, and pastured where the fields be greene and full of flowers, prefently diflodge and depart as it were out of an enemies countrey. And yet Bion the Sophister was more rough and odious in his words toward such, when he termed the first downe or haires appearing upon the face of beautifull youthes Harmodii, and Aristogitones; for that by them Lovers were delivered out of the tyrannie of fuch faire persons, when they begin once to budde and put foorth. But these imputations are not justly charged upon true Lovers. As for that which Euripides faid, it was pretie, and caried some elegancie with it; for as he embraced and kiffed faire Agathon, even when his beard began to grow, he faid: that of faire persons, the very latter season of the Autumne was lovely and beautiful But I say more than fo, namely, that the lovelineffe of honest women passeth not away with rivels, wrinckles, and 10 hoarie haires, but continue alwaies even to their sepulchre and tombes of memoriall. Againe, there are but a few couples in that other fex, of true Lovers; but of men and women joined in wedlocke, an infinite number, who to the very last houre have kept most faithfully their loialty and hearty love reciprocally one unto the other. But one example among many other, which befell in our daies, under Vespasian the emperour, I will relate unto you. Julius, he who in Galatia was the author of a revolt, and raifed a rebellion, had many other complices, (as a man may well thinke) of this conspiracie, and among the rest, one Sabinus a young gentleman of an high spirit, and for wealth and reputation, a principall person, and of speciall marke: these men having enterpised a great desseigment, failed of their purpose; and expecting no other but that they should, according to justice, suffer due punishmet according to their deserts, some 20 killed themselves, other thinking to escape by flight, were apprehended; as for Sabinus, all other good and ready meanes he had to fave himfelfe, and flie unto the Barbarians in a strange countrey: but lately he had taken to wife, a most vertuous dame, and every way right excellent, whose name in those parts was * Empona, as one would say in the Greeke language, it was, that is to say, * Or, Finneaprincesse or great lady; but her he could not possibly either in his love endure to for sake nor minance. find meanes to take with him: whereas therefore he had at an house in the country certeine secret vaults, & hidden cellars deepe under the ground, where he bestowed his treasure & goods infafteie, and those knowen to two of his enfranchised servants, and no more; the rest of his houshold servitors he discharged and sent away; pretending unto them, that he was resolved to poison himselfe; & reteining still about him those two trusty freed men, with them he went 30 downe into those secret caves or vaults digged out of the ground; which done, he sent one of these enfranchised servants of his, whose name was * Martalinus unto his wife, to let her un- Or, Marisederstand that he had killed himselfe with poison, and that the whole house together with his line corps was burnt; for his purpose was by the unseined forrow and mourning of his wife, to make the rumour that ran of his death, the better to be beleeved; & fo it fell out invery deed: for no fooner heard the this newes, but with pitcous cries, & dolefull lamentations, the caft herfelfe upon the ground, where the at that time was, & lay there along for three daies and three nights together, without meat or drinke: which when Sabinus heard, fearing least the woman would by this meanes worke her owne death; he commanded the faid Martalinus to round her fecretly in the care, that he was yet living, and lay hidden within the ground, requesting her withall, 40 that she would continue still a while longer in this monroefull state, bewailing her husbands death, yet so, as she might not be perceived to counterfer; and verily this yoong ladie in all other respects performed the tragicall shew of that calamitie so artificially, and plaied her part with such dexteritie, that she confirmed the opinions received and divulged of his death: but having alonging defire to fee him, she went by night unto him, and came againe the same, so fecretly, that no creature perceived it; and thus continued the this haunt from time to time, for the space of seven moneths, keeping company, and lying as one would say in hell under the ground with her husband; during which time, the one day difguifed Sabinus in his apparell, and what with shaving his beard, and knitting about his head a kerchiefe, she ordered the matter fo, that he could not be knowen to them that met him: and upon hope of obtaining par-50 don, the brought him with her to Rome, with other stuffe and carriages of hers: but when the could not speed, she retired againe into the countrey, and for the most part abode and converfed with him under the grond: howbeit, otherwhiles betweene, the would repaire to the city, and thew herfelfe unto other women her friends, and of her familiar acquaintance. But that which of all other feemeth most incredible, she handled the matter so, that it was never perceived the was with childe, albeit the wathed and bathed ordinarily with other dames and wives

haire, But in what fente et or other, viderint alij. But the place is to corrupt every way, that is skillethnot if it for to make the same faire and yellow like burnithing gold, hath a certaine propertie in it to pinguisie withall, to incarnate, and so to raise and rarifie the flesh, that it causeth it to be lax, and to to swell and puffe up more plumpe : of this medicinable oile the made no spare, but used to rub and befineare the other parts of her body, in fuch fort, as that by their proportionable rifing, the hidder greatbelly, which grew more round and full every date than other. Now when her time was come, the endured the pangs and paines of her travell in child-birth, alone by herselfe; being gone downe to her husband like a lionesse into her denne, and thereshe fuckled at her owne breft fecretly, if I may fo fay, her male whelpes, for two boy twinnes she was delivered of; of which two fonnes, the one chanced to be flaine in Aeg ypt, the other. not long fince, but very lately, was with us at Delphos, named after his father, Sabinus. How 10 beit for all this, Vefpafan caused this lady to be put to death; but for this murder of his he dearely paid, and was punished accordingly: for within a while after, his whole posterity was utterly destroid and rooted out from the face of the earth, so as there remained not one of his race: for there was not in those daies, and during his empire, a more cruell and inhumane fact committed; neither was there ever any other spectacle that both gods and angels seemed more to abhorre and to turne away their eies from beholding. And yet her grandiloquence and flour refolutions in her speech, whereby the did exasperate and provoke Vestasian most, was such, that it diminished much the pitifull ruth and compassion, that the beholders of the execution had of her: for when the was past hope of obtaining her husbands life, the would needs die in his turne, and required that exchange for him, faying withall, that it was a greater joy unto her, 20 for to live in darkenesse and under the earth, than to see him emperour.

And hecrewith (quoth my father) ended their discourse as touching Love, at what time as they were necre unto Thespies, for then they might perceive comming toward them, faster than with a footepace, one of Pissos friends, named Diogenes; unto whom Sociarus spake aloud, when he was yet a good way off: You bring us no newes I hope Diogenes of warred Offe better than fo (quoth he) being; as there is, a mariage toward; why mend you not your pace therefore, and make haste thither? for the nuptiall facrifice staieth onely for your comming: At which words (as my father faid) all the rest of the company joied, and were exceeding glad, onely Zeuxippus shewed himselfe mal-content, and not well pleased; for he could not diffemble it: howbeit he was the first man that approoved the act of Ismenadora, as good and lawfull: 10 and even now he willingly fet a garland upon his ownehead, and put on a white wedding robe, marching before all the companie through the market place, to render thankefgiving unto the god Love, for this mariage. Well done (quoth my father then) I sweare by Jupiter: goe we on all hands away, and let us be gone; that we may laugh and make our felves merie with this man, and withall adore and worithin the god: for evident it is, that hee taketh joy in that which hath beene done, and is present with his favour and approbation to grace the wedding.

The Summarie.

His dialogue is defective in the beginning thereof. Init are brought in Sylla and Pharnaces, with some others, disputing with Plutarch, as touching one point of naturall Philosophy, worthy to be considered and readover and over agame, by those that take delight in such pleasant speculations meete for good wits so be exercised in. The waight of this matter concerneth she globe of she Moone and touchesh principally this notable accident of the face which appeareth therein: by occasion whereof, divers questions depending upon the first and principall, are discussed and resolved by our authour, according as he hash comprised and understood them. But here is the mischiefe in this discourse, like as in many others of thusecond tome, that it is not only headlesse, but maimed also and dismembred otherwise: and yet the translatour and the french especially hath with great dexterity laid the pieces together, so as the breaches can hardly be seene, unlesse a man looke very neere. Now the principall matters handled here, be these that follow. After that Plutarch had refuted three opinions concerning the face in the Moone, and brought in one Lucius, maintaining that position of the Academiques, who presuppose 30 that the Moone is terrene and confifter b of an earthly substance, he entreth into disputation against those who attribute one centre unto the world and the earth, labouring to confirme his owne opinion by divers arguments marked in their order: which he handleth with such a grace, that yet a man may see withall, how naturall Philosophy destinate of that light of Gods word (which by Moses in the first chapter of Genesis resolveth and cleereth infinit disputations and controver sies in these matters) is in amaner blinde and stumbleth many times most grossy and absurdly. Moreover, according to the traine of words and speeches, which commonly in such conferences follow one upon another, they treat of the centre and motion of the universall world, of the proportion thereof, and the principal parts of it, of theillumination of the Moone, of reflexions and mirrours, of ecliples and the shadow of the earth. Item, whether the Moone be a globe of fire, or of what elfe twhat is her colour? from whence procee-40 deth & how commeth this resemblance of a face which is observed in her? whether the beinhabited or no? as also of her nature and effects. Toward the end he intermedieth a fable fetched from the Poets and ancient naturall Philosophy, for to mollifie and make more probable and credible that which had beene delivered as touching those that dwell within the Moone. In sum, this treatise gives hoood proofe of the quicke and pregnant wit of our authour, who could enter ento, and perce through althings: whereof if he have not alwaies attained unto the exact knowledge, we should rather by all likelihood blame the iniquity of long time, which hath not permitted us to have these bookes entire and whole, than the insufficiency of so deepe a clerke. To conclude, this ought to unite those that sound and search into the secrets of nature, to ioine with that which the moderne Philosophers of our time are able to write fleightly and at ease of such matters, what hath beene delivered by the ancients, who indeed have made the coverture unto those who succeeded after them: to the end that there might be drawen out of them all, a certaine firmere solution, which raises hus up above the Moone, and all other celestiall bodies, unto the onely God and sole Creator of so many admirable works, thereby to acknowledge, serve and praise him according as his omnipotent greatnesse doth deserve.

OF

Ell, thus much faid Sylla, for it accorded well to my speech, and depended thereupon: but I would very willingly before all things else know, what need is there to make such a preamble for to come unto these opinions, which are so curran and rise in every mans mouth, as touching the face of the Moone. And why not (quoth I) to considering the difficultie of these points which have driven us thither: for like as in long maladies, when we have tried ordinatie remedies, and usuall rules of diet, and found no helpe thereby, we give them over in the end, and betake our selves to lustrall facissics and expiations, to anulets or preservatives for to be hanged about our necks, and to interpretations of dreames: even fo in fuch obscure questions, and difficult speculations, when the common and ordinarie opinions, when usuall and apparent reasons will not serve not fatisfie us, necessary it is to assay those which are more extravagant, and not ote-ject and despite the same, but to enchant or charme our selves, as one would say, with the discourses of our auncients, and trie all meanes for to sinde out the trueth: for at the very first encounter you see, how absurd he is & intollerable, who saith, that the forme or face appearing in the Moone, is an accident of our cie-sight, that by reason of weaknes giveth place to the bright ensile thereof, which accident we call the dazzeling of our cies, not considering withall, that this should befall rather against the Sunne, whose light is more resplendent, and beames more quicke and piercing, according as Empe docles himselse in one place pleasantly noteth the difference, when he saith:

for so he expresset that milde, amiable, pleasant, and harmelesse visage of the Moone: and afterwards rendereth a reason, why those, who have obscure & feeble sights, perceivenot in the Moone any different forme or shape, but unto them her circle shineth plaine, even, unisome and sull round about; whereas they who have more quicke and piercing eies, doe more exactly observe the proportion and lineaments, and discene better the impression of a sace, yea, and distinguish more perfectly and evidently the severall parts: for in mine opinion it would fall out cleane contrary, in case the weakenesse of the eie being overcome, caused this apparition, that where the patient eie is more feeble, there the said apparence and imagination should be more expressed and evident: surthermore, the inequalitie therein, doth fully every way consute this reason; for this face or countenance is not to be seen in a continuate and consulted shadow: But Agessaw the Poet, right elegantly depainteth in some fort the same, in these words:

All round about environed
With fire she is illumined:
And in the middes there doth appeere,
Like to some boy, a wifage cleere:
Whose eies to us doe seeme in view,
Of colour grayish more than blew:
The browes and forehead, tender seeme,
The checks all reddish one would deeme.

For intructh darke and shaddowy things, compassed about with shose that are shining &cleate are driven downeward, and the same doe rise againe receptocally, being by them repulled, and in some word, are interlaced one within another; in such fort as they represent the forme of a face lively and natuturally depainted: and it seement that there was great probability in that which Cleareus said against your Aristotle. For this Aristotle of yours, though he familiarly conversed with that ancient Aristotle, pervetted and overthrew many points of the Perepateticks destrine. Then Apollonides, taking upon him to speake, demanded, what opinion this might be of Aristotle and upon what reason it was grounded. Surely (quoth I) it were more meet for any man else to be ignorant hereof, than for you, considering that it is grounded upon the very fundamental principles of Geomitry. For this man affirmeth that the thing, which we call the sace in the Moone, are the images and figures of the great ocean, represented in the Moone as in a mirror: for the circomference of a round circle, being restlected backe every way, is wont to deceive the sight in such things as are not directly seene. And the full Moone her telse is, so evenesse, smoothnesse and lustre, the most beautifull and purist mirror in the world. Like as therefore yee holde, that the rainbow appeareth (when our cirsight is restlected backe upon the Sanne) in a cloud, that hath gotten smoothnesse for mewhat liquid, and a consistence with alseven so (quoth he) a man may see in the Moone the great ocean, without, not in the very place where it is situate: but from whence the reseasion by touching the light reverberat and lent backe, maketh a sight and apparition thereof. which Agessmax hath said in another place, after this maner,

is just refembled there

In fluming mirrour, when great waves

It doth against it reare.

Apollonides then, being perswaded that it was so ; a singular opinion believe me (quoth he) this was of his, and when all is faid, newly and after a ftrange maner devised by a man, who may be thought bold and confident enough in his projects, howbeit full of wit and a great clerke with-20 all. But how did Clearehus refute the fame? First & formost (quoth I) If the maine sea or ocean beall of one nature then it must needs be that the currant thereof is all one uniforme & continuate: but the apparence of those blacke & dim obscurities which are observed in the face of the Moone, is not even and continued, but there be certaine ifthmes or partitions betweene cleere and bright, which divide and seperat that which is shadie and darke. Therefore seeing each part isdiffine, and hath proper bounds and limits apart, the conjunctions & approchaments of the electe to that which is darke, making a femblance of high and low, do expresse and resemble the fimilitude of a figure, with cies & lips; fo that of necessity we are to suppose, that there be many oceans and maine feas, diffinguished by the ifthmes of firme lands betweene: which is a manifest untrueth. And admit that there is but one continued sea for all, it is not credible that the i-30 mage thereof should appeare so diffipate and distracted by peeces: and as for this point, the furer way is, and leffe dangerous, to demand, than to affirme ought in your prefence; namely whether, the habitible earth being equall in length and bredth, it be possible, that all the fight reflected and fent backe by the Moone, should equally touch the whole ocean and all those that faile therein, and even fuch as feeme to dwell in it, as the Brittaines doe: feeing that your felves have maintained that the whole earth, in proportion to the globe or fphære of the Moone, is no more than a very pricke. As for this verily (quoth I) it is your part to regard and confider : and true it is that as touching the reverberation and reflexion of the fight from the Moone, it belongethneither to you nor to Hipparcus. And yet I affure you, my good freind Lamprius (quoth Apollomides) there be many naturalists, who holde it not good to affirme with Hippareus that 40 our fight is so driven backe; but they suppose and affirme, that it is more like and probable that ithath a certaine temperature and obeifant compact structure, than such beatings and repercustions as Epicurus imagineth the Atomes have. Neither doe I beleeve that Clear chus would have us to suppose, that the Moone is a massive and waighty bodic, but celestiall and lightsome: against which you say that the refraction of our eie-fight should reach : and therefore all this reflexion, and reverberation falleth to the ground and comes to nothing. But if I should be urged, and intreated by him to receive and admit the fame, I would aske him the question, how it comes to passe, that this image of the sea is to be seene onely in the bodie of the Moone, and not in any of the other starres? for by all likelihood and probability, our fight should suffer the fame equally in all, or just in none at all. But I pray you (quoth I, castyng mine cies upon Lu-50 cine) call to minde againe that which was first delivered of our part, & by those of our side. Nay rather I am affraid (quoth Lucius) leaft we may be thought to offer over much injury unto Phirnaces, if we should so passe over the Stoicks opinion unconsuted, and without opposing any thing against it. Why then reply somehat upon this man (quoth I) who holdeth that the Moon is a whole mixtion of the aire, and of some milde fire, and then afterwards saith, that like as in a calme, there happeneth other whiles a little horror or winde, that rumbleth and bloweth upon the fea, even fo the aire thereby becommeth blacke; and thereupon is made a certaine relemblance and forme of a vifage. Courteoufly done of you Lucius (quoth I) thus to clad and cover with faire words and good termes fo abfurd and false an opinion. But so did not our friend, but spake the plaine troth, and faid that the Stoicks disfigured the Moones face making it blacke and blew, and filling it with darke spots and clouds, and withall invocating her by the name of Minerva and Diana, and in the meane while making her a lumpe as it were of paste, consisting of darke aire and a fire of charcole, that cannot burne out, nor yeeld light of it felfe, but having a body hard to be judged and knowen, ever smoaking and alwaies burning like to those lightnings which by the Poets are called, lightleffe and smoakie. But that a fire of coales, such as they would have that of the Moone to be, continueth not long, nor can fo much as fubfift, if it meete not with some solid matter, which may holde it in and withall feed and nourish it; I suppose that they know better, who in meriment fay that Vulcane is lame and doth halt, than thefe Philosophers doe : for that indeed fire cannot goe forward without wood or fewell, no more than a lame criple without his staffe or crouches. If then the Moone be fire, how commeth it to have fo much aire in it? For this region aloft which mooveth round, doth not confift of aire, but of fome other more noble substance, which is able to subtilize and set on fire every thing beside. But in case it be afterwards engendred in it, how is it that it perishith not by being changed and transmuted by the fire into accelestiall substance, but mainteineth it selfe, and continueth together as it were, cohabiting with the fire follong, like unto a fpike or naile fet fast continually in the fame parts, and fitted thereto? For being rare as it is, and diffused, meet it were that it should not fo abide and continue, but be diffipated and refolved; and to grow compact and thicke it 20 is impossible, so long as it is mixed with fire, having no earth nor water; which are the two onely elements whereby the aire will gather to a confiftence and thicknesse. Moreover, the fwiftnesse and violence of motion, is wont to enslame the aire that is within stones, yea, and in lead as cold as it is: much more then, that which is in fire, being whirled about, and turned with fo great celeritie and impetiolitie: for in this regard they are offended with Empedocles. for that he made the Moone congealed aire, in maner of haile, and included within a sphære of fire: and yet themselves say, that the Moone being a sphære or globe of fire, doeth enclose and conteine the aire dispersed to and fro; and that the same hath neither ruptures nor concavities, ne yet any profundities, which they admit who will have the Moone to be of earth, but for footh superficially onely, and as it were settled upon the imbossed and swelling backe there. of: which is against all reason, if it be to endure, and cannot possibly be, incase we give credit 30 to that which we doe fee in full Moones: for divided it ought not to be, and feparagate apart, being blacke and darke, but either being hidden, to be altogether darkened, or else to be illuminate when the Moone is overspred by the Sunne. For heere beneath with us, the aire that is in deepe pits and low caves of the earth, where the Sunne beames never come, remaineth darke and shadie, without any light at all: but that which is spred about the earth, is cleere, and of a lightlome colour; for by reason of the raritie thereof, it is very easie to be transmuted into every qualitie and facultie; but principally by the light, which if it never fo little touch it, as they fay, and lay hold of it, you shall see it incontinently changed, and light throughout. This very reason therefore seemeth greatly to helpe and mainteine the opinion of them who drive the aire into I wor not what deepe vallies and pits within the Moone; as also to consute you, 40 who mingle and compound I know not how, her sphære of fire and aire; for impossible it is that there should remaine any shadow or obscuritie in the superficies thereof, when the Sunne with his brightnesse doeth cleere and illuminate whatsoever part of the Moone we are able to difference, and cut with our eie-fight. And as I spake these words, even before I had made an end of my speech: See (quoth Pharnaces) the ordinary cast of the Academie, how it is, practifed upon us, in that they busie themselves evermore, and spend time in all their discourses to speake against others, but never allow the discussing and reprooving of that which they deliver themfelves: but if any happen to conferre and dispute with them; they must plead in their ownedefence alwaies, and not be allowed to reply or come upon them with any accusations: for mine 50 owne part, you shall not draw me this day to render a reason of such matters as you charge upon the Stoicks, nor to speake in their behalfe, before I have called you to an account: for thus turning the world upfide downe, as you doe. Heereat Lucius laughing; And very well content am I good fir, (quoth he) fo to do, provided alwaies, that you accuse us not of impietie; like as Ariflarchus thought that the Greeks ought to have called Cleant hes the Samean into questio, judicially & to condemne him for his impletie and Atheisme, as one that shooke the very foundations of the world to overthrow all, in that the man endevoring to fave and maintaine those things which appeare unto us above, supposed the heaven to stand still as immooveable, and that it was the earth that mooved round by the oblique circle of the Zodiacke, and turned about the owne axeltree. As for us, we speake of our selves, and in our owne behalfe. But they, my good friend Pharnaces, who suppose that the Moone is earth, why doe they turne the world upfide downe, more than you, who place the earth heere hanging in the aire, being farre greater then the Moone, as the Mathematicians take their measure, in the accidents of the ecclipfes, and by the paffages of trajections of the Moone through the shadow of the earth, collecting thereby the magnitude thereof, and what space it taketh up? for surely the shadow of the to earth is leffe than it felfe, by reason that it is cast by a greater light. Now that the said shadow is fireight, and pointed upward toward the end, Homer himselse was notignorant, butfignified as much, when he called the night soin, for the tharpeneffe at the point of the faid thadow, and yet the Moone as it appeareth in her ecclyples, being caught and comprehended within the compasse of that shadow, hath much adoo to get out of it, by going forward in length, thrice as much as her owne bigneffe comes to. Confider then, how many times greater must the earth needs be than the Moone, if it be so, that the shadow which it casteth, where it is sharpest and narrowest, is thrice as much as the Moone, But yee are afraid least the Moone should fall, if she were avowed to the earth: (for it may be haply, that Aefchylus hath sealed you a warrant, and fecured you for the earth, when he faid thus of Atlas:

He flandeth like a pillar strong and sure, From earth to heaven above that reacheth streight: To beare on stoulders twaine, he doeth endure A masse burden and unweldy weight.)

is under the Moone there runne and be spred a light and thin aire, not firme and sufficient for to sustein a solide masse: whereas according to Pindarus:

To beare the earth there standmost pussant Columns and pillars of hard diamant.

And therefore Pharnaces for himselfe is out of all feare, that the earth will fall; mary he pittieth those who are directly and plumbe under the course of the Moone, and namely the Aethiopi-30 ans, and those of Taprobana, least so weightie a masse should tumble downe upon their heads. And yet the Moone hath one good meanes and helpe to keepe her from falling, to wit, her very motion and violent revolution, like unto those bullets or stones, or whatsoever weights be put within a fling, they are fure enough from flipping or falling out, folong as they be violently fwong and whirled about. For every body is carried according to the natural motion thereof, if there be no other cause to empeach or turne it aside out of course: which is the reason that the Moone mooveth not, according to the motion of her poife, confidering the inclination thereof downward, is staied and hindred by the violence of a circular revolution. But peradventure more cause there were to marvel, if the should stand altogether as the earth, immoveable whereas now the Moone hath this great cause to empeach her, for not tending down-40 ward hither. As for the earth, which hath no other motion at all to hinder it; great reason there is, that according to that onely weight of the owne, it should moove downward and there settle; for more heavy it is than the Moone, not so much in this regard, that greater it is, but more, for that the Moone by reason of heat and adustion of fire, is made the lighter. In briefe, it appearethby that which you fay, if it be true that the Moone be fire, it hath need of earth, or some other marter to rest upon and cleave untenfor to mainteine, nourish, and quicken still the power that it hath: for it cannot be conceived or imagined, how fire should be preserved without fuell, ormatter combustible. And you your felves affirme, doe yee not? that the earth abideth firme and fure, without any base or piedstall to susteine and hold it up? Yes verily (quoth Pharmases) being in the proper and naturall place, which is the very mids and center. For this is it 50 whereto all heavy and weightie things doe tend, incline, and are caried to, from every fide, and about which they cling, and be counterpeized : but the upper region throughout, if haply there be any terrestriall and heavy matter, by violence sent up thither, repelleth and casteth it downe againe with force incontinently, or to speake more truely, letteth it goe and fall, according to the owne naturall inclination, which is to tend and fettle downward.

For the answer and refuration whereof, I willing to give Luctue fome reasonable time to fummon his wits together, and to thinke upon his reasons: and calling unto Them by name,

Which

Which of the tragical Poets was it (Theon quoth I) who faid that Phylicians Bitter medicines into the body powre,

The face appearing in the Moone.

When bitter choler they meane to purge and scoure? And when he made me answere that it was Sophocles. Well (quoth I) we must permit them so to doc upon necessity: but we ought not to give eare unto Philosophers, if they would main. taine strange paradoxes, by other positions as absurd, or to confute admirable opinions, devise others much more extravagant and wonderfull; like as these here who broch and bring in a motion for footh tending unto a middle, wherein, what abfurdity is there not? Holde not they that the earth is as round as a ball, and yet we fee how many deepe profundities, hauticfublimi. ties & manifold inequalities it hath ? affirme not they that there be antipodes dwelling opposit to one unto another, and those sticking as it were to the sides of the earth with their heeles upward & their heads downward all arfe verfe, like unto thefe woodwormes or cats which hang by their Tharpe clawes? Would not they have even us also that are here for to goe upon the ground not plumbe upright, but bending or enclining fidelong, reeling and staggering like drunken folke? Doe they not tell us tales, and would make us beleeve, that if barres and maffes of iron waighing a thousand talents a peece, were let fall downe into the bottom of the earth, when they came once to the middle centre thereof, will stay and rest there, albeit nothing els came against them nor fulfained them up? And if peradventure by fome forcible violence they should passe beyond the faid midft, they would foone rebound backe thither againe of their owneaccord? Say not they that if a man should faw off the trunks or ends of beams on either fide of the earth, 30 the fame would never fettle downeward still throughout, but from without forth fall both into the earth, and so equally meet one another, and cling together about the hart or centre thereof. Suppose not they that if a violent streame of water should runne downeward still into the ground, when it metonice with the very point or centre in the midft, which they holde to be incorporall, it would then gather together and turne round in maner of a whirlepoole, about a pole, waving to and fro there continually like one of these pendant buckets, and, as it hangeth. wagge inceflantly without end? And verily some of these affertions of theirs are so absurd, that no man is able to enforce himselfe to imagine in his minde although falsely, that they are possible. For this indeed is to make high and low all one; this is to turne all upfide downe: that those things, which become as farre as to the midft, shal be thought below and under : and what is un- 30 der the middle shall be supposed above and aloft; in such sort, as that if a man, by the sufferance and content of the earth, flood with his navell just against the middle and centre of it, he should by this meanes have his head and his heelesboth together standing upward: and if one should come and digge through the place beyond that part of him which was above, shall in the digging be drawen downeward, and that which was beneath be cast upward both at once: and if there may be imagined another to goe cleane contrary unto him, their feet which were oppofite one unto the other, should neverthelesse be said and be indeed both together, beneath and above. Thus they both carrying upon their backs and also drawing after them, not I affure you a box or little budget, but a fardle and packe, I sweare unto you, of judglers boxes full of so many and so groffe paradoxes and abfurdities, wherewith they play paffe and repaffe, yet the lay 40 for all this, that others erre, who place the Moone which they holde to be earth, above, and not where the midst and centre of the world is. And yet if every ponderous body, incline to the fame place and bendeth from all fides and on every part to the midfithereof, certainly the earth shall not appropriate and chalenge unto it felfe waightie masses as parts thereof because it is the middle of the world, more than in regard it is whole and entire : and the gathering together of heavie bodies about it, shall be no figne nor argument to shew that it is the middle of the world, but rather to proove and testifie that these bodies which have been etaken and pulled from it and returne againe, have a communication and conformitie in nature with the earth. For like as the Sunne converteth into it selfe the parts whereof it is composed even fo the earth receiveth and beareth a stone, as a partappertaining unto it, in such fortas intime 50 every one of these things is concorporate and united with it. And if it chance that therebe some other body which from the begginning was not allotted and laid unto the earthnor plucked from it, but had a part from it, a proper confistence and peculiar nature of the owne, as they may fay the Moone had, what should let, but it may abide severally by it selfe, compacted and bound close together in all the proper parts thereof? For heereby, is not shewed demonstratively that the earth is the midst of the whole world: and the conglobation of waighty bodies heere and their concretion which the earth declareth unto us the maner how it is probable that the parts the which be their gathered to the bodie of the Moone, may there also remaine. But he who driveth all earthly and ponderous things into one place, ranging them altogether, and making them the parts of one and the fame bodie, I marvell why he attributeth not in like maner the same force and constraint unto light substances, but suffereth so many conglobations of fire to be apart and diffinct afunder, neither can I fee the reason why he should not bring all the starres into one, and thinke that there ought to be one entire body of all those substances that flie upward and are of firie nature. But you Mathematicians, (friend Pollonides) affirme that the Sunne is distant from the Primum Mobile, and highest scope of heaven, infinite thou-10 fands of miles : and after him, that the day starre Venus and Mercury, with the other Planets, which being fituate under the fixed starres, and distant one from another, by great intervals and spaces betweene, doe make their severall revolutions: meane while you doe not thinke, that the world affordeth unto heavy and terrestriall bodies, a great and large place in it, and a distance one from another. But see what a ridiculous thing it were, to denie the Moone to be earth because it is not seated in the lowest place of the world; and withall to affirme it to be a star fofarre remote from the firmament and Primum Mobile, even a huge number of Stadia, as if it were plunged low into some deepe gulfe : for so farre under other starres she is, as no man can expresse, and even you Mathematicians want numbers to reckon and summe the distance: and the feemeth after a fort to touch the very earth, making her revolution as the doth, fo nere 20 unto the tops of high mountaines, leaving behinde her (as Empedocles faith) the very prints and tracks of her chariot wheeles upon them : for often times the furpaffeth not the shadow of the earth, which is very thort, and reacheth not high, by reason of the excessive greatnesse of the Sunne that shineth upon it: and she seemeth to walke her stations so neere unto the upper face of the earth, and in a maner within the armes of it, that the obstructeth and hideth from us the light of the Sunne, because the mounteth not above this shadowy, terrestriall and darke region like unto the night, which is (as one would fay) the very finage and marches allotted to the earth. And therefore a man may be bolde to fay, that the Moone is within the limits and confines of the earth, feeing withall that darkened and shadowed it is by the high crests and tops of mountaines therein. But to leave all other starres, aswell fixed as wandering, consider the de-30 monstrations of Aristarchus in his treatise of Magnitudes and Distances, that the distance of the Sunne from us is more than that of the Moone, above eighteene folde, but under twentie: andheverily who raiseth the Moone highest, faith that she is from us, fix and fiftie times as, farreas is the centre of the earth; the diffance whereof is fortie thousand stadia. By their calculation who keepe a meane, and according to this supputation, the Sunne ought to be distant from the Moone more than foure thousand and thirty stadia ten thousand times tolde : so farre (Ifay) is the off from the Sunne in regard of her ponderofity, and fo neere approacheth the unto the earth: fo that if, by places, we ought to diffinguish of substances, the region and portion of the earth challengeth the Moone, and in regard of her proximity and vicinage unto it, the ought by right to be reckoned and enrolled among the natures, affaires, and bodies terrestrials. 40 Neither shall we do amisse in my conceit, if having given unto these bodies (that are said to be aloft) so large a space and distance, we allow also to those beneath, such a race and spacious roune to runne in, as is from the earth to the Moone: for as he is not moderate nor tolerable, who calleth the upper superficies onely and cope of the heaven are, that is to say, alost, or superiour; and all the rest wire, that is to say, beneath; so he who termeth the earth or rather the center of it onely, garas, that is to fay, below or inferiour, is not to be endured; confidering that the huge valitity of the world may affoord, even in this region beneath, such a competent space as is meet and convenient for motion. For if one would mainteine, that all above the earth is immediatly to be counted high and aloft; another presently will come upon him with this contradiction, and fay, that he may aswel hold, that what soever is beneath the Primum mobile or thar-50 rie firmament, ought to be called Below. In fumme, how is the earth called, The middle? and whereof is it the middle? for the univerfall frame of the world, called may, is infinit; and this infinit which hath neither head nor foot: how can it in reason have a navill? for even that which we call the mids of any thing, is a kinde of limitation; whereas infinitie is a meere privation of all limits and bounds. As for him who faith, it is not in the mids of that universalitie, but of the world, he is a pleafant man, if he thinke not withall, that the world it felfe is subject to the lame doubts and difficulties: for the faid univerfall frame leaveth not unto the very world a Fffff middle, but is without a certeine feat, without affured footing, mooving in a voidneffe infinite not into some one place proper unto it : and if haply it should meet with some any other cause of flay, and so abide stil, the same is not according to the nature of the place. And as much may we conjecture of the Moone, that by the meanes of some other soule or nature, or rather of some difference, the earth continueth firme beneeath, and the Moone mooveth. Furthermore you see, how they are not ignorant of a great errour and inconvenience: for if it be true, that whatfoever is without the centre of the earth, it skils not how, is to be counted Above and Aloft, then is there no part of the world to be reckoned Below or Beneath; but aswell the earth it selfe. as al that is upon it, shal be above & aloft: and to be short, every bodie neere or about the centre, mult go among those things that are aloft; neither must we reckon any thing to be under or be- or neath, but one pricke or point, which hath no bodie : and the fame for footh must make head and stand in opposition necessarily, against all the whole nature besides of the world; in case, according to the course of nature, and wire, that is to fay, above and beneath, be opposite. And not onely this abfurdity will follow, but also all heavie and ponderous bodies must needs lose the cause, for which they bend and incline hither: for, bodie there will be none, toward which it should move : and as for this pricke or centre that hath no bodie, there is no likelihood, neither would they themselves have it so, that it should be so puissant and forcible, as to draw to it, and reteine about it, all things. And if it be found unreasonable and repugnant to the course of nature, that the world should be all above, and nothing beneath, but a termeor limit, and the same without body, without space and distance; then this that we say, is yet more 20 reasonable, namely, that the region beneath and that above, being parted distinctly one from another, have nevertheleffe ech of them a large and spacious roume to round themselves in. But suppose (if it please you) it were against nature, that terrestrials bodies should have any motion in heaven; let us confider gently and in good termes, not after a tragicall maner, but mildly, This prooveth not by and by, that the Moone is not earth, but rather, that earth is in some place, where naturally it should not be: for the fire of the mountaine Aetna, is verily under the ground, against the nature of it; howbeit, the same ceaseth not therefore to be fire. The winde conteined within leather bottles, is of the owner nature light and given to mount upward, butby force it commeth to be there, where naturally it ought not to be. Ourvery foule it felfe (Ibefeech you in the name of Jupiter) is it not against nature deteined within the body; being light, 30 in that which is heavie; being of a firie substance in that which is colde, as yee your selvestay; and being invisible, in that which is groffe and palpable? do we therefore denie, that the soule is within the bodie, that it is a divine fubltance under a groffe and heavie maffe, that in a moment it passeth thorowout heaven, earth and sea 3 that it pierceth and entreth within sless, nerves and marrow; and finally, is the cause together with the humors of infinit passions? And eventhis Jupiter of yours, fuch as you imagine and depaint him to be, is he not of his owne nature a mighty and perpetuall fire? howbert, now he submitteth himselfe and is pliable; subject he is to all formes and apt to admit divers mutations. Take heed therefore, and be well advited (good fir) left that in transferring and reducing every thing to their naturall place, you doe not fo philosophize, as that you will bring in a diffolution of all the world, and fet on foot againe that olde 40 quarrell and contention among all things which Empedocles writeth of : or , to speake more to the purpose, beware you raise not those ancient Titans and Giants, to put on armes against nature: and so consequently endevour to receive and see againe that fabulous disorder and consufion, whereby all that is weightie, goeth one way, and whatfoever is light, another way apart,

according as Empedocles hath written; wherein the earth feeleth no heat, nor the water any winde; wherein there is no ponderofity above, nor lightnessee beneath; but the principles and so elements of all things be by themselves solitary, without any mutuall love or dilection betweene them; not admitting any fociety or mixture together, but avoiding and turning away one from the other, mooving apart by particular motions, as being disdainfull, proud, and carying themfelves in such fort, as all things do where no god is, as Plato saith, that is as those bodies are affected wherein there is no understanding nor soule, untill such time as by some divine providence there come into nature a defire; and so amity, Venus and Love be there engendred, according to the fayings of Empedocles, Parmenides and Hefodus; to the end, that changing their natural places and communicating reciprocally their gifts and faculties; fome driven by necessity to moove, other bound to reft; they be all forced to a better flate, remitting fomewhat of their puwer, and yeelding one to another, they grew at length unto accord, harmony and focietie. For if there had not beene any other part of the world against nature, but that ech one had bene both in place, and for quality, as it ought naturally to be, without any need of change or transpolition, to that there had beene nothing authefirst wanting, I greatly doubt what and wherein was the worke of divine providence; or whereupon it is, that Jupiter was the father, creator and maker. For in a campe or field, there would be no need of a man who is expert and skilfull in 10 ranging and ordering of battell, in case every souldier of himselfe knew his ranke, his place, his time and opportunity, which he ought to take, keepe and observe. Neither would there be any nie of gardiners, carpenters or masons, if water were of it selfe taught naturally to go where asit is needfull, and to runne and overflow a place which requireth watering; and if bricks; timber-logs and flones by their owne inclinations and naturall motions, were to range and couch themselves orderly in their due places. Now if this reason and argument of theirs doth directly abolish all providence; if order belong unto God, together with the distinction of all things in the world; why thould any man wonder, that nature hath beene fo disposed and ordeined by him, as that fire should be here, and the starres there? and againe, that the carth should be seated here below, & the Moone placed there above, lodged in a more fire & ftrong priton, devifed by 20 reason, than that which was first ordeined by nature? For were it so, that absolutely and of necesfitie, all things should follow their naturall instinct, and move according to that motion which naturally is given them, neither would the Sunne runne his course any more circularly, nor Venu, nor any other planet whatfocver; for that fuch light fubflances, and flanding much upon fire mount directly upward. Now if it be fo, that nature recive th fuch an alteration and change in regard of the place, as that our fire here being moved and flitted, rifeth plumbe upward; but after it is gotten once up to heaven, together with the revolution thereof, turneth round: what maryell is it, if femblably, heavie and terrestrial bodies, being out of their natural places, be forced & overcome by the circumstant aire, to take unto another kind of motion? For it can not befaid with any reason, that heaven bath this flower to take from light substances the propertie 30 to mount aloft, and can not likewife have the puilfance to vanquish heavie things & such as naturally move downward; but one while it maketh use of that power of her owne, another while of the proper nature of things, alwaies tending to the better. But to let patfe these habitudes and opinions whereto we are fervilly addicted, and to speake frankly and without seare what our minde is, I am verily perswaded, that there is no part of the universall world, that hath by itselfe any peculiar order, feat or motion, which a man fimply may fay to be naturall unto it; but when ech part exhibiteth and yeeldeth profitably that, wherefore it is made, and whereto it is appointed, moving it felfe, doing or fuffering, or being disposed as it is meet and expedient for it, cither for fafetie, beautie, or puisfance, then feemeth it to have place, motion and disposition, proper and convenient to the owne nature. For man, who is disposed (if any thing els in the 40 whole world) according to nature, hath in the upper parts of the bodie, and especially about his head, those things that be ponderous and earthly; but in the mids thereof, such as be hore and of a firy nature; his teeth, fome grow above, others beneath; and yet neither the one range of them nor the other, is against nature. Neither is that fire which shineth above in his eies, according to nature, and that which is in the bellie and heart, contrary to nature, but in ech place is it properly feated and commodiously. Now if you confider the nature of thell-fitnes, you shall finde, that (as Empedocles faith)

Of the face appearing in the Moone.

The oifters, murets of the fea, and shell-fish every one, Withmaßie coat; the tortoife eke, with crust as hard as stone, And vaulted backe, which archwise he aloft doth hollow reare; Show all, that beave carth they do above their bodies beare.

And yet this hard coat and heavie cruft, like unto a stone, being placed over their bodies, doth not preffe or cruth them; neither doth their naturall heat, in regard of lightnesse, slie up and vanith away, but mingled and composed they are one with the other, according to the nature of every one. And even fo it standeth to good reason, that the world, in case it be animall, hath in many places of the body thereof, earth, and in as many, fire and water, not driven thither perforce, but so placed & disposed by reason: for the eie was not by the strength of lightnesse forced to that part of the body wherein it is; neither was the hart depressed downe by the weight that it had, into the brest; but because it was better and more expedient for the one and the other, to be feated where they are. Semblably, we ought not to thinke, that of the parts of the world, either the earth fetled where it is, because it sell downe thither by reason of ponderositie. or the Sunne, in regard of lightnesse, was caried upward, like unto a bottle bladder full of winde, which being in the bottome of the water, prefently rifeth up, (as Metrodorus of Chios was perfwaded) or other stars, as if they were put in aballance, inclined this way or that, as their weight to more or leffe required, and so mounted higher or lower to those places where now they are feated: but rather by the powerfull direction of reason in the first constitution of the world. fome of the starres like unto bright and glittering eies have beene set fast in the sirmament, as one would fay aloft in the very forhead thereof: and the Sunne representing the power and vigor of the heart, sendeth and distributeth in maner of bloud and spirits, his heat and light thorowout all. The earth and sea are to the world, proportionable to the paunch and bladder in the body of a living creature: the moone fituate betweene the Sunne and the earth, as betweene the heart and the bellie, refembling the liver or fome such soft bowell, transmitteth into the inferiour parts here beneath, the heat of those superior bodies, and draweth to herselfethose vapors that arise from hence, and those doth she subtilat & refine by way of concoction and puri- 20 fication, and fo fend and distribute them round about her. Now whether that folid and terrestriall portion in it, hath fome other propertie ferving for a profitable use or no, it is unknown to us; but furely it is evermore the best and surest way in all things, to goby that which is necesfarie: for what probabilitie or likelihood can we draw from that which they deliver? They affirme, that of the aire the most subtile and lightsome part, by reason of the raritie thereof, became heaven; but that which was thickened and closely driven together, went to the making of starres; of which the Moonebeing the heaviest of all the rest, was concret and compact of the most groffe and muddy matter thereof: and yet a man may perceive how she is not separate nor divided from the aire, but mooveth and performeth her revolution through that which is about her, even the region of the winds, and where comets or blafing starres be engendered and 30 hold on their course. Thus these bodies have not beene by their naturall inclinations, accor-

reason they have beene so ranged and ordeined. After these words were said, when I would have given unto Lucius his turne to speake, and to hold on this discourse, there being nothing at all behinde left, but the demonstrations of this doctrine: Aristotle beganto simile, I am a witnesse (quoth he) that you have directed al these your contradictions and refutations, against those, who hold that the Moone is it selfe halfe fire; and who affirme, that all bodies of their owne accord, tend either upward or downward directly: But whether there be any one who faith, that the Starres of their owne nature, have a circular motion, & that in substance they be far different from the foure elements, that came 40 not ever, so much as by chance and fortune into your remembrance: and therefore I count my felfe exempt from all trouble and molestation in that behalfe. Why, good fir (quoth Lucius) if yee should haply suppose and set downe, that the other starres, and the whole heaven besides, were of a pure and fyncere nature, voide of all change and muration, in regard of pattion, as alfo bring in a certeine circle, in which they performed their motions by a perpetuall revolution, you should not finde any one at this time to gaine-say you; notwithstanding there were in this position doubts and difficulties innumerable. But when your speech is descended so low as to touch the Moone, then can it not mainteine in her that impassibility, and the celestiall beautie of that body. But to leave all other inequalities and differences therein; certes, that very face which appeareth in the body of the Moone, commeth necessarily from some passion of her so owne substance, or else by the mixture of some other, (for that which is mingled in some sort alwaies suffereth) because it looseth that former puritie, being perforce overcast and filled with that which is woorfe. As for that dull and flow course of hers, that weake and feeble heat whereby, as the Poet Jon faith, ding as ech of them is light or heavie, placed and fituate as they be, but furely by fome other

And on the wine tree turne not blacke.

unto what shall we attribute the same, if not to her imbecilitie, in case an eternal and heavenly body can be subject unto any such passion? In summe, my good friend Aristotle, if the Moone be earth, furely a most faire and beautifull thing it seemeth to be, and full of great maiestie: if a starte, or light, or some divine and celestiall body, I am affraid least the proove deformed and soule, yea, and disgrace that beautifull name of hers, in case of all those bodies in heaven, which are in number so many, she onely remaineth to have need of the light of another, according as Parmendes writeth. And verily our familiar friend, having in a lecture of his, prooved by demonstration this proposition of Anaxagoras; that all the light which the Moone to hath, the Sunne giveth unto her, was commended and well reputed for it. For mine owne part, I am not minded to fay what I have learned, either of you, or with you; but taking this for a thing granted and confessed, I will proceed forward to the rest behinde. Probable therefore it is, that the Moone is illuminate, not in maner of a glaffe or crystall stone, by the bright irradiation and thining beames of the Sunne striking through her; neither yet by a certaine collustration and mutuall conjunction of lights, as torches which being fet a burning together, do augment the light: for fo it would be no leffe ful moone in the conjunction or first quarter, than in the opposition, in case she did not conteine and keepe in, nor repell the raics of the sunne, but fuffer them to paffe through her by reason of her raritie and frugositie, or if by a contempeture the shineth and kindleth as it were the light about her: for we cannot alledge her oblique and biase declination, or her aversions and turnings away, before and after the conjunction or change, as when it is halfe Moone, tipped croifant, or in the wane; but being directly and plumbe under the bodie that illuminateth it, as Democritus faith, it receive thand admitteth the Sunne, in fuch fort, as by all likelihood she should then appeare, and he shine through her: But so farre is the from so doing, that both herselfe at such a time is unseene, and many times hideth the Sunne, and keepeth off his beames from us: for according to Empedoeles,

His raies aloft she turneth cleane aside, That to the earth beneath they cannot wend: The earth is selfe she do th obscure and hide, So farre as she in compasse doth extend.

Asifthis light of the Sunne fell upon night and darkneffe and not upon another starre. And whereas Posadonius saith, that in regard of the thicknes & depth of the Moones body, the light of the Sun can not through her pierce, as far as unto us, this is manifestly convinced as untrue. Fortheaire as infinite as it is, and deeper by many degrees than the Moone, is neverthelesse illuminated and lightned all over, and thoughout by the Sunne. It remained therefore that according to the opinion of Empedocles, the Moone-light which appeareth unto us, commeth by the reflexion and repercussion of the Sunne-beames. And hererupon it is, that the same is not with us hot and bright, as of necessitie it would be, if it did proceed either from the inflammation or commixtion of two lights. But like as the restraction or reverberation of a voice, doth cause an eccho, or resonance more obscure than is the voice it selfe, as it was pronounced; and so the raps, that shot, rebounding backe againe, doeth give, are more milde and soft,

Even so the Sunne beames when they beat upon the Moone in compasse great. yeeld a weake and feeble reflexion or refluxion, as one would fay of light, the force thereof being much abated & resolved by the refraction & reslexion. Then Sylla: Certes, great probalitie this carieth with it, that you have delivered: But the most forcible objection that is made against this position, how thinke you, is it any waies mitigated and mollisted? or hath our friend heere passed it over quite with silence? Whereby speake you this (quoth Lucius?) what oppofition meane you dor is it the doubt or difficulty about the Moone when sheappeareth the one halfe? Even the very fame (quoth Solla) for there is some reason; considering that all resexion 50 is made by equall angles, that when the halfe Moone is in the middes of heaven, the light should not be carried from her upon the earth, but glaunce and fall beyond the earth: for the Sunnebeing upon the Horizon, toucheth with his raies the Moone, and therefore being reflected and broken æqually, they must light upon the opposite bound of the Horizon, and so not lend the light hither; or elfethere shall enfine a great distortion and difference of the angle, which is impossible. Why good fir (quoth Lucian) I dare assure you, this hath not beene overpassed, but explaned already fand with that, casting his eie as he spake, upon Menelaus the Mathematician:

Mathematician: I am abashed (quotli he) friend Menelam, to overthrow a Mathematicall pofitton, that is supposed and laid as a ground, and fundamentall principle for oblique matters of mirrours : And yet I must (quoth he) of necessitie: for that it neither appeareth in this example, nor is generally confessed as true, that all reflexions tend to equal angles, for checked and confuted it is by round embowed or embofied mirrors, when as they reprefent images appearing at one point of the fight, greater than themselves. This also is disproved by double or two folde mirrors, for that when they be inclined and turned one unto the other, fo as the angle be made within, ech of the glaffes or plaine superficies, yeeld the resemblance of a double image, and fo represent source in all from one face; two apparent, answerable to that without on the left fide; and other twaine obscure, & not so evident on the right fide, all in the bottome of 10 the mirrors, where they yeeld images, in appearance greater than the thing it felfe, at one point onely of the fight. The same likewise is overthrowen by those mirrors which are hollow, wherein the aspect is variable: whereof Plato rendereth a reason and efficient cause: for he faith, that a mitrorrifing of the one fide and the other, the fight doeth change the reflexion, falling from the one fide to the other: and therefore as the viewes and visions, some immediately returne upon us, others gliding upon the opposite parts of the mirror, have recourse againe from thence unto us, it is not possible that all reflexions should be in equal angles: so that when they come to coping and clote fight, they thinke by these oppositions to take from the fluxions of light, caried from the Moone to the earth, the equalitie of angles, supposing this to cary more probability with it, than the other. Howbeit, if we must needs yeeld thus much, and grant this 20 unto our best beloved Geomitrian: first and formost by all likelihood this should befall unto those mirrors that are very smooth and exquisitly polished: whereas the Moone hath many inequalities, and afperities, in such fort, as the raies comming from the vast body of the Sunne, and carried to mightie altitudes, which receive one from another, and intercommunicate the lights, as they be sent to and fro, and distributed reciprocally, are refracted, broken, and interlaced all maner of waies, fo as the counterlights doe meet and encounter one another, as if they came from many mirrours unto us. Moreover, if we should grant and suppose these reflexions of beames upon the superfices of the Moone, to be made by way of equal angles, there is no impossibility in the matter, but that the same raics being caried so great a way, shuld have their fractions, flexions, and delaptions; that thereby the light flould be confused and to thing the more.

Some also there be who prove by lineary demonstration, that she casteth much of her light to the earth plumbedowne by direct line drawen under her as the dothencline: But for a man to make such a discription and deliniation, reading as he doth, and discoursing in a publicke auditorie, especially being so frequent, it was not easie, neither could it well be. In briefe I marvell (quoth he) how they came thus to alledge against us the halfe Moone, more than halfe tipped or croifant. For if the Sunne do illuminate the maffe, as a man would fay, of the Moone, being of a celetitall or firy matter, furely he would not leave halfe the sphære or globe thereof datke alwaies & thadowed without light, to our fenfe, but how little foever he touched her, turning as he doth about, reason would give and convenient it were that she should be wholly replenished 40 and totally changed and turned, by that brightnesse of his, which spredesh so quickely, and pasfeth through all to cafily. For confidering that wine touching water in one point onely, or a drop of blood falling into some liquor, dieth and coloureth the same all red or purple, like into blood: and feeing they fay that the very aire is altered with light, nor by any definition of beames intermingled, but by fudden convertion and change, even in a point or pricke enely: how can they thinke that one starre comming to touchanother starre; and one light another thould not be mingled immediatly, nor make a confusion and mutation throughout, but to like minate that onely in the outward superficies which it toucheth? For that citale which the Sun maketh in fetching a compatie and turning toward the Moone, one while falling upon the very line which parteth that which is visible in her fto the invisible, another while rifing up discory; so in fuch fort as that it both cutteth her in twaine & is cutte also by her reciprocally, according to divers regards and habitudes of that which is light to the darke, cauling those fundry formerin her, whereby the appeareth but halfe, more than halfe horned and croffant : this I fay theweth more than any thing els, that this illumination of the Moone, whereof we speake all this whiles, is not a mixture of two lights but a touching onely, not a collustration of gathering together of fundry lights, but an illustration thereof round about But for as much as the is not onely illuminate her felfe, but he alfo fendeth backe hither unto us the image of that brightneffe, this confirmeth us more and more in that which we fay as touching her terreine fubflance. For never are there any reflections and reverberations upon a thing that is rare and of lubtile parts; neither may a man eafily fo much as imagine how light from light, or one fire should refult and rebound from another: but needs it must be that the subject which maketh the reverberation or reflection is firme, folidand thicke, to the end there may be a blowgiven against ir, and a rebounding also from it. To prove this, doe but marke the aire, which giveth passage nuto the Sunne for to perce quite through it, neither admitteth it any repulse or driving backe. Contrariwife we may fee, that from wood, from stones, and from clothes or garments, hung forth to against the same, he maketh many reflections of his light, and illuminations on every side. And even so we see, that the earth by him is illuminate; for he sendeth not his beames to the very bottome thereof as in water, nor throughout the whole as in the aire: but looke what circle the Sunne maketh turning about the Moone, and how much he cutteth from her, such another there is that compaffeth the earth: and just fo much he doth illuminate alwaies, as he leaweth without light: for that which is illumined in the one and the other, is a little more than a hemisphære. Give me leave therefore now to conclude after the maner of Geometricians by proportion. If, when three things there be, unto which the light of the Sunne commeth, to wit, the Aaire, the Moone, and the earth, we fee that one of them is by him illuminate, not as the aire, but as the earth: we must of necessity collect that those two be of one nature, considering an that of the fame cause they suffer the same effects. Now when all the companie highly commended Lucius for this disputation: Passing well done of you Lucius (quoth I) you have to a proper discourse annexed as prety a comparison; for we must give you your right and not defraud you of that which is your due. With that smiled Lucius: I have yet (quoth he) a second proportion which I will adde unto the other, to the end that we may prove by demonstration, that the Moone wholy refembleth the earth, not only by this that the fuffreth togetheer with the earth, from the fame cause, the fame accidents: but also because they both doe worke the like effects upon the fame object. For this I am fure you will yeeld and grant unto me, that of all those things which are observed about the Sunne, none doe so much refemble one another, as Somethinke his eelips doth his fetting or going downe: if you will but call to minde that meeting of Sunne he meaneth and Moone together, which hapned of late daies, and beginning immediatly after noonelted, over the face caused many a starre from fundry parts of the skie to be seene, and wrought such a temperature of the earth, ordisposition in the aire, as is of the twilight evening and morning. But if you will not grant which hapned at the venic methe faid supposition in this, our Theon here will cite and bring, I trow, Minnermus, Cydias, timethat our Architochus: and besides them Stesicher us and Pindarus, lamenting that in eclipses, the world is Saviour suite robbed of their greatest light which they bewaile as if it were enterred, faying that midnight was croffe, which loftand miffing out of the heaven being inconjunction with the Moone. And this happeth by a natural cause, according as Homer sheweth in this verse, of whi o Hour D plui O, To d' isantioro. What time as Moones their interchange begin

As one goes out, another commeth in.

As for the reft in mine advice they be as certaine and doe conclude as exactly as the demonstrations of the Mathematicians, to wit, that as the night is the fladow of the earth, fo the eclipse of seems, so it the Sun, is the thadow of the Moone, when as the fight returneth upon it felfe. For the Sunne will not that the Suns going downe is hidden from our fight by the earth, and being eclipted is likewife darkened by ecclipte, to be the Moone, and both the one and the other be offuscations of darkenesse; that of the Sunne at any other the Moone, and Both the one and the other poorrucations of darkeners, and the other of the Sunne eclipfed by the Moone, by the reafon that the die change, shade empeacheth our fight : of which premises the conclusion evidently doth follow. For if by course of the effect be like; the efficients also be semblable; because necessary it is, that the same accidents nature. or effects in the lame subject must come from the same efficient. Now if the darkenesse occafroned by the ecliples be not fo deepe nor affect the aire fo forcibly as doth the night, we are not to marvell thereat : for the substance of that bodie which maketh the night, and of it that canfeil the eclipse, may wel be the same, although the greatnesse be not equall. For the Aegypcome at noone day, and that the radiant beames of the Sunne, went in the way and path of communed his datkenesse: but above all he will alledge Homer, saying that in an eclips, the faces and visages of the facts home of the day, to men wete overcast and seized upon with night and darkenesse: also that the Sunne was quite to the math, tians, I suppose, doe hold, that the Moone is in bignesse the 72. part of the carth: And agor as faith it is just as big as Peloponnesus. Aristarchus writeth that the overthwart line or Diamiter of the Moone in proportion to that of the earth is leffe than if 60, were compared with nineteene: and somewhat more than if a hundred and eight were compared with 43: and thereby the earth bereaveth us of all fight of the Sunne, fo greatitis. For it must be a great obstacle and opposition betweene, which continue the time of a night: and the Moone albeit otherwhile the hideth all the Sunne, yet that ecclipse neither lasteth not so long, nor is so universall: for there appeareth alwaies about his circumference fome light, which will not permit the darknesse to be so blacke and deepe, and altogether so obscure. Anstotle also, I meane the ancient Philosopher of that name, rendring a reason why there happen ecclipses of the Moone 10 oftener than of the Sunne, among other causes, brings in this for one : that the Sunne is ecclipfed by the obstruction of the Moone, and the Moone by that of the earth, which is much greater and more spacious, and so by consequence is opposed very often. And Posidonius defined this accident thus: The ecclipse of the Sunne (quoth he) is the conjunction or meeting of the Sunne and the Moone, the shadow whereof doeth darken our eie-fight: for there is no defect or ecclipse of the Sunnes light, but unto those, whose fight the shadow of the Moone hath caught, and so hindreth them from seeing the Sunne. Now in confessing that the shadow of the Moone reacheth downe unto us, I know not what he hath left himfelfe for to alledge. Certes, impossible itis, that a starre should cast a shadow: for that which is voide altogether of light, is called a shadow; and light maketh no shadow, but contrariwise, naturally 20 riddeth it away. But what arguments befides, were alledged to this purpose (quoth he?) The Mounc (quoth I then) fuffereth the fame ecclipfe: Well done (quoth he) of you, to reduce this into my memoric: But would you have me to profecute this disputation, as if you had already granted and fet downe, that the Moone is subject to ecclipses, when she is caught within the shadow of the earth; or that for a subject and argument of some declamation, and demonftration unto you, I first rehearse all the arguments one after another ? Mary, do so I pray you (quoth Theon:) befrow your labour in fuch a discourse. I had need verily (quoth he) of some perswasson, having onely heard say, that when these three bodies, to wit, the earth, the Sunne, and the Moone, are directly in one right line, then happen ecclipses; for that either the earth, taketh the Sunne from the Moone, or the Moone taketh him from the earth: for the Sunne is 30 in defect or ecclipse when the Moone, and the Moone likewise when the earth is in the mids of them three; whereof the one falleth out in conjunction, the other in the opposition or full Moone. Then (quoth Lucius) these be in a maner all the principall points and the very briefe of those that which hath beene delivered: but to begin withall, if you thinke so good take in hand that firme argument which is drawen from the forme and figure of the shadow, which indeed is a Conte or Pyramis (refembling a fugar loafe) with the Tharpe end forward, namely when a great fire or great light being round, comprehendeth a maffe likewise round but lesse : and hereupon it commeth that in ecliples of the Moone the circumscription of the blacke or darkeneffe, from the cleere and light, have alwaies their fections round: for the approchments and applications of a round bodie, in what part foever, whether it give or receive those sections; 40 by reason of the similitude doe alwaies keepe a round forme and be circular. Now to the second argument. Youknow well (I suppose) that the first part eclipsed or darkened in the Moone, is that which regardeth the east: and contrariwise in the Sunne, that which looketh toward the west: for the shaddow of the earth goeth from east to west, but contrariwise the Sunneand Moone, from west eastward. The experience of the apparitions, giveth us the visible knowledge of these things: and many words there need not to make the demonstration hereof plaine and evident to be understood: by which suppositions is confirmed the cause of the eclipse: For, in as much as the Sunne is eclipfed when he is overtaken, and the Moone by meeting with that which maketh her eclipfe, by all likelihood, nay rather necessarily, the one is caught behinde, the other furprised before, for that the obstruction, & inumbration beginneth on that side on which 50 that commeth first that maketh the said inumbration. Now the Moone lighteth upon the Sunne from the west, as striving with him in course and hastning after him: but the shaddow of the earth commeth from the east, as having a contrary motion. The third reason is taken from the time and greatnesse of the eclipses of the Moone. For when she is eclipsed on high and farrefrom the earth, the continueth but a little while in defect or want of light: but when the fuffereth the fame default being low and nere unto the earth, the is much oppressed, and slowly getteth the foorth of the shade thereof : and yet when the is low the moveth most swiftly, and being aloft, as flowly. But the cause is in the difference of the shaddow, which toward the bottome or base is broader as are the Cones or Pyramides, & so it groweth smaller and smaller raperwife, untill at the top it endeth in asharpe point. And hereupon it cometh that the Moone being low and so falling within the shadow is compassed with greater circles of the shadow, & so passed feth through the very bottome of it, & that which is most darke but being on high, by reason of the narrow compaffe of the shadow, being as it were in a small puddle of mire, she is but a little fullied or beraied therewith, & so quickely getteth forth of it. Here I passe by the accidents and effects that have their particular causes. For we daily see that the fire, out of a shady place appea-10 reth & shineth the rather, either by reason of the thickenesse of the darke aire, which admitteth no effuxions nor diffusions of the vertue of the fire, keeping in and containing within it selfe the fubstance thereof: or rather if this be a passion of the sense, like as hot things nere unto cold are felt to be more hot, and pleasures presently upon paines found more vehement : even so things cleere, appeare better when they are laid neere unto those that be darke, by meanes of different passions, which doe streine the imagination: but the former conjecture seemeth to bee more probable: for in the Sunne-shine, the whole nature of fire not onely leefeth his brightneffe, but also in giving place unto it, becommeth more dull, and unwilling to burne, for that the hear of the Sunne doth scatter and diffipate the force thereof. If then it were true that the Moone had in it a feeble and dimme or duskish fire, as being a muddy starre, as the Stoicks faie 20 it is, reason it were and meet, that it should not suffer any one of those accidents (but contrary al) which now we fee it to fuffer, namely to be feene at that time when as it is hidden; and againe to be hidden, what time as the theweth herfelfe: that isto fay, to be covered all the rest of the time, being darkned by the aire environing it, and to shine out against or fix moneths, and afterwards for five moneths be hidden, entring within the shadow of the earth. For of 465, revolutions of ecclipfed full Moones, 404. are of fix moneths, and the rest of five. It must needs bethen, during this time, the Moone should appeare shining in the shadow but contrariwise we'ee, that in the fhadow ecclipfed theis, and loofeth her light, which the recovereth againe afterwards, when the is escaped and gotten foorth of the faid shadow, yea, and appeareth often in the day time; fo that it is rather any thing elfe than a firie body, and refembling a starre. 30 Lucius had no fooner thus faid, but Pharnaces & Apollonides came running both together, to fet upon him, and to confute his speech : and then Pharnaces affished by Apollomides there prefent: Why: this (quoth he) is that which principally prooveth the Moone to be a starre, and to fland much upon fire, namely, that in ecclipfes the is not wholly darkned, and not at all to befeere, but sheweth through the shade a certeine colour, refembling a coale of fire, and the fame fearefull to fee to, which is the very naturall and proper hue of her owne. As for Apollomides, he made instance and opposition as touching the word shadow: for that (quoth he) Mathematicians by that terme use alwaies to call the place which is not illumined, but the heaven admitteth no shadow. Whereto I made answer, that this instance of his was alledged rather against the word contentiously, than against the thing Physically, or Mathematically; for 40 the place which is darkned and obstructed by the opposition of the earth, if a man will not call a shadow, but a place voide or deprived of light, yet be it what it will, when soever the Moone is there, you must of necessitie confesse, that she becommeth obscure and darkned and in one word, I fay, it is a very abfurd folly to hold, that the shadow of the earth reacheth not to that place, from whence the shadow the Moone falling upon our fight heere upon the earth, caufeth the ecclipse of the Sunne. And now will I come against to you Pharnaces: For that burnt colour, like a coale in the Moone, which you fay is proper unto her, agreeth very well to a body, that hath thicknesse and depth: neither use there to remaine in bodies which be rare any marke or token of a flame, nor a coale can possibly be made of a body which is not solide & able to receive deepe within it the heat of fire, and the blacknesse of smoake: as Homer himselse 50 fhewerh very well in one place, by these words:

When flower of fire was gon and flowen away And flume extinct the coales he did forth lay.

For the coale feemeth not properly to be fire, but a bodie firie and altered by fire, remaining fill in a folid maffe or fubstance which hath taken as it were deepe root: whereas flames are but the fetting on fire and fluxions of fome nutriment or matter which is of a rare fubstance, and by reason of feeblenesse is quickely resolved and consumed. In so much as there were not another argument to evident, to prove that the Moone is folid and terrestriall, as this, if the proper colour therof resemble a coale of fire. But it is not so my Pharnaces; for in her eclipse the changeth diverfly her coldurs', which Mathematicians in regard of time and place determinally dithinguish in this fort, If the be eclipsed in the West, the appeareth exceeding blacke for three houres and an halfe; if in the middle of the heaven, the flieweth this light reddith or hay colour resembling fire : and after seven houres and an halfe, there ariseth a rednesse indeed. Finally, when this eclipse hapneth in the east and toward the Sunne rifing shetaketha blew or gravish colour, which is the caufe that the Poets and namely Empedocles calleth her Glaucopis. Confidering then, that they fee manifeftly how the Moone changeth into fo many colours in the fliaddow, they doe very ill to attribute unto her this colour onely of a burning or live coale: 10 which intructina man may flay to be leffe proper unto her than any other, and rather to be fome little fuffulion and remnant of light appearing and thining through a fliaddow; and that her proper and naturall colour is blacke and earthly. For feeing that here below whereas the lakes and rivers which receive the Sunne beames, and by that meanes feeme in their superficies to be some time reddish, and otherwhiles of a violet colour, the shaddowy places adjoining take the fame colours and are illuminated, flarting backe by reason of reflexions & divers rebated splendures. What wonder is it, if a great river (as it were) or flux of thadow falling upon a celeftiallifea as a man would fay of a light not firm, fledy & quiet, but flirred with inumerable flarres walking overit, and besides, which admitteth divers mixtures and mutations, doth take from the Moone the impression of fundry colours, and send the same hither unto us? For it cannot be avowed 20 that a flarre or fire flouid appeare through a fladdow either blacke, blew, or violet; buthils, plaines, and feas, are feene to have many and fundry refemblances of colours by reflexion of the Sunne running upon them, which are the very tinettures, that a brightnesse, mingled with shaddowes and milts (as it were) with painters drugges and colours, bringeth upon them: which tinctures Homer went about to expresse in some fort and to name, when one while he called the fea interfer, and one-lethat is to fay, of a violet colour, or deepered as wine, and otherwhile the waves purple: in one place the feablew, greene or grey, and the colour white: as for the tinctures and colours appearing upon the earth diverfly, he liath let them paffe, as I suppose, for that they be in number infinit. So, it is not like that the Moone should have but one plaine and even superficies in maner of the fea, but rather refemble naturally of all things especially the earth, whereof 30 olde Socrates in Plato seemeth to fable, whether it were, that under covert words and cenigmatically he ment this here of the Moone, or spake of some other. For it is neither incredible nor wonderfull if the Moone in it having no corruption normuddinesse but the fruition of pure light from heaven, and being full of heat, not of furious and burning fire, but of fuch as is milde and harmeleffe, hath also within her faire places and marvellous pleasant mountaines also, refplendant like bright flaming fire, purple tinctures or zones, gold and filver likewife good flore, not dispersed heere and there in the bottome thereof, but ariting up to the upper face of the said planes in great aboundance, or elfe fpred over the hils and mountaines, even and fmooth. Now fay that the fight of all thefe things commeth unto usthrough a fhaddow, and that after divers and fundry forts, by reason of the variable and different mutation of the circumstant aire, yet 40 loofeth not the Moone for all that, the venerable opinion that goeth of her and the reputation of her divinity, being effectned among men a celeftiall earth, or rather a feculent and troubled fire, as the Stoicks would have it, and franding much upon lees or dreggifh matter. For the very fire it lelle hath barbarian honers done unto it among the Medes and Affyrians, who for very feare ferve and adore such things as be notiforme and hurtful, hallowing & confectating the same above those things which are of themselves good and honorable. As for the name of the earth, there is not a Greeke but he holdeth it right worshipfull, sacred, and venerable: in so much as it is an ancient costome received throughout all Greece, to honour it as much as any other god whatfoever. And far is it from us men, to thinke that the Moone which we take to be a celestiall carth, as a dead body without foule or fpirit, and altogether yold of fuch things, which we ought 50 to offer as first fruits to the gods. For both by law we yeeld recompence and thankesgiving unto it, for those good things which we have received, and by nature we adore the same, which we acknowledge to be the most excellent for vertue, and right honourable for puissance, and therefore we thinke it no finne at all, to suppose the Moone to be earth. To come now unto the face that appearer) therein: like as this earth upon which we walke, hath many finuofities and valleis, even so as probable it is, that the faid heavenly earth, lieth open with great deepecaves, and wide chinks or ruptures, and those conteining either water or obscure aire: to the bottome thereof the light of the Sunne is not able to pierce and reach, but there falleth, and fendeth to us hither a certeine divided reflexion. Then Apollonides: Now I befeech you good fir, even by the Moone herselfe, thinke you it is possible that there should be shadowes of caves, gulfes, and chinkes there, and that the fame should be discovered by our fight heere? or doe you not make reckoning of that which may come thereof? What is that (quoth I:) Mary I will tell you, (quoti he) and albeit you are not ignorant thereof, yet may you give me the hearing. The Diameter of the Moone, according to that bigneffe which appeareth unto us, in the meane and ordinary distances, is twelve fingers bredth long: and every one of those blacke and darke to shadowy streaks therein, is more than halfe a finger, that is to say, above the foure an twentieth part of the faid Diameter. Now if we suppose the whole circumference of the Moone to be thirtie thousand stadia, and according to that supposition the Diameter to be ten thousand, every one of those obscure and shadowy marks within her, will not be lesse than five hundreth Stadia, or thereabout. Consider then first, whether it be possible that there thould be in the Moone to great profundities, and fuch rugged inequalities, as to make to bigge a thadow? and then, whether being to great, their bigneffe should not be descried and seene by us. Hecreupon I smiling upon him: Now I affure you Apollonides (quoth I) I con you thanke, you have done it very well, in devising such a proper demonstration, whereby you will proove both me and your felfe alfo to be greater than those Giants Alorades, I meane not at every houre of the 20 day, but especially in the morning and evening: doe you thinke that when the Sunne maketh our shadowes so long, hee yeeldeth unto our fense this goodly collection and augmentation, that if the thing which is shadowed be great, then that which maketh the shadow must needs be exceeding great? Neither of us twaine, I wot well, hath ever beene in the ille Lemnos, and yet both of us have many a time heard this vulgar Iambique verfe fo rife in every mans mouth: alos ratifes modes Anuvias Boos,

For this shadow of the hill falleth as it should seeme, upon a certeine brazen image of an heiser in that Isle, reaching in lengthover fea no lesse than 700 stadia; not because the faid mountaine 30 which maketh the Thadow is of that height, but because the distaces of the light causeth the shadowes of bodies to be by many folds greater than the bodies are, Go to then, confider that when the Moone is at the full, at what time as the rendreth unto our eie the forme of a vifage most exprefly, by reason of the profunditie of the shadow within, then is she also farthest distant from the Sunne: for the farre recoiling and withdrawing backward of the light, is it that makes the shadow great, and not the bignesse of those inequalities, which are upon the superficies of the Moone. Moreover you fee that the excessive glittering of the Sunne shining all about, will not fuffer a man to fee in the day time the very tops of mountaines: but the deepe, hollow, and shadowy parts therein, appeare very farre off. It carieth therefore no abfurditie at all, that a man is not able exactly to fee and differne that full light and illumination of the Moone: but 40 that the opposition of darke shadowes unto cleare lights, by reason of their diversitie is more exquifitely feene. But this (quoth I) feemeth rather to checke and confute that reflexion, and teverberation which is faid to rebound from the Moone, for that they who stand within the raics or beames that are returned and retorted backe, have meanes to see not onely that which is illumined, but that also which doeth illuminate. For when, in the resultation of a light from the water upon some wall, the fight falleth upon the very place it selfe, which is thus illuminate by the reflexion, the eie feeth three things, to wit, the beames or finning light driven backe, the water which maketh that reflexion, and the Sunne it selfe, whose light hitting upon the superficies of the water, is reflexed and sent backe. This being generally granted as a thing evidently scene, yet by way of objection, they bid those who affirme, that the carth is 50 illuminate from the Moone by the reflection of the Sunnes light from it, to thew by night the Sunne appearing in the superficies of the Moone, like as he may be seene in the day time within the water upon which the thineth, when there is the forefaid reflexion of his beames : But because he cannot then be seene, they inferre, that it must be by some other manner, and not by reflexion, that the Moone is illuminate; and if there be no fuch reflexion, then cannot the Moone in any wife be earth. How shall this be met withall, and what answere shall be shaped unto it (quoth Apollonides?) for the reason of reflexion seemeth all one, and common as well to us as to you. True (quoth I) common it is in some fort, and in some fort not : but first marke I befeech you the comparison, how they go cleane kim, kam, and against the streame, as if rivers ranne up hilles: for the water is heere beneath upon the earth, and the Moone is above and in the heaven : in fuch fort as the beames reflected, make the forme of their aneles opposite and quite contrarie one unto the other; the one carrying the head or point upward against the superficies of the Moone, the other downeward to the ground. Let them not then demaund and require that a mirrour should render every forme or face alike, nor that in every diffance there should be equall, or semblable reflexion, for inso dooing they would goe against apparent evidence. And they who holde the Moone to be abodie not smooth, even subtile as water is, but solid, massy, and terrestriall, I cannot conceive to why they should looke for to see the Sunne in it as in a glasse. For milke verily doth not yeeld fuch specularic images nor cause reflexion of the fight, by reason of the inequality and rugged asperity of the parts show is it possible then, that the Moone should send backe from it the sight as mirrours doe which are more polished? And even this also, if any rase, blur, filth, or confufed foot have caught them in the superficies, from whence the fight being reflected is wontto receive the impression of some figure, may well be seene, but counter-light they yeeld none; and he who requireth, that either the Sunne should appeare in the Moone, or our fight be redubled against the Sunne, let him require withall, that the cie be the Sunne, the fight thereof the light, and man, heaven. For like it is that the reflexion of the Sunne beames against the Moone, for their vehement & exceeding great brightnesse, should with a stroke rebound upon us: but seeing 20 our fight is weake and feeble, what marvel is it, if it neither give fuch a stroke as might rebound, nor maintaine the continuity thereof if it leaped backe againe, but is broken and faileth, as not having that abundance of light, whereby it should not be difgregate and diffipated, within those unneven and unnequall asperities? For it is not possible that the reflexion of our fight upon water, or other forts of mirrours, whiles the fame is yet firong, and able, as being necreunto the fpring from whence it commeth, should not returne againe upon the eie. But from the Moone, suppose there may rebound some glimmering glances, certes they be all weake and obscure, failing in the very way, by reason of so long a distance. For otherwise arched and hollow mirrors fend backe their reflected raies with more force, than they came, in fuch fort as many times they catch fire and doe burne: whereas the imboffed and courled mirrours made round 30 and bearing out like a bowle, cast from them feeble and darke raies, because they beate themnot backe on all sides You see certainely when two rainebowes appeare in the heaven, by reason that one cloud doth inviron and comprehend another, that the rainebow which compaffeth the other without forth, yeeldeth dim colours, and not sufficiently distinct & expressed, because the outward cloud being farther remote from our fight, maketh not a strong and forcible reflexion. And what needs there any more to be faid? confidering that the very light of the Sunne returned and fent backe by the Moone leefeth all the heat: and of his brightneffe there commeth unto us with much adoc but a small remnant, and a portion very little and feeble. Is it possible then that our fight running the same race there should any percell or residue thereof reach from the Moone backe againe to the Sunne? For mine owne part, I thinke not. Confider also I befeech 40 you (quoth I) even your owne selves, that if our eiefight were affected and disposed alike by the water and by the Moone, it could not otherwise be but that the Moone should representative us the images of the earth, of trees, of plants, of men, and of starres, as well as water doth, and all other kinds of mirrors. Now if there be no fuch reflexion of our eie fight fro the Moone, as to bring backe unto us those images, either for the feeblenesse of it, or the rugged innequality of her superficies, let us never require that it should leape backe as far as to the Sun. Thus have we reported as much as our memory would carrie away, what foever was there delivered: Now is it time to defire Sylla or rather to require & exact of him, to make his narration, for that admitted he was to here this discourse upon such a condition. And therefore if you thinke so good, let us give overwalking, and fitting downe hereupon these seates, make him a sedentarie audience. 50 All the companie liked well of this motion. And when we had taken our places, Theorethus began, Certes I am desirous (quoth he) and none of youall more, to heare what shall be faid: But before I would be very glad to understand somewhat of those who are said to dwell in the Moone, not whether there be any persons there inhabiting, but whether it be possible that any should inhabit there. For if this cannot be, then it were mere folly and befide all reason, to say, that the Moone is earth: otherwise it would be thought to have beene created in vaine and to noend: as bearing no fruits, nor affoording no habitation, no place for nativity; no food or nouriffiment for any men or women, in regard of which cause, and for which ends we turnly hold, that this earth wherein we live, as Plato faith, was made and created, even to be our nourie and keeper, making the day and night diffinct one from another. For you fee and know, that of this matter, many things have beene faid aswell merily and by way of laughter, as seriously and in good earnest. For of those who inhabit the Moone, some are faid to hang by the heads under it, as if they were fo many Tantali; others contrariwife, who dwell upon it, are tied fail, like a fort of Ixions, and turned about with fuch a violence, that they are in danger to be flung and shaken out. And verily she moveth not after one single motion, but three maner of waies; to whereuponthe Poets call her other-while, recolins, or Trivia, performing her course together, according to length, bredth, and depth in the Zodiak. Of which motions, the first is called, A direct revolution; the fecond, An oblique winding or wheeling in and out; and the third, the Mathematicians call (I wote not how) An inequalitie: and yet they see, that she hath no motion at all even and uniforme, not certeine in all her monthly circuits and reversions. No marvell therefore, confidering the impetuolitie of these motions, if there fell a lion sometimes out ofher into Peloponnes is : nay rather we are to wonder, why we see not every day a thousand falls of men & women, yea, and as many beafts shaken out from thence, and flung downe headlong with their heeles upward. For it were a meere mockerie, to diffoute and fi.md upon their habitation there, if they neither can breed nor abide there. For confidering that the Aegyptians and 20 Troglodytes, over whose heads the Sunne standeth directly one moment onely of the day in the time of the Solflices, and then presently retireth, hardly escape burning, by reason of the excessive ficcitie of the circumstant aire; how possibly can the men in the Moone endure 12 Summers every yere, when the Sunne once a moneth is just in their Zenith, and setleth plannbe over head, when the is at the full? As for winds, clouds, and raines, without which the plants of the earth can neither come up nor be preferved, it paffeth all imagination, that there flould be any there, the aire is fo fubtile, dric and hote; especially, seeing that even here beneath, the highelf mountaines doe admit or feele the hard and bitter Winters from yeere to yeere, but the aire about them being pure and cleere, and without any agitation whatfoever, by reafon of the fubtilitie and lightnesse, avoideth all that thicknesse and concretion which is among us : unlesse 20 haply we will fay, that like as Minerva instilled and dropped into Achilles mouth some Nettar and Ambrosia, when he received no other food 3 so the Moone, who both is called and is indeed Minerva, nourisheth men there, bringeth foorth daily for them Ambrosia, according as olde Phereides was wont to fay, that the very gods also were fedde and nourished. For as touching that Indian root, which (as Megasthenes faith) certeine people of India, who neither eat nor drinke, nor have fo much as mouthes, whereupon they be called Aftoni, do burne and to ke to fmoake, with the odor and perfume whereof, they live; how can they come by any fuch there, confidering the Moone is never watered nor refreshed with raine? When Theon had thus said: You have (quoth I) very properly and fweetly handled this point 3 you have (Ifay) by this mery conceited jeft, laied smooth and even, those bent and knit browes, the austerity (I meane) of this 40 whole discourse; which hath given us heart and encouraged us to make answere; for that, if we faile and come short, we looke not for streight examination, nor feare any sharpe and grievous punishment. For to say a trueth, they who take most offence at these matters, rejecting and discrediting the fame, are not fo great adversaries unto those who are most perswaded thereof; but fuch as will not after a milde and gentle fort confider that which is possible and probable. First and formost therefore, this I say, that, suppose there were no men at all inhabiting the Moone, it doth not necessarily follow therefore, that she was made for nothing and to no purpose: for we fee that even this earth here is not thorowout inhabited, nor tilled in all parts : nay, there is but a little portion thereof habitable, like unto certeine promontories or demy-ilands ariting out of the deepe (ea, for to breed, ingender and bring forth plants & living creatures : for of the 50 tell, some part is defert, waste and barren, by reason of excetsive colde and heat; but in trueth, the greatest portion lieth drowned under the great and maine sea. But you, (for the great love that you beare to Anflarchus, whom you admire fo much, and evermore have in your hands) give no eare to Crates, notwithstanding that you reade these verses in Homer;

The ocean fea, from whence both men, and gods were first ibred,
With surging waves the greatest part of earth aothower spred,

And yet God forbid, that these parts should be faid for to have beene made for nought : for the fea doth expire and breath forth certeine mild vapours: and the most gentle and pleafant winds which arise and blow in the greatest heat of Summer, come from frozen regions and not inhabited for extreame colde, which the fnow melting and thawing by little and little do fend from them and featter over all our countreys. And the earth (as Plato faith) arifeth out of the fea in the mids, as a guardianesse and workmistresse of night and day. What should hinder then, but that the Moone also may well be without living creatures in it, and yet give reflexions unto the light diffused and spred about her; yea, and yeeld a receit or receptacle of the stars raies which have their confluence, meeting and temperature in her, whereby the concocteth the evaporations afcending from the earth, and withall, abateth the over-ardent and firie heat of the Sunne, to Over & befides, attributing as we do very much to the ancient opinion & voice which we have received from our forefathers, we will be bold to fay, that the hath bene reputed Diana, as a virgin, barren and fruitlesse, but otherwise salutarie, helpfull and profitable to the world. And of all this that hath bene faid (my friend Theon) there is nothing that doth proove and shewdi. rectly, this habitation of men in the Moone to be impossible: for her turning about being so milde, so kinde and calme, polisheth the aire necre unto it, it distributesh and spreadeth the same all about in fo good disposition, that there is none occasion given to feare, that those who live in it should fall downe or slide out of her, unlesse she also come downe withall. As for that manifold variety of her motions, it proceedeth not from any inequality, error or confusion, but the Astrologers demonstratively shew thereby an order and course most admirable, contriving it 20 fo, that The fhould be fast within certeine circles that turne and winde about other circles, some deviling that the herselfe stirreth not, others supposing that the mooveth alwaies equally, fmoothly and in conforme celerity: for these are the ascentions of divers circles, the circumvertions and turnings about, the habitudes in references one to another, yea, and respective to us, which make most elegantly those orderly elevations and depressions in altitude, which appeare in her motion, yea, and her digressions in latitude, all jointly with that ordinary and direct revolution of hers in longitude. As touching that exceeding heat and continuall inflamation of the Sunne, you will ceafe (I am fure) to be afraid thereof, in cafe, first and formost, you will lay to those eleven hote and aftivall conjunctions as it were in exchange, as many oppositions when the is at the full; and then oppose unto those excessive and enormous extremities which holde 30 not long, the continual change and mutation, which reduceth them into a proper and peculiar temperature, taking from them that which is exceffive and overmuch in both: for it feemeth very probable, that the time betweene is a leafon refembling the Springtide. Moreover, the Sun fendeth his beames into us thorow a groffe and troubled aire, cafting his heat nourished and fed by evaporations: wheras the aire there, about the Moone, being fubtile & transparent, doth difgregate and disperse the said beames, as having no nouriture to mainteine them, nor body to fettle upon.

To come now unto trees, woods and fruits; here indeed with us, they be the raines that now rish them: but in other high countreys with you, namely, about * Thebes and Siene, it is not the water from heaven, but out of the earth, that feedeth them: for the earth being foaked there-40 with, and besides refreshed with coole winds and comfortable dewes, would be both to compare infertilitie with the best watered ground in the world, such is the goodnesse, vertue and temperature of the foile. And verily the trees of the same kinde with us, if they have beene well Wintered, that is to fay, if they have endured a sharpe and long Winter, bring forth plenty of good fruit; but in Libys and with you in Aegypt, they are soone hurtand offended with colde, and it they scare exceedingly. And whereas the provinces of Gedrosia and Trogloditis, lying hard upon the ocean fea, be very barren by reason of their drouth, and are altogether without trees: yet within the sea adjoining thereto, and which beateth upon the continent, there grow trees of a wonderfull bigneffe, yea & there be that put foorth fresh and greene at the very bottome of the sea: whereof some they call Olive trees, others, Lawrels, and some againe Is haires. As for 50 those plants which be called Anacampserotes, after they be plucked foorth of the ground where they grow, and so hanged up, they doe not onely live as long as a man would have them, but (that which more is) budde and put foorth greene leaves. Moreover, of those plants which are fet or fowen, fome, as namely, Centauri, if they be planted or fowed in a rich or fat foile, and the fame well drenched and watered, doe degenerate and grow out of their naturall qualitie, yea, and leefe all their vertue, for that they love to grow drie, and in their proper nature and foile agreeable thereto, they thrive paffing well. Others cannot fo much as away with any dewes, as the most part of the Arabian plants; for wet them once, they millike, fade and die. What marvell then if there grow within the Moone, rootes, feeds, plants, and trees, that have no need either of shewers, or of winter winde and weather, but are appropriate naturally to a fubrile and dry aire, fuch as the fummer season doeth affoord? And why may it not stand with good reason, that the Moone herselse sends certaine warme windes, and that by her shaking and agitation, as the still mooveth, there should breath foorth a sweet and comfortable aire, fine dewes, and gentle moistures, spred and dispersed all about, sufficient to mainteine the plants fresh and greene: considering withall, that she of her owne temperature is not ardent, not exceeding drie, but rather foft and moift, and engendring all humiditie? For there comto meth not from her unto us, any one effect or accident of ficcity, but of moisture and of a seminine & fost constitution, many; to wit, the growing and thriving of plants, the putrefaction of fleshkilled, the turning of wines to be sowre, flat, and dead, the frumnesse and tendernesse of wood, and the easie deliverance of women in childbirth. But I feare me, that I should moove and provoke Pharnaces againe, who all this while fitteth still and faieth nought, if I alledge the ebbing and flowing, or the inundations of the great Ocean, as they themselves say, the firthes, fireights, and armes of the fea, which swell and rife by the Moone, naturally given to encreale moisture and breed humours: and therefore I will direct my words toward you rather, friend Theon, for you fay unto us, in expounding these verses of the Poet Aleman,

What things on earth the deaw, as nourse doth seed: Which Jupiter and Moone betwirt them breed.

that in this place he calleth the aire Jupiter, and faith, that being moistened by the Moone, he is converted into dew: for the Moone my good friend, seemeth in nature to be quite contrary unto the sunne, not onely in this, that whatsoever he doeth thicken, drie, and harden, she is woont to resolve, moisten, and molliste, but that which more is, to humest and refrigerate the heat that commeth from him, when the same lightest upon her, or is mingled with her, Therefore as well they who suppose the Mooneto bea firie and ardent body, doe erre, as those who would have the creatures there inhabiting, to have all things necessarie for their generation, food and maintenance, like unto them that live heere; never considering the great difference and inequality which is in nature, wherein there be sound greater and more varieties and 30 diversities of living creatures, one with another, than with other things: neither would there bemen in the world without mouthes, and whose lippes are growen up together; and who were nourished also with smels onely, in case men could not live without folide and substantial food. But that power of Nature which Ammonius himselfe hath shewed us, and which Hessau under covert words hath given us to understand by these verses,

In Mallowes and in Affhodels, which grow on every ground, What use and prosit manifold, for manthere may be sound.

Epimenides hath made plaine and evident indeed and effect, teaching us that nature susteined 40 and preserveth a living creature with very small food and maintenance: for so it may have but as much as an oilive, it needs no more nourifhment, but may live therewith, and doe full well. Nowit is very like & probable, that those who dwel within the Moone, if any els, be light, active and nimble of body, and easie to be nourished with any thing whatsoever: also that the Moone (as well as the Sunne, who is a living creature, standing much upon fire, and by many degrees greater than the earth) is nourished and mainteined as they say, by the humours which are upon the earth, like as all other starres, which are in number infinite. So light and slender they imagine those living creatures to be that are above, and so soone contented and satisfied with small necessaries. But we neither see this, nor yet consider that a divers region, nature and temperature is meet and agreeable unto them: much like, as if when we could not our felves come 50 nereunto the sea, nor touch and taste it, but have seene it only a farre off, & heard that the water in it is bitter, brackish, salt, and not potable, one should come and tell us, that it nourishesh a mightie number of great creatures, of all forts & formes, living in the bottome thereof, and that it is full of huge and monstrous beasts, which make use of the water, as we doe of aire; hee would be thought to tell us tales and monftrous fables : even fo it feemeth that we ftand affected and disposed in these matters of the Moone, not beleeving that there be any men inhabiting within it. But I am verily perswaded, that they may much more marvell, seeing the earth heere afarre off, as the dregges, fediment, and grounds as it were of the whole world, appearing unto them through moilt cloudes, and foggie mifts, a finall thing God wot, and the fame without light, base, abject, and unmooveable show the fame should breed, nourish, maintaine, and keepe living creatures which have motion, breathing, and vitall heat: and in case they had ever heard these verses out of Homer, as touching certaine habitations, ugly and foule, most hideous to be seene: Whereof the gods themselves right fearefull beene. Also:

under the earth beneath, and hell unseene, As farre as heavens from earth remooved beene.

they would thinke verily and say, that they had beene spoken of this earth heere: and that darke hell and Tartarus were heere situate, and farte remote: as also that the Moone onely was the earth, as being equally distant from heaven above and hell beneath. Now before I had well made an end of my speech, Sylla taking the words out of my mouth: Stay a while (quoth he) & Lamprius, your speech; and hold off with your boat, as they say, for scare your unner annew with your tale upon the ground ere you be aware, and mar all the plaie, which for this present hath another scene and disposition; and I mysselfe am the actour: but before I proceed farther, I will bring forth mine author unto you, if there be nothing to impeach me; who beginneth in this maner with a verse of Homer:

Farre from the maine, within the Ocean fea,

There lies an Iland hight Ogygiæ, distant from great Britaine or England Westward, five daics sailing: And other three islesthere be, of like diffance one from the another, and from the faid iland, bearing northwest, whereas the fun setteth in Summer: in one of which the barbarous people of the countrey do fable and seine that Saturne was deteined and kept prisoner by Jupiter. Now for the keeping as well of it, as of those other isles, and the whole sea adjacent, which was called Saturns sea, the gyant Ogygiu, or Briaress was placed: as also that the maine and firme land, wherewith the great sea is bordered round about, is removed from the othes ifles not fo farre, but from Ogygia five hundred stadia or there about: unto which men use to row in galleis, for that sea is very ebbe and low, hardly to be passed by great vessels, by reason of the huge quantitie of mudde brought thither 30 by a number of rivers, which running out of the maine continent, discharge themselves into it, raising mightie thelves and barres, whereby the sea is choked up as it were with earth, and hardly navigable: which gave occasion of that old opinion which went thereof, that it should be frozen and stand all over with an ice. Well, the coasts along the firme land, which lie upon this sea, are inhabited by Grecks, all about a mightic bay or gulfe thereof, no lesse spacious than the huge lake Meetis, the mouth or entrance whereof lieth directly opposite unto that of the Caspian sea: These people are reputed and named to be the inhabitants of the continent or firme land, accounting and calling all us Handers, as dwelling in a land environed round about, and washed with the sea. They suppose also, that they in old time who accompanied Hercules, and being left by him, abode there, and intermingled afterwards with the people and 40 nations of Saturne, caused to revive againe the Greeke nation there, well necre extinguished, which being subdued and brought under the language, lawes, maners, and fashions of the Barbarians, flourished againe by these meanes, was well peopled, and recovered their ancient puiffance and greatnesse. And heereupon it is, that the chiefe and principall honour, they doe unto Hercules, but in a second place, to Saturne. Now when the starre of Saturne, which we call Phanon, & there by his faying, Nycturus is entred into the figne Taurus, (& that it doth once in the space of 30. yeeres) they having long before prepared al necessaries for a solemne facrifice, & a long voiage or navigation, send foorth those upon whom the lot falleth, to row in that huge sea, and to live a long time in a strange country. Now when they be imbarked & entred once in to the wide and open sea, they take their adventure and fortune, as it falleth out. Such as have 50 passed the dangers of the sea & arived in safetie, land first in those Ilands lying opposite against them, being inhabited by Greeke nations, where they fee the Sunne to be hidden from them not one full houre in thirtie daies (and that is all their night) whereof the darkeneffe is but small, as having a twilight in the west where the Sunne went downe, much like the dawning of the day. Having heere made their abode for ninety daies, during which space they were highly honored and found great entertainment, as being reputed holy men and fo termed, conducted they are with the mindes and transported over into the Island of Saturne: which is inhabited by no others but themselves and such as had beene sent thither before time in this maner. For albeit lawfull it is for them, after they have done service unto Saturne the time of thirty yeres, to faile homeagaine into their owne country; yet for the most part they chuse to remaine there still in peace and reft, than to returne foone, for that they be already inured and accustomed to the place: others because without any labor and trouble of theirs, they have plentie of all things, as welfor their facrifices, as for the ordinary maintenance of fuch, as continually are given to their books and to the study of Philosophy. For furely by their faying, the nature of the Island and themildenesse of the aire is woonderfull. And whereas some of them were willing to de-10 part from thence, they have beene staied and empeached by a divine power; which hath appear redunto them as unto their friends and familiars, not onely in dreames and by way of ourward fignes, but visibly also unto many of them, by the meanes of familiar spirits and angels, deviting and talking with them. For they fay that Saturne himselfe is personally there, within the deepe cave of a great hollow rocke shining and glittering like pure gold, where he lieth asleepe, for that Jupiter had devited for him fleepe, in flead of other chaines and bonds, to keepe him fatt for flirring. But there be certaine birds haunting the top of the faid rocke, which flie downe from thence and carry unto him the divine food Ambrofia. As for the whole Island, it is by report replenished with a most fragrant and odoriferous perfume, which out of that cave, as from a lively fountaine doth breath forth continually. And the faid demons or angels doe attend and 20 waite upon Saturne, fuch I meane as were his courtiors and minions, at what time as he raigned as foveraigne over gods and men; who having the skill of prophecie and divination, doc of themselves foretell many future things: howbeit of the greatest matters and of most importance, they make report and relation after they have beene downe below with Saturne, as his dreames revealed unto them. For whatfoever Jupiter thinketh and devifeth of before, Saturne dreameth: As for his fodaine wakenings they be Titanicall paffions and perturbations of the fpirit in him. But his fleepe is milde and fweet, wherein he the weth his divine and roiall nature of it felfe pure and incrutaminate. And thither (quoth he) this stranger and friend of mine being brought, where he ferved god Saturne at his cate & repose, attained unto the skil of Astrologie, fo far forth as it is possible for one that had the exact knowledge of Geometry. And among 30 other parts of Philosophy he gave himselfe unto that which is called naturall. But having a longing defire to vitite and fee the great Illand (for fo they call the firme land wherein we are) after the thirtie yeares were past, and his successors thicher arrived, taking his leave of his kinsfolke and triends whom he bad farwell, he tooke fea in other respects lightly and numbly appointed, but good store he carried with him of voiage provision within pots and cups of gold. But to recount unto you in particular what adventures to him befell, how many nations he visited, through what countries he travelled, how he fearched into holy writings, and was profeffed in all religious orders and holy confraternities, one whole day would not be sufficient (I fay) to rehearfe, as he himfelfe delivered the fame unto us, particularifing very wel of every thing; but as much as concerneth this prefent discourse, listen and I will relate unto you. For he continued a 40 long time at Carthage, where he was greatly honored and respected, as also among us, for that he found facred skinnes of parchiment, which at the overthrow and faccage of the former city called Great Carthage had beene fecretly conveyed thither and lien hidden along time under the ground. So he faid that of those gods which appeare unto us in heaven, we ought (and so he advised me also) to adore and worship especially the Moone, as the principall guide and mailtreffe of our life. Whereat when I mervelled and befought him to expound and declare the fame more plainely: The Greeks (quoth he) ô Sylla, talke very much of the gods; but in all things they fay not well. As for example, first and formost, in naming Ceres and Proferpina they doe well and right: but to put them both together, and to thinke that they are both in one and the same place, they doe amisse: For the one, to wit, Ceres, is upon the earth, the very dame 50 and militreffe of all those things that be above the ground; but the other is in the Moone, and called the is by them that inhabite the moone, Core and Perferphonie that is to fay, Proferpina. Persephonie as one would say emobles, for that the bringeth light and brightnesse: but Core, because the sight or apple of the cie, in which is seene the image of him who looketh into it, like as the brightnesse of the Sunne appeareth in the Moone, we call Core. Now whereas it is faid that they goe up and downe wandring and feeking one the other, the fame carieth fome tructh with it: for they defire and long after one another when they be parted and afunder, and they embrace one the other in the darke many times. Moreover, that this Core or Proferpina is one while above in heaven and in the light, another while in darkeneffe and the night, is not untrue; onely there is some error in reckoning and numbring the time. For we see her not fix moneths. but every fixth moneth, or from fix moneths to fix moneths, under the earth, as under her mother, caught with the shadow: and seldome is it found that this should happen within five moneths: for that it is impossible that the should abandon and leave Pluto, being his wife: according as Homer, hath fignified although under datke and covert wordes, not untruely, fav.

But to the farthe st borders of the earth and utmost end, Even to the faire Elysian fields the gods then shall thee send.

For looke where the shadow endeth and goeth no farther, that is called the limit and end of the earth: and thither no wicked and impure person shall ever be able to come. But good solke after their death in the world being thither carried, lead there another eafie life in peace and repose; howbeit, not altogether a bleffed, happie and divine life, untill they die a second death; but what death this is, aske me not, my Sylla, for I purpose of my selfe to declare & shew it unto you hereafter. The vulgar fort be of opinion that man is a subject compounded: and good rea-Ion they have so to thinke: but in beleeving that he consistesth of two parts onely, they are deceived: for they imagine that the understanding is in some fort a part of the soule: but the underflunding is better than the foule, by how much the foule is better and more divine than the bodie. Now the conjunction or composition of the soule with understanding, maketh reason: but with the bodie, passion: whereof this is the beginning and principle of pleasure and paine, the other of vertue and vice. Of these three conjoined and compact in one, the earth yeeldeth for her part the body; the Moone, the foule; and the Sunne, understanding to the generation or creation of man; and understanding giveth reason unto the soule; * * * even as the Sunnelight and brightnesse to the Moone. As touching the deathes which we die, the one maketh man of 3. two, and the other of 2. one. And the former verily is in the region and jurifdiction of Ceres, which is the cause that we facrifice unto her. Thus it commeth to passe that the Athenians called in olde time those that were departed, Anumageius, that is to say, Cereales. As for the other death it is in the Moone or region of Proferpina. And as with the one terreftriall Mercury, fo with the other, celeftiall Mercurie doth inhabit. And verily Ceres diffolveth and seperateth the soule from the bodic sodainly and forcibly with violence: but Proserpina parteth the understanding from the soule, gently, and in long time. And heereupon it is, that the is called, Meroy wis, as one would fay, begetting one: for that the better part in a man becommeth one and alone, when by herit is separated: and both the one and the other hapnethaccording to nature. Every foule without understanding, as also endued with understanding, when it is departed out of the body, is ordeined by fatall destiny to wander for a time, but not both alike, in a middle region betweene the earth and the Moone. For fuch foules as have beene unjust, wicked, and difficulte, fuffer due punishment and paines for their finfull deferts: whereas 40 the good and honest, untill such time as they have purified, and by expiration purged foorth of them, all those infections which might be contracted by the contagion of the body, as the cause of all evill, must remaine for a certeine settime, in the mildest region of the aire, which they call the meddowes of Pluto. Afterwards, as if they were returned from some long pilgrimage or wandring exile into their owne countrey, they have a tafte of joy, fuch as they fecie especially, who are professed in holy mysteries, mixed with trouble and admiration, and ech one with their proper and peculiar hope: for it driveth and chafeth foorth many foules, which longed already after the Moone. Some take pleasure to be still beneath, and even yet looke downward, as it were to the bottome: but fuch as be mounted aloft, and are there most so furely bestowed, first as victorious, stand round about adorned with garlands, and those made of the wings of Eustathia, that is to faic, Constancie: because in their life timehere upon earth, they had bridled and restreined the unreasonable and passible part of the soule, and made it subject and obedient to the bridle of reason. Secondly, they resemble in fight, the raies of the Sunne. Thirdly, the foule thus ascended on high, is there confirmed and fortified by the pure aire about the Moone, where it doth gather strength and solidity, like as iron and steele by their tineture become hard. For that which hitherto was loofe, rare and spongeous, groweth groweth close, compact and firme, yea, and becommeth shining and transparent, in such fort, as nourished it is with the least exhalation in the world. This is that Heraelerus meant, when he faid, that the foules in Platoes region have a quicke fent or fmelling. And first they behold there the greatnesse of the Moone, her beauty and nature, which is not simple nor void of mixture, but as it were a composition of a starre and of earth. And as earth mingled with a spiritual laire and moisture, becommeth foft, and the blood tempered with fleth, giveth it fenfe; even to, tay they, the Moone mingled with a celeftiall quinteffence even to the very bottome of it, is made animate, fruitfull, and generative, and withall, equally counterpeifed, with ponderofity and lightneffe. For the whole world it felfe, being thus composed of things which naturally moove 10 downward and upward, is altogether void of motion locall, from place to place; which it feemeth that Xenocrates himselfe by a divine discourse of reason understood, taking the first light thereof from Plate. For Plate was he who first affirmed, that every starre was compounded of fire and earth, by the meanes of middle natures given in certeine proportion; in as much as there is nothing object to the fense of man, which hath not in some proportion a mixture of earth and light. And Xenocrates faid, that the Sunne is compounded of fire and the field or primitive folid: the Moone of a fecond folid, and her proper aire: in fumme, throughout, neither folid alone by it felfe, nor the rare apart, is capable and fusceptible of a foule. Thus much as touching the substance of the Moone. As for the grandence & bignesse thereof, it is not such as the Geometricians fet downe, but farre greater by many degrees. And feldome doth it measure 20 the shadow of the earth by her greatnesse; not for that the same is small, but for that it bringeth a most fervent and swift motion, to the end, that quickly and with speed the might passe the darke place, and bring away with her the foules of the bleffed which make hafte and crie: hecause all the while they are within the shade, they can not heare any more the harmonic of celefiall bodies : and withall, underneath, the foules of the damned which are pumished, lamenting, wailing, and howling in this shadow, are presented unto them. And this is the reason, that in the eclipses of the Moone, many were wont to ring basons and pannes of bratte, and to make a great noise and clattering about these soules. And affrighted they are to beholde that which they call the face of the Moone, when they approch neere unto it, feeming to be a terrible and fearefull fight, whereas it is no fuch matter. But like as the earth with us hath many deepe and 30 wide gulfes, as namely, one here, to wit, the Meditetranean fea, lying betweene Hereules pillars, and forunning into the land hither to us: and another without, that is to fay, the Caspian sea, and that also of the red sea. So there be these deepe concavities and vallies of the Moone, and those in number three; whereof the greatest they call The hole or guise of Hecase, wherein the foules do punish and are punished, according as they either did or fuffred hurt whiles they were here the other two * be small, to wit, the very passages whereby the soules must go, one while to * uneges, some the tract of the Moone lying toward heaven, and another while to that which regardeth the readjusters. earth. And verily, that which looketh to heaven, they call the Elysian field, whereas the other long, earth-ward to us, the field of Proferpina, nother, I meane, who is under the ground just against us. Howbeit, the Dæmons do not converfe alwaies in the Moone, but descend other-whiles hither 40 below, for the charge and superintendance of oracles: there be affiltant likewife to the highest mysteries and ceremonies, and those they do celebrate, having an observant cie to wicked deeds which they punish; and withall, ready they are to preserve the good in perils as well of warre as thefea. In which charge and function, if they themselves commit any fault, and heere upon eatth do ought either by injust favour or envie, they feele the smart thereof according to their merits; for thrust downe they are againe to the earth, and sent with a witnesse into mens bodies. But of the number of the better fort, are they who served and accompanied Saturne, as they themselves report; such as in times past also were the Idai Dactyli in Crete, the Corybants in Phygia, & those of Boe stia in the city of Lebadia, named Trophoniaces besides, an infinit number of others in fundry parts of the earth habitable; whole names, temples and honors remaine 30 & continue unto this day, but the powers & puissances of some do faile and are quite gone, as being translated into another place, & making a most happy change: which translation tonic obteine fooner, other later, after that the understanding is separate from the soule: and separated it is by the love and defire to enjoy the image of the Sunne, by which that divine, bleffed and desirable beautie which every nature after divers sorts seeketh after, shineth. For even the verie Moune turneth about continually for the love of the Sunne, as longing to companie and converse with him, as the very fountaine of all fertilitie. Thus the nature of the soule is spent in the Moone, reteining onely certeine prints, marks and dreames, as it were, of her life: and hereof. thinke it was well and truely faid,

I he foule made haste, as one would say,

Like to a dreame, and flew away. which it doth not immediatly upon her feparation from the bodie, but afterwards, when she is alone by herselfe and severed from the understanding. And in trueth, of all that ever Homer wrote, most divinely he seemeth to have written of those who are departed this life, & be amone the spirits beneath, these verses:

Next him, I knew of Hercules the Arength and image plaine, Or semblance: for himselfe with gods

immortall did temaine. For like as every one of us is not ite and courage, nor feare nor yet luft, no more than flesh or humours, but that indeed whereby we discourse and understand; even so, the soule it felse being cast into a forme by the understanding, and giving a forme unto the bodie, and embracing it on every fide, expresseth and receiveth a certeine impression and figure, so as albeit she is distinctly fepatate both from understanding and also from the bodie, the reteineth still the forme and femblance a long time, infomuch as well the may be called an image. And of these foules, as I have already faid, the Moone is the element, because foules doe resolve into her, like as the bodies of the dead into the earth. As for fuch as have bene vertuous and honeft, and which loved 20 a fludious and quiet life, imploied in philosophie, without medling in troublesome affaires. foone are relolved, for that being left and rid of understanding, and using no more corporal passions, they vanish away incontinently; but the soules of ambitious persons, and such as are bufied in negotiations, of amorous folkealfo given to the love of beautifull bodies, and likewife of wrathfull people, calling still to remembrance those things which they did in their life, even as dreames in their fleepe, walke wandring to and fro, like to that ghoft of Endymion: for confidering their inconstancie and apmesse to be over subject unto passions, the same transporteth and plucketh them from the Moone unto another generation, not fuffering them quietly there to paffe and vanish away, but stil allureth and calleth them away: for now is there nothing small, staied, quiet, constant and accordant, after that being once abandoned of the understanding, 30 they come to be feized with the passions of the body: To that of such soules void of reason, came and were bred afterwards the Tityi and Typhons, and namely, that Typhon who in timespass by force and violence leized the city Delphos, and overturned up-fide-downe the fanctuarie of the oracle there; most ungracious imps destitute of all reason and understanding, and abandoned to all passions upon a proud spirit and violence, wherewith they were pussed up. Howbeit, at length, after long time, the Moone receiveth the foules, and composeth them: the Sunne alto intpiring into them againe, and fowing in their vitall facultie, understanding, maketh them new foules: yea, and the earth in the third place, giveth them a new bodie: for, nothing doth she give after death, of all that which the taketh to generation. And the funne receiveth nothing of others, but taketh againe that understanding which he gave. But the Moone giveth and recei. 40 veth, joineth and disjoineth, uniteth and separateth, according to her divers faculties and powers: of which, the one is named Ilithyia, to wit, that which joineth: another, Artonius or Diana, which parteth and divideth. Of the three fatall fifters or deftinies, the whom they name Atropos, is placed within the Sunne, and giveth the beginning of generation. Clotho being lodged in the Moone, is the that joineth, mingleth and uniteth. The third and last, called Lachesis, is in the earth, who also lendeth her helping hand, and doth participate much with Fortune. For that which is without foule, is weake in it felfe, and naturally exposed to all injuries and to suffer hurt: but the understanding is sovereigne over all the rest, and nothing is able to do it injurie.

Now the foule is of a middle nature and mixt of them both, like as the Moone was made and created by God, as a composition and mixture of things above and things beneath; keeping the fame proportion to the Sun, as the earth doth to her. And thus you have heard (quoth Sylla) what I learned of this stranger or traveller; which (as he faid himfelfe) he understood by those Dæmons, who were chamberlaines and sevitours to Saturne. As for you, o Lamprias, and the rest, you may take my relation in good or ill part, as you please.

TESSE PYTHIA GIVETH NO ANSWERES NOW FROM THE

The Summarie.

Hey who have so highly chanted the excellency of man, extolling the vigor of humane wit and under standing; what soever they doe alledge to that purpose, have ordinarily forgot the principall, which is to shew that all the sufficiencie of his intelligence is a furious quide; his will, a bottomlesse gulfe and pit of consusion; the light of his resson, a deepe darkenight; his lusts and desires, so many enraged beasts to rem and tear chim in peeces, if God by some especial and singular grace, doe not illumine, regenerate and conduct him. Among a million of sestimonies for the proofe and confirmation hereof, that which presentes hit selfe unto minthis dialogue is most sufficient : for is not this wonderfull, and a certaine signe of a mar vellous blindenesseof mans wisdome, to see those, who all their life time do nothing els but secke after the soveraigne good, maintaine vertue, detest vices, condemne Athists, Epicureans, and Libertines, yet to dread, feare, yea and adore the sworne enemie of their salvation and true life, to wit satan the divell? Tes verily, and that which now we reade, agreeable to certaine discourses heereafter following, and 30 namely, wherein a disputation is held, wherefore the oracles now doe cease? as also what this word EI. lignifieth, sheweth not onely the opinion of Plutarch and some other Philosophers as touching these matters: but also the miserable state of all those who are abandoned to their owne sense, and word of the knowledge of the true God. And this ought to be remembred a second time, for fear elest in reading these discourses so eloquently penned, we beturned out of the right way: but rather contrariwise that we may perceive so much the better how vaine and detestable all the habit of man is, if it have for the ground and foundation, nothing but the conceits of his corrupt spirit. So then in this dialogue, we may behold the wisdome of the Greeks, running after Satan: and taking great paines for to sture and fet on foot one matter, which we ought to abhorre and bury in perpetuall oblivion : or to touch withall their might and maine beside, that which the wisdome of the slesh cannot compasse. There be heere di-40 vers personages who revive and set a worke the oracles of that priestresse or prophetesse at Delphos, where was the renowmed temple of Apollo, the very cave and den of Satan, and wherein he exercised his trade and skill, with impossures and illusions incredible, during the space of many yeares. But to makerhis disposition of more force and validity, Plutatch after his accustomed fashion of broching and introducing his owne opinion by a third, following the stile and manner of the Academicks writing, bringeth to Delphos a stranger, who being together with Basilocles, Philinus, & other amused and occupied in beholding the statues which were there in great number, there began a discourse by way of disputation touching brasse and the propertie thereof. Which when it was well discussed and debated, Diogenianus demanded, why the ancient oracles were delivered in homely verse & those in evill fashion? whereto there were made divers answeres tending to this point to make us beleeve, that where-50 foever the words be most rusty, and worst couched, there we are toobserve so much the more the excellencie of the author. And this confirmeth fully, that which we have already spoken as touching the illusions of the divell, who is not content thus to abuse and deceive his slaves, but in this place hath to deale with a ridiculous & most apparent audaciousnesse, if the eyes of those whom he thus abuseth, had never so little means to see the thousand part of his deceitfull guiles, as grosse and thicke as mountains. Continuing this discourse, they bandle afterwards the presages of these statues, and of others reared in divers places for the better authorifing of the oracles; which when Boethus the Epicurean mocked, Plutarch replieth and reentresh into a common place, concerning the gravitie of sheferude and ill fall-ioned oracles, conferring them with those of Sibylla, and mainteining the authorisie of them with his companions, through all the reasons they could devise. These he in summe, the comens of this Dialogue, which comprehendeth divers matters dependent thereof, and those noted in their order: the conclusion where of is this, That as reprovable they be, who tax the sumplicity and rudenesse of such oracles, as those, who otherwise controll shem for their ambiguity, obliquity and obscurity.

WHY THE PROPHETESSE

Pythia giveth no answers now from the Oracle inverse or meeter.

BASILOCLES.

Ou have led this stranger, Philinus, such a walke in shewing him the statues and publike works, that you have made it very late in the evening, and I my selfe am weary in staying for you, and expecting when you will make an end.

No marvell, we goe to foftly, and keepe fo flow a pace, 6 Bafib- 20 eles, fowing and mowing (as they fay) prefently with all our speeches after fight and combat, which sprout foorth and yeeld unto us by the way as we go, enemies lying as it were in ambush much like unto those men which in old time came up of teeth sowen by Cadmu.

BASILOCLES.

How then? Shall we fend for and intreat some one of those who were present there, or will you your selfe gratify us so much, as to take the paines for to deliver unto us, what speeches those were, and who were the speakers?

I must be the man, I perceive Basiloeles, to doe this for your sake; for hardly shall you meet 30 with any other els throughout the whole citie: for I saw the most part of them going up againe together, with that stranger to Corycium and Lyeuria.

BASILOCLES.

What? is this stranger so curious and desirous to see things, and is he withall friendly and woonderfull sociable?

PHILINUS.

Yes that he is: but more studious is he, and desirous to learne: neither is this most woorthy of admiration in him; for he hath a kinde of mildnesse, accompanied with a singular good grace: his pregnant wit and quicke conceit ministreth unto him matter to contradict, and to propose doubts: howbeit the same is not bitter and odious in his propositions, nor leavened with any overthwart frowardnesse and perverse stubburnesse in such fort as a man thaving beene but a little acquainted with him, would soone say of him:

Certes a lewd man and a bad,

He never for his father had.

For you know well I suppose Diogenians, the best man one of them in the world?

BASILOGLES.

I know him not my felfe, Philinus: howbeit, many therebe who report as much of this yong man, But upon what occasion or cause began your discourse and disputation?

PHILINUS.

Those who were our guides, conversant and exercised in the reading of histories, rehearsed 50 and read from one end to the other, all those compositions which they had written, without any regard of that which we requested them, namely, to epitomize and abridge those narrations, and most part of the Epigrams. As for the stranger, he tooke much pleasure to see and view those faire statues, so many in number, and so artificially wrought: But he admired most of all, the fresh brightnesse of the brasse, being such as showed no fish nor rust that it had gathered, but caried the glosse and resplendent hew of azur: so as he seemed to be ravished and associated the glosse and resplendent hew of azur: so as he seemed to be ravished and associated the glosse and resplendent hew of azur: so as he seemed to be ravished and associated the glosse and resplendent hew of azur: so as he seemed to be ravished and astonied when he beheld the statues of the amirals and captaines at sea (for at them he began) as representing naturally in their tincture and colour as they stood, sea men and failers in the very maine & deepe fea. Whereupon: Had the ancient workmen (quoth he) a certaine mixture by themselves, and a temper of their braffe, that might give such a tincture to their works? for astouching the Corinthian braffe, which is fo much renowned, it is thought generally, and so given out, that it was by meere adventure and chaunce, that it tooke this goodly colour, and not by any art : by occasion that the fire caught an house, wherein there was laid up some little gold and filver, but a great quantitie of brasse, which mettals being melted together & fo confused one with another, the whole maffe thereof was still called brasse because there to was more thereof in it, than of the other mettals. Then Theon: We have heard (quoth he) another reason, more subtile than this, namely, that when a certeine brasse founder or coppersmith in Corintle, had met with a casket or coffer, wherein was good flore of golde, fearing left hee should be discovered, and this treasure found in his hands, he clipped it by little and little, melted and mixed it gently with his braffe, which tooke thereupon fuch an excellent and woonderfull temperature, that he folde the pieces of worke, thereof made, passing deere, in regard of their dainty colour, and lovely beauty, which every man fet much by, and effeemed. But both this and the other is but a lying tale: for by all likelihood this Corinthian braffe was a certeine mixture and temperature of mettals, so prepared by art; like as at this day, artifans by tempring gold and filver together, make thereof a certaine fingular and exquifice pale yellow by it 20 felfe, howbeit, in mine eie, the fame is but a wanne and fickly colour, and a corrupt hue, withoutany beautie in the world. What other cause then might there be (quoth Diogenianus) as youthinke, that this braffe heere hath fuch a tincture? To whom Theon made this answere: Confidering (quoth he) that of thefe primative elements and most naturall bodies that are, and ever shall be, to wit, fire, aire, water and earth, there is not one which approaches hor touchesh these brasse works, but aire onely, it must of necessarie be, that it is the aire which doeth the deed, and by reason of this aire lying alwaies close upon them, and never parting therefro, commeth this difference that they have from all others. Or rather this is a thing notoriously knowen of old, even before Theognis was borne, as faid the comicall Poet.

But would you know by what speciall propertie and vertue the aire should by touching, set 30 fuch a colour upon braffe? Yes, very faine answered Diogenians. Certes, so would I to, my sonne (quoth Theon) let us therefore search into the thing both together in common: and first of all, if you please, what is the cause that oile filleth it full of rust, more than all other liquor whatfoever? for furely it cannot be truely faid, that oile of it felfe fetteth the faid ruft upon it, confidering it is pure and neat, not polluted with any filth when it commeth to it. No verily (quoth the young man) and there feemeth to be fome other cause else, beside the oile; for the rult meeting with oile, which is fubtile, pure, and transparent, appeareth most evidently; whereas in all other liquors, it maketh no fliew, nor is feene at all. Well faid my fonne (quoth Theen) and like a Philosopher: but consider, if you thinke so good, of that reason which Aristotle alledgeth. Mary that I will (quoth he againe.) Why then I will tell it you (quoth Theon:) Ariftothe faith, that the ruft of braffe lighting upon other liquors, pierceth infenfibly, and is dispersed through them, being of a rare substance, and unequall parts, not abiding close together; but by reason of the compact and fast soliditie of oile, the said rust is kept in, and abideth thrust and 40 united together. Now then, if we also of our selves were able to presuppose such a thing, we should not altogether want some meanes to charme as it were and allay somewhat this doubt of ours. And when we had allowed very well of his speech, and requested him to say on and profecute the fame: he faid; That the aire in the citie of Delphos was thicke, fast, strong and vehement withall, by reason of the reflexion and repercussion of the mountaines round about it, and befides, mordicative, as witneffeth the speedie concoction of meat that it causeth. Now this aire by reason of the subtilty and incisive qualitie thereof, piercing into the brassle, and cut-50 ting it, forceth out of ita deale of ruft, and skaleth as it were much terreffrial fubftance from it: the which it restreineth afterwards and keepeth in for that the densitie and thicknesse of the aire giveth it no iffue: thus this ruft being staied & remaining still, gathering also a substance by occasion of the quantity thereof, puttern foorth this floure as it were of colour, and there within the superficies contracteth a resplendent and shining hew. This reason of his, we approoved very well; but the stranger faid, that one of those suppositions alone was sufficient to make good the reason: For that subtility (quoth he) seemeth to be somewhat contrary unto the spissitude and thicknesse, supposed in the aire: and therefore it is not necessarie to make any supposall thereof; for brasse of it selfe as it waxeth old, in tract of time exhaleth and putteth footh this rust, which the thicknesse of the aire comming upon, keepeth in and doeth so incrassate, as that through the quantitie thereof, it maketh it evident and apparent. Against which objection and teply of his, Theon inferred thus againe: And what should hinder (quoth he) that one and the same thing might not be firme or subtile, and withall thicke, both at once: like as his clothes of silke, and linnen, of which Homer writes thus:

And from faile web of linnen, ran away, I be oile as moist as it and would not stay.

Whereby he giveth us to understand, the fine spinning, and close weaving thereof, which to would not fuffer the oile to rest upon it, and soake through, but to glide off and drop downe, so necre were the threds, otherwise small, driven together, and so thicke, that it would not let any liquot to passe through. And thus a man may alledge the subtilitie of the aire, not onely forto fetch out the ruft, but also to bring it to a more pleasant and greenish colour, by mixing splendeur and light together with the faid deepe azure. Heercupon enfued a paufe and filence for a pretie while; and then the discoursers and historians abovefaid, alledged againe the words of a certeine oracle in verfe (which was delivered, if I be not deceived) as touching the rotalite and reigne of Aegon, an Argive king: Whereat Diogenianus faid, that it had beene many times in his head to marvell, at the base, rude, and homely composition of those verses, which doe conteine oracles: notwithstanding that the god Apollo is reputed the president of the Muses & elo- 20 quence; unto whom no leffe apperteined the beauty & elegancy of file & composition, than goodneffe of voice in fong & melody, as who furpaffed for fweet verfifying Hefiodus & Homer, both very farre: and yet for all that, we fee many of his oracles, tude, bale, & faulty, at well for the meeter & measure, as the bare words. Then Serapion the Poet, who being come fro Athens, was there present: Why (quoth he)beloeve you that those verses were of god Apolloes making that we fuffer you to fay as you do, that they come a great way flort of the goodnesse of those verses which Homer & Hefiodus composed? and shall we not use them as passing well and excellently made, correcting our owne judgement as forestalled and possessed aforehand with an ill cuflome? Then Boethus the Geometrician (for you wot well that the man hath ranged himselfe already to the feet of Epicurus:) Heard you never (quoth he) the tale of Paujon the painter: Not I 30 verily, quoth Serapion. And yet worth it is the hearing, faith Boethus. He having bargained & undertaken to paint an horse wallowing & tumbling on his backe, drew him running on soote with all foure: whereat when the party was angric and offended, who fet him a worke, Paufon laughed at him, and made no more adoe, but turned the ends of the painted table; thus when the upper end was shifted downward, the horse seemed not to runne, but to tumble with his heeles aloft. Semblably it falleth out (quoth Boethus) in certeine speeches, when they are inverted and uttered the contrary way: and therefore foone you shall have who will fay that the oracles are not elegant, becamfethey be of god Apolloes inditing: but contrariwife, that they be none of his, because they are but rudely made and unsavery; and as for that it is doubtfull and uncerteine: but this is evident and plaine, that the verses of oracles be not exquisite- 40 ly couched, and laboriously endited, whereof I crave no better judge then your selfe Serapion: for you are woont to compose and write Poems, which as touching the argument and subject matter be auftere and philosophicall: but for their wit, grace and elegant composition otherwife, refemble rather the verses of Homer and Hesiadus, than those of the oracles pronounced by Pythia the Priestres of Apollo. With that Serapion: We are discassed all of us (O Boethus) in our cies and eares to, being woont (fuch is our nicenesse and delicacie) to esteeme and terme such things simply better, which are more pleasant: and peradventure ere it be long, we will finde fault with Pythia, for that the doeth not chaunt and fing more sweetly than Glauce the professed ministrell and singing wench; and because she is not besmeared with odoriserous oiles, not richly araied in purple robes: yea, and some haply will take exception at her, for not 50 burning Cinamon, Ladanum or Frankincenfe, for perfume: but onely Laurel and barley meale. And fee you not faith one, how great a grace the Sapphik verses carie with them, and how they tickle the eares, and joy the hearts of the heares? whereas Sibylla out of her furious and enraged mouth, as Herachtus faith, uttering foorthand refounding words without mitth, and provoking no laughter, not gloriously painted and set out, not pleasantly persumed and bespiced, hath continued with her voice a thouland yeeres, by the meanes of Apollo, speaking by her. And pindurus faith, that Cadmus heard from Apollo, not loftic and high muficke, not fiveet, not delicate, nor broken and full of varietie: for an impaffible and holy nature, admitteth not any pleafure: but heere together with the base musicke, the most part of the delight also is call downe, and as it should feeme, hath runne into mens cares and possessed them. When Serapium had thus faid: Theon fimiling: Serapion, I fee well (quoth he) had done according to his old woont, and followed his owne disposition and maners in this behalfe: for there being offered some occalion to speake of pleasure, he hath quickly caught at it. But yet for all that, let us Beethas, howfoever the verses of oracles be woorse than those of Homer, not thinke that it is Apollo who made them; but when he hath given onely the beginning of motion, then ech prophetefle is to mooved according as the is disposed to receive his infpiration. And verily if oracles were to be penned downe and written, and not to be barely pronounced, I doe not suppose that we would reprove or blame them (taking them to be the hand-writing of the god) because they are not so curiously endited as ordinarily the letters of kings and princes are. For furely, that voice is not the gods, nor the found, nor the phrase, ne yet the meeter and verse, but a womans they be all. Asforhim, he representeth unto her, fancies onely and imaginations, kindling a light in the foule to declare things to come : and fuch an illumination as this, is that which they call Enthufulnes. But to speake in a word to you that are the pricess and prophets of Epicurus (For Hee well that you are now become one of that feet) there is no meanesto cleape your hands, confidering that yee impute unto the ancient propheteffes, that they made bad and faultie verfes, yea 20 and reproove those moderne priestresses of these daies, who pronounce in prote and in vulgar teamses the oracles, for fearethey should be articled against by you, in case they delivered their verses headlesse, without loines and entrailed. Then (quoth Diogenianus) jest not with us I pray you in the name of God, but rather affoile us this common doubt, and rid us of this feruple; for there is no man, but defireth to know the reason and cause, why this oracle hath given over to make answer in verses and other speeches as it hath done? Whereto Theon spake thus: But now my sonne, we may seeme to doe wrong and shamefull injurie unto our discoursers and directours heere, these Historians, in taking from them that which is their office : and therefore let that be done first which belongeth to them; and afterwards you may enquire and dispute at leafure of that which you defire. Now by this time were we gon forward as farre as to the statue 30 ofking Hiero; and the ilranger albeit he knew well all thereit, yet fo courtious he was and of fo good a nature, that he gave eare withall patience to that which was related unto him: but having heard that there stood sometime a certaine columne of the faid Hiero all of braffe, which fell downe of it selfe the very day whereon Hiero died at Saracose in Sicilie, he wondred thereat: and I thereupon recounted into him other like examples; as namely, of Hiero the Spartan, how theday before that he lost his life in the battellat Leuttres, the cies of his statue fellout of the head: also that the two starres which Lysander had dedicated after the navall battell at the river called Aigos-potamos, were miffing and not to be seene : and his very statue of stone put forth of a fodden for much wilde weedes and greene graffe in fo great quantity that it covered and hid theface thereof. Moreover during the time of those worfull calamities which the Athenians 40 fullained in Sieilie, not onely the golden dates of a palme tree fell downe, but alfo the ravens came and pecked with their bils all about the feutcheon or freeld of the image of Pallas. The Cuidians coronet likewife which Philomelus the tyrant of the Phoc wans had given unto Pharfislia the fine dauncing wench, was the cause of her death : for when the had passed out of Greece into Italie, one day as the placed and danneed about the church of Apollo in Wietsportine, having the faid coronet upon her head, the yong men of the city came upon her for to have a way the gold of that coronet: and firriving about her one with another who should have it, tare the poore woman in pecces among them. Arifforle was wont to fay that Homer was the onely Poetwho made and devifed words that had motion, so emphatical they were & lively expressed: but I for my part would say that the offrings dedicated in the city, to neat slatues, jewels, & other 50 ornaments mooved together with the divine providence, do forefignific future things: neither are the fame in any part vaine and void of sense; but all replenished with a divine power. Then Boethus: I would not else (quoth he:) for it is not sufficient belike, to enclose God once in a moneth within a mortall bodie, unlefle we thrust him also into every stone and peece of brasse? as if fortune and chance were not fufficient of themselves to worke such seates and accidents. What (quoth1) thinke you then that these things every one have any affinitie with fortune and chance? and is it probable that your Atomes doe glide, divide, and decline, neither before nor after, but just at the very time as each one of them who made these offrings, thould fare better or worfe? And Epicurus belike, as farre as I fee ferveth your turne now and is profitable unto you in those things which he hath said or written three hundred yeares past : but this god Apol. b, unleffe he imprison and immure himselfe (as it were) and be mixed within every thing is not able in your opinion, to give unto any thing in the world the beginning of motion, nor the cause of any passion or accident whatsoever. And this was the answere which I made unto Boe. thus for that point : and in like maner spake I as touching the verses of Sibylla. For when we were come as farre as to the rocke which joineth to the fenate house of the city, and there rested our felves, upon which rocke by report the first Sibylla sat, being new come out of Helicon, where the had beene fostered by the Muses, although others there be that say she arived at Maleon, to and was the daughter of Lamia, who had Neptune for her father, Serapion made mention of certaine verses of hers wherein the praised her selfe saying, that she thould never cease to prophefic and foretell future things, no not after her death; for that the her felfe should then goea. bout in the Moone, and be that which is called the face therein appearing: also that her breath and spirit mingled with the aire should passe to and fro continually in propheticall words and voices of oracles prognosticating and that of her bodie transmuted and converted into earth, there should grow herbes, shrubs and plants, for the food and pasturage of facred beasts appoint ted for facrifices: whereby they have all forts of formes and qualities in their bowels and inwards: and by the meanes whereof men may foreknow and foretell of future events. Hereat Boethus made femblance to laugh more than before. And when Zomalledged, that howfoever these 20 feemed to be fabulous matters and meere fables, yet so it was that many subversions & transmigrations of Greeke cities, many expeditions also and voiages made against them of barbarous armies, as also the overthrowes & destructions of fundry kingdomes and dominions, give testimonie in the behalfe of ancient prophefies and prædictions. And as for these late and moderne accidents (quoth he) which hapned at Cumes and Dicearchia, long before chanted and foretolde by way of prophesie out of Sibyls books; did nor the time entuing as a debt accomplish and pay? the breakings forth and cruptions of fire out of a mountaine, the strange chillitions of the fea, the casting up a loft into the aire of stones & cinders by subterranean winder under the earth, the ruine and devastiation of so many and those so great cities at one time, and that to fuddenly, as they who came but the next morrow thither, could not fee where they flood 30 or were built, the place was so confused. These strange events (I say) and occurrents, as they be hardly beleeved to have hapned without the finger of God, fo much leffe credible it is, that forefeene and foretolde they might be, without fome heavenly power and divinitie. Then Bothus: And what accident (good fir, quoth he) can there be imagined, that Time oweth not unto Nature; and what is there fo strange, prodigious and unexpected, as well in the sea as upon the land, either concerning whole cities or particular persons; but if a man foretold of them, in processe and tract of time the fame may fall out accordingly? And yet, to speake properly, this is not foretelling, but fimply telling, or rather to cast forth and scatter at random in that infinity of the aire, words having no originall nor foundation, which wandering in this wife, Fortune otherwhiles encountreth and concurreth with them at a very venture. For there is a great difference, 40 in my judgement, betweene faying thus, that a thing is hapned which hath bene fpoken; and a thing is spoken that shall happen: for that speech which uttereth things that are not extant, conteining in it felfe the fault and error, attendeth not by any right, the credit and approbation thereof, by the accidentall event; neither ufeth it any true and undoubted token of prædiction, with a certaine foreknowledge, that happen it will when it hath bene once foretold, confidering that infinity is apt to produce all things; but he who gueffeth well, whom the common proverbe pronounceth to be the best divinor,

resembleth him, who traceth out and solloweth by probabilities as it were by tracts and foot- soings, that which is to come. But these propheticall Sibils and furious Bacebides, have cast at all aventure as it were, into a vast ocean, without either judgement or conjecture, the time; yea, and have scattered at random the nownes and verbs, the words and speeches of passions and accidents of all forts. And albeit some of them fortune so to happen, yet is this or that salse alkeat the present time when it is uttered, although haply the same may chance afterwards to fall out truely. When Boethus had thus discoursed, Serapion replied upon him in this wise: Boethus (quoth he) giveth a good verdict and just fentence of those propositions which are indefinitly and without a certeine subject matter in this maner pronounced. If victorie beforetolde unto a Generall, he hast vanquished: if the destruction of a citie, it is overthrowen: but whereas there is expressed not onely thething that shall happen, but also the circumstances, how, when, after what fort, and wherewith, then is not this a bare guesse and conjecture of that which peradventure will be; but a præsignissication and denouncing peremptorily of such things as without faile shall be: as for example, that prophesie which concerned the lamenesse of segsilans, in these words:

Though proud and haughie (Spatta) now, and found of foot thou bee, Take heed by halting regiment,
there come no harme to thee:
For then shall unexpected plagues thy state long time asfaile,
The deadly waves of fearfull warres against thee shall prevaile.

Semblably, that oracle as touching the Isle which the sea made and discovered about Thera and Thera fit, as also the prophesse of the warre betweene king Philip and the Romans, which ran in these words:

But when the race of Trojan bloud,
Phanicians [hall defeat
In bloudy fight, looke then to fee frange fights and wonders great.
The fea shall from and the waves yeeld frietempe fis strong,
And flishes thicke of lightning bright, with stony stormes among.
With that an Island shall appeare, that never man yet knew:
And weaker men in battell set,

the mightier (hall subdue. For whereas the Romans in a small time conquered the Carthaginians, after they had vanquiflied aniball in the field, and Philipking of the Macedonians gave battell unto the Aetolians and Romans, wherein he had the overthrow; also, that in the end there arose an Iland out of the deepe fea, with huge learnes of fire and hideous ghusts: a man can not fay, that all these things hapned and concurred together by fortune and meere chance: but the very traine and orderly proceding thereof, doth fhew a certeine prescience and fore-knowledge. Also, whereas the Romans were foretolde the time five hundred yeeres before, wherein they should have warre with all nations at once, the fame was fulfilled when they warred against the flaves and fugitives who 40 revolted and rebelled. For in all thele, there is nothing conjecturall and uncerteine, nothing blinde and doubtfull, that we need infinitly to feeke after fortune therefore: whereas many pledgesthere be of experience, giving us affurance of that which is finite and determinate, flewing the very way, whereby fatall destinie doth proceed. Neither do I thinke any man will say, that these things being foretolde with so many circumstances, jumped altogether by fortune. For what els should hinder, but that a man may aswell say (ô Boethus) that Epicurus wrote not his books of principall opinions and doctrines fo much approoved of you, but that all the letters thereof were jumbled and hudled together by meere chance and fortune, that went to the compoling and finishing of that volume. Thus discoursing in this maner, we went forward still. And when in the Corinthian chapell we beheld the date tree of braffe, the onely monument 50 there remaining of all the oblations there offered, Diogenianus woondred to fee the frogges and water-fnakes which were wrought artificially by turners hand about the but and root thereof; and so did we likewise: because neither the Palme tree is a moorie plant and loving the waters, like as many other trees are: neither doe the frogges any way perteine to the Corinthians, as a marke or enfigne given in the armes of their city: like as the Selinuntians by report, offered fometimes in this temple, the herbe Smalach or Parfley, called Solinum, all of gold: and the Tenedians, an liatchet, taken from the Crabfifhes bred in their Island, necre unto the Promonto-Hhhhh 2

rie called Asterion: for those Crabs onely (as it is thought) have the figure of an hatchet imprinted upon their shell. And verily, for Apollo himselfe, we suppose that ravens, swannes, wolves, hawks, or any other beasts, be more acceptable than these. Now when serapion alledged, that the workman heereby meant and covertly signified the nouriture and rising of the Sunne out of humors and waters, which by exhalation he converteth into such creatures, whether it were that he had heard this verse out of Homer,

Then out of sea arose the Sun, And left that goodly lake anon.

Or feeme the Aegyptians to reprefent the Eaft or Sun-rifing by the picture of a childe fitting upon the plant Loros. Thereat Haughed heartily. What meane you thus (good fir, quoth l) to thrust hither the fect of the Stoicks: came you indeed to foist slily among our speeches and discourses, your exhalations and kindlings of the starres, not bringing downe hither the Sunne and the Moone, as the Thessalian women doe by their inchantments; butmaking them to spring and arise as from their first originall out of the earth and the waters? For Platovetily, called mana celestial plant, as rising directly from his root, above which is his head. But you in the meane time mocke and deride Empedacles, for saying that the Sunne occasioned by the reflexion of the heavenly light about the earth,

while your selves make the Sunne terrestriall, animall, or a fennith plant, ranging him among 20 the waters and the native place of frogs. But let vs betake all these matters to the tragicall and strangemonstruosities of the Stoicks: meane while treat we curfarily and by the way of these acceffary and by-works of mechanicall artifans and handicrafts men: for furely in many things they be very engenious and witty: mary in every plot they cannot avoid the note of bald devices & affected curiofitie in their inventions. Like as therefore he that painted Apollo with a rocke upon his head, signified thereby the day-breake, & the time a little before sunne rising : even so a man may fay that these frogs doe symbolize and betoken the season of the Spring, at what time as the Sunne begins to rule over the aire and to discusse the winter: at least waies if we must according to your opinion, understand the Sunne and Apollo to be both, one god, and not twaine. Why? (quoth Serapion) are you of another minde? and doe you thinke the Sunne to 30 be one, & Apollo another? Yes mary doe I (quoth he) as well, as that the Sunne and Moone do differ, Yea and more than fo : for the Moone doth not often, nor from all the world hide the Sunne: whereas the Sunne hath made all men together, for to be ignorant of Apollo: diverting the minde and cogitation by the meanes of the sense, and turning it from that which is unto that which appeareth onely. Then Serepion demanded of those Historians our guides and conductors, what was the reason that the forsaid cellor chappell, was not intitled by the name of Cypselus who dedicated it, but called the Corinthians chappel. And when they held their peace, because as I take it, they knewnot the cause; I began to laugh thereat: And why should we thinke (quoth I) that these men knew or remembred any thing more, being astonied and amased as they were to heareyou fable and talke of the meteors or impressions in the aire? For even 40 themselves we heard before relating, that after the tyranny of Cypselus was put downe and overthrowen, the Corinthians were desirous to have the inscription as well of the golden statue at Pifa, as of this cell or treasure house, for to runne in the name of their whole city. And verily the Delphians gave and granted them so much according to their due desert. But for that the Eliansenvied them that priviledge, therefore the Corinthians passed a publicke decree, by vertue whereof they excluded them from the folemnity of the Ishmian games: And heereof it came, that never after that, any champion out of the territorie of Elis, was knowen to shew himselfe to doe his devoir at those Isthmicke games. And the massacre of the Molionides which Hereules committed about the city of Cleone, was not the cause as some doe thinke, why the Elians were debarred from thence for contrariwife it had belonged to them for to exclude and put 50 by others; if for this they had incurred the displeasure of the Corinthians. And thus much said I for my part. Now when we were come as far as to the hall of the Acanthians and of Brasidas, our discoursing Historians and expositours shewed us the place, where sometimes stood the obelisks of iron, which Rhodopus the famous courtifan had dedicated. Whereat Diogenianus was in a great chafe, and brake out into these words: Now furely (quoth he) the same city (to their shame be it spoken) hath allowed unto a common strumper a place whether to bring and where to bestow the tenth part of that falarie which she got by the use of her body, and unjustly put to death Aclope her fellow fervant. True (quoth Serapion:) but are you so much offended hereat? cast up your eie and looke aloft : behold among the statues of brave captaines and glorious kings, the image of Mnefarete all of beaten gold, which Crates faith was dedicated and fet up for a Trophæ of the Greeks lasciviousnesse. The yong gentleman, seeing it: Yea, but it was of phryne that Crates spake so. You say true (quoth Serapion:) for her proper name indeed was Amelarete: but furnamed the was Fhryne in meriment because the looked pale or yellow like unto a kinde of frogge named in Greeke Phryne. And thus many times furnames doe drowne and suppresse other names. For thus the mother of king Alexander the great, who had for her to name at first, Pollyxene, came afterwards to be as they fay, surnamed Myrtale, Olympias and Stratonice. And the Corinthian lady Eumet is, men call unto this day, after her fathers name, Cleobuline; and Herophile, of the city Erythre, the who had the gift of divination and could skill of prophefie; was afterwards in proceffe of time furnamed Sibylla. And you have heard Grammarians fay, that even Leda her felfe, was named Mnefinoe, and Oreftes Achaeus. But how thinke your (quoth he) casting his eie upon Theon, to answere this accusation as touching Phryne? Then he fauling againe: In fuch fort (quoth he) as I will charge and accuse you, for busying your selfe in blaming thus the light faults of the Greeks. For like as Socrates reprooved this in Callias, that gave defiance onely to fweet perfumes or pretious odors; for he liked well enough to fee the daunces and geficulations of yong boies, and could abide the fight of kiffing, of pleafants, buf-10 fons and jefters to make folke laugh: fo me thinks that you would chafe and exclude out of the temple, one poore filly woman who used the beauty of her owne body, haply not so honestly as the might: and in the meane time you can abide to fee god Apollo environed round about with the first fruits, with the tenth and other oblations arising from murders, warres, and pillage, and all his temple throughout hanged with the spoiles and booties gotten from the Greeks: yea, and are neither angry nor take pity when you reade, over fuch goodly oblations, and ornaments, these most shamefull inscriptions and titles: Brasidae and the Acanthians, of the Athenian spoiles: the Athenians of the Corinthians: the Phocæans of the Thessalians: the Orneates of the Sicyonians: and the Amphyctions of the Phocauns.

But peradventure it was Praxiteles alone who was offensive unto Crines, for that he had fet up 20 amonument there, of his owne sweet heart, which he had made for the love of her; whereas Crates contrariwise should have commended him, in that among these golden images of kings and princes, he had placed a courtifan in gold, reproching thereby and condemning riches, as having in it nothing to be admired, and nothing venerable: for it well beforemeth kings and greatrulers, to prefent Apollo and the gods with fuch ornaments and oblations as might teftifie their owne justice, their temperance and magnanimity; and not make thew of their golden flore and abundance of superfluous delicates, whereof they have their part commonly who have lived most shamefully. But you alledge not this example of Crasus (quoth another of our historians & directours) who caused a statue in gold to be made & set up here, of his woman baker; which he did not for any proud and infolent oftentation of his riches in this temple, but upon 40 an honest & just occasion : for the report goeth, that Alyattes the father of this Creefus, espoused a fecond wife, by whom he had other children, whom hereared and brought up. This lady then purposing secretly to take away the life of Cra/m gave unto the baker aforesaid, poison, willing her, when the had reinpered it with dough, and wrought it into bread, to ferve the fame up unto Crafus. But the woman gave fecret intelligence hereof unto Crafus, and withall, bestowed the poisoned bread among the children of this step dame. In regard of which demerit, Crasus when he came to the crowne, would acknowledge and require the good fervice which this woman had done, with the testimony, as it were, of this god himselfe; wherein he did well and verthoully. And therefore (quoth he) meet it is and feemly, to praife and honor highly fuch oblations, if any have beene presented and dedicated by cities upon semblable occasions, like as the 50 Opuntians did. For when the tyrants of the Phocæans had broken and melted many facred oblationsboth of golde and filver, and thereof coined money, which they fent and dispersed among the cities; the Opuntians gathered as much filver as they could, wherewith they filled a greatpor, sent it hittier, and made thereof an offering to Apollo. And I verily, for my part, doe greatly comend those of Smyrna and Apollonia for sending hither certaine corne-cares of gold, intoken of harvest; and more than that, the Eretrians and Magnesians, for presenting this god with the first fruits of their men & women, recognifing thereby, him to be the giver, not only of the fruits which the earth yeeldeth, but also of children, as being the authour of generation and the lover of mankind. But I blame the Megarians as much, for that they onely in maner of all the Greeks, caused to be erected here, the image of this our god, with a lance in his hand, after the battell with the Athenians, who upon the defeature of the Persians, held their city in posses. fion, and were by them vanquished in fight, and differed thereof againe. And yet true it is, that these men afterward offered unto Apollo a golden plectre wherewith to play upon his Cittern or Viole, having heard (as it should seeme) the Poet Seythinus, speaking of the faid instrument

Which Don Apollo, faire and lovely sonne Of Jupiter, doth tune in skilfull wife, As who is wont of all things wrought and done, All ends with their beginnings to comprise: And in his hand the plectre bright as golde, Even glittering rates of hining Sun doth holde.

Now when Serapion would have faid somewhat els of these matters : A pleasure it were (quoth the stranger) to heare you devise and discourse of such like things, but I must needs demand the first promise made unto me, as touching the cause why the Prophetesse Pythia hath given over to make answere any longer by oracle, in verse and meetre : and therefore, if it so please you, let us furcease visiting the rest of these oblations and ornaments, and rather sit we down in this place, for to heare what can be faid of this matter, being the principall point and maine reason which impeacheth the credit of this oracle; for that of necessitie one of these two things must 20 needs be : either that the Prophetesse Pythia approcheth not neere enough to the very place where the divine power is, or els that the aire which was woont to breathe and inspire this inffinct, is utterly quenched, and the puiffance quite gone and vanished away. When we had fetched therefore a circuit about, we fat us downe upon the tablements on the South fide of the temple, nere unto the chappell of Tellus, that is to fay, the Earth, where we beheld the waters of the fountaine Castilius, and the temple of the Mules, with admiration, in such fort as Boethus incontinently faid, that the very place it felfe made much for the question and doubt mooved by the stranger: For in olde time (quoth he) there was a temple of the Muses even there, from whence the river fprings; infomuch as they nfed this water for the folemne libations at facrifices, according as Simonides writeth in this wife:

And in another place, the same Samonides with a little more curiositie of words, calling upon Cleio the Muse, faith, the is the holy keeper.

The facred ewres, who doth superintend Whereby from lovely fountaine do deseend Those waters pure, which all the world admires, And thereof for to have a taste desires: As rifing from those caves propheticall, That yeeld (weet odors most mirificall.

And therefore Endorses was much overfeene to believe those who gave out, that this was called the water of Styx. But in trueth, they placed the Muses as affiftants to divination, and the warders thereof, neere unto that riveret and the temple of Tellus aforefaid, whereunto apperteined the oracle: whereby answeres were rendred in verse and song. And some there be who says that this heroique verse was first heard here:

Συμφέρετε εθερεδιωνοί, κηρέν τε μέλια ... That is to fay, You pretie Bees and birds that fing:

Bring hither both your wax and wing. at what time as the oracle being for laken and deflitute of the god copollo, loft all the dignity and 50 majesty that it had. Then Serapion: These things indeed (quoth he) ô Boethus, are more meet and convenient for the Muses. For we ought not to fight against God, nor together with prophesicand divination take away both providence and divinitie; but to seeke rather for the solution of those reasons which seeme to be contrary thereto, and in no wife to abandon and calt off that faith and religious beliefe, which hath in our countrey, time out of minde, paffed from father to sonne. You say very well and truely (quoth I) good Serapion, for we despaire not of Phi-pronounced their fentences, and published their doctrines in verse: as for example, Orphess, Hesodus, Parmenides, Xenophanes, Empedocles, Thales, and afterwards ceased and gave over to verlifie, all but your selse, for you have into Philosophie reduced Poetrie againe, to set up aloud and loftie note, for to incite and flirre up young men. Neither is Aftrologie of leffe credite and estimation, because Aristarchus, Timochares, Aristyllus, and Hipparchus, have written in profe: whereas Eudoxus, Hesiodus, and Thales, wrote before them in verse of that argument; at leastwife, if it be true that Thales was the author of that Astrologie which is ascribed unto him. And Pindarus himselfe confesseth, that he doubted greatly of that maner of melodie, to which was neglected in his daies, wondering why it was fodefpifed. For I affure you it is no abfurd thing, nor impertinent, to fearch the causes of such mutations : But to abolish all arts and faculties, if haply somewhat be changed or altered in them, I hold neither just, nor reasonable, Then came in Theor also with his vie, adding moreover & faying, that it could not be denied, but that in truth herein there have bene great changes & mutations : howbeit, no leffe true it is, that even in this very place there have bene many oracles & answers delivered in profe, & those concerning affaires, not of least consequence, but of great importance. For as Thuey sides reporteth in his historic, when the Lacedæmonians demanded of the oracle, what iffue there would be of the warre which they waged against the Athenians ? this answer was made: That they should obtaine the victorie, and hold still the upper hand: also that he would aid and suc-20 cour them, both requested, and unrequested : and that unlesse they recalled home Faulanias, he would gather together * * * of filver. Semblably, when the Athenians confulted with the oracle about their fuccesse in that warre which they enterpised for the conquest of Sicilie; this answer they received: That they should bring out of the city Erythra, the priestresse of Minerva: now the name of the faid woman was Hefyehia, that it to fay, repose, or quietnesse. Moreover, at what time as Dinomenes the Sicilian, would needs know of the oracle, what should become of his sonnes? this answere was returned: That they should all three be tyrants, and great potentates: whereat when Dinomenes replied againe: Yea mary, my good lord Apollo, but peradventure they may rue that another day. Apollo answered: True indeed, & thus much moreover I prophetic unto thee, for to be their deftiny. And how this was fulfilled you all know: for 30 Gelon during his reigne, had the dropfie: Hiero was diseased with the stone, all the time of his tyrannic: and Thrashbulus being overtoiled with warres and civill seditions, in short time was diffhroned & driven out of his dominions. Moreover, Procles the tyrant of Epidawus, among many others, whom he had cruelly and unjustly put to death, murdred Timarchus, who fled from Athens unto him, with a great quantitic of money, after he had received him into his protection, and showed him many courtefies and kindnesses at his first arrivall: him (I say) he slew, and afterwards cast into the sea his corps, which he had put into a chest: and howsoever other knew not of this murder, yet Cleander of Aegina, was privic thereto, and the minister to execute the fame. After this, in processe of time, when he was fallen into troubles, and that his state began to be disquieted, he sent his brother Cleatures hither to the oracle, to enquire secretly 40 whether he were best to flie and retire himselfe out of the way. Apollo made this answer: That hegranted Procles flight and retreat thither, where as he commanded his hoft of Aegina to bellow a cheft, or elfe where the stagges cast their heads. The tyrant understanding that Apollo willed him either to throw himfelfe into the sea and there be drowned, or else to be

Furthermore (which is the greatest matter of all) those Rhetra, by vertue whereof, Lycurgus ordeined the government of the Lacedamonians com-50 mon-wealth, were delivered unto him in profe. What should I speake of Alyrius, Herodotus, Philochorus, and Ifter, who of all others travelled most in gathering of oracles together, which were given in verfe, and yet have penned many of them without verfe. And Theopompus, who studied, no man so much, to cleere the history as touching oracles; sharpely reprooveth those, who thinke that Pythia the propheteffe in those daies, gave no answers nor propheties in meetre: which chalenge of his when he minded to proove and make good, he could alledge but very few examples; for that all the reft in maner were even then pronounced in profe, like as at this day, fome there be that runne in verse and meeter. By which allegations of his, he made one about the rest notoriously divulged, which is this. There is within the province of Phoeis. a certeine temple of Hereules, furnamed Myhogyne, as one would fay, hating women: and by the ancient cultome and law of that country, the prieft thereof for the time being, must not in the whole yeere company with a woman: by occasion whereof, they chuse old men to this priesthood: howsoever not long since, a certeine young man, who was otherwise of no ill behaviour, but somewhat ambitious, and desirous of honour, and who besides loved a young wench, atteined to this prelacie or facerdotall dignity: at the first he bridled his affection, and forbare the faid damofell: howbeit, one time above the rest, when he was laid upon his bed, after he had drunke well, and beene a dancing, the wench came to visit him; and to be short, he to dealt carnally with her; whereupon being much troubled in minde, and in fearefull perplexity, he fled unto the oracle, and enquired of Apollo as concerning the finne which he had committed, whether he might not be affoiled for it by praiers or expiatoric fatisfaction? and this answer he received:

απαντα αναγγεία συγχωρεί θελς.

But if a man haply should graunt that no answere in these daies is delivered by oracle, but in verse; yet would he be more in doubt of ancient oracles, which sometime in meetre and otherwhiles in profe gave answeres. But neither the one nor the other (my fonne) is strange and without reason, if so be you conceive aright and carry a pure and religious opinion of god A- 20 pollo, and doe not thinke that he himselfe it was who in old time composed the verses and at this day prompteth unto Pythia the prophefies, as if he spake through maskes and visours. But this point is of fuch moment; that it requireth a longer discourse and farther inquirie into it: mary for this present it may suffice for our learning, that we call to remembrance and put youin minde briefely, how the body useth many organs or instruments; that the soule emploieth the body and the parts thereof; and that the foule is the organ or instrument of God. Now the perfection of any organ or instrument, is principally to imitate and resemble that which useth it, as much as is in the power thereof: and to exhibit the worke and effect of the intention init felfe, and to flew the fame not fuch as it is in the workeman, pure, fincere, without paffion, without error and faultleffe, but mixed and exposed to faults: for of it selfe obscure it is and al- 30 together unknowen unto us; but it appeareth another, and by another, and is replenished with the nature of that other. And here I paffe over to speake of wax, gold, silver, braffe, and all other forts of matter and fubstance, which may be cast and brought into the forme of a mould. For every of these verily receiveth one forme of a similitude imprinted therein, but to this resemblance or representation, one adjoineth this difference, and another that, of it selfe: as easily isto be seene, by the infinit diversities of formes in images, as also by the apparence of one and the fame vifage in divers and fundry mirours, flat, hollow, curbed, or embowed, round outwardly, which represent an infinit variety. But there is neither mirror that sheweth and expresses the facebetter, nor instrument of nature more supple, obsequent and pliable, than is the Moone: howbeit receiving from the Sunne a light and firy illumination, the fendeth not the fame backe 40 unto us, but mingled with fomewhat of her owne: whereby it changeth the colour, and hatha power or facultie far different, for no heat at all there is in it: and as for the light fo weakeard feeble it is that it faileth before it commeth unto us. And this I suppose to be the meaning of Herachtes, when he faith, that the lord, unto whom belongeth the oracle at Delphos, doth neither speake, nor conceale, but fignifie onely and give signe. Addenow to this which is so well faid and conceived, and make this application: that the god who is heere, ufeth Pythia the prophetesse, for fight and hearing, like as the Sunne useth the Moone. He sheweth future things by a mortall body, and a foule which cannot rest and lie stil, as being notable to shew her felfe immooveable and quiet to him who stirreth and mooveth her, but is troubled still more and more by the motions, agitations, and paffions, of her owne, and which are in her felfe: for 50 like as the turnings of bodies, which together with a circular motion, fall downward, are not firme and strong, but turning as they do round by force, and tending downward by nature, there is made of them both, a certaine turbulent and irregular circumgiration: Even so theravishment of the spirit, called Enthusiasmus is a mixture of two motions, when the minde is moved in the one by infpiration, and in the other naturally. For confidering that of bodies which have no foule, and of themselves continue alwaies in one estate quiet, a man cannot make use not moove them perforce, otherwise than the quality of their nature will beare, nor move a cylindre like abal, or in maner of a square cube, nor a lute or harpe, according as he doth a pipe, no more than a trumpet after the order of acithern or stringed instrument : ne yet anything else otherwise than either by art or nature each of them is fit to be used. How is it possible then to handle and manage that which is animate, which mooveth of it felfe, is indued with will and inclination capable also of reason; but according to the precedent habitude, putillance and nature? As for example, to move one mufically, who is altogether ignorant and an enemie of muficke; or grammatically, him who skilleth not of grammer, and knoweth not a letter of the booke; or eloquently and thetorically, one who hath neither skill not practife at all in orations. Certes I to cannot fee or fay how? And herein Homer also beareth witnesse with me, who albeit he suppofeth thus much, that nothing (to speake of) in the whole world, is performed and effected by any cause, unlesse God be at one end thereof: yet will not he make God to use all persons indisterently in every thing, but each one according to the fufficiency that he hath by art or nature. Toprove this, see you not (quoth he) my frend Diogenianus, that when Miner va would perswade the Achaeans to any thing the calleth for Ulyfes? when the is minded to trouble and marre the treaty of peace, the feeketh out Pandarus? when the is disposed to discomfit and put to flight the Trojans, the addreffeth her felfe and goeth to Diomedes? for of these three, the last was a valiant man of person, and a brave warrior; the second a good archer, but yet a soolish and brainficke man; the first right eloquent and wife withall : for Homer was not of the same minde 20 with Pandarus, if so be it were Pandarus who made this verse,

If God so will in sea thou maist well faile upon an hurdle or a wicker fraile.

But well he knew, that powers and natures be destined to divers effects, according as ech one hath different motions, notwithstanding that which mooveth them all, be but one. Like as therefore that facultie which moveth a living creature naturally going on foot, can not make it to flie; nor him who stutteth and stammereth, to speake readily; ne yet him to crie bigge and aloud, who hath a small and slender voice : which was the reason (as I take it) that when Battus wascome to * Rome, they fent him into Afrike, there to plant a colonie, and people a citie; for * δ31 τωυ Ρωhowsoever he had a stutting and stammering tongue, and was otherwise of a small voice, yet a uton, or postuture with a small no princely minde he caried, a politike head he had of his owne, and was a man of wisedome & go-character, vernment: even so impossible it is, that Pythia should have the knowledge to speake here ele-that is to say, gantly & learnedly: for notwithftanding that the were wel borne and legitimate as any other, & to his full had lived honestly and discreetly, yet being brought up in the house of poore husbandmen, she descendeth into the place of the oracle, bringing with her no art learned in schoole, nor any experience what foever. But as Xenophon thinketh, that a young bride when the is brought to her husbands house, ought to be such an one as hath not seene much, and heard as little; semblably, Pythia being ignorant and unexpert in maner of all things, and a very virgin indeed as touching her minde and foule, commeth to converse with Apollo. And we verily are of opinion, that God for to fignific future things, useth Herons, Wrens, Ravens, Crowes, and other birds, speaking after their maner: neither will we have soothsaiers, and prophets, being as they are, the messengers and heralds of God, to expound and declare their predictions in plaine and intelligible words: but wee would that the voice and dialect of the propheteffe Pythia, refem-40 bling the speech of a Chorus in a tragedie from a scaffold, should pronounce her answers not in fimple, plaine, and triviall termes, without any grace to fet them out, but with Poeticall magnificence of high and stately verses, disguised as it were with metaphors and figurative phrases, yea, and that which more is, with sound of flute and hautboies: what answere make you then, astouching the old oracles? Surely, not one alone, but many. First, the ancient Pythia as hath beene faid already, uttered and pronounced most of them in prose: secondly, that time affoorded those complexions and temperatures of bodie, which had a propense and forward in-50 clination to Poesie, whereto there were joined incontinently, the alacritie, desires, affections, and dispositions of the soule, in such fort, as they were ever prest and ready, neither wanted they ought but fome little beginning from without, to fet them on worke, and to stirre the imagination and conception; whereby there might directly be drawen unto that which was meet and proper for them, not onely Aftrologers and Philosophers as Philinus faith; but also such as were well foaked with wine, and shaken with some passion, who either upon pitic surprising them, or joy presented unto them, might immediately slude as it were, and fall into a melodious and finging voice; infomuch as their feafts were full of verfes, and love fongs, yea and their books and compositions, amatorious, and savoring of the like. And when Euripides said:

Love makes men Poets, marke it when you will,

Although before in verse they had no skill.

He meaneth not that love putteth Poetrie or Musicke into a man in whom there was none before, but wakeneth, stirreth and enchasteth that which before was drowsie, idle, and cold. Or elle my good frend, let us say, that now adaies there is not an amorous person, and one that skilleth of love, but all love is extinct and perished, because there is no man, as Pindarus saith,

Who now in pleasant vaine Poeticall His songs and ditties doeth addresse, Which just in rhime and meeter fall,

To praise his faire and sweet mistresse, But this is untrue and abfurd: for many loves there be that stirre and moove a man, though they meet not with fuch minds as naturally are disposed and forward to Musicke or Poetricand well may these loves be without pipes, without harpes, violes, littes, and stringed instruments: and yet no leffe talkative nor ardent, than those in old time. Againe, it were a shame and without all conscience to say, that the Academie with all the quire and company of Socrates and Plato, were void of amorous affection (whose amatorious discourses are at this day extant, & to beread) although they left no Poems behinde them. And is it not all one to fay, that there was never any woman but Sappho in love, nor had the gift of prophetic, fave onely Sibilla, and 20 Aristonice, or fuch as published their varicinations and propheties in verse? For vertue as Cheremonwas woont to fay, is mingled and tempered with the maners of those that drinke it: And this Enthuliasine or spirit of prophesie, like unto the ravishment of love, maketh use of that fufficiencie and facultie, which it findeth ready in the fubject, and moovethech one of them that are inspired therewith, according to the measure of their naturall disposition: and yet as we confider God and his providence, we shall see that the change is ever to the better. For the use offpeech, refembleth properly the permutation and woorth of money; which is good and allowable, fo long as it is used and knowen, being currant, more or lesse, and valued diversly, as the times require. Now the time was , when the very marke and stampe (as it were) of our fixech was current and approoved, in meeter, verses, songs and sonets: Forasmuch as then, all 30 historie, all doctrine of Philosophie, all affection; and to be briefe, all matter that required a more grave and stately voice, they brought to Poetry and Musicke. For now, onely few men, hardly, and with much a doe; give eare and understand: but then, all indifferently heard, yea, and take great pleasure to heare those that sung, as Pindarus faith: but also most men for the great aptitude they had unto Poetric, when they would admonish and make remonstrances, did it, by the meanes of harpe, lute, and fong with all: if they ment to rebuke, chastise, exhort, and incite, they performed it by tales, fables, and proverbes. Moreover their hymnes to the honour and praise of the gods, their praiers and 40 vowes, their balads for joy of victory, they made in meeter and muficall rhime: fome upona dexterity of wit, others by use and practise. And therefore neither did Apollo envie this ornament and pleafant grace unto the skill of divination, neither banished he from this threefooted table of the oracle the Muse so highly honored, but rather brought it in, and stirred it up as affecting and loving Poeticall wittes: yea, and himselfe ministred and insused certeine imaginations, helping to put forward the loftic and learned kinde of language, as being much prized and effeemed. But afterwards, as the life of men, together with their fortunes and natures came to be changed; thritt and utilitie (which remooveth all superfluity) tooke away the golden lufts, and foretops of perukes, the spangled coifes, caules, and attires, it cast off the fine and deinty robes called Xystides; it clipped and cut away the bush of haire growing too long; it so unbuckled and unlaced, the trim buskins, acquainting men with good reason, to glory in thriftinesse and frugalitie, against superstuous and sumptuous delicacies, yea, and to honour simplicitie and modelty, rather than vaine pompe and affected curiofitie: And even fo, the maner of mens speech, changing also and laying aside all glorious shew, the order of writing an historie therewithall, presently came downe as one would say from the stately chariot of versification on, to profe, and went a foot; and by the meanes especially of this fashion of writing and speaking at liberty, and not being tied to measures, true stories, come to be distinguished from lying sables: and Philosophie embracing perspicuity of stile, which was apt to teach and instruct, rather than that which by tropes and figures amused and amased mens braines. And then Apolorepressed Pythia, that she should not any more call her fellow citizens, Pyricaos, that is to say, burning sires; nor the Spartanes, Ophiaboros, that is to say, devourers of serpents; nor men Oremos, and river, Oremposas; and so by cutting off from her, prophesies, verses, and strange termes, circumlocutions and obscurities, the taught and inured her to speake unto those who reforted to the oracles, as lawes do talke with cities, as kings devise and commune with their people and subjects, and as scholars give care unto their schoole-masters, framing and applying is maner of speech and language so, as it might be full of sense and perswasive grace: for this lesson wought to learne and know that, as Sophoeles saith:

Godto the wife in heavenly things, is ay a lightfome guide,
But fooles to briefely he doth teach, that they goe alwaies wide.

And together with plainnesse, and diluciditie, beliefe was so turned and altered, changing together with other things, that beforetime, what foever was not ordinary nor common, but extravagant, or obscurely and covertly spoken, the vulgar fort drawing it into an opinion of some holinesse hidden underneath, was astonied thereat and held it venerable: but afterwards, de-20 firous to learne and understand things cleerely and easily, and not with masks of disguised words, they began to finde fault with Poefie, wherein oracles were clad; not onely for that it was contrary and repugnant to the easie intelligence of the truth, as mingling the darknesse and shadow of obscurity with the sentence, but also for that they had prophesies already in suspicion; faying, that metaphors ænigmaticall, and covert words, yea and the ambiguitles which Poetry useth, were but shifts, retracts, and evasions to hide and cover all, when soever the events fell not out accordingly. And many you may heare to report, that there be certeine Poeticall persons, practised in versifying, fit yet about the oracle, for to receive and eatch some words theredelivered; which prefently and extempore, they reduce and contrive into verse, meeter, and thime, as if they were panniers to beftow all the answers in. And hecre I forbeare to speake 30 what occasion of blame, and matter of calumniation in these oracles, these Onomacritos, Prodora and Cinefones have ministred, by adding unto them a tragicall pompe, and swelling inflation of words, when as neither they had need thereof, nor yet received any varietie and alteration thereby. Moreover, certeine it is, that these juglers and vagarant circumforancan landleapers, these practisers of legier demain, these plaiers at passe and repasse, with all the packe of those vagabonds, ribauds, and jesters who haunt the feasts of Cybele and Serapis, have greatly discredited and brought into obloquie the profession of Poetrie: some by their extemporall facultie and telling fortunes, others by way of lotterie forfooth, and by certeine letters and writings, forging oracles which they would give to poore varlets and filly women, who were foonelt abused thereby, especially when they saw the same reduced into verse, and so were caried 40 away with Poeticall termes. And from hence it is now come to passe, that Poesie, for that she hath suffered herselse thus to be prophaned and made common, by such consiners, juglers, dectivers, enchanters, and false prophets, is fallen from the trueth, and rejected from Apolloes three-footed table.

And therefore I nothing woonder if otherwhiles in old time, there was some need of this double meaning, circumlocution, and obscuritie: for I assure you, there was not woont to come hither one for to enquire and be resolved about the buying of a slave in open market: nor another to know what profit he should have by his traffike or husbandry: but hither came or fent great and puissant ties, kings, princes, and tyrants, who had no meane matters in their heads, to consult with spollo as concerning their important affaires; whom to provoke, 30 displease, and offend, by causing them to heare many things contrary to their will and minde, was nothing good and expedient for those who had the charge of the oracle: for this god obeieth not Euripides when he setteth downe a law as it were for him, saying thus:

Phoebus himfelfe, and none but he, Ought unto men the prophet to be.

for heufeth mortall men to be his ministers and underprophets: of whom he is to have a speciall care for to preserve them, that in doing him service, they be not spoiled and slaine by wicked

persons: in which regard he is not willing to conceale the truth; but turning aside the naked declaration thereof, which in poetrie receiveth many reflexions, and is divided into many parcels, he thereby did away the the rigor and odious aufterity therein conteined. And it skilled much, that neither tyrants should know it, nor enemies be advertised and have intelligence thereof. For their fakes therefore, he enfolded in all his answeres, doubts, suspitions and ambiguities, which from others did hide the true meaning of that which was answered. But such as came themselves to the oracle, and gave close and heedfull care, as whom it concerned particularly, those he deceived not, neither failed they of the right understanding thereof. And therefore a very foolish man is he, and of no judgement, who doth take occasion of slander and ca. lumniation, if the world and estate of mens affaires being changed, this God thinketh that he is to not to aide and helpe men any more after his accustomed maner, but by some other. Furthermore, by the meanes of poetrie and verlification, there is not in a fentence, any greater commoditie than this, that being couched and comprised in a certeine number of words and fullables measured, a man may reteine and remember the same better. And necessarie it was for those in olde time, to cary away in memory many things, because there were delivered many fignes and marks of places, many times and opportunities of affaires, many temples of strange gods beyond fea, many fecret monuments, and repolitories of demi-gods hard to be found of those who failed farre from Greece. For in the voyages of Chios and Candte, * * * enterprised by Onesichus and Palanthus, beside many other captaines and admirals, how many fignes and conjectures went they by, and were to observe, for to finde the resting seat, and place 20 of abode, which was ordered to every one of them? and fome of them quite miffed thereof: as for example, Battus: for his prophetie ran thus, That unleffe he arrived to the right place, he should be banished. Failing therefore of the countrey whereto he was fent, he returned against to the oracle in humble maner, craving his favour. And then Apollo answered him in this wife:

Thou knowest thy selfe, as well as I can tell, That uneshyes in Astikethous hast beene; (For thither sent I thee to build and dwell) We or Meliboca, that place so fertile, seene: If thither now accordingly thou wend, Thy wisdome then greatly will I commend.

And so he sent him away the second time. Likewise Lysander being altogether ignorant of the little hill Archeledes, of the place called Alopecon, as also of the river Ophres.

And of the dragon, sonne of earth by kinde

Full craftily affailing men behinde. all which hee should have avoided, was vanquished in battell, and slaine about those very places, and that by one Inachion and Aliartian, who had for his device or armes in the target that he bare, a dragon purtraid. But I thinke it needleffe to recite many other ancient oracles of this kinde, which are not eafily to be related, and as hardly remembred, especially among you who know them well enough. But now thanks be to God, the state of our affaires and of the world, in regard whereof men were woont to feeke unto the oracle is feeled: for which I rejoice and 40 congratulate with you. For great peace there is and repose in all parts; warres be staied, and there is no more need of running and wandring to and fro, from one countrey to another: civill diffentions and feditions be appealed: there are no tyrannies now excercifed: neither doe there raigne other maladies and miseries of Greece, as in times past, which had need of soveraigne medicins, exquifit drogues and powerfull confections, to remedy and redreffe the fame. Whereas therefore there is no variable diversity, no matter of secrecie, no dangerous affaires, but all demands be of petie & vulgar matters, much like to these schoole questions: Whethera man should marry or no? Whether a man may undertake a voiage by sea or no? or Whether he is to take up or put forth mony for interest? where, I fay, the greatest points, about which cities feeke unto Apollo, are about the fertility of their ground, plenty of corne and other fruits of the 50 earth, the breed and multiplying of their cattell, and the health of their bodies : to goe about for to comprile the fame in verfe, to devile and forge long circuits of words, to use strange and obscure tearmes, to such interrogatories as require a short simple and plaine answere, were the part of an ambitious and vaing lorious Sophister, who tooke a pride in the elegant composing of oracles. Over and besides, Pythia of her selfe is of a gentle and generous nature: and when the descendent thither and converseth with the god, the hath more regard of trueth than of glory, neither paffeth she whether men praise or dispraise her. And better iwis it were for us, if we also were likewise affected. But we now in a great agony (as it were) & searchill perplexity lest the place should leefe the reputation which it hath had for the space of three thousand yeeres, and doubting that some would abandon it and cease to frequentit, as if it were the schoole of a Sophister, who feared to lose his credit, and to be despited, devise apologies in desence thereof, faining causes and reasons of things which we neither know, nor is beseeming us for locarne, and all to appease and perswade him, who complaineth and seemeth to finde fault, whereas we should rather shake him off and let him goe.

For with him fir ft, It will be wor ft, who hath fuch an opinion of this our God, as that he approved and effected these ancient fentences of the Sages written at the entrance of the temple, Know thy felfe; Too much of nothing; principally for their brevity, as containing under few words a pithy sentence well and closely couched, and (as a man would say) beaten foundly together with the hammer: but reproved and blamed moderne oracles for delivering most part of their answeres, briefely, succinclly, simply, and directly. And verily such notable Apophthegmes and sayings of the ancient Siges, refemble rivers that runne through a narrow streight, where the water is pent and kept in so close, that a man cannot see through it, and even so unneth or hardly may the bottom of their sense be sounded. But if you consider what is written or said by them, who endevous 20 to fearch unto the very bottom, what every one of these sentences doth comprehend, you shall finde that hardly a man shall meet with orations longer then they. Now the dialect or speech of Pythia is such, as the Mathematicians define a straight and direct line, namely, the shortest that may be betweene two points: and even so it bendeth not, it crookeneth not, it maketh no circle, it carrieth no double fenfe and ambiguity, but goeth straight to the trueth; and say it be subject to censure and examination, and dangerous to be misconstured and believed amisse: yetto this day it hath never given advantage whereby it might be convinced of untrueth: but in the meane time, it hath furnished all this temple full of rich gifts, presents and oblations, not onely of Greeke nations, but also of barbarous people, as also adorned it with the beautiful buildings and magnificent fabricks of the amphictyons. For you fee in some fort, many buildings and adjoined which were not before, and as many repaired and restored to their ancient perfection. which were either fallen to decay and ruined by continuance of time, or elfe lay confusedly out of order. And like as we fee, that neere unto great trees that fored much and prosper well, other smaller plants and shrubs grow and thrive: even so together with the city of Delphos, Pylea flourisheth, as being fed and maintained by the abundance and affluence, which ariseth from hence, in such fort as it beginneth to have the forme and shew of solemne facrifices of stately meetings and facred waters, fuch as in a thousand yeeres before it could never get the like. As for those that inhabited about Galaxion in Beotia, they found and felt the gracious presence and favour of our God by the great plenty and store of milke, For,

From all their ewes thicke milke did pin, As water fielh from lively spring: Their tubs and tunnes with milke therein Brim full they all, home fast did bring: No barrels, bottels, pailes of wood, But full of milke in bonfes stood,

But to us he giveth better markes, and more evident tokens and apparent fignes of his prefence and favour, than these be; having brought our countrey (as it were) from drinesse and penurie, from desert & waste wildernesse, wherein it was before, to be now rich and plentiful, frequented and peopled, yea and to be in that honor and reputation, wherein we see it at this day to shour it is, on this businesse, to get the much better, for that I was so well affected, as to put to my helping hand to in this businesse, together with Polyerates and Petram: Yea and him also I love in my heart, who was the first author unto us of this government and policy, and who tooke the paines and endevoured to set on foot and establish most part of these things. But impossible it was, that in so small a time there should be seene so great and so evident a mutation by any industry of man whatsoever, if God himselfe had not beneassistant to fanctific and honour this oracle. But like as in those timespass, so there be in these daies, others, who like sycophants cavill at the over-much simplicitie of them; whose humorous passion is injurious and exceeding foolish. For even as little children take more joy and pleasure to see rainbowes, haloes or garlands about the Sunne, Moone, &c. yea, and comets or blafing starres, than they do to behold the Sunne himfelfe or the Moone; fo these persons desire to have anigmaticall and darke speeches, obscure allegories, and wrested metaphors, which are all reflexions of divination upon the sansie and apprehension of our mortall conceit. And if they understand not sufficiently, the cause of this change and alteration, they go their waies, and are ready to condemne the God, and not either us or themselves, who are not able by discourse of reason to reach unto the counsell and intention of the faid gods.

OF SOCRATES.

* A Treatise in maner of a Dialogue.

The Summarie.

He Thebans having lost their freedome and liberty by the violent proceedings of Archias, Leontidas and other tyrants, who banished a great number of good cuizens 30 and men of woorth, in which roll and catalogue Pelopidas was one (as appeareth in the storie of his life, wherein Plutarch writeth of all this matter at large) it fellout at last, that the exiled persons tooke heart, drew to an head, and wrought so, as they reentred the city of Thebes, flew the tyrants, and difflaced the garrison of the Spartans. Which done, they dispatched their ambassages to other States and Common wealths of Greece, for to justifie this their action; and namely, among the rest, they sent Caphisias to Athens: who being there, at therequest of Archidamus a personage of great authoritie, related and reported the returne of the bamshed men, the surprising of the tyrants, and the restoring of the citie to their ancient franchises; and that with discourses woonderfull patheticall, and such as stew the singular providence of Godin the preservation of States, and confusion of such wicked members as disturbe the publicke peace. But in this re- 40 citall, there is inserted, and that with good grace, a digression as touching the familiar spirit of Socrates, by occasion of a Pythagorean Philosopher newly come out of Italie to Thebes, for to take up the bones of Lysis: for by occasion that Galaxidorus the Epicurean derided the superstition of this stranger, praising withall, the wisdome and learning of Socrates, who had cleered and delivered Philosophie from all fant afticall illusions of spirits and ghosts, Theocritus bringeth in an example of a certeine preaiction of this familiar spirit. But withall, when the other had demanded the question, whether the Same were an humane and naturall thing or no, the disputation began to kindle and waxe hote; until fuch time as Epaminondas and this stranger named Theanor came in place: and then they fell into adifcourse of povertie and riches, by occasion that Theanor offered filver unto the Thebans, in recompense of their kindnesse and good enterteinment shewed unto Lylis. And as they would have procee so ded forward in this argument, there came one who ministred occasion for to returne unto the former narration as touching the enterprise and exploit of the said exiled persons: in which there is intermingled againe a treatife concerning the familiar of Socrates, with a large recitall of the fable of Timatchus, After which, Caphilias rehearfeth the iffue of the tragadie of the tyrants, flowing thorowout, notable discourses of the divine wisdome, and joining therewith a consideration of Socrates his wistdome, guiding and directing to a particular plot for the good of all Greece. But in this place thereadermust remember and call to minde who this Socrates was ; to wit, a man destitute of the true knowledge of God, and therefore he is to holde for suspected and naught this familiar spirit of his, if aman would receive and admit the opinion of some interloquutors, who suppose it was a Damon or shirit from without; to the end that we should not rest upon revelution, inspirations and guidances of angels, unleffe a be of fuch, the testimonies whereof are grounded upon the holy scripture; but flie from the profine curiositie of certaine fantasticall heads, who by their books published abroad in print, have darediorevive and rasse up againe this false opinion (which some in this age of ours have) of similar pinis, by whom they are for sooth as well advised and as surely taught and instructed as by the very pirit of God, feaking unto us by his written word.

Have heard (as I remember) ô Caphifias, a prety speech of a certaine painter making a comparison of those who came to see the pictures and tables which he had painted: for he was woont to fay, that the ignorant beholders and fuch as had no skill at all in the art of painting, refembled them who faluted a whole multitude of people all at once; but the better fort and fuch as were skilfull, were like unto those who used to falve every one whom they met, severally by name: for that the former had no exquifit infight into the works, but a superficiall and generall knowledge onely; whereas the other contrariwife, judging every piece and partthercof, will not miffe

one jote, but peruse, consider and censure that which is well done or otherwise. Semblably it falleth out in my judgement, as touching true actions indeed, which are not painted. The conceit and understanding of the more idle and carelesse persons resteth in this bare knowledge, in case they conceive only the summary and issue of a thing; but that, of studious and diligent per-30 fons, and lovers of faire and goodly things, like unto a judicious and excellent spectator of vertue, as of some great and fingular art, taketh more pleasure to heare the particularities in speciall: for that the end of matters, ordinarily, hath many things common with fortune; but the good wit is better feene in causes, & in the vertue of particular occurrences & affaires which are presented; as when valour she weth it selfe not astonied, but considerate and well advised in the greatest perils; where the discourse of reason is mingled with passion, which the sudden occasion of danger presented doth bring. Supposing then, that we also are of this kinde of spectators, declare you to us now in order from the beginning, how this matter did passe and proceed in the execution thereof, as also what talke and discourse was held there; for that by all likelihood youwere present: and for mine owne part, so desirous I am to heare, that I would not faile to go 40 as farreas to Thebes for the knowledge thereof, were it not, that I am thought already of the Athenians, to favorife the Bootians more than I should.

CAPHISIA'S.

Certes, Archidamu, fince you are so earnest and forward to learne how these affaires were managed, I ought in regard of the good will which you beare unto us, before any businesse whatfoever (as Pindarus faith) to have come hither, expresly for to relate the same unto you: but fince we are hither come in embaffage already, and at good leafure, whiles we attend what answere and dispatch the people of Athens will give us, in making it strange and goodly, and refuling to fatible fo civill a request of a personage so kinde and well affectionate to his friends, were as much as to revive the olde reproch imputed upon the Boeotians, to wit, that they hate 50 good letters and learned discourses; which reproch began to weare away with your Socrates, and in lo doing, it seemeth that we treat of affaires with two priests: and therefore see, whether the Seigniors here present be disposed to heare the report of so many speeches and actions; for the narration will not be short, considering that you will me to adjoine thereto the words that pasfed alfo.

ARCHIDAMUS.

Youknownot the men, ô Caphifias, and yet well woorthy they are to be knowen; for noble persons they had to their fathers, and those who had beene well affected to our countrey. As for him (pointing to Lysinides) he is (quoth he) the nephew of Thrasshalm; but he here, is Timethem the sonne of Conon: those there, be the children of Archinum; and the other, our familiar friends. So that you shall be sure to have a well willing auditorie, and such as will take pleasure to heare this natration.

CAPHISIAS.

You say well. But where were I best to begin my speech, in regard of those matters that ye have already heard and knowen, which I would not willingly repeat?

Archidamus.

We know reasonably well, in what state the citie of Thebes stood, before the returne of the 10 banished persons; and namely, how Archias and Leonidas had secred intelligence, and complotted with Phabidas the Lacedamonian captaine, whom they perswaded, during the time of truce, to furprise the castle of Cadmus; and how having executed this diffeigne, they drave some citizens out of the city, and put others in prison, or held the men in awe, whiles themselves ruled tyrannically and with violence. Whereof I had intelligence, because I was (as you wot well) hoalf unto Melon and Pelopidas, with whom (folong as they were in exile) I was inwardly acquainted and converfed familiarly. Moreover, we have heard already, how the Lacedamonians condemned Phabidas to pay a great fine, for that he had feized the fort Cadmia, and how they put him by, and kept him from the journey and expedition of Olynthus, and lent thither in stead of him, Lyfanoridas with two other captaines, and planted a stronger garrifon within the 20 castle. Furthermore, we know very well, that Ismenias died not the fairest kinde of death, prefently upon I wot not what processe framed, and an action commensed against him, for that Gorgidas advertised the banished who were heere, by letters, from time to time, of all matters that passed; in such fort, as there remaineth for you to relate, nothing els, but the returne of the faid banished men, and the furprising or apprehension of the tyrants.

CAPHISTAS. About that time (Archidamus) all we that were of the confederacie and complotted together, used ordinarily to meet in the house of Simmias, by occasion that he was retired and in cute of a wound which he had received in his leg, where we conferred fecretly of our affaires as need required; but in shew and openly, discoursed of matters of learning and Philosophy, drawing 30 unto us often times into our companie, Archias and Leontralas, men who misliked not such conferences and communications, because we would remoove all suspicion of such conventicles. For Simmies having abode long time in forren parts among the Barbarians, being returned to Thebes but a little while before, was full of all manet of newes and strange reports as touching those barbarous nations; infomuch, as Archiae when he was at leasure, willingly gaue eare to his discourses and narrations, sitting in the company of us yong gentlemen, as being well pleafed that we should give our mindes to the study of good letters and learning, rather than buse our heads about those matters which they went about and practised in the meane while, x And the very day on which late in the evening, and toward darke night following, the exiled persons abovefaid were come closely under the wall, there arrived from thence unto us a messenger, 40 whom Pherenicus fent, one who was unknowen to us all, unleffe it were to Charen, who brought us word, that to the number of twelve yoong gentlemen, and those the bravest gallants of all the banished conspiratours, were already with their hounds hunting in the forest citharon, intending to be heere in the evening; and that therefore they had fent before and dispatched a vauntcourrier of purpose, as well to advertise us thereof, as to be certified themselves who it was that should make his house ready for them to lie secret and hidden therein when they were once come; to the end that upon this foreknowledge they might fet forward and go directly thither. Now as we studied and tooke some deliberation about this point, Charon of himselfe offered his house: whereupon, when the messenger intended to returne immediatly & with great speed to the exiles, 7 heoritus the foothfaier griping me fast by the hand, & casting his eie upon Charon 50 that went before: This man (quoth he) ô Caphistas, is no Philosopher nor deepe scholar, neither is he come to any excellent or exquisit knowledge above others, as his brother Epaminonals, and yet you fee how being naturally enclined, and directed withall by the lawes, unto honorand vertue, he exposeth himselfe willingly unto danger of death, for the deliverie and setting free of his countrey; whiles Epaminondas, who hath had better meanes of instruction and education to the attaining of vertue, than any other Boeotian whatfoever, is restiffe, dull, and backeward, when the question is of executing any great enterprise for the deliverance of his native country. And to what occasion of service shall he ever be so well disposed, prepared and emploied, than this? Vnto whome I made answere in this wife: We for our parts, most kinde and gently Theorium, doe that which hath beene thought good, refolved and concluded upon among our felves, but Epamanondas having not yet perswaded us, according as he thinketh it better himself, not to put these our designements in execution, hath good reason to goe against that wherewith his nature repugneth, and so he approveth not the designement whereunto he is moved and invited. For it were unreasonable to force & compell a physician, who promiseth & undertaketh to cure a disease, without lancet & fire, for to proceed to incission, cutting & cauterizing. to Why (quoth 7 bearit w) doth not he approve of the conspiracie? No (quoth I) neither alloweth he that any citizens thould be put to death, unleffe they were condemned first judicially by order of law: mary, he faith, that if without maffacre and effusion of citizens blood they would enterprise the deliverance of the city, he would affist and aide them right willingly. Seeing then that he was not able to enduce us for to believe his reasons, but that we followed still our owne course, he requireth us to let him alone pure, innocent, and impolluted with the blood of his citizens, and to fuffer him for to espie and attend some better occasions and opportunities, by meanes whereof with justice he might procure the good of the weale publicke. For murder (quoth he) will not containe it felfe within limits as it ought: but Pherenicus happly and Pelopedas, may bend their force principally upon the authors and heads of the tyranny, and wicked 20 persons: but you shall have some such as Eumolpidas and Samiadas hot stomacked men, set on fire with choler and defire of revenge, who taking liberty by the vantage of the night, will not lay downe their armes, nor put up their fwords, untill they have filled the whole city with bloodfhed, and murdered many of the best and principall citizens.

As I thus devised and communed with Theoritus, Anaxidorus overhearing some of our words (for nere he was unto us:) Stay (quoth he) and hold your peace, for I fee Archias & Lylanoridas the Spartan captaine comming from the castle Cadmia, and it seemeth that they make haste directly toward us. Heercupon we paused and were still: with that Archiae calling unto Theoritus, and bringing him apart by himfelfe unto Ly/anoridus, talked with him a long while, drawing him afide a little out of the way, under the temple of Amphion; in such fort, as we were 30 in an extreame agony & perplexity, for feare left they had an inckling or suspition of our enterprise, or that formthing were discovered: & thereupon they examined Theoritus. As these matters thus paffed, Phyllidas (whom you Archidamus know) who was then the principall fecretary orscribe under Archias, at that time captaine generall of the armie, being desirous of the approch of the confpiratours, & with al both privy and party with us in the complot, came in place and tooke me (as his manner was) by the hand, beginning with open mouth to mocke our exercifes of the body and our wreftling: but afterward, drawing me afide, a good way from the others, asked me whether the banithed perfons would keepe that appointed day or no? I made him answere, Yea. Then have I (quoth he) to very good purpose prepared a feast this day for to entertaine Archias in my house, and so to deliver him with ease into their hands, when he shall 40 havecaten freely, and drunke wine merily. Paffing welldone (quoth I)ô Phyllidass: but I befeech you withall, for to bring together all our enimies, or as many as you can. That is no casse matter (quoth he) to compaffe, but rather altogether impossible. For Archas hoping that some great lady of honor and estate will come thither unto him, in no wife can abide that Leontidas thould be there, fo that of necessity we must divide them into fundry houses. Now if archies and Leontidas both, be once apprehended, I suppose that the rest will soone flie, or else remaine quiet, and be very highly contented if any man will grant them fafety and fecurity of their lives. Well (quoth I) we will so doe: but I pray you, what businesse have they with Theoretius, that they are folong in talke with him ? I know not for a trueth (quoth Phyllidas) but I have heard that there be certaine prodigious fignes of unluckie and unfortunate prefage unto the ci-

When Theoritus was returned unto us againe, Phidolaus the Haliertian comming toward us. Summias (quoth he) requesteth you to stay here a while for his sake: for hers an intercessor in the behalfe of Amphiteus by the meanes of Leontides, that his life may be pardoned, and that in fread of death, the man might be banished, This is fallen out (quoth Theoritus) in very good time and sity to the purpose as a man would have it: for I was minded to enquire of you what things were found within the tombe of Alemena, and what shew it caried when it was opened among you: and also whether you were present when Agessiam sent of purpose for to translate and carry the reliques unto Sparsa. Present I was not my selfe Phidolaus in person: and I was very much angry and offended with my fellow citizens, in that I was so discarded and lest out. Howbeit found there was with the bones and other reliques of the corps, a certaine carquanet of brasse, and that of no great bignesse, and two earthen pots, containing amphors a piece sull of earth which in continuance of time was growen hard and converted into stone.

Over the sepulcher there was a table of brasse likewise, wherein were written many letters, and those of a strange and wonderfull forme, as being of right great antiquity: for nothing could we picke out of them, notwithstanding the letters appeared very well, after that the braffe was faire washed and sourced cleane, the characters were of such a making by themselves, after a 10 barbarous fashion, and resembling neerest those of the Aegyptians. Whereupon Agessian also, as men say, sent a copy of them unto the king of Aegypt, praying him to shew the same unto their priefts, to fee whether they understood them or no? But peradventure of these matters Simmias also is able to tell us some newes, because about that time he conversed much with the faid priests in points of Philosophie. And those of the citie Aliartos are of opinion, that their great sterility, and scarcitie, as also the swelling and inundation of the lake hapned not by chance, but was the vengeance divine upon those who suffered the monument of this sepulchre to be digged up and opened. Then Theorritus after he had paused a little: The Lacedamonians likewise (quoth he) seeme to have beene threatned by the ire of the gods, as the prodigious fignes and tokens presage no lesse, whereof Lylanoridas ere while talked with 20 me: who even now is gone into the citie Aliarros, to cause the said monument to be filled up againe, and there to offer certeine funerall effusions and libaments, to the ghost of Alemena and Alew, according to a certeine oracle; but who this Alew should be, he knoweth not; and fo foone as he is from thence returned, he must fearch also the sepulchre of Diree, which none of the Thebanes doe know, unlesse they be those who have beene captaines of the horsemen. For looke who goeth out of this office, taketh with him his successor that entreth into his place, by night, and when they two be alone together, he sheweth it unto him, and there they performe certeine religious ceremonies without fire, the tokens and marks whereof, they shuffle together, and confound fo, as they be not feene; which done, they depart in the darke, and goe diverswaies, one from the other. But for mine owne part, ô Phidolaus, I beleeve verily he will 30 never finde it out, for the most of those who have beene lawfully called to the captainship of the cavallerie, or to fay more truely, even all of them are in exile, except Gorgidas and Plato, whom they will never aske the question, because they are afraid of them. And as for those who are now in place, well may they take the launce and the fignet within the castle of Cadman; for otherwise they neither know nor can shew ought. As Theorisms spake these words, Leonisdan went foorth with his friends; and we entring in, faluted Simmias, being fet upon his bed, but I fuppose he had not obtained his request, for very pensive and heavie he was; and looking wistly in the face upon us all, he brake out into these words: O Hercules, what a world is this, to see the barbarous and favage maners of men? And was not this then a very good answere made by old Thales, who being returned home, after a long voiage, from out of a forren countrey, and 40 demanded what was the strangest newes that he could make relation of? answered: That he had feene a tyrant live to be an old man. For thus you fee, that himfelfe who in his owne particular, had never received wrong by a tyrant, yet in regard of the odious trouble, in converfing and having to doe with them, is offended and become an enemie to all foveraigne and absolute governments, which are not subject to render an account unto the lawes. But haply God will see to these matters, and provide in time convenient. But know you (Caphisias) who this stranger may be, that is come unto you? I wot not (quoth he) whom you meane. Why (quoth he)2gaine, Leontidas came and told us of a man, who was feene by night to atife from about the tombe of Lysis, accompanied in stately wife, with a great traine of men, in good order; and well appointed, who lodged there and lay upon pallets: for that there were to be feene in the mor- 50 ning little beds hard by the ground, made of chast tree and of heath or lings. There remained also the tokens of fire, and of the libaments and oblations of milke. Moreover betimes in the morning he demanded of all paffengers whom he met, where he should finde the children of Polymnis dwelling in that country? And what stranger might this be (quoth I:) for by your report he should be some great personage, and not a private man and of meane degree. Not fo (quoth Phidolam) but when he comes welcome he shall be, and we will receive him courte-oully. But for this prefent, if peradventure (Simmias) you know any thing more than we concerning those letters whereof we were of late in doubt, declare it unto us : for it is faid that the priests of Aegypt understood by conference together the letters of a certaine table of braffe, which Agefilan not long fince had from us, at what time as he caused the tombeof Alemena to be opened. I have not (quoth Simmas, calling another matter presently to minde) seene this faid table, ô Phidolam: but Agetoridas the Spartan carrying with him many letters from Agefilang came to the city Memphis and went unto the prophet Chonuphis, with whome we conferred astouching Philosophy, and abode together a certaine time, my selfe I meane, and Plato, with Ellopion the Peparethian. Thither I say arrived he as sent from king Agesilans, who requested to Chonuphis, that if he understood any thing of those letters which were written in the said brasse, he would interpret the same, and fend it backe unto him incontinently. So this prophet was musing and studying three daies together by himselfe, perusing and turning all forts of figures and characters of auncient letters; and in the end wrote backe his answer unto king Agesilans, and by word of mouth told us, that the faid writing gave direction and commandement unto the Greeks, to celebrate the feaft, and folemnize the plaies and games in the honor of the Mufes: also that the forme of those characters, were the very same which had beene used at the time when Protein reigned in Acgypt, which Hercules the sonne of Amphitryo learned: and that God by those letters advised and admonished the Greeks to live in peace and repose, instituting certeine games unto the Muses, for the study of Philosophy and good litterature, and di-20 sputing one against another continually, with reasons and arguments as touching justice, laying armes cleane aside. As for us, we thought verily even then at the very first, that Chopubles faid well and truely; but much rather, when in our returne out of Aeg ypt, as we passed along Caria, certeine persons of the Isle Delos, met us upon the way, who requested Plato (as he was a man well feene and exercised in Geometrie) to explane the meaning unto them of a certeine strange oracle, & hard to be understood; which god Apollo had given them: the tenour whereof was this: That the Delians and all other Greeke nations, should have a ceffation & end of all their prefent troubles and calamities, when they had once doubled the alter which flood in the temple at Delos: for they being not able to gueffe nor imagine what the substance and meaning should be, of this answer delivered by the oracle; and besides, making themselves ridiculous, 30 when they thought to double the fabricke and building of the altar (for when they had doubled ech fide of the foure, they were not ware how by augmentation they made a folid bodie, eight times as bigge as it was before, and that by ignorance of the proportion, which in length yeeldeth the duple) they had recourse unto Plato, for to be resolved of this difficulty. Then he calling to minde the foresaid Aegyptian priest, said unto them: that the god plaied with the Greeks, for despissing good sciences; reproching them for their ignorance, and commanding them in good earnest to study Geometry, and not curfarily after a superficiall maner; for that it was a matter and worke, not of a depravate conceit, nor of a troubled and dimme understanding, but fufficiently exercifed, and perfectly feene in the sciences of Lines; to find of two lines one middle proportioned, which is the onely means to double the figure of a cubicke body, be-40 ing augmented equally in all dimensions: And as for these (quoth he) Endoxus the Chidian, or Helicon the Cyzicenian, hath performed fufficiently unto you: howbeit, we are not to thinke that the god hath need of any fuch duplication, neither was it, that which he meant, but he commanded the Greeks to give over armes for to converse with the Muses; in dulcing their pasfions by the study of good literature, and the sciences, and so to couple and carie themselves, asthat they might profit, and not hurt one another. But whiles Simmias thus spake, my father Polymnia entred the place, and fat him downe close unto Simmias, beginning thus to speake: Epaminondas (quoth he) requesteth both you, and all the rest that be heere, unlesse your busineffe otherwise be the greater, notto faile, but heere to stay; as being desirous to make you acquainted with this stranger, who is of himselfea gentle person, and withall, is hither come 50 with a generous and honest intention (being one of the Pythagorian Philosophers) from out of Italy, and his arrivall into these parts, as by occasion of certaine visions and dreames as he faith, yea, and evident apparitions admonifing him to powre and offer unto the good feignior Lysis, upon his tombe, those libaments which are due unto men departed: and having brought with him a good quantitie of gold, he supposeth that he is bound to make recompense unto Epaminondas, for the charges which he was at in keeping & mainteining good Ly/is in his old age, and most ready he is, without our request, and against our will, to succour our need and povertic. Simmias taking great pleasure to heare this: You tell us (quoth he) of a woonderfull man indeed, and fuch an one as is woorthy of Philosophy: but what is the reason that he came not directly unto us? Because (quoth he) he tooke up lodging last night about the sepulchre of Ly. fis, and as I take it, Epaminondas bath led him to the river Ismenus, for to wash; but from thence they will come both together unto us: but before that he spake with us, he lodged upon the tombe of Ly/is, with a purpose as I thinke, to take up the bones and reliques of his body, for to cary with him backe into Italy, unlesse there were some spirit or dæmon empeached him in the night: When my father had thus much faid, he held his tongue: and then Gallaridorus: O Hercules (quoth he) how hard a matter is it to finde a man who is altogether free from vanitie, and in whom there is no spice of superstition ? For somethere be, who even to against their willes are otherwhiles surprised with these passions, by reason either of ignorance or infirmity: others againe, to the end they might be thought more religious, more devout, and better beloved of the gods, upon a fingularity, referre all their actions to the gods, as the authors thereof, preferring before all the inventions that came into their minde, dreames and fantasticall apparitions, and all such foolish toies and vanties; which paradventure is not unbeferning nor unprofitable for polititians and statists, who are forced to frame themselves to a stubberne & disordinate mulittude, for to reclaime and to pull backe the common & vulgar fort by superstition, as it were by the bit of a bridle, unto that which is expedient for them. But this maske feemeth not onely undecent and unfeemely for Philosophy, but also contrary to the profession thereof, which promise to teach us all that which is good 20 and profitable with reason, and afterwards referreth the beginning of our actions unto the gods, as if it contemned reason and disgraced the proofe of demonstration, wherein it seemeth to be most excellent turning aside to I wot not what oracles and visions in dreames, wherein often times the wickedest man in the word, findeth as much as the very best. And therefore in mine opinion our Socrates, ô Simmias, used that maner of teaching which is most worthy and besitting a Philosopher, to wit, simple, plaine, without all fiction, chusing it as most free and frendly unto the trueth, rejecting and turning upon the Sophisters, all such vanity, as the very sume and fmonke of Philosophy. Then Theorit w taking his turne to speake: How now (quoth he) Galaxidorus, hath Melitus perfwaded you, as well as he made the judges believe, that Socrates difpiled the gods and all divine powers? For this is that which he chargeth him with before the 20 Athenians. In no wife (quoth he) as touching those heavenly powers: but having received from the hands of Pythagor as and Empedocles, Philosophy full of ridiculus fables, fantasticallil-Infions, and vaine superstition, he acquainted us, playing thus the soole in good earnest, and being drunke with furie, to take up betimes and wifely to cleave unto things of fubstance, yea and to acknowledge, that in fober reason consistent the trueth. Be it so (quoth Theoritus,) but as touching the lamiliar spirit of Socrates, what shall we thinke or say of it? was it a cogging lie and mere fable, or what should we call it? For in mine owne conceit, like as Homer faignesh that Minerva was evermore affiftant in all the travels and petils of ulyfes, even fo from the very first beginning, this divine spirit allotted unto Socrates a certaine vision, which guided him in all the actions of his life, this onely went and walked before him: it was a light unto him in all those affaires wherein nothing could be seene, and which possibly might not be gathered, nor comprehended by reason and wisedome ofman, insomuch, as many times this spirit spake with him, inspiring, directing, and governing, after a heavenly maner, his intentions. Now hee 40 that would know a greater number of proofes, and those more woonderfull, let them heate Simmias speake, & others, who lived familiarly with him: as for my selfe, I wil relate one example, which I saw with mine owne eies, and where I was in person present: One daywhen I went to confult with the divinor or foothfaier Enthyphron, Socrates went up (as you may remember well, ô Simmias, for prefent you were there also, toward a place called Symbolon, and the house of Andocides, asking all the way as we went, & troubling Euthyphron with many questions, merily and by way of sport; but all on a sudden he stated and rested, very studious and musting with 40 himselfe a good while: then he turned backe and went along the street where ioyners dwelt, that made coffers and chefts, and called not those of his familiar friends who were gone before, the other way, forto have them returne: for why, his familiar spirit forbad him to go forward as he began: thus the greater part of them, retired and went with him, & among them, I my felie was one, following evermore Euthyphron hard at heeles; but some other of the yonger fort, would needs goe streight on still, of a very deliberate purpose to crosse and convince the familiar spirit of Socrates, and drewalong with them Charillus the plaier upon the flute, who was then come with me to Athens, for to visit Cebes. Now when they went by the shops of the imagers, neere the common halles and courts of justice, they might see before them a mightie heard of hogges, as thicke as one might stand by another, full of dirt and mire, and bearing downe all before them, by reason of their great number; and for that there was no meanes to turne afide from them, they overthrew fome of the yoong men abovefaid, and laid them along, on the ground, yea and all to be raied the rest of their fellowes. Thus returned Charillus home tohis lodging, with his legges, his thighes, and all his clothes, fouly bedaubed with filthy dirt; in fuch fort, as he maketh us remember many times, and that with good laughing, the familiar 10 of Socrates, and caufeth us to marvell how that divine power never for fooke this man, but had evermore a care and charge of him in all places and occasions what soever. Then (quoth Galaxidorno:) Thinke you that this familiar spirit of Socrares was some proper and peculiar power, and not a parcell of that univerfall and common necessitie, which confirmed this man by long experience, to give the counterpoife and over-weight for to make him encline to or fro, in things obscure and hard to be conjectured and guessed at, by discourse of reason? For like as one pound weight by it felfe alone draweth not the balance, but when as the poife hangeth equally, if a man put it then either to the one fide or the other, it draweth the whole, and maketh all to incline that way: even so a voice or some small and light signe, is not sufficient to flire a grave cognation to proceed unto the execution of a thing, but being put into one of the two contrary discourses, it solvethall the doubt and difficultie, taking away the inequall in fuch fort, as then it maketh a motion and inclination. Then my father taking his courfe to ipeake: But I have heard (quoth he) ô Galaxidorus, a certeine Megarian fay, who likewise heard as much of Terpsion, that this spirit was nothing else but the sneeting either of himselfe, or of others about him; for if any one of his company fneefed on his right hand, whether he were before or behinde, it mattered not, then he enclined to doe that which he intended, and was presented into his minde; but if it were on the left hand, he gave over; and if it were himselfe that sneesed, when he was in doubt or suspense to doe, or not to doe a thing, he then was confirmed, and refolved to doe it; but if he hapned then to fneefe, when a thing was already begun, it staied him, and checked his inclination and purpose, to effect and finish the same. But 30 this is very strange, if it be true that he used this observation of sneefing, how he could say, unto his friends, that it was his familiar spirit, which either mooved him forward to doe a thing or drewhim backe from it: for this my good friend can not chuse but proceed from a foolish vanitie, and prefumptuous oftentation, and not of truth and franke fimplicitie, for which we esteeme this personage, to be very great and excellent above others, in case for some voice comming without foorth, or by reason of sneesing, he should be troubled and empeached in the continuance of an action which he had commenced already, and for clinquish his dessigne and deliberation : whereas it feemeth cleane contrary, that the motions and inclinations of $\mathcal{S}_{ heta}$ grates carried with them a firmitude and durable vehemence in whattoever he went about and undertooke, as proceeding from a direct and powerfull judgement, and from a strong motive 40 that let him on worke. For he continued voluntarily all his life time in povertie, whereas he might have had wealth enough, if he would have received at his friends hands fufficient, who were very willing, yea, and tooke joy to bestow their goods upon him: also he would never leave the studie and profession of Philosophie, for all the great hinderances and empeachments that he met withall s and finally, when he might eafily have escaped and faved himselfe, by the meanes that his friends had prepared and made for him, he would never be remooved, nor yeeld unto their praiers, nor defilt from his maner of merie and jefting speeches, though death were presented unto him, but held his reason firme and unremoveable in the greatest perill that was. These were not the parts of a man, who suffered himselfe to be transported or carried away with vaine voices, or fneefings, from any refolution which he had taken: but of him who was guided 30 and conducted by a greater command, and more puiffant power, unto his dutie. I heare also, that he foretold fome of his friends, the defeature and overthrow of the Athenians armie in Sicilie. And before these things, Pyrilampes the sonne of Antephon, being taken by us, in the chase and execution of victorie about Delion, and wounded with a javelin, when he heard by those who were fent from Athens unto us for to treat of peace, that Socrates together with Altibiades and Laches, being gone downe by the way of Rherifte, were returned in fafety, made report unto us, that Socrates had many times called him backe, & other of his friends, and of his band, who flying with him for company, along the mountaine Parnes, were overtaken and killed by our horfemen, for that they had taken another way of flight from the battell, and notit, that he directed him unto by his angell or familiar spirit. And thus much I suppose that Simmias himselfe hath heard as well as I. True (quoth Simmias) I have heard it oftentimes, and of many persons, for upon this example and such like, the familiar spirit of Soerates was not a little spoken of in Ashens, Why suffer we then, o Simmias (quoth Phidolaus) this Galaxidorus here, by way of jest and meriment, to debase so much, this so great a worke of divination, as to passe it away in I wot not what voices and incefings: Which fignes the vulgar fort of ignorant persons made use of by jest and mockerie, in small matters, and of no consequence: for when the question is of more greevous dangers, and affaires of greater importance; the faying is verified 10 of Euripides:

Noman will play the foole, nor fuch vaine words Cast our, so neere the edge and dint of swords.

And Galaxidorus: It Simmias (quoth he) o Phidolaus, hath hard Socrates himselfe fay ought of these matters, I am willing to give care and to pardon him with you: but for any thing that you (ô Polymnis) have faid, an eafie matter it is to confute the fame: for like as in Physicke, the bea. ting of the pulse is no great matter in it selfe, nor a pimple or whelke : but signes they be both of no small things unto the Physician: and unto the pilot and master of a ship, the noise of these, the fight or voice of some bird, or a thin cloud running through the aire, fignifieth some great winde or violent tempest in the sea: even so unto a propheticall and divining minde, a freeling 20 or a voice spoken, in it selfe considered, is no such great matter, but signes these may be of most important accidents. For in no art nor science whatsoever, men doe despise the collection or judgement of many things by a few, nor of great matters by finall: but like as if an ignorant perfon, who knoweth not the power of letters, feeing them few in number, and in formevile and contemptible, could not believe that a learned man was able to read and relate out of them long warres in times past, the foundations of cities, the acts of mighty kings, and their variable fortunes; and should say that there were something underneath, which tolde and declared unto the said Historian, every one of those matters in order; he might give good occasionof laughter & pleafantly to deride his ignorance unto as many as hard him ipeake to : even to take heed and beware, left we (for that we know not the vertue and efficacy of every figne and foretoken, in as much as they prefage future things) be not foolifhly angred, if fome prudent and wife to many by the force fo man by the same signes foretell somewhat as touching things unknowen, and namely, if he say that it is not a voice nor a freefing, but a familiar spirit, which hath declared the same unto him. For now come I to you Polymnia, who effecme and admire Socrates as a personage, who by his plaine simplicity, without any counterfet vanity whatsoever, hath humanized as I may so say, Philosophy, and attributed it to humaine reason, if he called not his figne that he went by, a voice or freefing, but after a tragicall maner thould name it a spirit familiar. For contrativite, I would matvell rather that a man fo well spoken as Socrates was, fo eloquent, and who had all words for eady at command, should fay that it was a voice or a fneefing, and not a divine spirit that taught him: as if one should say that himselfe was wounded by an arrow, and not with an 40 arrow by him who shot it, or that a poise was weighed by the balance, and not with a balance, by him that held or managed the balance in his hand : for the worke dependent not upon the inftrument, but upon him who hath the instrument, and useth it for to doe the worke; and even to the instrument is a kinde of figure used by that, which doth figurify and prognosticate thereby. But as I have faid already, we must listen what Simmias will say, as the man who knoweth this matter more exactly than others doe. You fay true indeed (quoth Theoretias) but let us fee first, who they be that enter heere in place: and the rather because Epaminondas is one, who seemeth to bring with him hither unto us the stranger above faid. And when we looked all toward the gates, we might perceive Epaminondas indeed going before and leading the way, accompanied with Imenodorus, Bacchilidas and Melissus, the plaier upon the flute. The stranger followed af 50 ter, a man of a good and ingenious countenance to fee to, and who carried in his vilage great mildnesse and humanity, & besides went in his apparel very gravely and decently. Now when he had taken his place and was fet downe close unto Simmia, and my brother next unto me, and all the reft as every one thought good: after filence made, Simmias addrefting his speechunto my brother: Go to now Epaminondas, (quoth he) what stranger is this, from whence commeth he, and what may be his name ? for this is the ordinary beginning and usuall entrance to farther knowledge and acquaintance. His name (quoth my brother) is Theanor à Simmins : a man borne in the city Croton, one of them who in those parts professe Philosophy, and discrediteth not the glory of great Pythagoras: but is come hither from out of Italy, a long journey, to confirme by good works, his good doctrine and profession. But you Epaminondas your selfc (quoth the stranger then) hinder me from doing, of all good deeds, the best. For if it be an honest thing for a man to doe good unto his friends, dishonest it cannot be to receive good at their hands: for in thanks there is as much need of a receiver as of a giver, being a thing composed of them both, and tending to a vertuous worke : and he that receiveth not a good turne, as a tennis ball fairely fent unto him, different it much, fuffring it to fall short and light upon the ground. to For what marke is there that a man shooteth at which he is so glad to hit and so fory to misse, as this, that one worthy of a benefit & good turne, he either hath it accordingly, or faileth thereof unworthily? And yet in this comparison, he that there, in shooting at the marke which standeth fill, and miffeth it, is in fault; but heere, he who refuseth and flieth from it, is he that doth wrong and injury unto the grace of a benifit, which by his refufall, it cannot attaine to that which it tendeth unto. As for the causes of this my voiage hither, I have already shewed unto you; and defirous I am to rehearfe them againe unto thele gentlemen heere prefent, that they may be judges in my behalfe against you. When the colledges and societies of the Pythagorean Philosophers, planted in every city of our country, were expelled by the strong hand of the seditious faction of the Cyclonians, when those who kept still together were affembled and held a coun-20 fell in the city of Metapontine, the feditious fet the house on fire on every fide, where they were met: and burnt them altogether except Philolams and Lysis, who being yet yong, active and able of body, put the fire by and escaped through it. And Phylolaus being retired into the countrey of the Laconians, faved himfelfe among his friends, who began already to rally themfelves and grow to an head, yea, and to have the upper hand of the faid Cyclonians. As for Lyfis, long it was ere any man knew what was become of him, untill fuch time as Gorgias the Leontine being failed backe againe out of Greece into Sicelie, brought certeine newes unto Arcefue, that he had spoken with Lysis, and that he made his abode in the city of Thebes. Whereupon Arcesus minded incontinently to embarke and take the fea; fo defirous he was to fee the man: but finding himselfe for seeblenesse and age together, very unable to performe such a voiage, he 30 tooke order expresly upon his death bed with his friends to bring him over alive if it were possible into Italie, or at least wife, if haply he were dead before, to convey his bones and reliques over. But the warres, seditions, troubles and tyrannics that came betweene and were in the way, empeached those friends, that they could not (during his life) accomplish this charge that he had laied upon them: but after that, the spirit or ghost of Lysis now departed, appearing visibly unto us, gave intelligence of his death, and when report was made unto us, by them who knew the certaine trueth, how liberally he was entertained and kept with you, ô Polymnis, and namely, in a poore house, where he was held and reputed as one of the children, and in his old agerichly mainteined, and so died in blessed estate, I being a yoong man, was sent alone from many others of the ancient fort, who have store of money, and be willing to bestow the same 40 upon you who want it, in recompense of that great favor and gracious friendship of yours extended to him. As for Lysis, worshipfully he was enterred by you, and bestowed in an honourable sepulchre, but yet more honourable for him will be that controlle, which by way of recompense is given to his friend, by other friends of his and kinsfolke.

Whiles the stranger spake thus, the teares trickled downe my fathers checks, and he wept a good while for the remembrance of Lofts. But my brother smiling upon me, as his maner was: How shall we do now Caphifias, quoth he; shall we cast off and abandon our poverty for money, and fofay no more, but keepe filence ? In no wife (quoth I) let us not quit and for fake our olde friend, and fo good a fostresse of young tolke : but defend you it, for your turne it is now to speake. And yet I (quoth he) my father, feare not that our house is pregnable for money, un-50 leffeit be in regard onely of Caphifias, who may feeme to have some need of a faire robe, to shew himselfe brave and gallant unto those that make love unto him, who are in number so many, as also of plenty of viands and food, to the end that he may endure the toile and travell of bodily exercises and combats which he must abide in the wrestling schooles. But seeing this other heere, of whom I had more diffrust, doth not abandon povertie, nor rafeth out the hereditary indigence of his father and house, as a tincture and unseemly staine; but although he be yet a yoong man, reputeth himselfe gaily set out and adorned with frugality, taking a pride therein, and resting contented with his present fortunes: Wherein should we any more employ our gold and filver, if we had it, and what use are we to make of it? What, would you have us to gild our armor, and cover our fhields as Nicias the Athenian did, with purple and gold intermingled therewith? And shall we buy for you, father, a faire mantle of the fine rich cloth of Milerus, and for my mother, a trim coat of scarlet coloured with purple ? For furely we will never abuse this present, in pampering our bellie, in feasting our selves, and making more sumptuous cheere than ordinary, by receiving riches into our house as a costly and chargeable guest? Fie upon that , my fonne (quoth my father) God forbid I should ever see such a change in mine house, Why (quoth he againe) we will not fit still in the house, keeping riches with watch and ward idle: for so the benefit were not beneficiall, but without all grace, and the possession thereof dishono- 10 rable. To what end then shall we receive it, quoth my father. It seemed of late (quoth Epani. nondas) unto Jajon a captaine of the Theffalians, that I made him an uncivill and rufticall anfwere, when he fent hither a great masse of gold, and requested me to take it as a gift: for I charged him plainly, that he did me great wrong, and began to picke a quarrell with me, in that he affeeting and affiring to a monarchie, came with money to tempt & folicit me a plaine citizen, of a free city, and living under the lawes. But as for you fir, who are come unto us as a stranger, I approove your good will, for it is honest, vertuous and beseeming a Philosopher, yea, and I love and embrace it fingularly well : but this I must needs fay unto you, that you bring medicines and physickedrogues to men that are not sicke and aile nothing. Like as therefore, if you hearing that our enemies warred upon us, were come to bring us harneffe, armes and weapons as 20 well defensive as offensive for our succour; and being arrived and landed in these parts, should finde all quiet, and that we lived in peace and amitie with our neighbours, you would not thinke that ye ought to give or leave the faid armes among them that had no need nor defire thereof: even so, come you are to aide us against povertie, as if we were afflicted and distressed thereby: but it is cleane contrary, for we can beate it with eafe, and well content we are to have it dwell with us still in the house: and therefore we feele no want either of money or munition, against her that doth us no displeasure. But this message you shall cary backe unto your fellowes and brethren in the same profession beyond sea, that as they use their goods and riches most honestly and in the best maner, so they have friends here also, that can make use of their poverty as well. Now for the keeping, funerals & sepulture of $L\eta fis$, he hath himselfe sufficiently paied us there z_0 fore and discharged all, in that among many other good instructions, he taught us, not to be afraid of povertie, nor to take it in ill part. To this, Theanor replied in this maner : Doethit (I pray you) bewray a base minde and want of courage, to seare povertie? and is it not as abfurd and as great a default in judgement, to dread and eschue riches? in case (I say) a man, not upon any found reason, but for outward disguised shew, and in a soolish humor of vanitie, result and reject it. And what reason is there, to disswade and debarre the getting and possession of goods, by all just and honest meanes, as Epaminondas useth? But rather, for asmuch as you are ready enough in your answeres, as appeareth by that which you made as touching this point, unto Jason the Theffalian, I demand of you first, Epaminondas, whether you thinke any kinde of giving money to be just and lawfull; but no maner of taking? or that simply, both givers and ta-40 kers do offend and finne? Not fo, quoth Epaminondas: but of this opinion I am, that as of other things, so of riches likewife, there is one giving and possessing, that is civill and honest; and another, dishonest and shamefull. Well then, quoth Theaner; what say you of him who giveth willingly and with a good heart, that which he ought: doeth he not give it well? Theother granted and confessed it. Go to then, quoth Theanor, he who receiveth that which is given well and honeftly, doth he not take it honeftly also? or can there be a more just and lawfull taking of money, than that which is received of him who giveth righteously ? I suppose (quoth Epaminonaas) there can not be. Betweene two friends therefore (quoth he) ô Epaminonaas, if the one may give, the other likewife may justly take: for in battels I confesse, a man ought to turne away and decline from that enemie of whom he hath received some pleasure; but in the case of bene-50 fits and good turnes, it is neither feemly nor honest, either to avoid or to reject that friend that giveth well and honeftly. No intrueth, quoth Epaminondas; but you are to confider with us, thus much, That there being in us many lusts and defires, and those of fundry things; some are naturall and (as they fay) inbred, budding and breeding in our flesh and about our bodies, for the enterteinment of those pleasures which be necessary; others be strangers, proceeding from vaine opinions, which gathering strength and force by tract of time and long custome in bad nouriture, grow to fuch an head, that many times they plucke downe and holde our foules in subjection more forcibly and with greater violence, than doe those naturall before said. Now reason, by good use and vertuous exercise, ministreth meanes, that a man may draw away and frend many of those very passions which are inbred within us; but he had need to employ all the power and strength of custome and exercise against those other concupiscences which be foreners and come from without forth, for to confume, cut off and chaftice them, by all means of repressions and retentions that be reasonable. For if the resistance which reason maketh against the appetite of eating and drinking, forceth many times and conquereth both hunger and thirst; far more casse is it, to cut off avarice and ambition, by forbearing and absteining those to things which the fame do covet, fo farre forth, as in the end they will be difcomfitted and fubdued. How fay you, thinke you not that it is so? The stranger confessed no lesse. See you not then, quoth he againe, that there is a difference betweene an exercise, and the worke unto which the exercise is addressed? And like as of the art which teacheth how to exercise the body, a man may fay, that the worke is the emulation, strife and contention to win the prize of the crowne against the concurrent or adversarie; but the exercise thereof, is the preparation that the champion makes, for to have his body apt, nimble and active thereto by continual trials of mafteries: even so you will grant, that a difference there is betweene vertue and the exercise of vertue. The stranger faid yea unto it. Then tell me first and formost, quoth he, To absteine from vile, filthy and unlawfull lufts, what thinke you, is it an exercise unto continency, or rather the very worke 20 it felfe, and proofe of continency? The very worke and proofe, I take it to be, quoth he againe: and the exercise and accustomance to sobriety, temperance and continency, is not that which you all practife, when after you have travelled your bodies, and like brute beafts provoked your appetites, you fit downe to meat, and there continue a long time, having your tables before you furnished with exquisit viands of all forts, but touch not one dish, leaving them afterwards for your fervants to engarge themselves therewith and make merry; when you the while present fome little thing, and that plaine and fimple, unto your appetites, which are already dulled and quenched: for the abstinence from pleasures and delights permitted, is it not an exercise against such as are forbidden ? Yes verily, quoth the stranger. There is then (quoth he) my friend, a certeine exercise of justice against avarice and coverousnesse of money; and that is 20 not, to forbeare in night feason to rob and spoile our neighbours houses, or to strip passengers out of their clothes: no, nor if a man doe not betray his countrey or friends for a piece of money, is he truely faid to inure and exercise himselfe against avarice: for haply the law and scare doth bridle and restraine his covetous desire from doing wrong or hurt to another: but he, who many times absteineth from taking just gaines, and such as are granted and permitted himby the lawes, he willingly exercifeth and woonteth himfelfe to keepe farre from any unjust and unlawfull taking of money. For neither is it possible, that in great pleasures, and those wicked and pernicious, the foule should conteine herselfe from the appetite thereof, if many times before, being in full libertie to enjoy them, the did not despite the same: nor easie for a man to paffe over & contemne wicked takings & great gaines prefented, who long before hath not chastisfed and tamed his covetous defire to have and gaine, which by other habitudes enough is nourished & bred up impudently & without all shame to lucre: for it swelleth againe, & ispuffed up with injuffice, fo as hardly & with much ado it can absteine fro doing outrage to 40 any one, for to win private profit therby: but never will it affault a personage who hath not abandoned & given himselfe over to receive gifts & largesses of his friends, or to take presents & rewards of kings, but hath renouced the very benefits allotted unto him by fortune: who also hath retired & removed himselfe far from avarice, and a leaping defire after a treasure discovered and feen: It will never (I fay) tempt him to commit any injustice, nor trouble his thoughts & cogitations: but fuch an one, wil quietly and peaceably frame himselfe to do that which is honest, as having his heart more hauty, than to stoupe to law, and being privy to himselse of all good 50 things fetled in his foule. Loe, what men they be, upon whom Caphissias and my selse be enamoured: and this is the reason friend Simmias, why we request this honest gentleman heere, the stranger, to suffer us to be sufficiently exercised in povertie, that we may attaine unto such vertue. After that my brother had finished this speech, Simmias having twise or thrice nodded with his head: A great man no doubt (quoth he) is this Epammondas, and a verie great man indeed: and well may be thanke his good father heere Polymnis for all; who from the first beginning, hath given his children the best education and bringing up in Philosophie: but as Kkkkk touching these matters, agree and accord with them, good stranger and friend. As for you Lyfias, let me demaund of you (if we may be so bold, as to heare and know of you) whether you purpose to remoove him out of his sepulchre, and so transport him over into Italy? or rather to leave him behinde you, to tary among his friends and wel-willers, who no doubt will be glad of us to lodge with him, when we shall be there. Thesner smiling upon him: It seemeth Simmias (quoth he) that Lifts liketh well of the place where he is, and is not willing to remoove, for that he had no want of any good things heere, by the meanes of Epaminondus: for there be certeine particular facred ceremonies, which we observe in the sepulture of our fellow profeffours in this confraternitic of the Pythagoreans, which if they have not when they bedead, me thinke they have not atteined to that happy end which we defire. When as there to forewe knew by dreames, that Lysis was departed this life (for we have an infallible figne, appearing unto us in our fleepe, whereby we can difcerne whether it be the ghoft and image of one alive or dead) many had this conceit, that being departed in a forren and farre countrey, he had beene otherwise enterred than he ought, and therefore we were to translate him from thence where he was, to the end, that being transported, he might have the due service, and accultomed obsequies belonging to our societie. Being therefore come with this minde and cogitation into these parts, and incontinently conducted by those of this country to his sepulchre; about the evening I powred out the libaments for mortuaries, for to call footh his spirit, that it might come and instruct me how I might proceed in this action: and this last night passed, I saw nothing; but me thought I heard a voice saying unto me: That I should not re- 20 move that which ought not to be stirred; because the corps of Lysis had beene by his friends in holy maner enterred, and his foule having her dome already, had her conge and pasport to go unto another generation and nativity, accompanied and coupled with another dæmon, And verily this morning when I had conferred with Epaminondas, and heard the maner how he had buried Lysis, I understood that he himselfe had beene instructed by him, in the most secret points of our religion, and how he used the same spirit or dæmon for the guidance of his life, unleffe I be so unexpert, that I cannot conjecture what the pilot is by his maner of navigation: for broad be the waies of this life, but few they are, which these angels doe direct and lead men in. When Theaner had thus faid, he cast his eie upon Epaminondas, as if once againe he would behold his nature and maners, by the infoiration of his countenance and vifage. And 30 hecreupon came in the Physician, and loofed the band wherewith Simmias his wound was bound up, as purposing to dreffe him. Then Phyllidas who came in afterwards with Hipposities nidas, willing me and Charon, and Theocritus to arife, drew us apart into a certeine corner or angle of the porch, woonderfully troubled as it might feeme by his countenance. With that, I fpake unto him and faid: What newes Phyllidas? No newes Caphifias (quoth he to me) for I forefaw my felfe, and foretold you as much, namely, the flackneffe and cowardife of Hippofhenidas, requelling you not to communicate unto him your enterprise, nor admit him into your company. Now whiles we were much amazed and aftonied at these words: Say not so good Phyllidas (quoth he) for gods fake; neither be you a cause both of our undoing and of the ruine of this city, by thinking rathnesse to be hardinesse: but have patience, and suffer these men to 40 returne in safetie, in case it be so by fatall destiny appointed. Phyllidas being chased heerewith, and fet in a choler: Tell me (quoth he) Hippost hemdas, how many thinke you be privy to our secrets in this delignment? I know my felfe (quoth he) to the number of thirty at the least. If there be fo many (quoth he) how commeth it to paffe, that you onely croffe and gainlay, yea, and hinder that which hath beene concluded and agreed upon by usall? and to this purpose have dispatched a light-horseman, to ride in posteunto the banished persons, (who had put themselves in their journey hitherward) charging them to returne backe, and that in no wife they should goe forward this day? considering that the most part of those things which went to this journey, fortune it selfe had procured & prepared fit for their hands ? upon these words of Phyllidas, we were all much troubled and perplexed: but Charon about the reft, fastining his cic 50 upon Hippofthenidas, and that with a fowre and sterne countenance: Most wicked wretch that thou art, quoth he, what halt thou done unto us? No harme, faid Hippofthemidas, in cafe, leaving this curft & angrie voice of yours, you can be content and have patience, to heare and underftand the reasons of a man as aged as your selfe, and having as many gray haires as you have: for if this be the point, to thew unto our fellow citizens how hardy and couragious we are, that we make no reckoning of our lives, and care not for any perill of death, feeing we have day enough Phyllidas, let us never stay for the darke evening, but prefently, and immediately from this place run upon the tyrants with our fwords drawen, let us kill and flay, let us die upon them, and make no spare of our selves: for it is no hard matter to do and suffer all this: many to deliver the citie of Thebes out of the hands of fo many armed men as hold it, to differze and expell the gatifon of the Spattanes, with the murder of two or three men, is not fo eafle a thing, (for Phylida hath not provided fo much wine for his feaft and banquet, as will be fufficient to make fifteene hundred fouldiers of Archine guard drunken: and fay we had killed him, yet Crippiday and Arcefus, are ready at night, both of them fober enough to keepe the corps du quard) why make wee fuch hafte then, to draw our friends into an evident and certaine danger of to prefent death, especially, seeing withall, that our enemies be in some fort advertised of their comming and approach; for if it were not fo, why was there commandement given by them to those of Thespie, for to be in their armes upon the third day, which is this, and readie to goe with the Lacedæmonian captaines, whenfoever they gave commandement? And as for Amphilhem, this very day as I understand, after their judiciall proceeding against him, they minded to put to death, upon the comming of Archies. And are not these pregnant prefumptions, that the plot and enterprise is to them discovered ? Were it not better then to deferre the execution of our defignments a while longer, untill fuch time as the gods be reconciled and appealed? for our divinors and wifards having facrificed a beefe unto deres, pronounce that the fire of the factifice denounceth fome great fedition and danger to the common weale: and that which you 20 Charon particularly ought to take good heed of is this: Yesterday, and no longer since, Hippathedores the forme of Erianthes, a man otherwise of good fort, and one who knowed nothing at all of our enterprite, had this speech with me : Charon is your familiar triend, Hope Chanday, but with me not greatly acquainted; advertise him therefore, if you thinke so good, that he beware and looke to himfelfe, in regard of some great danger & strange accident that is toward him: for the last night, as I dreamed, methought I saw that his boule was in travell as it were of childe; that he and his friends being themselves in distresse, praied unto the gods for her delivery, ftanding round about her during her labour and painfull travell; but she seemed to loow and rore, yea, and to cast out certains inarticulate voices, untill at the last there issued out of itamightie fire, wherewith a great part of the citie was immediately burnt, and the callie 30 Cadmea covered all over with smoke onely, but no part of the sire ascended thereto. Loe, what the vision was, which this honest man related unto me, Charon: which I affaire you, for the prefent, fet me in a great quaking and trembling; but much more when I once heard fay, that this day the exiled persons were to returne and be lodged here within an house of the citie. In great anguish therefore I am, and in a wonderfull agonie, for feare least we engage our selves within a world of calamities and miferies, without being able to execute any exploit of importance upon our enemies, unleffe it be to make a garboile, and fet all on a light fire: for I suppose that the citie when all is done, will be ours, but Cadinea the castle as it is already, will be for them. Then Theorites taking upon him to fpeake, and staying Charon who was about to reply somewhat against this Hipposthemdas: I interpret all this (quothhe) cleane contrary: for there is 40 not a figne that confirmeth memore in following of this enterprise (aithough I have had alwaies good prefages in the behalfe of the banished, in all the facrifices that I have offred) than this vision which you have rehearfed: if it be so as you say, that a great and light fire shone over all the citie, and the fame arising out of a friends house, and that the habitation of our enemies, and the place of their retreat was darkned and made blacke againe with the fmoke, which never brings with it any thing bettet than teares and troublefome confusion: and whereas from among us there arose inarticulate voices, (in case a man should construct it in evill part, and take exception thereat, in regard of the voice) the fame will be when our enterprife, which now isenfolded in obscure, doubtfull, and uncerteine suspicion, thall at once both appeere, and alfoprevaile: as for the ill fignes of the facrifices, they touch not the publike state, but those who 50 now are most powerfull and in greatest authoritie. As Theocritus thus was speaking yet still, I faid unto Hipposthemidas: And whom I pray you have you fent unto the men? for if he be not too farre onward on his way, we will fend after to overtake him. I am not able to fay of a trueth Caphistas, whether it be possible to reach him, (quoth Hipposthemelas) for he hath one of the best horses in all Thebes under him; and a man he is, whom yee all know very well, for he is the mafter of Melons chariots, and his chariot men, one unto whom Melon himselie from the very first discovered this plot, and made privie unto it. With that, I confidering and thinking Kkkkk 2 with my felfe what man he should speake of : It is not Chliden (quoth I)ô Hipposthemdas, he who no longer fince than the last yeere, wanne the prise in the horse running, at the solemne feast of Juno? The same is the man quoth he. Who then is he whom I have seene this long while stan. ding at the hall doore and looking full upon us? It is Chlidon himselfe I affure you quoth he. Now by Hercules I sweare, could any thing have hapned woorse? And with that, the man perceiving how we looked upon him, approched faire and fofuly from the dore unto us. Then Hippofthenidas beckned unto him, and nodded with his head, as willing him to speake unto us all, for that there was no danger because they were all honest men, and of our side. I know them all well enough quoth he, (Hipposthenidas) and not finding you at home nor in the market place. I gueffed by and by that you were gone toward them, and therefore I made as great hafte as I to could hither, to the end that you might not be ignorant of all things how they goe : For fo foone as you commanded me in all speed to meet with our banished citizens in the forest. I went prefently to my house for to take horse, & called unto my wife for my bridle, but she could not give it me; and to mend the matter, staied a great while in the chamber or store-house where fuch things use to be: now after the had made a feeking & puddering in every corner within the roome, & could not find it, at length when the had plaid long enough with me, & made a foole of me, the confessed & told me plainly, that the had lent it forth to one of our neighbors, whose wife the evening before came to borrow it of her : whereupon I was in a great chafe, and gave her fome curst words; but she like a shrew, paied me with as good as I lent her, and madeno more adoe, but curfed me in abominable tearmes, withing my forth going might be unhappie, 20 and my home comming worle: which execrations I pray god may all light upon her owne head. To be thort, the provoked me to farre, that in my choler I dealt her fome blowes for her threwd tongue: with that comes out a number of the neighbors and women especially, where after I had given and taken one for another with shame inough, at last with much adoe I got away from them and came hither to pray you for to fend fome other messenger to the partics you wor of: for I affure you at this prefent I am so much out of temper that I am not mine owne man, but in maner befide my felfe. This wrought in us all a mervellous alteration of our wils and affections: For whereas a little before wewere offended that our designments were croffed, and their comming impeached, now againe upon this fudden occurrence & the shortnes of time, which allowed us no leafure to put of, & to procraftinate the matter, we were driven 30 into an agony and fearefull perplexity. Howbeit fetting a good countenance upon the matter, fpeaking also cheerefully unto Hippojthenidas, and taking him frendly by the hand, I encouraged him, and gave him to understand, that the very gods themselves seconded our intentions and invited us to the execution of the enterprise. This done, Phyllidas went home to his house for to give order about his feast, and withall to draw on Archias to drinke wine liberally and to make mery : Chai on departed also to make ready his house for the intertainment of the banished men, against their returne. Meane while Theocritus and I went against to Simmias: to the end that finding some good occasion and opportunity for the purpose, we might talke with Epaminondas againe, who was well entred already into a prety question, which Galaxidorus and Phidolaw a little before had begun, demanding of what fubitance, nature and puiffance was the fa- 40 miliar spirit of Socrates, so much spoken of? Now what Simmias had alledged against Galaxido. rus upon this point, we hard not: mary thus much he faid, that when he demanded upon a time of Socrates himselfe concerning the faid matter, he never could get of him any answer, & therefore he never after would aske him the question, but he said, that oftentimes he had bene present when Socrates gave out that he reputed those men for vaine persons, who said they had seene with their cie any divine power, and so communed therewith: but contrariwise that he could hold better with those, who said they tooke knowledge of such a thing by hearing a voice, speaking unto one that gave attentive care thereto, or earnestly enquired thereof: whereupon he set our heads on worke when we were apart by our felves, and made us to gueffe and conjecture, that this damon of Socrates, was no vision, but a sense of some voice, and an intelligence of so words, which came unto him, by an extraordinary maner. Like as in our dreames, it is not a voice indeed that men heare lying fast asleepe, but the opinion of some words that they thinke they heare pronounced: but this intelligence of dreames commeth in truth, to men alleepe, by reason of the repose and tranquillity of the body: whereas they that be awake cannot heare, but very hardly, these divine advertisements, being troubled and disquieted with tumultuous passions, and the distraction of their affaires, by occasion whereof they cannot wholy yeeld their minde and thought to heare the revelations that the gods deliver unto them. Now Socrates having a pure and cleare understanding not tossed and turmoiled with any passions nor mingled with the body, unleffe it were very little, for things necessary and no more, was calle to be touched, and so subtile that soone it might be altered with whatsoever was objected and prefer. ted to it: now that which met with it, we may conjecture that it was not fimply a voice or found, but a very articulate speech of his damon, which without any audible voice touched the intellectuall part of his foule, together with the thing that it declared and revealed unto him. For the voice relembleth a blow or stroke given unto the foule, which by the eates is constrained to receive speech, when we speake one unto another: but the intelligence or understanding to of a divine and better nature, leadeth and conducteth a generous minde by a thing that canfeth itto understand without need of any other stroake : and the same minde or soule obeieth and veeldeth thereto accordingly, as it either flaketh loofe or stretcheth hard the instincts and inclinations, not violently by refiftance which the paffions make, but fupple and pliable, as flacke and gentle raines. And hereof we shall not need to make any wonder, considering that we see how little helmes turne about and winde the greatest hulks and caraques that be: and againe the wheeles that potters use, being never so little touched with the hand, turne very easily : for although they be inftruments without life, yet being as they are counterpeifed and framed even on every fide, by reason of their polithed smoothnesse, they are apt to stirre and yeeld unto the mooving cause with the least moment that is. Now the soule of man being bent and stretched 20 out fliffe with innumerable inclinations as it were with fo many cords, both more agility than all the ingins or instruments in the world, if a man hath the skill to manage and handle it with reafon, after it hath taken once a little motion, that it may bend to that which conceived it: for the beginnings of inflincts and paffions, tend all to this intelligent and conceiving part, which being stirred and shaken, it draweth, pulleth, stretcheth and haleth the whole man: Wherein we are given to understand, what force and power hath the thing that is entred into the conceit and intelligence of the minde. For bones are fenfeleffe, the finewes and flesh full of humors, and the whole maffe of all these parts together, heavie and ponderous, lying still without some motions: but fo foone as the foule putteth fomewhat into the understanding, and that the same moveth the inclinations thereto, it frarteth up and rifeth all at once, and being stretched in all 30 parts, runneth a maine, as if it had wings into action. And so the maner of this moving, direction, and promptitude, is not hard, and much leffe, impossible to comprehend: whereby the foule, hath no fooner understood any object, but it draweth presently with it, by instincts and inclinations, the whole maffe of the body. For like as reason conceived and comprised without any voice, moveth the understanding: even so in mine opinion, it is not such an hard matter, but that a more divine intelligence and a foule more excellent, should draw another inferior to it, touching it from without, like as one speech or reason may touch another, and as light, the reflection of light: For we in tructh, make our conceptions and cogitations known one to another, as if we touched them in the darke, by meanes of voice: but the intelligences of Dx. mons having their light, doe shine unto those who are capable thereof, standing in need 40 neither of nownes nor verbs which men use in speaking one to the other, by which markes they fee the images and refemblances of the conceptions and thoughts of the minde: but the very intelligences & cogitations indeed they know not, unleffe they be fuch as have a fingular and divine light, as we have already faid: and yet that which is performed by the ministery of the voice, doth in some fort helpe and satisfie those who otherwise are incredulous. For the aire being formed and stamped as it were by the impression of articulate sounds, and become throughout, all speech and voice, carieth a conception and intelligence into the minde of the heater: and therefore according to this fimilitude and reason, what marvell is it if that also which is conceived by these superior natures altereth the aire, and if the aire being by reason of that quallity which it hath, apt to receive impressions, signifieth unto excellent men and such as 50 have a rare and divine nature, the speech of him who hath conceived ought in is minde? For like as the ftroks that light upon targuits or sheelds of brasse, be heard a farre off, when they proceed from the bottome in the mids within, by reason of the resonance and rebound: whereas the blowes that fall upon other sheelds are drowned and dispersed, so as they be not heard at al: even fo the words or speeches of Dæmons and spirits, although they be carried and flie to the cates of all indifferently, yet they refound to those onely, who are of a settled and staied nature, and whose toules are at quiet, such as we call divine and celestiall men. Now the vulgar fort Kkkkk 3 have an opinion, that some Dæmon doth communicate a kinde of divinitie unto men in their fleepes: but they thinke it strange and a miracle incredible, if a man should say unto them, that the gods doe move and affect them semblably when the be awake, and have the full use of reafon : As if a man should thinke that a musician may play well upon his harpe or lute, when all the strings be flacked and let downe: but when the faid instruments be set in tune, and have their strings fet up, he cannot make any found, nor play well thereupon. For they consider not the cause which is within them, to wit, their discord, trouble and confusion, whereof our familiar friend Socrates was exempt, according as the oracle prophefied of him before, which during his infancie was given unto his father : for by it, commanded he was, to let him doe all that came into his minde, and in no wife either to force or divert him, but to fuffer the instinct and nature of the child to have the reines at large, by praying onely unto Jupiter Agoraus that is to fay e. loquent, and to the Mules for him: and farther than fo, not to bufie himfelfe nor to take care for Socrates, as if he had within him a guide and conductor of his life better than ten thouland mafters and padagogues. Thus you fee, Philolaus, what our opinion and judgement is as touching the Dæmon or familiar spirit of Socrates both living and dead, as who reject these voices, fneefings and all fuch fooleries. But what we have hard Timarchus of Charoneato dif. course of this point, I wot not well whether I were best to utter and relate the same, for search forme would thinke, that I loved to tell vaine tales. Not fo quoth Theoritim, but I pray you be for good as to rehearle the fame unto us: For albeit fables doe not very well expresse the trueth, vet in some fort they reach thereto. But first tell us, who this Timarchus was? For I neverknew the man. And that may well be ô Simmiss (quoth Theoritus) for he died when he was very yong, and requested carnelly of Socrates to be buried, nere unto Lamprocles Socrates his sonne who departed this life but few daies before, being a deere friend of his, and of the fame age, Now this yong gentleman, being very defirous (as he was of a generous disposition, and had newly tasted the sweetnesse of Philosophy) to know what was the nature and power of Socrates familiar spirit, when he had imparted his mind and purpose unto me only and Cebes, went downeinto the cave or vault of Trophonius, after the usuall facrifices and accustomed complements due to that oracle performed: where having remained two nights and one day, infomuch as many men were out of all hope that ever he would come forth againe, yea and his kinsfolke and frends bewailed the loffe of him, one morning betimes he iffued forth very glad and jocand : Andafter 30 he had given thanks unto the god and adored him, so soone as he was gotten through the presse of the multitude, who expected his returne, he recounted uuto us, many wonders strange tobe heard and scene: for he said, that being descended into the place of the oracle, he first met with much darknes, & afterwards when he had made his praiers, he lay a long time upon the ground, neither knew he for certaine whether he was awake, or dreamed all the while? Howbeit, he thought that he heard a noise which light upon his head, and finot it, whereby the sutures or feanes thereof were disjoined and opened, by which he yeelded forth his foule; which being thus separat, was very joious, seeing it selfe mingled with a transparent & pure aire. And this was the first time that it seemed to breathe at liberty, as if long time before untill then, it had beene drawen in and pent, for then it became greater and larger than ever before, in maner of a faile 40 fpred and displaied to the full. Then he supposed that he heard (though not cleerely and perfeetly) as it were a noise or found turning round about his head, and the same yeelding asweet and pleafant voice. And as he then looked behinde him he could fee the earth no more, but the Ifles all bright and illuminate with a mild and delicate fire, and those exchanged their places one with another, and withall, received fundry colours, as it were divers tinctures, according as in that variety of change the light did alter: and they all feemed unto him in number infinite, and in quantity exceffive: and albeit they were not of equal pourprise and extent, yet round they were all alike: alfo, to his thinking, by their motion which was circular, the skie refounded, because unto the uniforme equality of their mooving, the pleasant sweetnesse of the voice and harmonic composed and resulting of them all, was correspondent and conformable. 50 Amid these Islands there seemed a sea or great lake diffused and spred, shining with divers mixt colours, upon a ground of grey or light blew. Moreover, of these Isles some few failed as one would fay, and were caried a direct course downe the water beyond the current; but others, and those in number many, went aside out of the chanell, and were with such a violence drawen backe, that they feemed to be swallowed under the waves. Now this sea or lake, was (as hee thought) very deepe toward the South; but on the North fide full of shelves and shallow flats;

in many places it swelled and overflowed the land; in others it retired and gathered in, as much for it againe, and arose not to any high tides: as for the colour, in some place it was simple and fea-like; in another, not pure, but troubled and confused with mud, like unto a meere or lake. As concerning the force of the waves about these liles which are caried together, the same bringeth them backe a little, but never conjoineth the end to the beginning: fo as they make at no time a circle entire and perfect, but gently divert the application and meeting of their ends, fo as in their revolution they winde in and out, and make one crooked obliquity. To the mids of thefe, and toward the greatest part of the ambient aire, is enclined the sea, somewhat lesse than eight parts of the univerfall continent, as he thought. And the fame fea hath two mouthes or to entrances, whereby it receiveth two rivers of fire breaking into it, opposite one to the other, in fuch fort, as the blewneffe thereof became whitifh, by reason that the greatest part was repelled anddriven backe. And these things he said, that he beheld with much delight. But when he came to looke downward, he perceived a mighty huge hole or gulfe all round, in maner of an hollow globe cut thorow the mids, exceeding deepe and horrible to fee to, full of much darkeneffe, and the same not quiet and still, but turbulent and often times boiling and walming upward, out of which there might be heard innumerable roarings and gronings of beafts, cries and wrawlings of an infinite number of children, with fundry plaints and lamcintations of men andwomen together, befides many noifes, tumults, clamors and outcries of all forts, and those not cleere, but dull and dead, as being fent up from a great depth underneath, wherewith he was an notalittle terrified, untill fuch time as after a good while, there was one whom he faw not, who faid thus unto him, O Timarchus, What is your defire to know? Who made answere: Even all, for what is there here, not admirable? True, quoth he; but as for us, litle have we to do, & a fmall portion in those superiour regions, because they apperteine to other gods: but the division of Proferpina being one of the foure, and which we dispose and governe, you may see if you will, howitisbounded with Styx. And when he demanded againe of him, what Styx was : It is (quoth he) the way which leadeth unto hell and the kingdome of Plate, dividing two contrary natures of light and darkneffe with the head and top thereof; for as you fee, it beginneth from the bottome of hell beneath, which it toucheth with the one extremity, and reacheth with the other to the light all about, and so limiteth the utmost part of the whole world, divided into 30 four regiments. The first, is that of life; the second, of moving; the third, of generation; and the fourth, of corruption. The first, is coupled to the second, by unity, in that which is not vifible; the fecond, to the third, by the minde or intelligence, in the Sun; the third, to the fourth, by nature, in the Moone. And of every one of these copulations, there is a friend, or Destiny the daughter of Necessity, that keepeth the key. Of the first, she that is named Arropos, as one would fay, Inflexible; of the fecond, Clotho, that is to fay, the Spinfler; of the third in the Moon, Luchefis, that is to fay, Lot, about which is the bending of geniture or nativity. As for all the other Isles, they have gods within them; but the Moone apperteining to the terrestrial Damons, avoideth the confines of Styx, as being fomewhat higher exalted, approching once only in an hundred seventie seven second measures: and upon the approach of this precinct of Siyx, 40 the foules cry out for feare. And why ? hell catcheth and fwalloweth many of them, as they glide and flip about it: and others, the Moone receiveth and taketh up, twimming from beneath unto her; fuch I meane, as upon whom the end of generation fell in good and opportune time, all fave those which are impure and polluted: for them, with her searefull flashing and hideous roaring, the fuffereth not to come neere unto her; who feeing that they have miffed of their intent, bewaile their wofull state, and be caried downe againe as you see, to another generation and nativity. Why, quoth Timarchus, I fee nothing but a number of starres leaping up and downe about this huge and deepe gulfe, some drowned and swallowed up in it, others appearing againe from below. These be (quoth he) the daemons, that you see, though you know them not. And marke withall, how this comes about. Every foule is endued with a portion of minde or under-50 standing; and of man, there is not one void of reason: but looke how much thereof is mingled with flesh and with passions, being altered with pleasures and dolours, it becommets unreasonable. But every foule is not mixed after one fort, one as much as another; for fome are wholly plunged within the bodie, and being troubled and disquieted with passions, runne up and downe all their life time: others partly are mingled with the flesh, and in part leave out that which is most pure, and not drawen downward to the contagion of that grosse part, but remaineth swimming and floating as it were aloft, touching the top or crowne onely of mans head: (whereas the rest is depressed downward to the bottome, and drowned there) and is in maner of a cord hanging up aloft just over the soule which is directly and plumbe under, to upholde and raise it up, so fattee forth as it is obeisant thereto, and not overruled and swaied with passions and perturbations; for that which is plunged downe within the bodie, is called the soule; but that which is entire and uncorrupt, the vulgar fort callest the understanding, supposing it to be within them as in mirrours that which apppeareth by way of reslexion: but those that judge aright and according to the trueth, name it Damon, as being cleane without them.

These stars then which you see as if they were extinct and put out, imagine and take them to be the foules which are totally drowned within bodies : and fuch as feeme to thine out againe. and to returne lightfome from beneath, calling and shaking from them a certeine darke & fog. 10 gy milt, as if it were fome filth and ordure, effective the fame to be fuch foules, as after death are retired and escaped out of the bodies: but those which are mounted on high and move to and fro in one uniforme course throughout, are the Dæmons or spirits of men, who are said to have intelligence and understanding. Endevour now therefore and straine your selfe to see the connexion of each one, whereby it is linked and united to the foule. When I heard this, I began to take more heed, and might fee flarrs leaping and floting upon the water, some more, some leffe. like as we observe pieces of corke, shewing in the sea where fishers nets have beene cast : and fome of them turned in maner of spindles or bobins, as folke spin or twist therewith, yet drawing a troubled and unequall course and not able to direct and compose the motion straight. And the voice faid that those which held on a right course and order by motion, were they whose 20 foules were obeifant to the raines of reason, by the meanes of good nurture and civilleducation, and fuch as thewednot upon the earth their beaftly, groffe and favage brutishnesse: but they that eftfoones rife and fall up and downe unequally and diforderly, as ftruggeling to breake our of their bounds, are those which strive against the yoke, with their disobedient and rebellions maners, occasioned by want of good bringing up, one while getting the mailtry and bringing them about to the right hand, another while curbed by paffions and drawen away by vices, which notwithstanding they refist another time againe, and with great force strive to withstand. For that bond which in maner of a bridle-bit is put into the mouth as it were of the brutilh and unreasonable part of the soule, when it pulleth the same backe, bringeth that which they call repentance of fins, & the shame after unlawfull and prohibited pleasures, which is a griefe and re- 30 morfe of the foule restrained and brideled by that which governeth and commandethit, untill fuch time asbeing thus rebuked and chaftifed, it become obedient and tractable like unto a beaft made tame without beating or tormenting, as quickely and readily conceiving the fignes and markes which the Damon Theweth. Thefetherefore, at the last (long and late though it be) are ranged to the rule of reason. But of such as are obedient at the first, and presently from their very nativity hearken unto their proper Dæmon, are all the kind of prophets and divinors, who have the gift to foretell things to come, likewise holy and devout men: Of which number you have hard how the foule of Hermodorus the Clazomenian, was wont to abandon his body quite, and both by day and night to wander into many places: and afterwards to returne into it againe, having beene present the while to heare and see many things done and said a farreoff: 40 which it used so long, untill his enimies by the treachery of his wife, surprised his body one time when the foule was gone out of it, and burnt it in his house. Howbeit, this was not true: for his foule never departed out of his body: but the fame being alwaies obedient unto his Damon, and flacking the bond unto it, gave it meanes and liberty to run up and downe, and to walke to and fro in many places, in luch fort, as having feene and hard many things abroad, it would come and report the fame unto him: But those that confumed his body as he lay asleepe, are tormented in Tartarus even at this day for it: which you shall know your selfe, good yong man, more certainely within these three moneths (quoth that voice) and for this time see you depart. When this voice had made an end of speaking, Timarchus, as he told the tale himselfe, turned about to fee who it was that spake; but feeling a great paine againe in his head, as if it had 50 bene violently preffed and crushed, he was deprived of all sense and understanding, and neither knew himfelfe nor any thing about him: But within a while after when he was come unto himfelfe, he might fee how he lay along at the entry of the forefaid cave of Trophonius, like as he had himselfe at the beginning. And thus much concerning the fable of Timarchus: who being teturned to Athens, in the third moneth after, just as the voice foretold him, departed this life. And then we woondred heereat, and made report thereof backe to Socrates; who rebuked and chid us, for faying nothing to him of it, whiles Timarchus was alive; for that he would willingly himfelfe have heard him more particularly, and examined every point at the full. Thus you have heard, Theoritus, a mingled tale and hillorie together of Timarchus: But see whether we thall not be faine to call for this strangers helpe, to the decision of this question : for verie proper and meet it is for to be discussed by such devout and religious men. And why (quoth Theaner) doth not Epaminondas deliver his opinion thereof, being a mantrained up, and infliused in the same discipline and schoole with us. Then my father smiling at the matter: This is his nature (quoth he) my good friend, he loveth to be filent, and wary he is what he speaketh, but woonderfull defirous to learne, and infatiable of hearing others. And heereupon Spinchato rus the Tarentine, who converfed familiarly with him heere a long time, was woont to give out this speech of him; That he had never talked with a man, who knew more, and spake lesse thanhe. Buttell us now what you thinke your felfe, of that which hath beene faid. For mine owne part (quoth he) I faie, that this discourse and report of Timarchus, as sacred and inviolable, ought to be confecrated unto God: and marvell I would if any should discredit and hardly believe that which Simmias himfelfe hath delivered of him; and when they name fwans, dragons, dogs, and horfes, facred, believe not that there be men celeftiall and beloved of the gods, confidering they hold and fay, that God is never enterprise, that is to fay, a lover of birds, but ειλαθημπε, that is to fay, a lover of mankinde. Like as therefore a man who is faid to be Phylippos, that is to fay, a lover of horfes, taketh not a fancie, nor regardeth alike all horfes, compri-20 fed under the whole kinde, but chufing alwaies fome one more excellent than the reft, rideth, cherisheth, and maketh much of him especially: even so, those divine spirits which surmount our nature, make choise and take as it were out of the whole flocke the best of us, upon whom they fet their brand or marke, and them they thinke woorthy of a more fingular and exquifite education, and those they order and direct not with reines and bridles, but with reason and learning, and that by fignes, whereof the common and rafcall for thave no knowledge nor experience. For neither doe ordinary hounds understand the signes that huntimen use, nor every horse, the fiflling and chirting of the escuirry, but such onely as have beene taught and brought up to it; for they with the least whistling and houping that is, know presently what they are commanded to do, and quickly be ordered as they ought. And verily, Homer feemeth not to be 30 ignorant of this difference, whereof we speake: for of divinors and soothstiers, some he calleth inorenthes, that is to fay, authours, or observers of birds; others, πρείς, that is to fay, bowel-priers, that spie into the inwards of facrifices; and some againe there be, who hearing and knowing what the gods themselves do speake, are able to declare secretly and foretell things to come; as may appeare by these verses:

King Priams deere sonne Helenus, their minde soone under stood, And what this god and goddesse both in counsell deemed good.

Anda little after :

For thus I beard the gods to fay, Who as immortall live for ay.

For like as they who are without, and not of the domesticall and neere acquaintance of kings, princes and generall captaines, do know and understand their willes & minds by the meanes of certeine firelights, sound of trumpets and proclamations; but to their faithfull, trustly and familiar friends they speake by word of mouth: even so, God communeth and talketh with few, and that very seldome; but unto the common forthe giveth signes, and of these consistent he arte of divination: for the gods receive very sew men in recommendation for to adome their lives, but those onely whom they are disposed to make exceeding happy and divine indeed: and those souls which be delivered from farther generation, and are for everafter at libertie and dismissed such sinch be delivered from farther generation, and take the charge and care of men, according as stessard lith. For like as champions, who otherwise heretofore have made prosession of wrestling and other exercises of the bodie, after they have given over the practise thereos, by reason of their olde age, leave not altogether the desire of glorie by that meanes, nor cast off the affection in cherishing the bodie, but take pleasure still to see other yoong men to exercise their bodies, exhorting and encouraging them thereto, yea, and enforcing themselves to runne in the race with them: even so, they that are past the combats & travels of this life, and through the

the vertue of their foules come to be Dæmons, despise not utterly the affaires, the speeches and studies of those that be here, but being favorable unto them who in their good endevorsaspire to the fame end that they have atteined to, yea, and after a fort, banding and fiding with them. do incite and exhort them to vertue, especially when they see them neere unto the ends of their hopes, and ready in maner to touch the fame. For this divine power of Dæmons, will not fort and be acquainted with every man indifferently, but like as they who fland upon the shore, can do no other good unto them who fwim farre within the fea, and a great way from the land, but looke upon them and fay nothing; but to fuch as are neere to the fea fide, they runne, and for their fakes, wading a little into the fea, helpe both with hand and voice, and so fave them from drowning: even to (Simmias) dealeth the Dæmon with us; for fo long as wee are plunged to and drowned within mundane affaires, and change many bodies, as it were fo many waggons and chariots, passing out of one into another, it suffereth us to strive and labour of our selves, yea, and by our owne patience and long fufferance to fave our felves, and gaine the haven: but when there is a foule, which hath already by innumerable generations supported and endured long travels, and having in maner performed her course and revolution, strainethall her might and maine, with much swet to get forthand ascend up: to it God envieth not her owne proper Dæmon and familiar spiritto be affiltant, yea, and giveth leave to any other whatsoever, that is willing thereto. Now one is defirous and ready alwaies to helpe and fecond another, yea, and forward to promote the fafetie thereof: the foule alfo for her part, give the good care, because the is so nere, and in the end is saved; but she that obeieth not nor hearkeneth to her owne familiar 20 & proper damon as forfaken of it, speedeth not well in the end. This faid, Epaminondus looking toward me : It is high time, Capbifico, for you (quoth he) to go into the wrestling schoole and place of exercise, to the end that you disappoint not your companions: meane while, we (when it shall be thought good to diffolve and difinisse this meeting) will take the charge of Theanor, Then faid I, Be it fo : but I suppose, that Theoeritus, together with Galaxidorus & my selfe, is willing to commune and reason with you a little. In good time (quoth he) let them speake their minde and what they will. With that, he rose up and tooke us apart into a winding and turning corner of the gallery, where we came about him, and began to perfwade and deale with him for to take part with us in the enterprise. He made us answere, That he knew well enough the day when the banished persons were to returne; and had taken order with his friends to be ready a- 30 gainst the time with Gorgidan, and to embrace the opportunity thereof: howbeit, they were not determined to take away the life of any one citizen, not condemned by order of law, unlesse fome urgent necessitie enforced them thereto. And otherwise, it were very meet and expedient for the comminaltie of Thebes, that there should be some not culpable of this massacre, but innocent and cleare of all that then shall be committed; for so these men will be lesse suspected of the people, and be thought to counfell and exhort them for the best. We thought very well of this advice of his, and so he repaired againe to Simmias; and we went downe to the place of publicke exercises, where we met with our friends; and there we dealt one with another apart, as we wreftled together, questioning about one thing or another, and telling this or that, every one preparing himselfe to the execution of the dessigne : and there we might see Archias and Plis 40 lippus all anointed and oiled going toward the feast. For Phyllidas fearing that they would make haste and put Amphitheus to death, so soone as ever hee had accompanied Lysanoridas and fent him away, tooke Archias with him, feeding him with hope to enjoy the lady whom he defired, and promifing that the should be at the feast: whereby he perswaded him to mindeno other thing, but to folace himfelfe and make merry with those who were woont to roist and riot with him. By this time it drew toward night, the weather grew to be colde, and the winder ofe high, which caused every man with more speed to retire and take house. I for my part, meeting with D.moclidas, Pelopidas and Theopompus, enterteined them; and others did the like to the rest. For after that these banished persons were passed over the mountaine Cythara, they parted themselves; and the coldnesse of the weather gave them good occasion (without all suspition) 50 to cover their faces, and fo to paffe along the city undiscovered. And some of them there were, who as they entred the gates of the city, perceived it to lighten on their right hand without thunder, which they tooke for a good prefage of fafetic and glorie in their proceedings, as if this figne betokened, that the execution of their defignment should be lightform and honourable, but without any danger at all. Now when we were all entred in, and fafe within house, to the number of eight and fortie, as Theoritus was facrificing apart in a little oratorie or chappell by himselfe, he heard a great rapping and bouncing at the doore : and anon there was one came and brought him word, that two halberds of Archias guard knocked at the outward gate, as being fent in great hafte to Charon, commanding to open them the doore, as greatly offended that they had staied so long. Whereat Charon being troubled in minde, commanded that they thould be let in prefently: who meeting them within the court with a coronet upon his head, as having newly facrificed unto the gods, and made good cheere, demanded of thele halberds, what they would. Archias and Philippus (fay they) have fent us, willing and charging you with all foeed to repaire unto them. Why, what is the matter (quoth Charon) that they should fend for me in fuch haste at this time of the night, and what great newes is there? We know not, said thefe fergeauts; but what word would you have us to carry backe unto them? Mary, tell them (quoth he) that I will cast off my chaplet, and put on another robe, and prefently follow after: for if I should goe with you, it might be an occasion of trouble, and moove some to supcet that youlead me away to prison. You say wel, answered the officers againe, do even so; for we must goeanother way to those souldiers that watch and ward without the city, and deliver unto them acommandement from the head magistrates and rulers. Thus departed they. With that, Charon returned to us, and made relation of these newes; which strucke us into our dumps, and put usin a great affright, supposing for certeine, that we were betraied, and our plot detected most of the company suspected Hipposthenidas, for that he went about to impeach the returne of the exiled persons, by the meanes of Chlidon, whom he meant to send unto them : who seeing that 20 hemissed of his purpose, by all likelihood, upon a fearefull and timorous heart, might reveale our conspiracie, now when it was come to the very point of execution: for come hee was not with others into the house where we were all affembled; and to be short, there was not one of us all, that judged better of him than of a wicked and trecherous traitor: howbeit, we agreed all in this, that Charon should go thither as he was commanded, and in any wise obey the magistrates who had fent for him. Then he commanding (ô Archidamus) his owne fonne to be present, a stripling about sifteene yeeres of age, and the fairest youth in all the city of Thebes, very laborious and affectionate to bodily exercises; and for stature and strength, surpassing all his fellowes and companions of that age; made this speech unto us: My masters and friends, this is my sonne and onely 30 child, whom I love entirely, as you may well thinke; him I deliver into your hands, befeeching you in the name of the gods and all faints in heaven, that if you finde any perfidious treacherie by meagainst you, to doe him to death and not spare him. And now I humbly pray you, most valiant and hardy knights, prepare your felves resolutely against the last feast that ever these tyrants shall make: abandon not, for want of courage, your bodies to be villanously outraged and spoiled by these most leud and wicked persons, but be revenged of them, and now shew your invincible hearts, in the behalfe of your countrey. When Charon had delivered these words, there was not one of us all but highly commended his magnanimitie and loialtie; but we were angry with him, in that he doubted of us that we had him in fuspition and distrust; and therefore willed him to have away his fonne with him. And more than that, me thinks (quoth Pelopidas) you 40 have not done well and wifely for us, in that you fent him not before to some other house: for what reason or necessitie is there, that he should either perish or come into perisl, being sound with us ? and yes it is time enough to convey him away, that in case it fall out with us otherwise than well, he may grow up after his kinde, for to be revenged of these tyrants another day. It shall not be so, quoth Charon; he shall even stay here, and take such part of fortune as we shall do : and befides, it were no part of honesty or honour, to leave him in danger of our enemies: And therefore, my good fonne (quoth he) take a good heart and a refolute, even above these yeeres of thine; enter in Gods name into these hazzards and trials that be thus necessarie, together with many valiant and hardy citizens, for the maintenance of liberty and vertue. And even yet, great hope we have, that good fucceffe will follow, and that fome bleffed angell will regard 50 and take in protection those who adventure thus for righteousnesse and justice sake. Many of us there were (Archidamus) whose teares trickled downe their cheeks, to heare Charon deliver these words ; but himselse being instexible and not relenting one jote, with an undanted heart, a setled countenance, and eies still drie, put his sonne into Pelopidas hands, embraced every one of us, shooke us by the hands, and so encouraging us to proceed, went forth of the doores. Woonderfull was this; but much more you would have woondred, to have feene the alacrity, cheerefull and constant resolution of his sonne, as if he had beene another Neoprolemus, who never looked pale, nor changed colour for the matter, notwithflanding fo great danger prefented; neither was he one jote aftond: but contratiwife, drew forth Pelopidas fword out of his feabberd, to fee and trie whether it was keene enough.

Whiles these matters thus passed, there comes towards us Diotonus, one of Cephisodorus friends, with a fword by his fide, and a good cuirason of steele under his robe, who having heard that Charon was fent for to come to Archias, blamed much our long delay, & whetned us on to go forthwith to the tyrants houses: For in so doing (quoth he) we shall prevent them, by comming fuddenly upon them: if not, yet better were it for us, to fet upon them without dores, feparate one from another, and not all in one plumpe, than to stay for them, enclosed all within one parlour, and be there taken by our enemies, like a fwarme of bees, and have all our throats to cut. In like maner Theoritus the divinor, urged us to make hafte, faying, that all the fignes of facrifices were good, and prefaged happy fucceffe with all fecurity. Whereupon we began on all hands to take armes, and to prepare our felves: by which time, Charon was returned to us, with a merrie and cheerefull countenance: who fmiling and looking upon us: Be of good chere (quoth he) my masters and friends, all is well: there is no danger, and our affaire proceedethwell: for Archias and Philippus, so soone as they heard that I was come, upon their sending for me, being already well cup-fhotten, and halfe drunke with wine, fo as both their minds and bodies were very farre out of tune; with much adoe they rose from the boord, and came foorth to the dore unto me: Now Charon, quoth Archias, we heare that our banished men lie lurking here within the citie, being fecretly and by flealth entred into it. Whereat I feeming to 20 be much amazed: Where (quoth I) are they faid to be, and who? That we know not (quoth Archias, and that is the cause why we sent for you, to come before us, if haply you have heatdany thing of it more certainly. He ercupon I remaining for a while as one fomewhat aftonied and pensive, comming againe to my selfe, began thus to thinke, that this must needs be some headlesse rumour, and arising from no good ground, nor certeine author; neither was it like to be any one of them that were privy to the complot who had discovered it, because they would not then have been eignorant of the house where they were affembled, and therefore it could not chuse but be some blinde brute blowen abroad through the citie, and come to their eares. So I faid unto him, that during the life of Androclides, we had heard many fuch flying tales, and vaine falle rumors that ranne about the city and troubled us. But now (quoth he) ô Mr-30 chas, I have heard no fuch thing: howbeit, if it please you to command me, I will enquire and hearken farther into the thing, and if I find any matter of importance, I will come and enforme you of it. It is well faid of you (quoth Phyllidas: and it were very good Charon, that in these cases you be very inquisitive, and leave nothing unsearched: for why should we be carelesse and negligent in anything, but rather it behooveth us to be circumfpect, and to looke about us on every fide: providence in these cases is very requisite, and good it is to make all fure: and when he had so faid, he tooke Archias and had him into the parlour, where they be now drinking hard: and therefore my good friends, let us flay no longer; but after we have made our praiers unto the gods, for our good speed, go about our businesse. Charon had no sooner said this, but we praied unto the gods for their affiltance, and encouraged one another to the enter- 40 prife. It was the very just time, when all men use to be at supper; and the whistling winde arising stil more & more, had brought some snow or sleet, mingled with a drisling raine, so as there was not one person to be seene in the streets as we passed along. Those therefore who were appointed to affaile Leontidas and Hippates, who dwelt necre together, went out in their cloakes, having no other armes or weapons, but ech of them their fwords, and those were Pelopidas, Democlidas, and Cephisodorus: But Charon, Melon, and others, ordeined to set upon Archin, had their brestplates or demy-cuiraces before them, and upon their heads thicke chaplets, some of firre, others of the pine or pitch tree branches: and part of them were clad in womens apparell, counterfeir ting drunken persons, as if they were come in a maske and mummerie with their women. And that which more is, ô Archidamus, fortune also making the beastly cowardise and soutish igno- 50 rance of our enemies equall to our hardinesse, and resolute preparations, and having diversified and diffinguished even from the beginning our enterprise, like a plaie or enterlude, with many dangerous intercurrents, was affiftant & ran with us, at the very point and upfhot of the execution thereof, presenting unto us, even then a doubtfull & dangerous occurrent, of a most sudden & unexpected accident: for when Charen after he had talked with Archias & Philippus, was returned to the house, and had disposed us in order, for to go in hand with the execution of our deffignment 3 there was brought from hence a letter written by Archias the high priest heere among you, unto that Archias his old hoaft and friend, which declared unto him (as it should feeme) by all likelihood, the returne of the banished, and the furprise which they were about. the house also wherein they were affembled, and all the complices who were of the conspiracy. Archias being by this time drenched and drowned in wine, and befides that, transported and past himselfe, with the expectation of the women, whose comming he attended, albeit the meslenger that brought the letter, faid it contained ferious affaires, of great confequence, yet he onely received it, and made no other answer but this: What tellest thou me of serious affaires; we shall thinke of them to morrow; and with that, put the letters under the pillow, whereon he 10 leaned, calling for the pot againe, and commanding that it should be filled; fending Phyllidas ever and anon to the dore, to fee if the women were yet comming. Thus whiles this hope enterteined and held the feast, we came upon them, and paffed along through the servicours unto to the very half or parlour, where they were at support, and there we staiced a while at the dore, eving and viewing every one of them as they fat about the table. Now the fight of those chaplets and garlands which we ware upon our heads, and of the womens apparell, which fome of us were dreffed in, deceived them a little upon our first comming, in such fort, as for a while there enfued filence, untill fuch time as Melon first laying hand upon his sword hilt, rushed into the middes of the place: with that, Cabirichus Cyamistos who was Archon for the time, tooke him by the arme as he passed by, and held him backe, crying out withall: Phyllidas, Is not this 20 Melon? but Melon thaking him off fo, as he left his hold, drew foorth his fword withall, and ranne upon Archias, who being hardly able to rife, he gave not over untill he had killed outright in the place. Charen then fet upon Philippus, whom he wounded in the necke, and notwithstanding that he defended himselfe with the pots that stood about him upon the table, yet Lysithern mounting upon the boord, laied him along on the floore, and there under-foot dispatched him. As for Cabirichan we spake him faire, and entreated him not to take part with the tyrants, but to joine with us, in delivering our native countrey from tyranny, as he was a facrofaint magistrate, and confecrated unto the gods for the good and fafetie of the commonwealth. But being not eafily induced to hearken unto reason, and that which was most expedientfor him, because he was little better than halfedrunke; he hanging still in doubtfull su-30 spence and perplexitie, arose up on his feet, and presented unto us his javelin, with the head forward, which by the custome of the place, the Provosts with us, ever goe withall: whereupon I caught hold of the javelin in the middes, and held it over my head, crying unto him, to let it goe, and fave himselse; or else he should die for it. In this meane while, Theopompus standing on his right fide, ranne him through with his fword, faying withall: There lie thou also together with them whom thou hast flattered and soothed up: for it were not beseeming thee to weare a coroner and garland when Thebes is fet free, nor to offer any more facrifice to the gods, before whom thou hast cursed thy countrey, by making praiers so often for the prosperity of her enemies. When Cabirichus was fallen downe dead, Theocritus who stood by, caught up the facred javelin, and drew it out of the bloud that there was shed. This massacre being done, 40 some sew of the servants, who durst interpose themselves, and come betweene for the desence of those usurpers, we slew; but as many as were quiet, and stirred not, we thut up within a chamber, where men are wont to keepe; being not willing that they should get foorth, and goe to publish throughout the city what was done, before we knew how the world went with others.

Thus you heare how this chare was done. As for Pelopulus and his traine, they came to the utmost gate of Leonidus, where they knocked as softly, as they thither came gently and with silence, and to one of the servants who heard them knocke, & demanded who was there, they answered, That they were come from Athens, and brought letters unto Leonidus from Calistratus. The servitour went and told his master for much, who being commanded to set open the gate, who are dain unbolted it; the gate no sooner yeelded from them a little, but they rushed in all at once with violence, bare downe the man and laid him along, ran a pace through the court and hall and so directly passed to the bed chamber of Leontidus: who presently suspecting what the matter was, drew his dagger, & put himselfe forward to make resistance & to stand upon his defence, unjust he was no doubt & tyrannicall, howbeit otherwise a tall man of his hands, and of touragious stomacke: yet forgat he to overthrow the lampe, & put out the light, and in the darke to intermingle himselfe with those who came to assault him, and so haply to get a way from them; but being espied by them, so soone as ever the doore was open, he stabbed Cephisodorus in the very flanke under the short ribs : and then incountring with Pelopidas who would have entred fecond into the chamber, he cried out aloud and called to his fervants for helpe: but Sams. das with others about him kept them backe, and otherwise of themselves they durst not meddle nor hazard their lives to deale with the nobleft persons of the city, and those who for strength and valour were knowen to surpasse the rest. So there was a scussing and stife combat between Pelopidas and Leontidas, in the very portall of the chamber dore, which was but narrow, where Cephisodorus fell downe in the midit betweene them ready to die, so that others could not come in to fuccor Pelopidas : Arthe last when our friend Pelopidas had received a little wound in his head, but given Leonidas many a one, he overthrew him and flew him upon the body of Cophifodor w, who being yet warme and not fully dead, saw his enimy fall, and therewith putting forth 10 his right hand to Pelopidas, and bidding all the rest adew, he joifully yeelded up his breath. When they had dispatched this businesse, they turned immediately from thence to Hypates house, and when the doore was likewife fet open for them, the killed him also, as he thought to escape, and fled by the roose of the house unto his neighbours. Which done, they returned with speed directly unto us, whom they found abroad at a gallery called Polystylon. Afterwe had faluted and embraced one another & talked a litle all together, we went straight to the common goale; where Phyllidas having called forth the goaler: Archias (quoth he) and Philippus command you with all speed to bring your prisoner Amphithem unto them. The goaler considering that it was an unreasonable houre, and withall perceiving that Phyllidas in his speeches was not very well staied, but that he was yet chased and panted still unquietly upon the freshfray 20 that he had beene at, doubting and suspecting a skirmish: When was it ever seene (quoth he) ô Phyllidas, that the Polemarchy or chiefe captaines fent for a prisoner at this time of the night? when by your and what token or watchword bring you from them? As the goaler reasoned thus, Phyllidas made no more adoe, but with an horsemans staffe or launce that he had in his hand, ranne him through the fides, and laied him dead on the ground, wicked wretch that he was, whom the next morrow, many a woman trampled under their feet, and spit in his face as he lay. Then brake we the prison dore open, and first called by name unto Amphichew, and afterwards to others, according a seach of them was of our acquaintance and familiarity; who hearing and knowing out voices leapt out of their pallets upon their feete, and willingly drew their chaines and ironsafter them: but fuch as had their feet fast in the stockes, stretched forththeir 30 hands and cried unto us, befeeching they might not be left behinde: and whiles we were buffein fetting them loofe, many of the neighbours by this time who dwelt neere and perceived what was done, were run forth already into the streets with glad and joifuil hearts. The very women alfo, as any of them heard ought of their acquaintance, without regard of observing the custome and maner of the Bocotians, ran out of dores on cunto another, and demanded of every one whom they met in the street, what newes? And as many of them as light either upo their fathers or husbands, followed them as they went, and no man impeached them in fo doing: for the pitifull commisferation, the teares, praiers, and supplications, especially of honest and chast wives, were in this case very effectuall, and moved men to regard them. When things were brought to this passe, so some as we heard, that Epamnondas and Gorgidas with other friends, were now 40 affembled within the temple of Minerva, we went directly unto them, and thithet repaired also many honest citizens and men of quality, flocking still more and more in great frequencie. Now after relation was made unto them how al things sped, & that they were requested to assist us in the performance and execution of that which was behind, and for that purpofe to meet all together in the common market place, incontinently they fet up a shout, and cried unto the citizens, Liberty, liberty, distributing armes and weapons among as many as came to joine with them: which they tooke forth of the temples and halles, being full of the spoiles of al forts, won from enimies in times past, as also out of the armorers, furbushers, and cutters shops there adjoining. Thither came Hippoft benidas likewife with a troupe of friends and fervants, bringing those trumpetters with him, who were by chaunce come to the city against the feast of Hereules: and 50 immediatly fome founded the alarm in the market place, and others in all parts of the city befides, and all to aftonith and affright those of the adverse part, as if the whole city were revolted, and had rifen against them : who making a great smoake, for the nonce in the streets, because they would not be descried, put themselves within the castle Cadmea, drawing with them those choife foldiers called Keerflores, that is to fay, the better, who were wont usually to ward all night and keepe a standing corps de guard about the said castle. Now those who were above in the faid fort, feeing their owne captaine to run fo disorderly and in great affright, and to make hall to get in, perceiving also from above, how we were gathered together about the market place in armes; and no part of the city quiet, but full of tumult, uprores and garboiles, whereof the noise ascended up unto them, durst not adventure to come downe, though they were to the number of five thouland, as fearing the prefent danger: but pretended for their excuse the absence of Lylanoridats their captaine, who was ever wont to remaine with them, but onely that day, which was the cause that afterwards as we have heard, the Lacedæmonians making meanes by a peece ofmoney, to apprehend him in Corinth, whether he was retired, and immediately put him to death: but upon composition and safe conduct, they delivered up the castle into our hands, and to departed with all the foldiers in it.

THE MALICE OF HERODOTUS.

Lutarch confidering in what credit and request Herodotus the Historiographer was, who in many places of his bookes, which are at this day extant in our bands, defameth divers states and honorable persons of Greece, is minded heere in this treatise to arme as it were and prepare the readers against all such false suggestions and imputations: and in the very entry of his discourse, accuse the Herodotus of malice and leafing. For proofe of this challenge he setteth downe certaine markes , whereby a man may discerne a 30 flanderous writer from a sage and descreet Historiographer. Which done, he applieth the said markes unto Herodotus, shewing by a number of examples drawen out of his stories and narrations, that often times he useth odious words, when as other smore milde and gentlewere as ready for him to use: that he describeth an evill matter, when as there was no need to make mention thereof: that he taketh pleafure to speake ill & to raile: that among praises, he insertet the bitter blames of one and the same per-Sonage: and in recounting one thing two maner of waies and more, he resteth alwaies in the worse, and imputeshworthy deeds and brave exploits unto disordinate and irregular passions, and so after an oblique maner doth the persons injury. So that this treatise teacheth as well the writers of histories, to lookewell about themselves, and stand upon their quard, lest they be esteemed, slanderous, socisfs and impudent: as allothereaders to carry with them a pure and sincere judgement for to make their profit 40 by those bookes, which they take in hand to read.

THE MALICE of Herodotus

Any men there be, ô Alexander, whom the stile &phrase of Herodorm the Historiographer (because it seemeth unto them plaine, fimple, naturall, and running fmoothly upon the matters which he delivereth) hath much deceived : but more there are, who have bene caught and brought into the fame errour, by his maners and behaviour. For it is not onely extreame injustice, as Plato said, to seeme just and righteous, when a man is nothing leffe, but also an act of malice in the highest degree, to counterfait mildenesse and simplicity, and under that pretence and colour, to be covertly most bitter and malicious. Now for that he sheweth this spight of his against the Boeotians and Corinthians especially, although he spareth not any others whatsoever, I thought it my part and LIIII 2 duty doe defend hecrein the honor of our ancesters in the behalfe of trueth, against this onely part of his writings, and no more. For to pursue and goe thorow all other lies and forged tales of his, dispersed in that historie, would require many great volumes. But as Sephoeles said:

Of eloquence the flattering face, especially when it meeteth with a tongue which is pleasant, and carieth such a force, asto cover among other vices, the malicious nature of an Historiographer. Philip king of Macedonie was woont to say unto those Greeks who revolted from his alliance, and sided with Titus Quintum, that they had changed their former chaines, and given them for others, that were indeed more polished; howbert longer a faire deale. Even so a man may say, that the malignitie of Hero to dotus is smoother and more delicate than that of Theopompus, but it toucheth necere to the quicke, and stingeth more; like as the windes are more sharpe and piercing, which blow through a narrow streight or close glade, than such as are spred more at large. I thinke therefore that I shall doe very well, sirst to describe generally, and as it were in grosse, the tracks and marks as it were of a narration which is not pure, sincere, and friendly, but spightfull and malicious, for to apply the same afterwards to ech point that we shall examine, and see whether they doe agree fitly thereto.

First and formost therefore, he that useth the most odious nownes and verbs, when there be others at hand more milde and gentle, for to expresse things done: as for example; whereas he might say, that Alies was very ceremonious, and somewhat supersticiously given; reported to that he was fanaticall; and chuseth rather to chalenge Cleon for rash audacitie, and furious madnesse, than for light and vaine speech: surely he cariethnot a good and gentle minde, but taketh pleasure to make a narration in the woorst maner.

Secondly, when there is some vice otherwise in a man, which apperteineth not unto the history, and yet the writer catcheth hold thereof, and will needs thrust it into the narration of those affaires which require it not, drawing his historic from the matter, setching a compasse about, after an extravagant maner, and all to bring in either the infortunitie or unhappy accident, or else some absurd and shamefull act of a man: it is very evident that such an one delighteth in reprochfull and evill language. And therefore contrariwise, Thucydides, howsover cleon committed an infinite number of grosse and foule faults, yet he never traduced him openly 30 for them in his writings. And as touching the busic oratour Hyperbolus, he glanced a him onely by the way, terming him a naughtie man, and so let him goe. Phisse likewise passed over all the outrages and wrongs (many though they were) of Dianysius the tyrant, which he offered unto the barbarous nations, so long as they were not interlaced among the affaires of the Greeks. For the digressions & excursions of an history, are allowed, principally for some sables or antiquities. Moreover, he who amog the praises of some great personages, thrusteth in some matter tending to reproch & blame, seemeth to incurre the malediction of the tragical Poet,

Curfed be thou, that low'ft a roll to have,

Of mens mishaps, who now lie dead in grave.

Furthermore, that which is equipollent and reciprocall thereto, every man knoweth, that the 40 leaving out and passing over quite of some good qualitie, or laudable sack, seemeth not to be a thing reprehensible and subject to account, though done it were maliciously, and the same were left out in some such place as perteined well to the traine of the historie: for to commend a man coldly and after an unwilling maner, savoreth no more of civilitie, than to blame him affectionately; and besides that, it is nothing more civill, it smelleth haply more of malice, and of the twaine is woorse.

The fourth figue of a malicious nature in an historian, in my account is this: when one and the fame thing is interpreted or reported two waies, or more, to encline unto the harder conftruction. For permitted it is unto Sophisters and Rhetoricians, either for to gainetheir fee, or to winne the name and reputation of eloquence, otherwhiles to take in hand for to defend 50 and adorne the woorfe cause; because they imprint not deepely any credit or beliefe of that which they deliver: and they themselves doe not deny, that they undertake to proove things incredible, even against the common opinion of men. But he that composeth an historie, doeth his part and devoir, if he written that which he knoweth to be true: but of matters doubtfull, obscure, and uncerteine, those which are better seeme to be reported more truely alwaies, than the worse. And many there be, who omit quite and overpasse the worse: as for example;

Ephorus having faid as touching Themistocles, that he was privy to the treason that Paulamise plotted and practifed, and what he treated with the lieutenants of the king of Persia: Howbeit, he confented not (quoth he) nor never could be induced to take part with him of those hopes, whereto he did follicite him. And Thucydides left this matter wholly out of his storie, as not acknowledging it to be true. Againe, in matters confessed to have beene done, but yet not knowen, for what cause, and upon what intention; he that guesseth and casteth his conjecture in the woorfe part, is naught and maliciously minded: and thus did the comicall Poets, who gave out, that Perisles kindled the Peloponnelian warre, for the love the of courtifan Albalia, or elle for Phidias fake, and not rather upon an high minde and contention to take downe the to pride of the Peloponnefians, & in no wife to give place unto the Lacedemonians. For of arts approoved and laudable affaires, he that supposeth and setteth downe a leud and naughty cause, and by calumniations draweth men into extravagant suspicions, of the hidden and secret intention of him who performed the act, which he is not able to reproove or blame openly : as they who report of Alexander the tyrants death, which dame Thebe his wife contrived, that it was not a deed of magnanimity, nor upon the hatted of wickednesse and vice, but proceeding from the paffionate jealoufie of a woman: as also those who say; that Cato uticensis killed himselfe. fearing left Cafir would execute him shamefully: these (Isay) are envious and spightfull in the highest degree. Semblably, an historical narration smelleth of malice, according as the maner of a worke or act done is related: as if it be put downe in writing, that it was by the 20 meanes rather of money and corruption, than of vertue & valour, that fome great exploit was performed, (as some there were who did not sticke to say as much of Philip:) or else, that it was executed without any travel and danger, as others gave out of Alexander the Great: also not by forecast and wisedome, but by the favour of fortune; like as the enviour and ill willer of Timothem, who in painted tables represented the pourtrature of diverscities and townes, that of themselves fell within the compasse of his net and toile, when he lay fast asseepe : evident it is, that it is that it tendeth to the empairing of the glorie, beautie, and greatneffe of those acts, when they take from them the magnanimity, vertue, and diligence of the authors, and give out they were not done and executed by themselves. Over and besides, those who professedly and directly speake evill of one, incurre the imputation of quarrellers, rash-headed and furious 20 persons, in case they keepe not within a meane: but such as doe it after an oblique maner, as if they discharged bullets, or shot arrowes at one side from some blinde corner, charging surmiles and fulpicions; and then to turne behinde and shift off all, by faying, they doe not bekeve any fuch thing, which they defire most of all to be believed, how soever they disclame all malice and evill will: over and befides their cancred nature, they are steined with the note of notorious impudencie. Next neighbours unto these, are they, who among imputations and blames, adjoine certaine praises: as in the time of Socrates, one Aristoxenus having given him thetermes of ignorant, untaught, diffolute; came in with this afterwards: but true it is that he doeth no man wrong, and is woorst to himselfe: for like as they, who will cunningly and artisicially flatter otherwhiles, among many and unmeasurable praises, mingle some light repre-40 hentions, joining with their fweet flatteries, (as it were fome tart fauce to feafon them) certeine words frankly and freely spoken : even so the malicious person, because he would have that beleeved which heblameth, putteth thereto some little sprinkling of a sew praises. There may be exemplified and numbered many other fignes and marks of malice: but these may suffice to give us to understand the nature and intention of this author whom now we have in hand.

First and formost therefore to begin at heavenly wights, and as they say at Vesta, so the daughter of Inachus, whom all the Greeks thinke to have bene destined and honored with divine honors by the barbarous nations, in such fortas that she hath lest her name to manie seas, and noble ports, in regard of her great glory and renowme; and opened the source (as it were) and original beginning of many right noble, most famous and roiall samilies; this our gentle Historiograph of the state of the sta

it is very apparent quoth he, that these women if they had not bene willing themselves, they had never bene foravithed, and had away as they were. And therefore we may as well fay that the gods did foolishly to shew themselves angry and offended, with the Laced emonians for the abuling of the daughters of Scedafie the Leuctrian; as alfo to punish Ajax, for that he forced lady Coffandra: for cetteine it is according to Herodotus, that if they had not bene willing, they had never beene defloured: and yet himselse faith that Arishmenes was taken alive, and eatted a. way by the Lacedemonians, and afterwards Phlopamer captaine generall of the Achaenstalled the same fortune, and Aritim Regular the confull of the Romans, tell likewife into the hands of his enimies : all of them such personages ashardly may be found more valiant and hardy warriors in the world. But what marvell is this, confidering that men doe take leopards, and tygres alive? Now Herodorm blameth the poore women, who were by force abused, and defendeth 10 those wicked men who offered them that abuse. Besides, to much affected he is in love unto the Barbarous nations, that he will acquite & cleere Businides of that ill name which went of him, for flaying of his guests & facrificing men, and attributing unto all the Aegyptians by all his softimonies, much godlineste, religion and justice, returneth upon the Greeks this inhumaine and abhominable cruelty. For in his second booke he writeth that Menelaus having received Helena at the hands of king Proteus his wife, and bene by him honored with great and rich prefents, shewed himselfe againe a most unjust and wicked man. For when the winde and weather served him not for to embarke and faile away, he wrought by his report, a most curfed and detretable fact, in taking two of the inhabitants male children of that countrey, and cut them in peeces for facrifice: by occasion whereof being hated of the Aegyptians, and purfued, he fled directly with his fleet, and departed into Libya. For mine owne part, I wot not what Aegyptian hath given out this report of Menelans : but contratiwise I know full well, that in Accept they retaine still to this day many honors in the memoriall, both of him and also of his wife Helens. Moreover this writer holding on still his course, reporteth that the Persians learned of the Greeks, to abuse boies carnally and contrary to kinde. And yet how is it possible that the Persians should learne this vilany and filthineffe of the Greeks, confidering that the Perfians in maner all doe confelle, that the children were there guelded, before they had ever seene the Greeks sea. Also he writeth, that the Greeks were taught by the Aegyptians, their folemne pompes, festivall processing ons, and publicke affemblies: likewife to adore the twelve gods: yea & that Melampu had learneid of the fame Aegyptians the very name of Dionyfus, that is to fay, Bacchus, who taughtit the 30 other Greeks. As touching the facred mysteries, and secret ceremonies of Ceres, that they were brought out of Aegypt by the daughters of Danaus: as also that the Aegyptians beat themfelves and are in great forrow, yet will themselves name nothing why they so doe, but remaine close and keepe tilence in the religious service of the gods. As touching Hercules and Bacchun whom the Aegyptians effecme as gods, and the Greeks very aged men, he maketh mention in no place of this precise observation and distinction: howsoever he faith that this Acgyptian Hercules, was reckoned and ranged in the second order of the gods, and Bacchus in the third, as those who had a beginning of their essence, and were not eternall : and yet he pronounceth those other to be gods, but unto these, he judgeth that we ought to performe anniversarie sune rals, as having been elometime mortall, and now canonized demi-gods, but in no wife to facti-40 fice unto them as gods. After the same maner spake he of Pan, overthrowing the most holy and venerable factifices of the Greeks by the vanities and fables which the Aegyptians devised. Yet is northis the woorst, nor so intollerable; for deriving the pedegree of Hercules from the race of Perfess, he holdeth, that Perfess was an Affyrian, according to that which the Persians fay: But the captaines and leaders of the Dorians (faith he) feeme to be descended in right line from the Aegyptians, and fetch their genealogie and ancestours from before Danae and Actifius : for as concerning Epaphus, Io, Iajus and Argus, he hath wholly passed over and rejected, ftriving to make, not oncely the other two Herenlees Aegyptians and Phoenicians, but also this whom himselse nameth to be the third, a meere stranger from Greece, and to enroll him among 50 Barbarians, notwithstanding that of all the ancient learned men, neither Homer, not Hesiodus, ne yet Archilochus, Pifander, Stefichorus, Aleman, nor Pindarus, do make mention of any Hereules an Aegyptian or Phoenician, but acknowledge one alone, towit, our Boeotian and Argien. And that which more is, among the seven sages, whom he termeth by the name of Sophillers, he will needs beare us downe, that Thales was a Phoenician borne, extracted from the ancient stocke of the Barbarians. And in one place, reproching in some fort the gods, under the vi-

fard and person of Selon, he hath thesewords: O Crafus, thou demandest of me as touching humane things, who know full well, that the deitie is envious and full of inconstant incertitude: where attributing unto Solon, that opinion which himselfe had of the gods, he joineth malice unto impiety and blafphemy. And as for Pitrachine, using him but in light matters, and such as are of no confequence, he paffeth over in the meane while, the most worthy and excellent deed that ever the mandid a for when the Athenians and Mitylenians were at warre about the port Sig aums; P brynon the captaine of the Athenians having given defiance, and challenged to combat hand to hand; the hardiest warriour of all the Mitylenians, Pitrachus advanced forward and presented himselfe to his face for so performe his devoir, where he bare himselfe with such dexto terityy that he caught this captaine, as mighty a man as he was and tall of feature, and fo entangled him; that he flew him outright. And when the Mitylenians, for this proweffe of his, offered unto him goodly tich presents, he launced his javelin out of his hand as farre as over he could, and demanded formuch ground onely as he raught with that shot. And thereupon, that field, even at this day, is called Pittacium. But what writeth Herodotus, when he comes to this place? In lieu of reciting this valiant act of Pittachus, he recounteth the flight of Aleaus the Poet, who flung from him his armour and weapons, and for an away out of the battell: whereby it appeareth, that in avoiding to write of vertuous and valiant acts, but in not concealing vicious and foule facts, he teltifieth on their fide who fay, that envie, to wit, a griefe for the good of another, and joy in other mens harmes, proceed both from one root of malice.

After all this, the Alemeonidæ who shewed themselves brave men and generous; and namely, by delivering their countrey from tyranny, are by him challenged for treason: for he faith, That they received Pifistratus upon his banishment, and wrought meanes for his returne again, upon condition, that he should espouse and marry the daughter of Megaeles: and when the maiden faid thus unto her mother, See my good mother, Pififtratus doth not company kindly withme, as he should, and according to the law of nature and marriage; heereupon the said Alemaonidae tooke fuch indignation against the tyrant for his perverte dealing, that they chafed him into exile. Now, that the Lacedæmonians should taste aswell of his malice as the Athenians had done before them, fee how he defaceth and traduceth Othryadas, a man esteemed and admired among them above all others, for his valiance: He only (faith he) remaining alive 30 of those three hundred, ashamed to returne to Sparta, when all the rest of that company and confort of his were flaine and left dead in the field, prefently overwhelmed himfelfe in the place under an heape of his enemies shields reared for a Tropha, and so died: for a little before, he faid, that the victory betweene both fides refted doubtfull in even ballance; and now he witneffeth, that through the shame and bashfuinesse of Othryadas, the Lacedæmonians lost the day: for as it is a shame to live being vanquished, so it is as great an honor to survive upon a victorie. I forbeare now to note and observe, how in describing Crasus every where for a foolish, vainglorious and ridiculous person in all respects, yet neverthelesse he faith, that being prisoner he taught and instructed Cyru, a prince who in prudence, vertue and magnanimitie surpassed all the kings that ever were. And having by the testimonie of his owne historie, attributed no 40 goodnesse unto Crassus, but this onely, that he honoured the gods with great offerings, oblations and ornaments, that he prefented unto them; which very fame (as himfelfe declareth) was the most wicked and profancit act in the world: for whereas his brother Pantaleon and he were at great variance and debate, about succession in the kingdome during the life of their father; after that he came once to the crowne, he caught one of the nobles, a great friend and companion of his brother Pantaleon, who had before-time beene his adverfarie, and within a fullers mill all to beclawed and mangled him with tuckers cards and burling combs, so as he died therewith; and of his money which he did confiscate and feize upon, he caused those oblations and jewels to be made which he fent as a prefent to the gods. Concerning Deioces the Median, who by his vertue and justice atteined to the kingdome, he faith, that he was not such an one indeed, but 50 anhypocrite, and by femblance of justice was advanced to that regall dignitie. But what should Istand upon the examples of Barbarous nations; for he hath ministred matter enough in writing onely of the Greeks. He faith, that the Athenians and many other Ionians, being ashamed of that name, were not only unwilling, but also denied utterly to be called Ionians: also, as many of them as were of the noblest blood, and descended from the very Senate and Pryraneum of the Athenians, begat children of Barbarous women, after they had killed their fathers and former

bound with an oth, and ministred the same unto their daughters, never to eat nor drinke with their husbands, nor to call them by their names : and that the Milefians at this day be descended from the faid women. And having cleanly delivered thus much under hand, that those onely who celebrated the feast named apalatia, were indeed true Jonians : And all (quoth he) doe keepe and observe that solemnity, fave onely the Ephesians and Colophonians. By this slie device he doth in effect deprive these states, of the noble antiquity of their nation. He writeth likewife, that the Cumwans and Mirylenwans, were compacted and agreed withall, for a peece of mony, to deliver into the hands of Cyrus, Pattyus, one of his captaines, who had revolted from him: But I cannot fay (quoth he) certainly, for how much, because the just summe is not exactly knowen. But he ought not by his leave to have charged upon any city of Greece fuch a note of 10 infamy, without he had bene better affured thereof. And afterwards he faith, that the inhabitants of Chios pulled him , being brought unto them out of the temple of Alinerva Palinches that is to fay, Tutelar and protect reffe of the city, for to deliver him unto the Perfians; which the Chians didafter they had received for their hire, a peece of land called Starnes. Howbeit. Charon, the Lampfacinian, a more ancient writer, when he handleth the story of Pattyas, taxeth neither the Mitylen ans, nor the Chians, for any fuch facriledge: but writeth of this matter, thus word for word: Pacty as (quoth he) being advertised that the Persian army approched, fled first to Mitzlena, and afterwards to Chies: and there he fell into the hands of Cyrus. Moreover this our author in his third booke, describing the expedition or journey of the Lacedæmonians against Polycrates the tyrant, faith that the Samians, both are of opinion and also report, that it 20 was by way of recompence and requitall, because they had fent them aid in their warre against Messen, that the Lacedamonians entred into armes and warred upon the tyrant, for to reduce the exiled persons home againe, and restore them to their livings and goods: but he saith, that the Lacedæmonians deny flatly this to have bene the cause: faying it was neither to set the Isle Samos at liberty, nor to fuccour the Samians, that they enterprifed this warre: but ratherto chaftice the Samians, for that they had intercepted and taken away a faire standing cupof gold, fent by them as a prefent unto king Crasu: and besides a goodly cuirace or brestplate, fent unto them from king Amasis. And yet we know for certaine, that in all those daies, there was not a city in Greece fo desirous of honour, nor so infest and deadly bent against tytants, as Lacedamon was: for what other cuppe of gold, or cuirace was there, for which they chacedout 20 of Corimb and Ambracia the usurping tace of the Cypselidæ; banished out of Noxos, the tyrant Lygdamis 3 expelled out of Athens, the children of Pififtrasus 3 drave out of Sicyone, Aefchines; exiled from Thefes, Symmachus; delivered the Phoceans from Aulis; and turned Ariftogenes out of Miletus: as for the lordly dominions over Thessay, they utterly ruinated and rooted out, which Aristomedes and Angelus usurped, whom they suppressed and defaited by the meanes of Leotychidas their king? But of these things I have written else where more exactly and at large. Now if Herodotsus faith true, what wanted they of extreame folly and wickednesse in the highest degree, indifavowing and denying a most just and honorable occasion of this warre, to confesse that they made an invalion upon a poorer and miserable nation oppressed and afflicted under a tyrant, and all in remembrance of a former grudge, to be revenged for a small wrong upon abase minde and mechanicall avarice. Now haply he had a fling at the Lacedæmonians and gave them ablur with his pen, because in the traine and consequence of the story, they came to just under it; but the city of the Corinthians, which was cleane out of his way, he hath not withflan-40 ding taken it with him and befourted and dashed as he passed by, with a most grievous slander and heavy imputation. The Corinthians also (quoth he) did favor and fecond with great affection this voiage of the Lacedamonians, for to requite an hainous outrage and injury, which they had received before time at the Samians handes: And that was this? Periander the tyrant of Corinth, sent three hundred young boies, that were the sonnes of the most noble persons in all Corfu, to king Aliastes for to be guelded. These youths arrived in the Isle Samos, who being landed the Samians taught how to fit as humble suppliants within the temple and sanctuary of Di- 50 ana, & fet before them for their nourishment certaine cakes made of Sesam feed & hony. And this for foth was it that our trim historiographer calleth fo great an outrage & abuse offred by the Samians unto the Corinthians; for which he faith, the Lacedemonians also were stirred up and provoked against them, because they had saved the children of Greeks from eviration. But furely be that fasteneth this reproch upon the Corinthians, sheweth that the city was more wicked than the tyrant himselfe. As for him, his defire was to be revenged of the inhabitants of

Corfu, who had killed his fonne among them: but the Corinthians, what wrong received they of the Samians, for which they should in hostile maner set upon them, who opposed themfelves and empeached fo inhumane and barbarous crueltie to be committed? and namely, that they should revive and raise up againe an old cankred grudge and quarrels, that had lien dead and buried the space of three generations; and all in favour and maintenance of tyranny, which had laine very grievous and unsupportable upon them, and whereof, being overthrowen and ruined as it is, they cease not still to abolish and doe out the remembrance for ever. Loc, what outrage it was, that the Samians committed upon the Corinthians; but what was the revenge and punishment that the Corinthians devised against the Samians? For if in good earnest to they tooke indignation and were offended with the Samians, it had been emeet, not to have incited the Lacedæmonians, but to have diverted them rather, from levying warre upon Polyerates, to the end that the tyrant not being defaited and put downe, they might not have beene freed nor delivered from tyrannicall fervitude. But that which more is, what occafion had the Corinthians to bee angrie with the Samians, who though they defired, yet could not fave the Corcyreans children, confidering they tooke no displeasure against the Chidians, who not onely preferred, but also restored them to their parents? And verily the Corcyreans, make no great regard, nor speake ought, of the Samians in this behalfe: mary the Chidians, they remembred in the best maner; for the Chidians they ordeined honours, priviledges, and immunities, and enacted publicke decrees to ratific and con-20 firme the fame. For thefe Chidians failing to the Ifle of Samos, arrived there, drave out of the foresaid temple the guard of Persander, tooke the children foorth, and brought them safe to Corfu, according as Antenor the Candiot, and Dionysius the Chalcidian in the booke of Foundations have left in writing. Now that the Lacedæmonians undertooke this expedition, not for tobe quit with the Samians, and to punish them, but to deliver them rather from the tyrant, and for to fave them; I will believe no other testimonie but the Samians themselves. For they affirme, that there is among them now standing, a tombe or monument by them erected at the publike charges of the citie, for the corps of Archias a citizen of Sparta, whose memoriall they doehonour, for that in the faid fervice he fought valiantly, and loft his life: for which cause the posteritie descended from that man, doe yet unto this day, beare singular affection, and do 30 all the pleasures they can unto the Samians, as Herodot to himselfe beareth witnesse. Furthermore, in his fifth booke he writeth, that Clifthenes, one of the most noble and principall personages of all Athens, perswaded the priestresse Pythia, to be a false prophetesse, in mooving the Lacedæmonians alwaies by heranswers that the gave out, for to deliver the citic of Athens from the thirtie tyrants: and thus unto a most glorious peece of worke and right just, he adjoineth the impuration of fo great an impietie, and a damnable device of fallhood; and withall, bereaveth god Apollo of that prophelie which is fo good and honest, yea and beforming Themis. who also as they say affilteth him in the oracle. He faith also, that Isagoras yeelded his wife unto Cleomenes, for to use her at his pleasure, when sover he came unto her: and then, as his ordinary maner is, intermingling some praises among blames, because he would be the better be-40 leeved: This Isagoras (quoth he) the sonne of Tisander, was of a noble house; but I am not able to fay of what antiquitie before-time his pedegree was; but onely that his kinsfolke and those of his bloud, doe facrifice unto Tupiter, surnamed Carina. Now I assure you, this our Hiflorian is a proper and pleafant conceited fellow, to fend away Isagoras thus to the Carians, as it were to ravens, in a mischiefe. And as for driftogiton, he packeth him away not by a backe doore or posterne, but directly by the broad & open gate, as far as unto Phanice; saying, that his first originall came long since from the Gephyrians: but what Gephyrians trow yee: not those in Eubæa, or in Eretria, as some doethinke: but he faith plainly they be Phoenicians, and that he is so perswaded of them by heare-say. And not being able to deprive the Lacedæmonians of their glory, for delivering the city of Athens from the fervitude of the thirty tyrants, he 30 goeth about to obliterate quite, or at leastwife in some fort to disgrace and dishonor that most nobleact, with as foule a paffion, and as villanous a vice: for hee faith, that they repented incontinently, as if they had not well done, by the induction of falle and supposed oracles, thus to have chaced out of their countrey the tyrants their friends, guests, and allies, who promised to deliver Athens into their hands, and to have yeelded the city unto an unthankfull people; and that anon they fent for Hippias, as farre as to Sigaum, for to reduce him to Athens: but the Corinthians opposed themselves, and diverted them, whiles Sosieles discoursed and shewed how many miseries and calamities the citie of Corinth had endured whiles Periander & Crofelus held them under their tyrannicall rule: and yet of all those enormous outrages which Periander committed, they could not name any one more wicked and cruell, than that of the three hundred children which he fent away for to be gelded: Howbeit, this man dareth to fay, that the Corinthians were mooved and provoked against the Samians, who had faved the faid youthes, and kept them from suffering such an indignity, and caried the remembrance thereof for revenge, as if they had done them fome exceeding great injurie : fo full is his malice and gall of inconstancie, of repugnance and contradiction in all his speeches, which ever and anon is ready to offer it selfe in all his narrations. After all this, comming to describe the taking of the citie Sardis, he diminished, deformeth, and discrediteth the exploit all that ever he can, be 10 ing fo armed with shamelesse audacitie, that he termeth those shippes which the Athenians set ont, and fent to fuccor the king, and to plague the Ionians, who rebelled against him, the originall causes of all mischiefe, for that they affaied to fet at liberty and deliver out of servitude, so many goodly and faire cities of the Greeks, held forcibly under the violent dominion of the barbarous nations. As touching the Eretrians, he maketh mention of them onely by the way. & paffeth in filence a most woorthy and glorious piece of service, which they performed at that time: for when all Ionia was now already in an uprore & hurliburly, and the kings armada neere at hand, they put out their navie, and in the maine fea of Pamphylia, defeated in a navall battell the Cyprians: then returning backe, and leaving their navie in the rode before Ephefus, they went by land to lay fiege unto the capitall citie of Sardis, where they beleagured Artaphernes 20 within a castle, into which he was fledde, intending thereby to raise the siege before the cine Miletus: which service they put in execution and performed; causing their enemies to remoove their campe, and dislodge from thence, in a woonderfull great feare and affright: but feeing a greater number of enemies to presse hard upon them, they returned. Many Chroniclers report the historie in this maner; and among the rest Lyfunds Mallotes, in his chronicle of the Eretrians. And verily it would have beformed well, if for no other reason, yet after the taking and destruction of their citie, to have added this their act of valour and prowesse. Howbeit, this good writer, contrariwife faith, that being vanquished in the field, the Barbarians followed in chase, and pursued them as farre as to their shippes: and yet Charon the Lampsacenian, maketh no mention thereof, but writeth thus, word for word: The Athenians (quoth be) put to sea with a sleet of twentie gallies, for to aid the Ionians, and made a voiage as farte as to Sardeis, where they were mafters of all, except the kings fortresse or wall; which done, they returned to Miletus. In the fixth booke, our Herodotus, after he had related thus much of the Platæans, that they had yeelded and committed themselves to the protection of the Lacedæmonians, who made remonstrance unto them, that they should doe farre better to raunge and fide with the Athenians their neighbours, and able to defend them: he addeth moreover and faith afterwards, nor by way of opinion and fulpicion, but as one who knew it was foindeed, that the Lacedæmonians thus advised and counfelled them at that time, not for any good will and loving affection that they bare unto them, but because they were all very well appaied to see the Athenians to have their hands full, and to be matched with the Bæotians. If then Herodotsu be not malicious, it cannot chuse, but that the Lacedamonians were very cautelous, fraudu-40 lent, and spightfull; and the Athenians as blockish and senselesse, not to see how they were thus deluded and circumvented. The Platæans likewise were thus posted from them, not for any love or honor entended unto them, but because they might be the occasion of war. Furthermore, he is convinced to have falfly devifed, and colourably pretended the excuse of the full moone against the Lacedæmonians, which whiles they attended and staied for, he saith, they failed and went not in that journey of Murathon, to aid the Athenians: for not onely they began a thousand voiages, and fought as many battels in the beginning of the moneth and new of the moone, but also at this very battell of Marathon, which was fought the fixth day of the month Boedromion, that is to fay, November, they missed very little, but they had arrived in 10 due time: for they came soone enough to finde the dead bodies of those that were slaine in the field, and lying still in the place: and yet thus hath he written of the full moone. It was impossible for them to doe this out of hand, being as they were, not willing to breake the law; for that as yet it was but the ninth day of the moneth: and they made answere, that they might not let foorth, unleffe the moone were at the full. And thus these men waited for the full moone. But you good fir transferre the ful moone into the beginning of the halfe moone or fecond quarter, confounding

confounding the course of heaven, and the order of daies, yea, and shuffling every thing together. Over and besides, promising in the forefront and inscription of your historie, to write the deeds and affaires of the Greekes, you employ all your eloquence to magnifie and amplifie the acts of the Barbarians; and making femblance to be affectionate to the Athenians, yet for all that, you make no mention at all of that folemne pompe and procession of theirs at Mera, which they hold even at this day, in the honour of Hecate, or Proferpina, by way of thanker giving for the victorie, the feast whereof they do celebrate. But this helpeth Herodorus verie much to meet with that improperation and flander that went of him, namely, that he flattered the Athenians in his storie, for that he had received a great summe of money of them 10 for that purpose: for if he had read this unto the Athenians, they would never have neglected nor let passe that wicked Philippides, who went to moove and sollicite the Lacedamonians to be at that battell, from which himselfe came, and he especially, who as he saith himselfe, within two daies was in Sparta, after he had beene at Athens, if the Athenians after the winning of the field did not fend for the aide of their confederates and allies. But Diyllm an Athenian, none of the meanest Chroniclers, writeth, that he received of the Athenians, the fumme of ten talents of filver, by vertue of an an act that Anytes propounded.

Moreover, many are of opinion, that Herodotm in his narration of the battell of Marathon, himselfe marred the whole grace and honour of the exploit, by the number that he putteth downe of them who there were flaine: for he faith, that the Athenians made a vow to facrifice 20 unto Proferpina or Diana furnamed Agrotera, as many yeere old goats as they flew of the Barbarians: but when after the discomfiture and overthrow, they saw that the number of the dead bodies was infinit, they made supplication to the goddesse for to be dispensed for their you and promife, and to acquit them for five hundred every yeere to be killed in facrifice for her. But to passe over this, let us see what followed after the battell. The Barbarians (quoth he) with the rest of their thips drawing backe and retiring into the open fea, and having taken a thip boord thofe flaves of Eretria, out of the Isle where they had left them, doubled the point of Sunium, with a full purpose to prevent the Athenians before they could recover the citie. And the Athenians were of opinion, that they were advised thus to do by a secret complot betweene them and the Alcmæonidæ who had appointed and agreed with the Persians to give them a signall so soone as they were all embarked, by holding up aloft and shewing them a shield afarre off. And so they fetched a compaffe about the cape of Sunium. And here I am content that he should go cleere away with this, that he called those prisoners of Eretria by the name of slaves, who shewed as much courage and valour in this warre, yea, and as great a defire to win honour, as any Greeks whatfoever, although their vertue fped but ill, and was unworthily afflicted. And leffe account Imake also of this, that he defameth the Alcmaonida, of whom were the greatest families and noblest persons of all the citie. But the worst of all is this, that the honour of this brave victorie is quite overthrowen, and the iffue or end of fo woorthy and renowmed a piece of fervice is come just to nothing in a maner, neither feemeth it to have beene any fuch battell or so great an exploit, but onely a short scuffling or light skirmish with the Barbarians when they were landed, as evill willers, carpers and envious persons give out to deprave the service, if it be so, that after the battell, they fled not when they had cut the cables of their ships, permitting themselves to the winde, for to cary them as far as possibly might be fro Atrica, but that there was a shield or 40 targuet lifted up aloft in the aire as a fignall unto them of treason, and that of purpose they made faile toward the city of Athens, in hope to furprise it; and having without any noise in great silence doubled the forelaid point of Sunium, and were discovered a float, hovering about the port Phalera, infomuch as the principall and most honourable personages of the Athenians, being out of all hope to fave the citie, betraied it into their hands: for afterwards he dischargeth and cleereth the Alcmæonidæ, and attributeth this treason unto others: And cetteine it is (quoth he) that fuch a targuet or shield was shewed. And this he faith so confidently, as if himselfe had 50 feene the thing. But impossible it is that it should be so, in case the Athenians won the victorie cleere: and fay it had so beene, the Barbarians never could have perceived it, slying so as they did in great affright and danger, wounded also as they were, and chased both with sword and shot into their ships, who left the field every man, and fled from the land as fast as ever he could. But afterwards againe, when he maketh femblance to answere in the behalfe of the Alcmæonidæ, and to refute those crimes which himselfe broched, and charged upon them: I woonder (quoth he) and I can not beleeve the rumour of this imputation, that ever the Alcmæonidæ, by any compact with the Barbarians, shewed them the figuall of a shield, as willing that the Athenians should be in subjection to the Barbarians under Hippias. In thus doing, he putteth me in mind and remembrance of a certeine clause running in this maner: Take him you will; and having taken him, let him goe you will. Semblably, first you accuse, and anon you defend: write you do and frame acculatorie impurations against honourable persons, which afterwards you seeme to cancile, difcrediting herein (no doubt) and diftrufting your felfe: for you have heard your owne selse to say, that the Alemaonidae set up a targuet for a signal to the Barbarians vanquished and flying away; but in relieving them againe and answering in their defence, you shew your felfe to be a flanderous fycophant: for if that be true which you write in this place, that the Alcmæonidæ were worle, or at leastwise, as badly affected to tyrants, as Callias the sonne of Phenip- 10 pus and father of Hipponieu, where will you bestow and place that conspiracie of theirs against the common wealth, which you have written in your former books? faying, that they contracted alliance and affinitie in marriage with Pifftratus; by meanes whereof, they wrought his returne from exileto exercise tyrannie: neither would they ever have banished him againe, had it not beene that their daughter had complained and accused him, that he used her not according to law of marriage & of nature. Thus you fee what confused variations, contradictions and repugnances there be in that imputation and suspicion of the Alcmæonidæ: but in sounding out the praises of Callast the sonne of Phenippus, with whom he joineth his sonne Hipponicus, who by the report of Herodotus himselfe , was in his time the richest man in all Athens, he confessed plainly, that for to infinuate himselfe into the favor of Hipponicus, and to flatter him, without any 20 reason or cause in the world arising out of the matter of the story, he brought Callias. All the world knowes, that the Argives refused not to enter into that generall confederacy and affociation of the Greeks, requiring onely, that they might not be ever at the Laced amonians command, nor forced to follow them, who were the greatest enemies, & those who of all men living hated them most : when it would not otherwise be, he rendereth a most malicious and spightfull cause and reason thereof, writing thus: When they saw (quoth he) that the Greeks would needs comprise them in that league, knowing full well, that the Lacedae monians would not impartunto them any prerogative to command, they feemed to demand the communion thereof, to the end that they might have some colourable occasion and excuse to remaine quiet and sit still: which he faith, that Artaxerxes long after, remembred unto the embaffadors of the Argives, 30 who came unto him at Sussa, and gave this testimonie unto them, That he thought there was not acity in all Greece friended him more than Argos. But soone after, as his accustomed maner is, feeming to retract all, and cleanly to cover the matter, he comes in with these words: Howbeit, as touching this point, I know nothing of certeinty; but this I wot wel, all men have their faults, and I doe not believe, that the Argives have caried themselves woorst of all others: but howsoever (quoth he) I am bound to fay that which is commonly received, yet I beleeve not all: and let this stand thorowout the whole course of mine historie. For this also is given out abroad That they were the Argives who follicited and fent for the king of Persia to levie warre upon all Greece; because they were not able in armes to make head against the Lacedæmonians, and cared not what became of them, to avoid the present discontentment and griefe wherein they 40 were. And may not a man very well returne that upon himselfe, which he reporteth to be spo-க்கூழ்களில் na ken by an Aethiopian, as touching the sweet odours and rich purple of the Persians ? * Decision Minary PAA full are the Persian continents, deceitfull are their babilliments. For even so a man may very well tay of him: Decenful are the * phrases, decenful are the figures of Herodotus bu speeches;

So intricate and tortuous, fo winding quite throughout, As nothing found is therin found, but all turn's round about.

And like as painters make their light colours more apparent and eminent, by the shadowes that they put about them; even so Herodotus by seeming to denie that which he affirmeth, dothen 50 force and amplifie his calumniations so much the more; and by ambiguities and doubtfull speeches, maketh suspicions the deeper. But if the Argives would not enter into the common league with all other Greeks, but held off and flood out upon a jelousie of sovereigne command or emulation of vertue and valour against the Lacedæmonians; no man will say the contrary, but that they greatly dishonoured the memorie of their progenitous Hercules, and disgraced the nobilitie of their race. For better it had beene, and more beferming, for the Siphnians and

Cithnians, the inhabitants of two little Isles, to have defended the libertie of Greece, than by ftriving thus with the Spartans, and contesting about the prerogative of command, to shift off and avoid to many combats and to honourable pieces of service. And if they were the Argives, who called the king of Perfia into Greece, because their sword was not so sharpe as the Lacedamonians was, and for that they could not make their part good with them; what is the reason, that when the faid king was arrived in Greece, they shewed not themselves openly to band with the Medes and Persians? And if they were unwilling to be seene in the field and campe with the Barbarian king; why did they not, when they staied behinde at home, invade the territory of the Laconians? why entred they not againe upon the Thurians countrey, or by fome other meanes to prevented & impeached the Lacedamonians? for in fo doing, they had been able greatly to have endamaged the Greeks, namely, by hindring them from comming into the field at Place with so puiffant a power of armed footmen. But the Athenians verily in this service, he highly extolleth and fetteth out with glorious titles, naming them, The faviours of Greece; which had beene well done of him and juiltly, if he had not intermingled with these praises, many blames and reprochfull termes. Howbeit now, when he faith, that the Laceda monians were abandoned of the other Greeks, and nevertheleffe, thus forfaken and left alone, having undertaken many woorthy exploits, died honourably in the field, forefeeing that the Greekes favouring the Medes, complotted and combined with king Xerxes; is it not evident hecreby, that he gave not out those goodly words directly to praise the Athenians, but rather, that he commended them, 20 to the end that he would condemne and defame all other Greeks ? For who can now be angric and offended with him, for reviling and reproching in fuch vile and bitter termes the Thebans and Phoceans continually as he doth, confidering that he condemneth of treason (which neverwas, but as he gueffeth himfelfe might have so fallen out) even those who were exposed to all perils of death for the liberties of Greece? And as for the Lacedæmonians themselves, he putteth adoubt into our heads, Whether they died manfully in fight, or rather yeelded ? making flight arguments, God wot, and frivolous conjectures, to impaire their honour, in comparison of others that fought at Thermopyle.

Moreover, in relating the overthrow and shipwracke which hapned to the king of Persias fleet, wherein a mighty and infinit maffe of money and money worth was cast away: Aminocles 20 a Magnefian citizen (quoth he) and fonne of Cretines, was mightily enriched; for he met with infinit treasure as well in coine as in plate both of filver and gold. But he could not passe over so much as this, and let it go, without fome biting nip favouring of malice : For this man (quoth he) who otherwise before time was but poore and needy, by these windfalles and unexpected cheats became very wealthy: but there befell unto him also an unhappy accident, which troubled him and difgraced his other good fortune, for that he killed his owne fonne. For who feeth not, that he inferteth in his historic these golden words of wrecks, and of great treasure found floating or cast upon the sands by the tides of the sea, of very purpose, to make a fit roume and a convenient place, wherein he might bestow the murder committed by Aminocles upon the person of his owne sonne. And whereas Aristophanes the Bootian wrote, that having de-40 manded money of the Thebans, he could receive none of them; and that when he went about to reason and dispute scholastically with the youth of the city in points of learning, the magistrates (such was their rusticitie and hatred of good letters) would not suffer him: other proofe and argument thereof he putteth downe none: but Herodotus gave testimonic with Aristophames, whiles those imputations wherewith he chargeth the Thebans, hee putteth downe some fallely, others ignorantly, and fome againe upon hatred, as one that had a quarrell against them: for he affirmeth, that the Theffalians combined and fided with the Medians at the first upon meereneceffitie, wherein he faith true. And prophefying as it were of other Greeks, as if they minded to betray and forfake the Lacedæmonians, he commeth in afterwards with this shift, that this was not voluntarily and with their good liking, but upon constraint and necessity, because they were surprised city by city, one after another. But yet he alloweth not unto the Thebans the excuse of the same compulsion, albeit they had sent a band of sive hundred men under the conduct of captaine Mnamias, for to keepe the streights of Tempe, and likewise unto the Paffe of Thermopyla, as many as king Leonidas demanded, who onely together with the Thefpians stucke to him and remained with him, when he was for faken of all other, after they faw how he was environed round about on every fide. But after that the Barbarous king, having gotten all the Avennes, was entred upon their confines, and Demaratus the Spartan, being in right of

By this meanes, at the last driven they were to accept conditions of peace, and to grow into a composition with the Barbarians, finding themselves brought to so hard termes of necessitie: for neither had they sea at hand, nor a navy at command as the Athenians, neither dwelt they farre off from the heart of Greece in a most remote angle thereof, as did the Lacedaemonians, but were not above one daies journey and an halfe from the Medians rotall campe, and had already encountred in the streight passages with the kings power, affisted onely with the Spartans 10 and Thespians, where they had the worse and were defaited. And yet this our historiographer is fo just and equall, that he faith, The Lacedæmonians seeing themselves for saken and abandoned of all their allies, were faine to give care unto any composition whatsoever, & to accept at a venture what was offered: and to being not able to abolish not utterly blot out to brave and so glorious an act, nor to denie, but that it was atchieved; he goeth about to discredit and deface it with this vile imputation and fulpicion, writing thus: The allies then and the confederats being fent backe, returned into their countreys and obeied the commandement of Leonidas; only the Thespians and Thebans remained still with the Lacedamonians: and as for the Thebans, it was full against their willes, for that Leonidas kept them as hostages; but the Thespians were willing thereto, for they faid, they would never for fake Leonidas nor his company. Sheweth he not ap 20 apparently heerein, that he carrieth a fpightfull and malicious minde particularly against the Thebans, whereby not onely he flandereth the city fallly and unjuftly, but also careth nor fo much, as to make the imputation seeme probable, no norto conceale at leastwise unto sew men, that he might not be espied to have beene privie unto himselse of contradictions : for having written a little before, that Leonidas feeing his confederates and allies out of heart and altogether discouraged to hazard the fortune of the field, commanded them to depart : a little after, clean contrary he faith, that he kept the Thebans perforce with him and against their wils, whom by all likelihood he should have driven from him, if they had bene willing to stay, in case that he had them in jelousie and suspition, that they tooke part with the Medians: for seeing he would not have those about him who were cowardly affected, what boot was it to keepe among 30 his foldiers men suspected? For being as he was, a king of the Spartans, and captaine general of all the Greeks, he had not beene in his right wits not found in judgement, if he would have stated with him in hostage foure hundred men well armed, when his owne company were but three hundred in all, especially at such a time when as he saw himselfe hardly bested and beset with enimies, who pressed upon him at once, both before and behind. For how soever before time he had led them about with him as hoftages, probable it was that in fuch an extremity they would either have had no regard of Leonidas and so departed from him, or else that Leonidas might have feared to be environed by them rather then by the Barbarians. Over and besides, had not king Leonidas bene ridiculous and worthy to be laughed at, to bid other Greeks to depart, as if by tarying they should soone after lose their lives: and to forbid the Thebans, to the 40 end that he might keepe them for the behalfe of other Greekes, he I say who was resolved anon to die in the field; for if he led the men about with him in trueth as hoftages, or no better than flaves, he never should have kept them still with those who were at the point to perish and be flaine, but rather delivered them unto other Greeks who went from him. Now whereas there remaineth one cause yet, that a man may alledge, why he retained them still with him, for that peradventure they should all die with him, this good writer hath overthrowen that also, in that he writeth thus of the honorable mind & magnanimity of Leonidas, word for word in this wifer Leonidus (quoth he) cafting and confidering all these matters in his minde, & desiring that this glory might redound unto the Spattans alone, fent away his friendly allies every one into their owne countries, therefore rather than because they were of different minds & opinions: for ex-50 ceeding folly it had bene of his part, to keepe his enemies for to be pertakets of that glory, fró which he repelled his friends. It appeareth then by the effects, that Leonidas distrusted not the Thebans, nor thought amisse of them, but reputed them for his good and loiall friends: For he marched with his army into the city of Thebes, and at his request obtained that which to no other was ever granted, namely to be lodged all night and sleepe within the temple of Heraules, and the next morning related unto the Thebans, the vision which appeared unto him: For he faw as he thought, all the greatest and most principall cities of Greece in a sea, troubled and disquieted with rough windes and violent tempests, wherein they floted and were toffed to and fro. But the city of Thebes surpassed all the rest, for mounted it was on high up to heaven, & afterwards fuddenly the fight therof was lost, that it would no more be seene. And verily these things as a type refembled that which long time after befell unto that city. But Herodorus in writing of this conflict, burieth in filence the bravest act of Leonidas himselfe, faying thus much barely: They all lost their lives in the straights, about the top of a certaine hill. But it was far otherwise, For when they were advertised in the night that the enimies had invested them round about, they arose and marched directly to their very campe, yea and advanced so far forth as they came to within a little of the kings roiall pavilion, with a full resolution there to kill him, and to leave their lives all about him. And verily downethey went withall before them, killing, flaying and putting to flight, as many as they met, even as farre as to his tent. But when they could not meet with Xerxes, feeking as they did for him in fo vast and spacious a campe, as they wandred up and downe fearthing for him with much adoe, at the last hewed in peeces they were by the Barbarians, who on every fide in great number came about them. And albeit we will write in the life of Leonidas, many other noble acts and worthy fayings of his, which Herodorus hath not once touched, yet it shall not be amisse to quote heere also by the way, some of them. Before that he and his noble troupe departed out of Sparta in this journey, there were exhibited solemne funerall games for his and their fakes, which their fathers and mothers frood to behold: 20 & Leonides himselfe, when one faid unto him, That he led forth very few with him to fight a battell: Yeabut they are many enough (quoth he) to die there. His wife asked him when he tooke his leave of her, what he had elfe to fay? No more (quoth he) turning unto her but this, that thou marry againe with some good man, and beare him good children. When he was within the vale or passe of Thermopyle, and there invironed, two there were in his company of his ownerace and family, whom he defired to fave: So he gave unto one of them a letter to carry whether he directed it, because he would send him away: but the party would not take it at his hands, faying in great cholar and indignation, I am come hither to fight like a warrior, and not to conveigh letters as a carrier. The other he commanded for to goe with credence, and a meffage from him unto the magistrates of Sparta: but he made answere not by word of mouth, but 10 by his deed: for he tooke up his shield in hand and went directly to his place, where he was appointed to fight. Would not any man have blamed another for leaving out the fethings? But this writer having taken the paines to collect and put in writing the bason and close stoole of Amasis, and how he brake winde over it; the comming in of certaine affes which a theese diddrive; the congiary or giving of certaine bottles of wine, and many other matters of fuch goodstuffe; can never be thought, to have omitted through negligence, nor by overlight and forgetfullneffe, so many worthy exploits, and notable fayings: but even of peeviflineffe, malice and injustice, to some. And thus he saith, that the Thebans at first being with the Greeks, fought indeed, but it was by compulfion, because they were held there by force. For it should feeme for footh, that not only Xerxes, but Leonidas alfo, had about him a company that followed 40 the campe with whips, to scourge those I trow, who lagged behinde, and these good sellowes held the Thebans to it, and made them to fight against their willes: And thus he faith that they fought perforce, who might have fled and gone their waies: and that willingly they tooke part with the Medes, whereas there was not one came into fuccor them. And a little after, he writeth, that when others made hast to gaine the hill, the Thebans being disbanded and divided a funder, both stretched forth their hands unto the Barbarians, and as they approched neere unto them, faid that which was most true, namely, that they were Medians in heart, and so in teken of homage and fealty, gave unto the king water and earth: that being kept by force they were com-Pelled to come into this passe of Thermopyla, and could not doe withall, that their king was wounded, but were altogether innocent therof: By which allegations they went clere away with 50 their matter: For they had the Theffalians witnesses of these their words and reasons. Lo how this apologie and juttification of theirs, had audience among those barbarous outcries of so many thousand men, in those confused shouts and dissonant noises, where there was nothing but running and flying away of one fide, chafing and purfuit of another: See how the witneffes were deposed, heard and examined. The Theffalians also amid the throng and rout of those that were knocked downe and killed, and over those heapes of bodies which were troden under foot (for all was done in a very guller and narrow passage) pleaded no doubt very formally for the Thebans: Mmmmm 2

Thebans: for that a little before they having conquered by force of armes all Greece, chaled them as far as to the city The spie, after they had vanquished them in battell, and slaine their leader and captaine Lattamias. For thus much paffed even at that very time betweene the Thebans and the Thessalians: whereas otherwise there was not so much as civil love and humanity, that appeared by mutual offices from one to the other. Besides, how is it possible that the Thebans were faved, by the testimony of the Thessalians? For the Barbarous Medes, as himselfe faith. partly killed outright fuch as came into their hands : and in part whiles their breath was yet in their bodies, by the commandement of Xerxes, fet upon them a number of thekings markes. beginning first at the captaine himselfe Leontiades. And yet neither was Leontiades the generall of the Thebans at Thermopyle, but Anaxander as Ariftophanes writeth out of the Annals, and 10 records in the arches of Thebes, as touching their foveraigne magistrates: and so Nicander likewise the Colophonian hath put downe in his cronicle : neither was there ever any man before Herodotus who knew that Xerxes marked & branded in that maner any Theban: for this had bin an excellent plea in their defence against the foresaid calumniation, and a very good meanes for this city to vaunt and boast of such markes given them, as if king Xerxes meant to punish and plague as his greatest and most mortall enimies, Leonidas and Leontiades. For he cauled the one to be scourged, and his body to be hanged up when he was dead; and the other to be pricked whiles he was alive. And this our Historiographer hath used this cruelty which they thew. ed unto Leonidas dead, for a manifest proofe that the Barbarous king hated Leonidas in his life time above all men in the world. And in avouching that the Thebans who fided with the 20 Medes at Thermopyle were thus branded & marked as flaves, and afterwards, being thus marked, fought egetly in the behalfe of the fame Barbarians before Platea, me thinks he may well fay as Hippoclides the feat moriske dancers, unto whom, when at a feaft he bestirred his legges, and hopped artificially about the tables, one faid unto him, Thou dancest truly. Hippoclides answered againe, Hippoclides careth not greatly for the trueth. In his eighth booke he writeth that the Greeks being affrighted like cowards, entred into a resolution for to flie from Artemisium into Greece: and that when those of Eubara belought them to tarry still awhile, untill such time as they might take order how to bestow their wives, children and familie, they were nothing moved at their praiers, nor gave any care unto them, untill fuch time as Themistocks tooke a peece of mony of them, and parted the same betweene Eurybiades and Adimant us the Pretour or cap- 30 taine of the Corinthians. And then they staied longer, and fought a navall battell with the Barbatians. And verily Pindarus the Poet, albeit he was not of any confederate city, but of that which was suspected and accused to hold of the Medians side, yet when he had occasion to make mention of the battell at Artemfum, brake forth into this exclamation:

This is the place where Athens youth, fometime as writers fay, Did with their bood, of liberty
the glorious groundworkelay.

But Herodotus contrariwife, by whom some give out that Greece hath bene graced and adorned, writeth that the faid victory was an act of corruption, bribery and mere theft, and that the 40 Greeks fought against their wils, as being bought and fold by their captaines, who tooke mony therefore. Neither is here an end of his malice. For all men in maner doe acknowledge and confesse, that the Greeks having gotten the upper hand in sea fight upon this coast, yet abandoned the cape Artemisium, and yeelded it to the Barbarians, upon the newes that they heard of the overthrow received at Thermopyle. For it had bene no boot nor to any purpose, for to have fitten still there, and kept the sea for the behoofe of Greece, considering that now the warre was hard at their dores within those straights, and Xerxes, master of all the Avenies. But Herodotus feigneth, that the Greeks, before they were advertised of Leontidas death, held a counsell and were in deliberation to flie: For these be his words: Being in great distresse (quoth he) and the Athenians especially, who had many of their ships, even the one halfe of their fleet shrewdly 50 brused and shaken, they were in consultation to take their slight into Greece. But let us permit him thus to name or to reproch rather this retrait of theirs before the battell : but he termed it before, a flight: and now at this present he calleth it a flight: and hereafter he will give it the name of flight, fo bitterly is he bent to use this vile word, flight. But (quoth he) therecame to the Barbarians prefently after this, in a barke or light pinnace a man of Estiaa, who advertised them, how the Greeks had quit the cape Artemissium and were fledde: which because they could not beleeve, they kept the meffenger in ward and fafe custody, and thereupon put forth certainte swift foists in espiall to discover the trueth. What say you Herodotus? What is it you write? That they fled as vanquished, whom their very enimies themselves after the battell could not beleeve that they fled, as supposing them to have had the better hand a great deale? And deserveth this man to have credit given him, when he writeth of one perticular person, or of one city apart by it selfe, who in one bare word, spoileth all Greece of the victory? He overthroweth and demolisheth the very Trophæe and monument, that all Greece crecited. He abolisheth those titles and inscriptions, which they set up in the honor of Diana, on the East side of Artimisum, calling all this but pride and vaineglory. And as for the Epigram, it ran to this effect.

From Asia land, all forts of nations stout When Ashens youth, sometime in navall fight Had vanquished, and all these coasts about Dispers their sleet; and therewith put of light And slame the host of Medes: Loe heere in sight What monuments to the with due respect, Diana virgin pure, they did creek.

He described not the order of the battels, and how the Greeks were ranged, neither hath he shewed what place every city of theirs held, during this terrible fight at sea: but in that retrait of their fleet, which he termeth a flight, he faith, that the Corinthians failed formost, and the A-20 thenians hinmost: he should not then have thus troden under foot, and insulted too much over those Greeks, who tooke part with the Medes: he (I say) who by others is thought to be a Thurian borne, and reckoneth himselfe in the number of the Halicarnasseans, and they verily being descended from the Dorians, come with their wives and children to make warre against the Greeks. But this man is to farre off from naming and alledging before the flreights and neceffities whereto those states were driven, who sided with the Medians, that he reporteth thus much of the Medians, how notwithstanding the Phocæans were their capitall enemies, yet they fent unto them aforehand, that they would foare their countrey, without doing any harme or damage unto it, if they might receive from them as a reward, fiftie talents of filver. And this wrote he as touching the Phocæans in these very termes: The Phocæans (quoth he) were the 30 onely men who in these quarters sided not with the Medians, for no other cause as I finde upon mature confideration, but in regard of the hatred which they bare against the Thessalians: for if the Theffalians had bene affected to the Greeks, I suppose the Phocæans would have turned to the Medes. And yet a little after, himselfe wilfay, that thirteene cities of the Phocæans were fet on fire, and burnt to ashes by the Barbarian king, their countrey laid waste, the temple within the citie Abes confumed with fire, their men and women both put to the fword, as many as could not gaine the top of the mount Pernaffue: Nevertheleffe he rangeth them in the number of those that most affectionatly tooke part with the Barbarians, who indeed, chose rather to endure all extremities and miseries that warre may bring, than to abandon the desence and maintenance of the honour of Greece. And being not able to reproove the men for any deeds 40 committed, he bufied his braines to devife falle imputations, forging and framing with his pen diversfurmifes and fuspicions against them, not willing that their intentions should be judged by their acts, if they had not beene of the fame minde and affection with the Theffalians, as if they would have renounced the treason, because their countrey was already seized by others. If then, a man, who would goe about to excuse the Thessalians for siding with the Medes, should lay, that they were not willing thereto, but for the hatred which they bare unto the Phocarans, feeng them adhere and allied to the Greeks, therefore they tooke the contrary fide, and clave to the Medes, even against their will and judgement: might not he seeme to be an egregious flatterer, who thus in favour of others, fearthing honest pretentes to colour and cover foule facts, perverteth the trueth? Yes verily, as I thinke. How then can it otherwise be, but that he 50 shall be taken for a plaine sycophant, who faith; that the Phocæans followed not the better for vertue, but because they knew the Thessalians were of a contrary minde and judgement? For he doeth not turne and father this flander and calumniation upon others, as his maner is else whereto doe, faying, that he heard fay, &c. but he affirmeth, that in conferring all things together, himselfe found no other occasion thereof. He ought then to have alledged withall, his prefumptions and proofes; whereby he was perfuaded, that they who performe all actions semblable to the best, are yet in will and intention all one with the woorst. For the occasion Mmmmm 3 which he alledgeth, to wit, enmitte, is frivolous, and to be laughed at, because neither the enmitie that was betweene those of Aegins and the Athenians; nor that which the Chalcidians bare against the Eretrians; nor the Corinthians against the Megarians; was a barre to empeach them for joining together in the league of Greece, for the defence of common libertie: like as on the contrary fide, the Macedonians most bitter and mortall enemies unto the Theffalians, and those who plagued them most, diverted them not from the consederacie and alliance with the Barbarians. For the publicke perill, covered and hidde their private quarrels: infomuch as abandoning and banishing their passions, they gave their consent, either to honesty for vertue. or to profit for necessitie. And yet beside this necessitie, wherewith they found themselves overtaken, yea, and forced to submit themselves to the Medes, they returned againe to the to Greeks fide : and heereof Lecerates the Spartane, giveth direct testimonic in their behalfe, Yea and Herodotus hunfelfe being forced and compelled thereto, confesseth in the description of the affaires that passed at Placea, that the Phocians sided with the Greeks. And no marvell is it, if he be fo rough and violent with fuch as have beene infortunate; when as, even those who were present in the action, and hazarded their whole estate for the good of the common-wealth. he transposeth into the ranke of enemies and traitors. For the men of N axos sent three gallies or shippes of warre to aide the Barbarians in their service : but one of the captaines of those veffels named Democritus, perfinaded his other two fellowes, to turne, and range rather on the Greeks side. See how he can not for his life, praise, but he must withall dispraise: but looke when some particular person is commended, he must needs by and by condemne a whole citie 20 and nation: Witneffe heereof, among ancient writers, Hellameus, and of our moderne authors, Ephorus: for the one faith, that the Naxians came to fuccour the Greekes with fixe gallies, and the other faith with five: yea and Herodorus himselfe is convinced to have seigned and salissed this: For the particular chroniclers of the Naxians write, that before time they had repulled Megabetes the lieutenant of the kings, who with two hundred faile arrived at their Isle, & there ridde at anchor: afterwards drave away Datis another generall of his, who as he passed by, burnt their cities. And if it be fo as Herodotus faith ellewhere, that they themselves destroied their city, by fetting it on fire, but the people faved themselves, by flying into the mountaines, had they good cause to send aid unto those, who were the cause of the ruin and destruction of their owner country, and not to joine with them who fought for the common liberty? But that it was not so much to praise Democritus, as to blame the Naxians, that he devised this lie, he sheweth evidently by this, that he concealeth and omitteth to speake of the valiant feats of armes, which at that time captaine Demceritus exploited, according as Simonides shewed by this Epigram.

Democritus in third place gave the charge with all his might, What time as Greeks neve Salamis, with Medical te did fight, Five ships of enimes he tooke: a sixth there chunc do be, One of the Greeks in Barbarous hands, and that recovered be.

But why should any man be angry with him about the Naxians? For if their be any Antipodes, as some fay there are, who dwell in the other Hemisphære and goe opposit unto us, I suppose that they also have heard of Themispoeles, and the counsell that he gave unto the Greeks for to fight an avail battel before Salamis, who atterwards caused a temple to be built in the Isle of Melite unto Dians the wise counseller, after that the Barbarous king was discomfitted. Now this kinde and gentle cronicler of ours, refusing as much as lieth in him to avow this exploit, and to transfer the glory thereof unto another, writeth expressly thus. When things stood upon these termes, as Themispoeles went a boord into his owne gally, there was a citizen of Athens named Mnesiphelus, who demanded of him what they had resolved upon in their councell? And when so he heard that concluded it was to retire with their sleet unto Ithmus or the streights, there to fight a battell at sea even before Peloponnesus: I say unto you (quoth he) againe that it here to fight a battell at sea who here of the sum over the navy from Salamis, you shall never sight more upon the sea for any country of your owne: for every man will presently returne home to his owne city. And therefore if there any device and meanes in the world, goe your waies and indevor to breake this resolution, and if it be possible deale so with Eurybiades, that he may change his minde and tarry here still: And a little little after, when he had faid that this advice pleafed Themistocles wondrous much, & that without making any answere at all he went directly to Eurybiades, he writeth againe in these very tearmes: And fitting neere unto him, he relateth what counsell he had heard Mness to give, taking it upon himselfe, and addeth more things besides. Thus see you not how in some fort he brings Themistocles unto an ill name and opinion of leaudnesse, in that he attributeth unto himselfe a counsell which was none of his owne, but the invention of Mnesiphilus? And afterwards deriding still the Greeks more and more, he faith that Themistocles was no such wife man, as to fee what was good and expedient, but failed in his forelight, notwithstanding that for his prudence and cunning he caried the furname of uliffes. Mary, lady Artemifia borne in the 10 fame city that Herodot us was, without the prompting or teaching of any person, but even of her own head, fortold Xerxes that the Greeks could not hold out long, nor make head against him, but would disband and disperse themselves, & every one sie home unto his owne city: Neither it is like (quoth the) if you march with your army by land unto Peloponnes us, that they will be quiet and fit still, and take no care to fight at sea for the Athenians : Whereas, Sir, if you make haft to give them a navall battell, I feare me greatly that if your armada receive any foile or damage, it wil greatly prejudice your land forces. But here Herosotus wantednothing but his propheticall veries, to make Artemifia another Sibylla, prophefying of things to come fo exactly. Well in regard of this advertisement Xerxes gave her commission to carry his children with her to the city of Ephelic: for he had fogotten belike, to bring any women with him from his toi-20 all city of Sufa, in case his children needed a convoy of women to conduct them. But I make no account of fuch lies as these which he hath devised against us: yet let us onely examine a little what flanders he hath raifed upon others. He faith that the Athenians give out, how adimanus the captaine of the Corinthians, when the enimies were at the point of giving the charge, and joining battell, in great feare and aftonishment fled, not by shoving the ship backeward at the poupe by little and little after a foft maner of retreat, nor yet making way of evaluon and escape closely and with filence through his enimies; but hoising up and spreding full faile, and turning the proces and beake heads about of all his veffels at once. And then there was a fregat or fwift pinnace fent out after him, which overtooke him about the coasts of Salamis, our of which one cried out unto him: What Adimantus, doe you flie indeed, and have you abando-30 ned and betraied the Greeks? And yet they have the better hand, according as they made their praiers unto the gods for to vanquish their enemics. Now this fregat, we must thinke verily came downe from heaven: for what need had he to use any such tragique engine, or fabricke to worke fuch feats, who every where elfe furpaffeth all the Poets tragicall in the world, for lying and vanity. Well Adimantus believing the faid voice, was reclaimed and returned againe to the armada, when all was done, and the businesse dispatched by others to his hands. Thus goes the bruit and speech among the Athenians. But the Corinthians confessenot so much, faying that they themselves were the formost who in the vaward gave the first onset and charged theenimies in this battell at sea : and on their side beare witnesse all the other Greeks. And thus dealeth this man in many other places: He foweth flanders here and there upon one or o-40 ther, to the end that he may not miffe but light upon fome, tall it out as it will, who may appeare most wicked. Like as in this place he speedeth very well in his purpose. For if his flander and accusation be believed, the Corinthians shall sustaine infamie: if discredited, the Athenians shall beare the dishonor: or if the Athenians have not lied upon the Corinthians, yet himselfe hath spared neither of them, but told a lie of them both. For proofe hereof, Thurgdides who bringeth in an embaffador of Athens, to contest against a Corinthian at Lacedamon, and speake bravely of their owne worthy exploits against the Medes, and namely, of the navall battell of Salamis, chargeth upon the Corinthians no matter of treason nor cowardise in abandoning their colours: for there is no likelihood, that the Athenians would have reproched the city of Corinth in fuch termes, confidering that they faw it ingraven in the third place after the 50 Lacedamonians, and those inscriptions of spoiles which woon from the Barbarians, were conlecrated to the gods. And at Salamis, they permitted them to interre and bury their dead neere to the citie fide, as who were brave warriours, and had borne themselves most valiantly in that fervice, with an infeription in Elegick verses to this effect:

Once (p.sseer) we dwelt in Corinth towne, Well watered with sea on either side: And now our bones thu Isle of renowne, Phanician ships we sunke, that here didride: The Medes so stout we slew and Persians brave,

That facred Greece from bondage we might fave. But their Cenotaph or imaginary tombe which was erected in Ishmus, carieth this Epitaph:

Loe heere we lie, who with our lives fet free

All Greece, neere brought to shamefull slaverte.

Likewise over the offerings which Diodorus one of the captaines of the Corinthian gallies, caufed to be fet up in the temple of Latona, there was this superscription:

From cruell Medes, these armes which hang in sight,

7 he mariners of Theodorus won: And as memorials of their navall fight,

To dame Latona offred them anon. Adimant us himselfe, whom Herodorus evermore doth revile and reproch, saying, That he alone of all the captaines, went away with a full purpose to flie from Artemisium, and would not flay untill the conflict; fee what honour he had:

Friendpaffenger, heere les fir Adimant Entombed, by whose prowesse valiant, All Greece is crown'd with freedome at this day, Which els had beene to thraldome brought for ay.

For neither is it like that fuch honour should have beene done unto him after his death, if hee had beene a coward and a traitour; neither would he ever have dared to name one of his daughters Nausintee, that is to say, Victoric in battell at sea; another, Acrothmien, which is as much as the First fruits of spoiles won from enemies; and a third, Alexibia, that is to say, Aide against force: also to give unto his sonne the name of Aristem, which fignifieth a brave warriour; if he had not won fome glory and reputation by worthy feats of armes. Moreover, it is not credible, I will not fay, that Herodotus, but the meanest and most obscure Carian that is, was ignorant of that glorious and memorable praier which in those daies the Corinthian dames alone of allother Grecian wives made, That it might please the goddesse Venus to inspire their husbands with the love and defire to give battell unto the Barbarians. For this was a thing commonly 30 knowen and divulged abroad, infomuch as Simonides made an Epigram engraven over those their images of braffe, which are fet up in the temple of Venus, which by report was founded in times palt by Medea, as some say, to this end, that the herselse might cease to love her husband; but as others, that Jason her husband might give over the love of one Thetis. And the said Epigram goeth in this maner:

These ladies here, whose statues stand in place. Did whilom praiers to goddeffe Venus make, In Greeks behalfe 3 that it might please her grace Them to incise, the warres to undertake. Dame Venus then, for those good womens sake To Median archers expos'd not as a pray The Greeks, nor would their Citadel betray.

Such matters as thefe, he should have written and mademention of, rather than inferted into his historie, how Aminocles killed his owne sonne. Over and besides, after he had satisfied himselfe to the ful with most impudent imputations which he charged upon Themistocles, accusing him, that he ceased not secretly to rob and spoile the Isles, without the knowledge of the other captaines joined in commission with him; in the end, taketh from the Athenians the crowne of principall valiance, and fetteth it upon the head of the Aeginets, writing thus: The Greeks having fent the first truits of their spoiles and pillage unto the temple at Delphos, demanded of Apollo in generall, whether he had fufficient, and flood content with that portion of the bootie: 50 unto whom he answered, that of all other Greeks, he had received enough, & wherewith he was well pleased: but of the Aeginets not so; at whose hands he required the chiefe prise and honor of prowesse, which they woon at the battell of Salamis. Thus you see he fathereth not upon the Scythians, the Perfians or Acgyptians his lying tale, which he coggeth and devifeth, as Aspe doth upon crowes, ravens and apes, but he uleth the very person of god Jobla Pyrbiu, for to disappoint and deprive the Athenians of the first place in honor, at the battell of Salamis; as also Themistocks

The missocles of the second, which was adjudged unto him at Isthmus or the streights of Peloponnefus for that ech captaine there, attributed the highest degree of prowesse to himselfe, and the next unto him: and thus the judgement heereof growing to no end and conclusion, by reason of the ambition of the faid captaines, he faith, All the Greeks weighed anchor and departed, as not being willing to conferre upon Themistocles the sovereigne honour of the victorie. And in his ninth and last booke, having nothing left to wreake his teene upon, and to discharge his malicious and spigntfull stomacke, but onely the Lacedamonians, and that excellent piece of service which they performed against the Barbarians before the city of Placea, he writeth, That the Lacedæmonians, who aforetime feared greatly, that the Athenians being follicited and perfua-

10 ded by Mardoniu, would for fake all other Greeks: now that the Streights of Isthmus were mured up & their country fafe enough, they tooke no further care of others, but left them at fix and feven, featting & making holiday at home, deluding the embaffadors of the Athenians, and holding them off with delaies, and not giving them their dispatch. And how is it then, that there went to Platea a thousand and five Spartans, having every one of them seven Ilotes about him, for the guard of his person? How is it (I say) that they taking upon them the adventure of so great a perill, vanquished and discomfited so many thousands of Barbarians? But hearken what a probable cause hee alledgeth: There was (quoth he) by chance, a man at Sparta, named Chilem, who came from Tegaa thither, and sojourned there, for that among the Ephori he had some friends, as betweene whom and him there was mutuall hospitalitie: He it was who

20 perswaded them to bring their forces into the field, Thewing unto them that the bulwarke and wall for the defence of Peloponnesus would serve in small stead or none, if the Athenians joined once with Mardonius; and this was it that drew Paufamas forth with his power to Place: fo that if some particular businesse haply had kept Chiless at home still in Teges, Greece had never gotten the victoric. Againe, not knowing another time what to doe with the Athenians: one while he extolleth their city on high, and another while he debaseth it as low, toffing it to and fro, saying, that being in question about the second place of honor with the Tegeats, they made mention of the Heraclida, alledging their valiant acts, which before time they had atchieved against the Amazones: the sepultures also of the Peloponnesians, who died under the very wals of the castle Cadmea; and finally that they went downe to Marathon vaunting gloriously in 30 words, and taking great joy that they had the conduct of the left wing or point of the battell,

Also a little after, he putteth downe, that Paufanias & the Spartans willingly yeelded the superioritie of command to them, and defired them to take the charge of the right wing themselves, to the end they might confront the Perfians, and give them the left; as if they had excused themselves by their disuse, in that they were woont to encounter with the Barbarians. And verily, albeit this is a meere mockerie, to fay, that they were unwilling to deale with those enemies, who were not accustomed to fight with them: yet he faith moreover, that all the other Greeks, when their captaines ledde them into another place for to encampe in, fo soone as ever their flanderds marched & advanced forward: The horfemen (quoth he) in generall fled, and would willingly have put themselves within the city Platen, but they fledde indeed as sarre as to the 40 temple of Juno. Wherein he accuse thall the Greeks together of disobedience, cowardise, and treason. Finally, he writeth that there were none but the Lacedæmonians and the Tegcates who charged the Barbarians; nor any befides the Athenians, who fought with the Thebans; depriving all other cities equally of their part in the glory of that so noble an exploit: for that there was not one of them who laid hand to worke, but fitting all still, or leaning upon their weapons hard by, abandoning and betraying in the meane time, without doing ought, those who fought for their fafetie, untill that the Phliafians, and the Megarians, though long it were fift, hearing that Paulanias had the upper hand, ranne in with more hafte than good speed, and falling upon the cavallerie of the Thebanes, where they were presently defaited and slaine, without any great adoe: But the Corinthians (quoth he)were not at this fray, but after the vic-

50 torie, keeping above on the high ground among the mountaines, by that meanes met not with the Thebanes horsemen. For the cavallery of the Thebanes, seeing the Barbatians to fly all in a rout, put themselves soorth before them, to make them way, and by this meanes very affectionately affifted them in their flight, and all in recompence and by way of thankelgiving, for footh, (for so you must take it) for those marks which were given them in their faces, within the streight of Thermopila. But in what ranke and place of this battell the Corinthians were raunged, and how they did their devoir, and quit themselves against the Barbarians before Pla.

Amid the hoft arraunged flood,
and in the battell maine,
Those who inhabit Ephyra, waterd with many a vaine
Of lively springs: Men who in seats of mariall armes extell:
And joint with them, they that in old
so Glaucus citic dwell, Faire Cotinth hight: and the se their deeds of prowess to express,
A stately gift of precious gold,
did a sterwards addresse,
And conservate to gods above in heavins: and by the same Chusch amplified their owne revowme, and their forefathers fame. For this wrote he of them, not by way of a scholasticall exercise, as if he taught a schoole in Corinth: nor as one who of purpose made a song or balad in praise of the city, but as a chronicler penning the historie of these affaires in elegiack verses to that effect. But this writer here of ours, preventeth the conviction of a loud lie, lest he might be taken therewith, by those that 20 should demaund of him in this maner: How commeth it then to passe that there be so many fepulchres, tombes, graves, and monuments of the dead, upon which the Plateans even to this day doe folemnly celebrate the anniversarie effusions, to the ghosts and soules of those that are departed, in the presence of other Greeks affiftant with them? And verily in mine opinion he feemeth yet more shamefully to charge these mations with the crime of treason, in these words following: And these sepultures or places of burial which are seene about Platea, those I meane which their posteritie and successors, being ashamed of this foule fault, that their progenitours were not at this battell, or came too late, cast up, and raised on high, every man for his part in generall, for the posteritic sake. As for Herodotus he is the onely man of all others who hath heard of this absence from the battell, which is reputed treason: But Paufanias, Ariftides, the 30 Lacedamonians and the Athenians, never knew of those Greeks who made default, and would notbe at this dangerous conflict: And yet the Athenians neither impeached the Aeginetes though they were their adverfaries, that they were not comprised within the inscription, nor yet charged and convinced the Corinthians for flying from the battell at Salamis, considering that Greece beareth witnesse against them. And verily as Herodotus himselse dothtestifie, ten yeeres after this warre of the Medes, Cleadas a citizen of Platea, to gratifie and pleasure the Aeginetes as a friend, raifed a great mount bearing their name, as if they had bene interred therein. What ailed then the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, or what moved them, being so jealous one of another about this glory as they were, that they had like to have gone together 40 by the cares presently upon the exploit performed, for erecting of a Tropæe or monument of victory, not to deprive them of the price of honor, who upon cowardly feare were either away or else fled from the service, but to suffer their names to be written upon the Tropzes, Colopes and giantlike statues erected in memorial of them, allowing them their part in the spoiles and pillage, yea and in the end cauling this Epigram or superscription to be engraven upon a publicke alter?

The Greeks in figne of noble victory,
Which they fometimes wan of the Persians host,
And to retaine the thankefull memory
That they them drave away from Gretian coast,
(So refoluse they were or elfe all had bene lost)
This common alter built to Jupitet

Surnamed hercupon Deliverer.

How now Herodotus, was it Cleades, or fome other I prayyou, who in flatterie of the Greeks, made this Epigram or Infeription? What need had they then to take fuch paines & trouble thefelves in digging the ground in vain, & by cafting up of earth raife fuch mounts & monuments for

for the age to come, when as they might fee their glory confectated and immortalized in these most conspicuous and samous memorials, dedicated to the honor of the gods? And verily Paulanias, when as he intended, as men say to usurpe tyrannicall government, in a certaine oblation which he offred in the temple of Apollo at Delphos, set this inscription;

The malice of Herodotus.

Paulanias the captaine generall
Of all the Greeks: when he had conquered
The Medes in fight, for amemoriall
This monument to Phoebus offered.

And albeit infome fort he communicated the glory of this execution with the Greeks, whose to fovereigne captaine he termed himfelfe, yet the Greeks being not able to endure it, but utterly milliking him therefore, the Lacedæmonians above the rest sent their embassadors unto Delphos, and caused the said Epigram to be cut out with a chizzell, and in lieu thereof, the names of the cities, as good reason was, to be engraven: And yet what likelihood is there, that either the Greeks should take offence and discontentment for being left out in this inscription, in case they were culpable, and privy to themselves, that they were not with others at the battell ? or the Lacedæmonians when they raced out and defaced the name of their generall and chiefe commander, cause to be written and engraved their names, who had for saken and left them in the middeft of danger? For this were a manifest indignity, and most absurd, if when Socharus Dip. mission, and all those that performed the best service in that journey, never grieved nor complaian ned that the Cythnians and Melians had their names recorded in those Tropæes, Herodot us in autibuting the honor of this battell unto three cities onely, thould dash all others out, and not fuffer their names to stand upon any Tropæes or consecrated places: For whereas there were foure battels given then unto the Barbarians, he faith, that the Greeks fled from the cape Artemilium: And at the passe or streights of Thermopyla, whiles their king and soveraigne captaine exposed himselfe to the hazzard of his life, they kept themselves close at home and sat still, taking no thought for the matter, but folemnized their Olympicke games and Carnian feats.

Moreover when he commeth to discribe the battell at Salamis, he speaketh so much of Artemiss, that he spendeth not so many words againe, in all the narraton of that navall battell, and the iffue thereof. Finally as touching the journey of Platea, he faith that all other Greeks, fit-20 ting idly at their ease, knew nothing of the field fought, before all was done, according as Pigres Arimnsias being pleasantly disposed to jest, writeth merily in verse, that there was a battell betweene frogs and mice, wherein they were agreed to keepe filence, & make no noise al the whiles they fought; to the end that no others might take any knowledge thereof: also that the Lacedamonians were no better warriors nor more valiant than the Barbarians: but their hap was to defait and vanquish them, because they were naked men and disarmed: For Xerxes himselse being present in person, if they had not beene followed with whips & scourged forward, had neverbene able to have made them fight with the Greeks; mary in this journey of Platea, having changed their hearts and courages (for needs it must be so) they were nothing inferior in boldnesse of heart, strength of body, and resolution to the Greeks; but it was the apparell, which 40 wanting armes upon it, hurt them so much & marred al, for being themselves lightly appointed and in maner naked, thay had to deale with the Lacedæmonians that were heavily armed at all pieces. What honor then or great matter of glory could redound unto the Greeks out of thefe fourebattels, in case it be so that the Lacedæmonians encountred naked and unarmed men? And for the other Greeks although they were in those parts present, yet if they knew not of the combat, untill the fervice was done to their hands: and if the tombs honored yeerely by the feverall cities belonging to them, be emptie, and mockeries onely of monuments and fepulchres; and if the trevers and alters erected before the gods, be full of false titles and inscriptions; and Herodorus onely knew the trueth; and all men in the world besides, who have heard of the Greeks, and were quite deceived by the honorable name and opinion that went of them for their 30 fingular proweffe and admirable vertue; what is their then to be thought or faid of Herodo. Surely that he is an excellent writer, and depainteth things to the life: he is a fine man; he hath an eloquent tongue: his discourses are full of grace, they are pleasant, beautifull, and artificiall: and as it was faid of a Poet or Mulician in telling his tale; how ever he hath pronounced his narration and history not with knowledge and learning, yet furely he hath done it elegantly, smoothly, and with an audible and cleare voice. And these I wis be the things that move delight and doe affect all that reade him. But like as among roles we must beware of the veni-

mous flies Cantharides: even fo we ought to take need of detractions and backebiting of his base penning likewise of things deserving great praise, which infinuate themselves and creepe under his smooth stile, polished phrase and figurative speeches: to the end, that ere webe aware we intertaine not, nor foster in our heads, false conceits and absurd opinions of the bravest men and noblest cities of Greece.

OF MVSICKE.

A Dialogue.

The persons therein discoursing: On esicrates, Soterichus, Lysias.

This treatife, little or nothing at all concerneth the Musicke of many voices according and interlaced together, which is in use and request at this day; but rather apperteineth to the ancient fashion, which consisteth in the accordand consonance of song with the sense and measure of the letter, as also with the good grace of gesture: and by the stile and maner of writing, it seemeth not to be of Plutarchs doing.

He wife of that good man Phoeion, was wont to fay, that the jewels and ornaments wherein the joied, were those stratagemes and worthy feats of armes which her husband Phoeion had atchieved i but for my part may well and truely avouch, that the ornaments not onely of my felfe in particular, but also of all my friends and kinfolke in generall, is the diligence of my schoolemaster and his affection in teaching me good literature. For this we know full well, that the noblest exploits and bravest pieces of service performed by great generals and captaines in the field, can doe no more but onely save from present perill or imminent danger, some smallar 40

mie, or some one citie, or haply at the most, one entire nation and countrey; but are not able to make either their fouldiers, or citizens, or their countreymen, better in any respect: whereas on the other fide, good erudition and learning, being the very substance indeed of felicitie, and the efficient cause of prudence and wisdome, is found to be good and profitable not onely to one family, city and nation, but generally to all mankinde. By how much therefore the profit and commodity enfuing upon knowledge and good letters is greater than that which proceedeth from all stratagemes or martiall feats; by so much is the remembrance and relation thereof more worthy and commendable. Now it fortuned not long fince, that our gentle friend Onesierates invited unto a feaft in his house, the second day of the Saturnall solemnities, certeine perfons very expert and skilfull in Musicke, and among the rest, Soterichus of Alexandria, and Ly-50 fins, one of those who received a pension from him: and after the ordinary ceremonies and complements of fuch feafts were performed, he began to make a speech unto his company after this maner: My good friends (quoth he) I suppose, that it would not beseeme a feast or banquet, to search at this time what is the efficient cause of mans voice; for, a question it is, that would require better leafure and more fobrietie: but forasmuch as the best Grammarians define voice, to be the beating or percuffion of the aire, perceptible unto the sense of hearing, and because that yesterday we enquired and disputed as touching Grammar, and sound it to be an art making prosession and very meet, to frame and shape voices according to lines and letters, yea, and to lay them up in writing, as in the treasury and storehouse of memorie; let us now see what is the second science next to it, that is meet and agreeable to the voice: and this I take to be Musicke. For a devout and religious thing it is, yea, and a principall duty belonging unto men, for to fing the praises of the gods, who have bestowed upon them alone this gift of a distinct and articulate voice: which Homer also by his testimonie hath declared in these verses:

Then all day long the Gresian youth in Jongs melodious

Be Jonght god Phoebus of his grace, to be propitious:

Phoebus I Jay, who from afarre doth shoot his arrowes nie,

They chaint and praise; who takes great joy, to heare such harmony.

Goeto therefore my masters, you that are professed Musicians, relate unto this good company here that are your friends, who was the first inventour of Musicke; what it is that time hath addedunto it afterwards; who they were that became famous by the exercise and profession of this science; as also, to how many things and to what, is the said study and practise profitable. 20 Thus much as touching that which Onesicrates our master moved and propounded; whereupon Lysias inferred againe, and said: You demand a question, good Oneserates, which hath alreadie beene handled and discussed: for the most part of the Platonique Philosophers, and the best fort of the Peripateticks have emploied themselves in the writing of the ancient Musicke, and of the corruption that in time crept into it. The best Grammarians also and most cunning Musicians, have taken great paines and travelled much in this argument; and yet there is no small discord and jarre among them, as harmonicall otherwise as they be about these points, Heraclides in his Breviarie, wherein he hath collected together all the excellent professiours of Musicke, writeth that Amphion devised first the maner of singing to the Lute or Citherne, as also the Citharædian poelie; for being the fonne of Antiope and Jupiter, his father taught him that 30 skill. And this may be proved true, by an olde evidence or record enrolled, and diligently kept in the city Sieyone, wherein he nameth certeine Priestresses in Argos, as also Poets and Musicians. In the same age, he faith, there lived Linux also of Eubea, who composed certeine lamentable and dolefull ditties; Anthes likewise of Anthedon in Baotia, who made hymnes; and Pierim borne in Pieria, who wrote poëmes upon the Muses: he maketh mention besides of Philammon a Delphian, who reduced into fongs and canticles the nativity of Latona, Diana and Apollo; and he it was who instituted first the quires and dances about the temple of spollo in Delphos. And as for Thamyris a Thracian borne, he reporteth, that of all men living in those daies, he had the sweetest brest, and sung most melodiously, insomuch as if we may believe Poets, hee challenged the Muses, & contended with them in singing. It is written moreover, that this 7 ha-40 myris compiled in verse the warre of the Titans against the Gods; as also, that Demodocus of Coreyra was an ancient Musician, who endited a poeme of the destruction of Troy, and the marriage betweene Venus and Vulcane: Semblably, that Phemius of Ithaca wrote in verse of the retume of those Greeks from Troy, who came home againe with Agamemnon. Furthermore, it is faid, that the stile of those poemes above said, was not loose and in prose, without metricall numbers, but like unto that of Steficherus and other old Poets and fong-makers, who first made naked ditties in verse, and afterwards arraied them with Musicall tunes and notes: for the same author reporteth, that Terpander a maker of fongs with notes and measures to be sung unto the Lute or Cithern, according to ech law and rule of the faid measures, adorned both his owne verses and those of Homer also, with harmonicall tunes, and fung them accordingly at the so-50 lemne games, wherein Mulicians fing one against the other for the prise : he affirmeth likewise, that the same Terpander was the first who imposed names and termes to those tunes which are to be fung to the forefaid stringed instruments : and in imitation of Terpander, Clonas first composed songs and set tunes to the fluit and other winde instruments, as also the Prosodies and sonets fung at the entrie of facrifices, and that he was a Poet who made Elegiack and Hexameter vertes; also, that Polymne from the Colophonian, who came after him, used likewise the same poemes. Now the Metricall lawes and fongs in measures, called in Greeke Nopau, which these Poets and Mulicians used to the pipe, were termed (good One fierates) in this fort, namely, Apothetos, Elegi, Comarchios, Schanton, Cepion, Dios and Trimeles: but in processe of time, were devised others beside, called Polymnastia. As for the Musicall lawes or tunes to be sung unto the stringed instrument, they were invented long time before those other belonging to pipes, by Terpinde ; for he beforetime named those of the stringed instruments, Baotius, Acolius, Trochaus, Oxys, Capion, Terpandrios and Tetraædios. Furthermore, the faid Terpander made certeine processor voluntary fongs to the Lute, in verfe. Now, that the fongs or ditties to be fung unto stringed instruments, were composed in olde time of Hexamiter verses, Timotheus giveth us to understand; for mingling the first metricall rules in his verses, he sung the Dithyrambick ditty, to the end, that he might not feeme immediatly at the first, to breake the lawes of to the ancient Mulicke. This Terpander feemeth to have beene excellent in the art of playing upon the Lute and finging to it; for wee finde upon record in ancient tables written, that foure times together, one after another, he caried the prife away at the Pythian games: and no doubt, of great antiquitie he was. Certes, Glaucus the Italian writer, will have him to be more ancient than Architochus; for so he writeth in a certeine treatise as touching the olde Poets and Musicians, faying, that he followed in the fecond place after those who instituted first fongs unto the flute and other pipes. And Alexander in his Breviarie of the Poets and Mulicians of Phrygia, recordeth Olympus to be the first man who brought into Greece the feat and skill of striking the strings of instruments, and besides, those that are called Idei Dactyli. But Hyagnis was the first by his faying, who plaied upon pipes: after him, his fonne Marfyas, and then Olympus: alfo, that 20 Terpander imitated Homer in verses, and Orpheus in song : as for Orpheus, it should seeme, that he imitated none, confidering that before him there was not one, but those Poets who made ditties and fongs to pipes, wherewith the works of Orpheus have no refemblance at all. Touching this Cloras a composer of longs and tunes for the pipe, who lived somewhat after the time of Terpander, he was a Tegewan borne, as the Arcadians fay, or rather as the Boeotians give out, a Theban. After Terpander and Clonas, Archilochus is ranged in a third place, howfoever other Chroniclers write, that Ardalus the Troezenian ordeined the Mulicke of pipes before Clanss, as also, that there was one Polymnestus a Poet the sonne of Meles a Colophonian, who made those tunes and songs which carie the name of Polymnestos and Polymneste. True it is, that those who compiled the tables and records of Musicians, make mention that Clonus deviced these two fongs or tunes named Apostneros and Schamos. Andas for the above named Polymnessus, Pin. darus and Aleman, both fong-makers, made mention of him; and they report befides, that olde Philammon of Delphos composed some of those songs and tunes to the Lute and Harpe, which be attributed unto Terpander. In fumme, the fong and musicke to the Lute and Harpe, deviled by Terpander, continued very plaine and fimple, unto the daies of Phrynis: for in olde time, it was not lawfull to fing voluntary, as now they do at their pleasure, to stringed instruments; not to transferre either harmonies or muficall numbers and measures: for according to every fong and tune, they kept a proper and peculiar tension or stretching of the strings; which is the reafon that they be called Nowa, as one would fay, Lawes, because it was not lawfull to trangresse in any of these songs or tunes, that severall kinde of tension & stretching the strings, which was 11-40 fuall and ordinary. For after that they had performed those songs which appeare ine to the pacifying of Gods wrath, they leapt immediatly to the Poetric of Homer and of others, at their pleasure, which may evidently appeare, by the procemes and voluntarie tunes of Terpander. And verily, about this time, according as Capion the scholar of Terpander reporteth, was first formed that maner of Lute or Cithern which was called Afias, for that the Lesbian Minstrels and Musicians, who bordered hard upon Asia, used such a forme : and it is faid, that Perichtus was the last plaier upon such an instrument, who wan the prise at the Carnian games at Lacedemon, of all those who were Lesbians borne: after whose death ever after, there failed in Lesbos, that continuall fuccession of such Musicians. But some there be, who are greatly deceived, to thinke that Eipponax was of the same time with Terpander; and it seemeth that even Periolitus 50 was more ancient than Hipponax. -

Having thus declared the olde metricall longs and tunes jointly together, of Mulicians to ftringed inftruments and pipes, let us turne now to fuch as properly concerne those that pettine to plaiers upon pipes alone: for it is said, that the above-named Olympus being a plaier of the flute and other pipes, and came out of Phrygia, set a song to his instrument in the honor and praise of Ippollo, and the same was called Polycephalus: and by report, this Olympus descended lineally from that first Olympus the scholar of Marsyas, who composed ditties, and set times for the worship of the gods: for this Olympus being the derling of Marsyns, and singularly loved of him, learned likewife of him to play upon the flute and other pipes, and by that meanes brought into Greece those harmonicall tunes and songs, which at this day the Greeks use at the solemne fealts of the gods. Others are of opinion, that the foresaid song or tune Polycephalus, is to be aferibed unto Crates ascholar of Olympus: but Praimas writeth, that this song came from another Olympus of later time; and as for that other kinde of fong or time, named Harmation, the first Olympus, disciple to Marsysas, by report, composed it. And some there be who holde, that Marsy as was named Masses: others say no, and that he was called Marsy as onely, being the to some of Hyagnia, who first devised the art of playing upon the flute. And that this Olympus was the authour of the muficke or tune, named Harmatias, appeareth by the table or register of the ancient Poets, collected by Glaucus: and by the fame, a man may alfo learne, that Stefichorus borne in Himera, proposed to himselfe for to imitate, neither Terpander, nor Antilochiu, ne yet Thaletos, but Olympus; using altogether the law of Musicke Harmatias, and that forme of meafure which is according to Dattylus: and that, fome fay, artieth from the loud muficke called Orthios, but others hold, that it was an invention of the Mylians, for that there were certeine ancient pipers of the Mysians. Moreover, there is another antique song or tune, called Cradius, according to which (as Hipponax faith) Mimnermus plaied: for at the beginning, the minstrels and plaiers of pipes, fung certeine Elegies, reduced into measures and metricall lawes, which ap-20 peareth by the tables and registers, that testifie what Musicians they were, that contended at the games of prife, in the festivall Panathenacke folemnities. Moreover, there was one Sacadas of Arges, a Poet that made fongs and elegies or ditties, reduced into measures, for to be fung: and reckoned hee is among the better fort of Poets, and as it appeareth upon record inthose registers, hee wanne the best game three times at the Pythian folemnities. And Pindarm himselfe maketh mention of him. And whereas there be three kindes of tunes and measures in Musicke, according to Polymness and Sacadas, to wit, the Prygian, Dorian, and the Lydian, they say, that in every one of them Sacadas made a cetteine flexion or tune, called Strophe, and taught the Chorus to fing the first according to the Dorian tune; the second after the Phrygian measures; and the third, to the Lydian mulicke: and that this maner of fong 30 was thereupon called Trimeres, by reason of the three changes or parts: Howbeit, in the tables and registers of the auncient Poets, which are to be feene at Siegone; it is observed and noted, that it was Clonas who devised this melody or muficke Trimeres. Now the first maner of mulicke, ordeined and inflituted in the city of Sparta, by Terpander, was in such fort. The second was appointed as it is most generally received, by Thaletas the Gortynian, by Xenodamus the Cytherian, Xenocritus the Locrian, Polymnest us the Colophonian, and Sacadas the Argive; as the principall authors and directors: for as these were they who instituted first at Lacedamon thenaked daunces called Gymnopedia, fo in Areadia they ordeined those that were termed Apodixer; and in Argos the Endymatics. As for Thaletas, Xenodamus, and Xenocritus, they were the Poets that composed the songs of victorie, named Pæanes : Polymness w, of the Orthian 40 canticles; and Sacadas of the elegies. Others lay, that Xenodamas was the Poet who invented the longs entituled Hyporchemara, at the found whereof, folke danced at the feafts of the gods: buthe devised northe Paranes aforesaid, as Prainas did. And even at this day, there is a sonet extant of this very fame Xenodamus, which is evidently an Hyporchema; and this kind of poefic Pindarus ufeth. Nowthat there is a difference betweene a Pæan and an Hyperchema, the works of Findarus fufficiently do shows for he hath written as wel the one as the other. Polymnessus also made fongs and ditties to the flute; and in Orthian canticles, used measures and melodie, according as our harmonicall Musicians give it out: As for us, we know not the trueth, because our ancients have left nothing in writing thereof. There is some doubt also, whether Thalet as of Candie were a Poet that made Pæans: For Glauces in faying, that he was after Archilochus, 50 writeth indeed, that he imitated his fongs; but he extended them farther, and made them longer, inserting the measures Maron and Creticus into his melodie, which Archilochus never used, nor Orphess, nor yet Terpander: for it is said, that Thales as learned this from Olympus his playing and piping, and was reputed a good Poet. As touching Xenocritus of Locres in Italy, it is not yet resolved and for certeine knowen, that he was a maker of Pæanes. Certes, it is confidently faid, that he tooke for the subject matter and argument of his Poesse heroicke deeds, informuch as forme terme his arguments Dithyrambes. Glaucus affureth us, that Thalesas was Nnnnn 2 more ancient than Xenocritus. And Olympus as Ariflocritus writeth, is reputed by Mulicians to have beene the inventor of the Musicke called Euharmonian : for before his time, al Musicke was either Diatonique, or Chromatique: and it is conjectured to have beene invented in this maner: For Olympus practifing the Diatonique Mulicke, and extending his fong otherwhiles as farre as to the note Parhypate Diatonique, sometimes from Paramela, and sometime from Mese, and surpassing Lichenos Diatonique, observed the sweetnesse and beautie of such an affection, and the composition arising of that proportion, and allowing it to be good, inferted it in the Dorian Mulicke: for he touched nothing of that which properly perteineth to the Diatonique or Chromatique kinde, neither medled he with that which concerned harmony, And these were the beginnings of the euharmonique Musicke: For first of them they put 4 10 Spondaeus, wherein no division sheweth that which is proper, unlesse a man having an cic unto a vehement Spondiasme, will conjecture and say the same to be a kinde of Diatonos, But manifest it is, that he will put a falsitie and discord, who thus setteth it downe: A falsity (I say)in that it is by one Diefus leffe than the tone or note that is next unto the prime, and a discordor diffonance: for that if a man doe fet in the power of a Toniæum, that which is proper unto a vehement Spondiasme, it will fall out that he shall place jointly together, two Diatoniques, the one simple, and the other compound, for this enharmonique reenforced, and comming thicke upon the Mese, which now adaies is so much used, seemeth not to be devised by the Poet. Thusmay a man foone perceive, if he observe and marke one very well, who plainthupon a pipe after the old maner: For by his good will, the Hemitone in the Mefe, will be in- 20 compounded. Thus you fee what were the first rudiments and beginnings of Euharmoniques: But afterwards the demi-tone, was divided and diffracted as well in Lydian as in Phrygian Muficke: and it feemeth that Olympus hath amplified and augmented Musicke, because he brought in that which never yet was found, and whereof his predeceffors all were ignorant; fo that he may very well be thought the Greekish and elegant Musician. Semblably we are to speake of the numbers and measures in Musicke called Rhythmi: for devised there were and found out to the rest, certeine kinds and speciall forts of Rhythmi, as also there were those who ordeined and instituted such measures and numbers. For the former innovation of Terpander, brought one very good forme into Mulicke: Polymnestus after that of Terpander another: which he used, and yet he adhered also to that good forme and figure before. Semblably did 30 Thaletas and Sacadas: And these men verily were sufficient in making of these Rhythmi, and yet departed not from that good and laudable forme: But Crexus, Timotheus, and Philoxenus, and those about their age, were overmuch addicted to new devices, and loved novelties, in affeeting that figure which in these daies is called Philanthropon, that is to say, humane; and Thematicon, that is to fay, positive. For antiquitie embraced few strings, simplicitie also, and gravity of Musicke. Thus having according to my skill & ability discoursed of the primitive Musicke, and of the first authors who invented it, and by what inventions in processe of time it grewto fome meane perfection, I will breake off my speech, and make an end, giving leave to our friend Soterichus for to speake in his turne, who is a man not onely well studied in Musicke, and as well practifed therein, but also throughly seene in all other learning, & liberal literature. For mine 40 owne part I am better acquainted with the fingring Musicke & manuall practise than otherwise.

Of Musicke.

When Lysian had thus said, he held his peace: and then Soterichus after him began thus: You have heere good Onesterates mooyed and exhorted us to discourse of Musicke, a venerable science, and a profession right pleasing to the gods: and for mine owne part, I greatly approove of my master Lysias, as well for his good conceit and knowledge, as for his memorie, whereof he hath given us a fufficient proofe, by reciting the authors and inventors of the first Musicke, and the writers also thereof. This will I put you in minde by the way, that in all his proofes he hath reported himselfe, to the registers and records of those who have written thereof, and to nothing elfe. But I am of a farre other minde, and thinke verily that no earthly man was the inventour of this fo great good, which Musicke bringeth with it unto us, but even 50 god Apollo himselfe, who is adorned with all maner of vertues. For neither Marlyas, nor Olympus, ne yet Hyagnis, as some doethinke, devised the use of the flute and pipe, no more than both of the one and the other: the lute or harpe onely was the invention of dpollo: for this god deviled the play which may eafily be known by the daunces, and folemnities of factitices, which were brought in with the found of hautboies and flutes, to the honour of that god: according as Alcess among many others, hath left written in one of his hymnes:moreover, his very image in the Isle of Deles testifieth as much, where he is portraied standing thus; holding in his right hand a bow, and in his left the Graces, and every one of them hath an inftrument of Mulicke; the one an harpe or lute; another the shaulme or hauthoies; and she in the middes a flute or shrill fife neere unto her mouth. And because I would not have you to thinke, that I have picked this out of mine owne fingers ends; both Anticles and Hifter in their Commentaries, and Elucidarres, of these things doe quote and alledge as much. As for the image aforefaid, and the dedication thereof, fo auncient it is, that by report, it was made and erected in the time that Hercules lived. Moreover, the childe that bringeth the lawrell out of the valley of Tempe to the citie of Delphos, is accompanied with a piper or plaier of the hauthoies: yea and the facrifices which were woont in old time to befent from the Hyperboreans into the Isle of Delos, went with a fort of hauthoies, flutes, pipes, and lutes or ftringed inftruments about them. And sometherebe who say more than this, namely, that god Apollo himselfe plaied upon the flute and hautboies. And thus writeth Aleman an excellent Poet, and maker of sonners. And Comma faith furthermore, that Apollo was taught by Minerva, for to pipe. See how honourable and facted every way Muficke is, as being the very invention of the gods. And in olde time they used it with great reverence, and according to the dignitic thereof, like as they did all other fuch exercises and professions: whereas in these daies men rejecting and disdaining the majestie that it hath, in stead of Musicke, manly, holy and acceptable to the gods, bring that into the theaters, which is effeminate, enervate, broken, puling and deceitfull. And therefore 20 Plate in this third booke of his Common weath, is offended with fuch Musicke, and utterly resecteth the Lydian harmonie, which is meet for mones and lamentations, like as it is faid, that the first institution and making thereof was lamentable: for Aristoxenus in his first booke of Mulicke reporteth, that Olympus founded with the hautboies a dolefull and funerall dumpe in Lydian Musicke, upon the death of Python. And others there be who affirme, that Melanippides began first this tune. Pindaras in his Pæans saith, that this Lydian Musicke began first to be taught at the wedding of Niebe: others, that one Torebus used first this harmonic, according as Dunysius Iambus writeth. The Myxolydian Musicke also, is full of affection, and in that regard meet for tragedies. Arifoxenu writeth, that Sappho invented first this Myxolydian harmonie, of whom the tragedie makers learned it, and joined it with the Dorian: for that as 30 the one giveth a certeine dignitie and stately magnificence, so the other mooveth affections: and a tragedy you wot well is mixed of them both: Howbeit, in their rolles and registers, who have written of Musicians, it is said, that Pythoclides, the plaier of the hauthoies, was the first inventer of this Muficke, But Ly/is referreth the invention thereof to Lamproeles the Athenian, who having found and perceived, that the disjunction is not there where in maner all others thinke it is, but toward that which is high and fmall, made such a forme and figure thereof, as is from Para-mese to Hypate Hypaton. Likewise the Sublydian Musicke, if it be contrary unto the Myxolydian, and in refemblance comming neere unto the Ionique, was by report deviled by Damon the Athenian: Nowe because of these two harmonies, the one is mournfull and lamentable, the other diffolute and enervate; Plato had good reason to reject 40 them both : andtherefore he chose the Dorian , as that which is most beseeming valiant , sober and temperate men: not , I affure you because hee was ignorant (as Aristo xenus faith, in his fecond booke of Mulicians and Mulicke) that in the other there was some thing good for acommon-wealth, and circumspect pollicie: (for Plate had much applied his minde unto Mulicke, as having beene the scholar of Draco the Athenian, & Metellus the Agrigentine) but confidering as we have faid before, that there was more gravity and dignitic in the Dorian Muficke, he preferred the same before the rest. And yet he wish well enough, that Pindarus, Aleman, Simonides, and Bacebylides, had written and fet many other Parthenies to the Dorian Musicke: besides Prosodies and Pæans also. Neither was he ignorant, that tragical plaints, and dolefull mones, yea, and amatorious ditties, were composed for to be fung in this Dorian tune. 50 But he ftood fufficed and contented with those which were endited to the praise of Mars and Minerva, and with Spondaes; for these are sufficient to fortifie &confirme the minde of a temperate and lober man. Neither was he unskilfull in the Lydian Muficke, nor the Ionian; for he knew well enough that the traggedie used this kinde of melodie. Moreover, all our ancients before time, being not unexpert of all other kinds of Mulicke, yet contented themselves with the useof one. For ignorance or want of experience, was not the cause that they ranged themselves into fo narrow aftreight. & were contented with fo few strings: neither are we to thinke that Ter-Nnnnn 3

pander and Olympus, and they that followed their fect; for default of skill and experience, cut off the multiplicitie of strings, and their varietie. Witnesse heereof the Poems of Terpander Olympus, and all their followers, and fuch as tooke their course: for being but simple, and having no more than three strings, yet are they more excellent than those which consist of manie ftrings, and be full of varietie; in fuch fort, as no man is able to imitate the maner of Olympus; and all those who use many strings and varietie, be farre short, and come behinde him. Now that our ancients in old time absteined from the third, in that Spondcaik kinde, not upon ignorance, they shew sufficiently in the use of striking the strings: for never would they have used the accord and consonance with Pare-hypate, if the use thereof had beene unknowen unto them: but certeine it is, that beauty of affection which is in the Spondeaik kinde, by the third, to was it that led their fense to raise & exalt their note and song to Paranete: and the same reason also there is of Nete: For this verily they used to their stroke of the instrument, to wit, unto Pa. ranete in discord, & unto Mese in accord. But in song they seemed not unto them, proper and fit for the Spondeaik kinde. And not onely in these, but also in Nete of the Tetrachord conjunct, all used so to doe: For in the very stoake of the strings, they disaccorded with Paranete. Paramefe, and Lichanos, but in fong, they were ashamed thereof, for the very affection that refulted thereupon. Moreover, it appeareth manifeltly by the Phrygians, that this was not for any ignorance of Olympus, or his fecturies: for they used it not onely in fingring, and in the stroake of the stringes, but also in singing at the solemne feasts of the great mother of the gods, Cybile, and in some other Phrygian solemnities. It appeareth also mani- 20 feftly, by the Hypates, that it was not for ignorance that in the Dorian tunes they forbare this Tetrachord, for incontinently in other tunes they used it : so that it is evident that they did it wittingly but to avoide affection they tooke it out of the Dorique Musicke, honoring the beauty and honesty thereof: as we may observe some such like thing in tragicall Pocts. For never yet to this very day, did the tragedy use Chromaticke musicke, nor rhyme: whereas the citherne or lute, which by many ages is more ancient than the traggedy used it even from the very beginning. And evident it is that Chroma is of greater antiquity than is Harmony. For we must account this antiquity, whereby the one is said to be more ancient than an other, according to the use & practife of men, because in regard of the nature of these kinds one is not elder than another. If then some one would say, that Aefchylus or Phrynichus forbareto 30 use Chromaticke Musicke upon ignorance, & for that they knew it not, were he not thinke you very abfurd and much deceived? For the fame man might as well fay that Panerates also was ignorant of this Chromaticke kind, because for the most part he forbare to use it; and yet in some places he used it. So that it was not for want of knowledge, but of set purpose, and upon judgement that he abstained from it. He imitated then, as he faith himselfe, the maner of Pindarus and Simonides, and in one word, that which the moderne Musicians call the ancient Musicke. The like reason there is of Tyrtaus the Mantinean, of Andreas the Corinthian, Thrasyllus the Phliafian, and of many others whom we know upon good confideration to have absteined from the Chromaticke, from change and multiplicity of strings, yea and many other things interferted which are in common use, namely rhymes, harmonies, ditties, songs, and interpretations. 40 And not to goe far for proofe hereof, Telephanes the Megarian was fo great an enimy to flutes, fifes, and small pipes, that he would never abide the artificers and pipe-makers so much as to fer them to the shawme and hautboies; and for this cause especially, he forbare to come unto the Pythicke or Apollican games of prife. In summe, if a man will conjecture that if a thing be not used, it is long of ignorance, he might condemne of ignorance many of those who live in these daies; as for example the Dorioneans, because they despise the Antigenidian kinde of Musicke, for that they used it not. To the Antigenidians likewise they might impute ignorance of the Dirionian Mulicke, for the fame cause, as also the minstrels & harpers, as ignorant of the maner of Timothem his Musicke. For they have in maner all betaken themselves to patcheries and fallen to the Poëmes of Polydius. On the other fide, if a man confider aright, and with ex-50 perience make comparison betweene that which then was and that which now is, he shall finde that variety and diversity was in use and request even in those daics also. For the ancient Musicians used in their numbers and measure, their variety, much more diverse & different than now it is. So that we may boldly fay that the varietic of rhymes, the difference also and diversitie of strokes was then more variable. For men in these daies love skill and knowledge, but in former times they affected numbers and measures. So that it appeareth plainely that the ancients ab-

flained from broken Muficke and fong, not because they had no skill, but for that they had no will to approve thereof. And no mervell: for many fathions there be in the world and this our life, which are well enough knowen, though they be not practifed: mary strange they be by reason of disule, which grew upon occasion that some thing was observed therein, not decent & feemly. But, that it was not for ignorance, nor want of experience, that Plate rejected other kindes of Musicke, but onely because they were not beseeming such a common wealth of his, we will show hereafter : and withall that he was expert and skilfull in harmony : For in that procreation of the foule which he describeth in the booke of Timess, he declareth what fludy he hademploied in other Mathematicall studies and in Musicke besides, writing after this maner: to Thus in maner (quothhe) did God at the first : And after that, he filled the double and treble intervals, in cutting off one portion from thence, and putting it betweene both of them: in fuch fort as in everie intervall or distance, there were two moities. Certes, this Exordium or Proceme, is a sufficient proofe of skill and experience in harmonic, according as wee will shew heereafter. Three forts of primitive medicties there be, out of which all other bee drawen, to wit, Arithmeticall, Geometricall, and Harmonicall. Arithmeticall is that which furmounteth, and is furmounted in equal number: Geometricall, in even proportion: and Harmonicall neither in reason and proportion nor in number. Plato therefore intending to declare harmonically, the harmony of the foure elements of the foule, and the cause why things fo divers accorded together: in each intervall hath put downe two medicties of the foule, 20 and that acording to mulical proportion. For in the accord Diapason in Musicke, two intervals there are betweene two extremities, whereof we will them the proportion. For the accord Diapalon confifteth in a double proportion: as for example, fix and twelve, will make a double proportion in number: And this intervall, is from Hypate Meson, unto Nete Diezeugmenon: Now fix and twelve being the two extremities: Hypate Meson conteineth the number of fix, and Nete Diezeugmenon that of twelve. It remaineth now, that we ought to take unto thefe the meane numbers betweene these two extremities; the extreames whereof will be found, the one in proportion Epitritos or ferfquitettian, the other Hemiotios, or fefquialterall. And thefe be numbers eight and nine. For eight is ferquitertian to fix and nine, fefquialterall. Thus much as touching one of the extreames. As for the other which is twelve, it is above nine in fef-30 quitertian proportion, and above eight in sesquialterall. These two numbers then, being betweene fix and twelve, and the intervall Dappalon compounded and confifting of Diatefferon and Diapente, it appeareth that Mele shall have the number of eight, and Paramele, the number of nine: which done there will be the fame habitude, from Hypate and Mefe, that is from Paramefeto Nete, of a disjoint Tetrachord. The fame proportion is found also in numbers, for the same reason that is from fix to eight, is from nine to twelve, and looke what reason there is betweene fix and nine, the same is betweene eight and twelve. Now betweene eight and fix the proportion is sesquitertian, as also betweene twelve and nine. But betweene nine and fix, sesquialterall, like as betweene twelve and eight. Thus much may ferve to flew that Plato was well studied and very expert in the Mathematicks.

Now that harmony is a venerable, worthy and divine thing, Artstotle the describe of Plato tellifieth in these words: Harmony (quoth he) is celestiall, of a beautifull and wonderfull nature and more than humaine: which being of it felfe divided into foure, it hath two medicties, 40 the one arithmeticall, the other harmonicall; and of the parts thereof the magnitudes and extremities are seene according to number and equality of measure: for accords in fong are appropriat and fitted in two Tetrachords. These be the words of Aristotle: who said that the body of harmony is composed of parts dislike, and accordant verily one with the other, but yet the medicties of the same agree according to reason arithmeticall: for that Nete according to Hypate, by double proportion maketh an accord and confonants of Diapafon: For it hath as we have before faid, Nete of twelve unities, and Hypate of fix, & Paramete according with Hypa-50 te, in proportion sesquialterall of nine unities. But of Mese, we say, that it hath eight unities: &the principal intervals of Musicke are composed of these: to wit, Diateslaron, which consists ethof a proportion felquitertian, & of Diapente, which standeth upon a fesquialterall: and Dia-Palon of a duple : For to is preserved the proportion sequinoctave, which is according to the proportion Tonizus. Thus you fee how the parts of harmony doe both furmount and also are furmounted of other parts, by the same excesse: and the medieties of medieties, as well according to expresse in numbers, as Geometricall puissance. Thus Aristotle declareth them to have these and such like powers, namely that Nete surmounteth Mese by a third part, and that Hypate is semblably surmounted of Paramese: in such fort as these excesses, are of the kindeof Relatives, which have relation to another: for they furmount and be furmounted by the fame parts. And therefore by the same proportion the two extreames of Mese and Paramese, doe furmount, and be furmounted, to wit sesquitertian and sesquialterall. And after this sort is the harmonicall excesse. But the excesse of Nete and Mese by arithmeticall proportion, sheweth the exuperances in equall partie: and even so Paramese in proportion to Hypate: for Paramefe furmounteth Mesein proportion sesquioctave: Like as againe Nete is a double proportion of Hypate: and Paramele of Hypate in proportion sesquialterall: and Mese sesquitertian in regard of Hypate. See then how harmony is composed according to Aristotle himselfe, of her 10 parts and numbers. And so verily by him it is composed most naturally of a nature as well finit as infinit: both of even and also of od, it selfe and all the parts thereof: for it selfe totally and whole is even, as being composed of foure parts or termes: the parts whereof and their propor. tions, be even, od, and even not even. For Nete it hath even of twelve unities: Paramese od of nine unities: Mese even of eight unities, and Hypate even not even of six unities. So that harmony thus composed both it selfe and the parts thereof one to the other, as well in excesse as in proportions, the whole accordeth with the whole and the parts together. And that which more is, the very fenfes being inferted and ingraffed in our bodies by harmony, but principally those which are celestiall and divine, namely sight and hearing, which together with God give understanding and discourse of reason unto men with the voice and the light, doe represent har- 20 mony: yea and the other inferrior fenses which follow them, in as much as they be senses, are likewife composed by harmony: for all their effects they performe not without harmony, and howfoever they be under them and leffe noble, yet they yeeld not for all that: for even they entring into the body accompanied with the presence of a certaine divinity, together with the discourse of reason, obtaine a forcible and excellent nature. By these reasons evidentitis that the ancient Greeks, made great account, and not without good cause, of being from their infancie well instructed and trained up in Musicke: for they were of opinion, that they ought to frame and temper the mindes of young folke unto vertue and honesty by the meanes of Musicke, as being right profitable to all honest things, and which wee should have in great recommendation, but especially and principally for the perillous hazzards of warre: In which 30 case some used the Hauthoies, as the Lacedæmonians, who chaunted the song called Casterium, to the faid instruments, when they marched in ordinance of battell, for to charge their enimies. Others made their approch, for to encounter and give the first onset, with the noise of the Lyra that is to fay, the harpe or fuch like stringed instruments. And this we finde to have bene the practife of the Candiots for a long time, for to use this kinde of Musicke, when they fer forth and advanced forward to the doubtfull dangers of battell. And some againe continue even to our time in the use of Trumpets sound. As for the Argives, they went to wrestle at the folemne games in their city called Sthenia with the found of the Hauthoies. And these games, were by report instituted at first in the honor and memory of their king Danasse: and afterwards againe were confectated to the honor of Jupiter furnamed Sthenius. And verily even at this 40 day, in the Pentathlian games of prife, the maner and custome is to play upon the Hauthoics, and to fing a fong thereto, although the same be not antique nor exquisite, nor such as was wont to be plaied and fung in times past as that Canticle composed sometime by Hierax, for this kinde of combat, and named it was Eudrome. Well though it be a faint and feeble maner of fong, yet fornewhat, fuch as it was, they used with the Hautboies. And in the times of greater antiquity it is faid that the Greeks did not fo much as know Theatricall Musicke, for that they emploied all the skill & knowledge thereof in the service and worship of the gods,&in the inititution and bringing up of youth, before any Theater was built in Greece by that people : but all the Musicke that yet was, they bestowed to the honor of the gods and their divine service in the temples, also in the praises of valiant and woorthy men: So that it is very probable that 50 these termes Theater afterwards, and beopen, long before were derived of bees, that is to say, God. And verily in our daies, Musicke is growen to such an heigth of difference and diversity, that there is no mention made, nor memory remaining of any kinde of Mulicke for youth to be taught, neither doth any man fet his minde thereto, or make profession thereof: but looke who soever are given to Musicke, betake them selves wholy to that of Theaters for their delight. But some man may haply say unto me: What good fir, thinke you that in old time they devised no new Musicke and added nothing at all to the former? Yes I wis, I confesse they did adjoine thereto some new inventions, but it was with gravity and decency. For the historians who wrote of these matters, attributed unto Terpander the Dorian Nete, which before time they used not in their songs and tunes: And even so it is said that the Myxolidien tune was wholly by him devised to the rest: as also the note of the melody Orthien: and the song named Orthius, by the Trochæus, for sounding the all arme and to encourage unto battell.

And if it be true as Pindar w faith, Terpander was the inventour of those songs called Scolia, which were fung at feafts. Archilochus also adjoined those rhymes or Iambicke measures called Trimetra: the translation also and change into other number and measures of a different kinde, 10 yea, and the maner how to touch and strike them. Moreover, unto him, as first inventour, are attributed the Epodes, Tetrameter, Iambicks, Procritique and Profodiacks; as alfo, the augmentation of the first, yea, and as some thinke, the Elegie it selfe: over and besides, the intension of Iambus unto Paran Epibatos, & of the Herous augmented both unto the Profodiaque & alfothe Creticke. Furthermore, that of Iambique notes, fome be pronounced according to the stroke, others sung out. Archilochus was the man, by report, who shewed all this first, and afterwards, tragicall Poets used the same : likewise it is said, that Crexus receiving it from him, transported it to be used at the Bacchanall songs, called Dithyrambs. And he was the first also, by their faying, who devised the stroake after the fong; for that beforetime they used to sing, and strike the strings together. Likewise unto Polymnestus is ascribed all that kinde of note or 20 tune which now is called Hypolydius, and of him they fay, that he first made the drawing out of the note longer, and the diffolution and ejection thereof much greater than before. Moreover, that Olympus, upon whom is fathered the invention of the Greeke muficke, that is tied to lawes and rules, was hee who first brought, by their faying, all the kinde of harmonic, and of rhymes or measures, the Prosodiaque, wherein is conteined the tune and song of Mars; also the Charies, whereof there is great use in the solemnities of the great mother of the gods: yea, and some there be, who make Olympus the authour also of the measure Bacchius. And thus much concerning every one of the ancient tunes and fongs. But Lafus the harmonian, having transferred the rhymes into the order of Dithyrambs, and followed the multiplicitie in voice of hautboies, in using many founds and those diffused and dispersed to and fro, brought 30 a great change into Musicke, which never was before. Semblably, Melanippides who came after him, conteined not himselse in that maner of Musicke which then was in use, no more than Philoxenus did & Timotheus for he, whereas beforetime unto the daies of Terpander the Antiffæan, the harpe had but feven strings, distinguished it into many more founds and strings: yea, and the found of the pipe or hauthoies, being simple and plaine before, was changed into a Musicke of more distinct varietie. For in oldetime, unto the daies of Melamppides a Dithyrambicke Poet, the plaiers of the hautboies were wont to receive their falaries and wages at the hands of Poets, for that Poetrie you must thinke, bare the greatest stroke, and had the principal place in Musicke and acting of places, so as the Minstrels before faid were but their ministers: but afterwards, this custome was corrupted; upon occasion whereof, Pherecrates the Comicall 40 Poet bringeth in Musicke in forme and habit of a woman, with her bodie piteously scourged and mangled all over : and he devifeth befides , that Dame Justice demandeth of her the cause why, and how the became thus inituled; unto whom Poelie or Mulicke maketh answere in this wife:

Musicke.

I will glady tell, fine i hat we pleasure take Ton for to heare, and I to answer make:
One of the first, who didme thus displease
And worke my woe, was Melanippides;
He with we've string; my bodie whipt so fore,
That soft it is, and looser than before.
Tes was this man unto me tolerable
And not to the se my hurnes now, comparable.
For one of Athick land, Cynesias he,
Shame come to him, and cursed may hebe,
By making twines and winding cranks so strange
In all his strophes, and shose withous the range

Of harmony; hathme perverted fo, That where I am, unneth I now do kno. His Dithyrambs are framed in such guise, That left feeme right, in shield and tar quet wife. And yet of him one can not truly fay, That cruelly he meant me for to flay. Phrynis it was who fet to me a wrest (His owne device) that I could never rest: Wherewith he did me winde and writhe fo hard, That I well neere for ever was quite marr'd. Out of five strings for footh he would devise No fewer than twelve harmonies to rife: Well of this man I cannot most complaine, For what he mist, he soone repair a againe. Timotheus (weet Lady (out alas) Hath me undone: Timotheus it was, Most shamefully who wrought me all despite, He hath me torne, he hath me buried quite.

Justice.
And who might this Timotheus be (deere hart)
That was the cause of this thy wofull smart?

Imeane him of Miletus, Pytthias Surnam d, his head and haire fo ruddy was.
Thus fellow brought upon me forrowes more Than all the rest whom I have nam d before.
A fort he of unpleasant quavers brings,
And running points, when as he plates or sings:
He never meets me when I walke alone
tipon the way, but me assailed sanone.
Off go my robes, and thus devessed hare
He teaver me with twelve strings, andmakes no spare.

Aristophanes also the Comicall Poet maketh mention of Philosense, and saith, that he brought songs into the dances called Rounds: and in this maner he deviseth, that Musick should speake and complaine:

What with his Exharmonians, Niglars and Hyperbolians, And Juch loud notes, I wot not what, He hash me fluft fo full, as that My voice is britsle when I speake, Likeradish root that soone will breake.

Semblably, other Comicall Poets have blasoned and set our in their colours, our moderne Muficians, for their absurd curiositie, in hewing and cutting Musicke thus by peace-meale, and min-40 cing it so small. But that this science is of great power and efficacie, a swell to set strait and reforme, as to pervert, deprawe and corrupt youth in their education and learning, Aristocemus hath made very plaine and evident: for he saith, that of those who lived in his time, Telesius the Theban happened when he was yoong, to be brought up and instructed in the most excellent kinds of Musicke, and to learne many notable ditties and songs; among which, those also of Pindarus, of Dionysius the Theban, of Lamprus, Pratinus and other Lyricall Poets, singular men in their facultie, and prosession of playing cunningly upon the harpe and other stringed instruments. He had learned likewise to sound the hautboies passing well, and was sufficiently exercited and practifed in all other parts of good literature: but when he was once past the flower and middle of his age, he became so farre rivished and caried away with this Scenicall musicke so sufficiently exercited, that he despised that excellent musicke and poesse wherein he was nourtred, & all for to learne the ditties and tunes of Philoxenus and Timosheus, and principally such of them as had most varietie and noveltie: and when he betooke himselfe to compose ditties and set songs.

making triall what he could do in both kinds, aswell in that of Pindarus and this of Philosenus, he was able to performe nothing wel and to the purpose in that Musicke of Philoxenus: the reafon whereof, was his excellent education from his infancie. If then a man be defirous to use muficke well and judicioufly, let him imitate the olde maner: and yet in the meane while furnith the same with other sciences, learne Philosophie, as a mistresse to guide and leade; for thee is able to judge what kinde of measures is meet for musicke, and profitable. For whereas three principal points and kinds there be, unto which all musicke is universally divided, to wit, Diatonos, Chroma and Harmonie, he ought to be skilfull in Poetrie, which ufeth these severall kinds, who commeth to learne Muficke; and withall, he must atteine to that sufficiencie, as to know 10 how to expresse and couch in writing his poeticall inventions, First and formost therefore he is to underst and, that all musicall science is a certeine custome and usage, which hath not yet atteined to farre as the knowledge to what end every thing is to be leatned by him that is the scholar. Next to this it would be confidered, that to this teaching and instruction, there be not yet adjoined presently the enumeration of the measures & maners of musicke. But the most part learner as fully and without discretion, that which seemeth good & is pleasant either to the learner or the teacher; as the Lacedæmonians in old time, the Mantineans likewife and the Pellenians: for these, making choise of one maner above the rest, or els of very few, which they tooke to be meet for the reformation and correction of maners, used no other musicke but it: which more evidently may appeare, if a man will enquire and confider, what it is that every one of these sci-20 ences taketh for the subject matter to handle : for certaine it is, that the Harmonique skill conteineth the knowledge of intervals, compositions, sounds, notes and mutations of that kinde which is named Hermofmenon, that is to fay, well befitting and convenient: neither is it possible for it to proceed farther. So that, we must not require nor exact of her, that she should be able to discerne whether a Poet hath well, properly and fitly used (for example sake in musicke) the Hyperdorian tune in his entrance; the Mixolydian and the Dorian at his going forth; and the Phrygian or Hypophrygian in the mids: for this perteineth not at all to the subject matter of the Harmonicke kinde, and hath need of many other things: for he knoweth not well the force of the proprietie. And if hebe ignorant of the Chromaticke kinde and Enharmonian, he shall never atteine to have the perfect and absolute power of the proprietie, according to which, the 30 affection of the measures that are made are seene : for this is the office and part of the artificer. And manifest it is, that the voice of the composition called Systema, is one thing; and the melodie or fong which is framed in the faid composition, another: which to teach and whereof to treat, perteineth not to the facultie of the Harmonicke kinde. Thus much also we are to say as touching Rhythme; for no Rhythme will ever come to have in it the power of perfect proprietie: for that alwaies which is faid to be proper, is in regard and reference to the affection; wherof weaffirme the cause to be either composition or mixtion, or els both together: like as with Olympus, the Enharmonian kinde is put in the Phrygian tune, and Paon mixed with Epibatos: for this affection of the beginning hath it ingendred and brought forth in the fong of Minerva. For when the melody and rhythme or measure was artificially fet to, & the number or rhythme 40 alone cunningly transmuted, so as a Trochæus was put in stead of a Pæon. Hercof came the Harmonicke kinde of Olympus to be composed. Yet neverthelesse, when both the Enharmonicke kinde and the Phrygian tune remaine, and befide thefe, the whole composition also, the affection received a great alteration: for that which is called Harmonie in the long of Minerva, is farre different from the affection which is in common use and experience. If he then, who is expert and skilfull in Musicke, had withall, the facultie to judge, certeine it is, that such an one would be a perfect workman, and a paffing good mafter in Muficke. For he who is skilfull in the Dorique muficke, and knoweth not how to judge and different the proprietie, he shall neverknow what he doth, nor be able to keepe fo much as the affection, confidering there is fome doubt as touching the judgement of Dorian melodies and tunes, whether they apperteine to 50 the subject matter of Harmonie or no? as some Dorians are of opinion. The like reason there is of all the Rhythmike skill; for he who knoweth Pæon, shall not incontinently know the pro-Perty of the use thereof, for a fmuch as there is fome doubt as concerning the making of Pæonik thythmes, to wit, whether the Rhythmetique matter is able to judge with diffinct knowledge of them ? or whether as some say, it doe not extend so farre? Of necessitive therefore it soloweth, that there must be two knowledges at the least in him, who would make distinction and be able to judge betweene that which is proper and that which is strange: the one of maners and affections, for which all composition is made; theother, of the parts and members of which the composition doth confist. Thus much therefore may suffice, to shew that neither the Harmonique, nor the Rhythmicke, nor any one of these faculties of Musicke, which is named particular, can be sufficient of it selfe alone to judge of the affection, or to discerne of other qualities. Whereas therefore, Hermofmenian, which is as one would fay, the decent and elegant temperature of voices and founds, is divided into three kinds, which be equall in the magnitudes of compositions, in puissances of sounds, and likewise of Tetrachords; our ancients have treated but of one: for those who went before us, never considered, either of Chroma, or Diato. nos, but onely of Enharmonios, and that onely in a magnitude of a composition, called Diapason: for of the Chroma they were at some variance and difference: but they all in maner did 10 accord to fay, that there was no more but this Harmonie alone. And therefore he shall never understand that which perteineth unto the treatise of Harmonie, who hath proceeded so farre as to this onely knowledge: but apparent it is that he ought to follow both other partitular fciences, and also the totall body of Musicke; yea & the mixtions and compositions of the parts for he that is onely Harmonicall, is confined within one kinde and no more. To speake therefore generally and once for all, it behooveth that both outward fense and inward understanding concurre to the judgement of the parts in Musicke: Neither is one to prevent & runne before another, as the fenfes doe, which are more forward and hastie than their fellowes; nor to lagge behinde and follow after, as those senses doe which are slowe and heavy of motion. And yet otherwhile in some senses it falleth out upon a naturall inæquallitie which they have, that both 20 happen at once, to wit, they draw backe, and hast forward together: wee must therefore cut off these extremities from the sense, if we would have it runne jointly with the understanding: for necessarie it is, that there be alwaies three things at the least meet together in sense of hearing, to wit, the found, the time, and the fyllable or letter. And come to paffe it will, that by the going of the found, will be known the proportionable continuitie, called Hermosmenon; by the gate of time, the Rhythme, and by the passing and proceeding of the syllable or letter, the dittie: Now when they march altogether, there must needs be an incursion of the sense. This also is evident, that the sense not being able to distinguish and discerne every one of these three things, and accompany them feverally, impossible it is, that it should know or judge that which is well or amisse, in ech of them particularly. First and foremost therefore, we are 30 to take knowledge of the coherence and continuation; for necessarie it is, that there should be in the facultie and power of judging, a certaine continual order, for as much as good and bad be not determinately in fuch founds, times, letters or fyllables, severed one from the other, but in the continued fuit and conherence of them, for there is a certeine mixture or parts which cannot be conjoined in usage. And thus much may suffice for the consequence. After this we are to confider, that men, sufficient otherwise, and skilfull masters in Musicke, are not by and by able to judge: for impossible it is to be a perfect Musician, and a judge withall, of those which seeme to be the parts of totall Musicke, as the science and skill of instruments; likewise of long, as also of the exercise of the senses, I meane that which tendeth to the intelligence & knowledge of the well proportioned Hermosmenon, and of Rhythme. Over and besides, of the 40 Rhythmick and Harmonique treatife, and of the speculation, touching the stroke and the dittie, and what other foever there are besides. But what the causes should be, that it is not possible for one to be a Critick and able to judge, by meanes of these things by themselves, let us endevour to search and know. First, by this supposall, That of those things which are propofed unto us for to be judged of, some be perfect, others imperfect: Perfect, for example, every Poeticall worke, that is either chaunted, or plaied upon the pipe, or founded on the lute and ftringed instrument; or else the interpretation or elocution of the said Poemes, which they call equius as is the noise of the pipe, or of the voice, and such like: Unperfect, as those which tend heereto, and are for them ordeined, as by the parts of that which is called interpretation. Secondly, by Poesie or fiction, whereof the case is alike; because a man may as well judge if hee 50 heare the minstrell play or fing, whether his pipes accord or no, and whether his dialect or dittiebe cleere, or contrariwise obscure; for ech of these is a part of the foresaid interpretation of pipes, not the end it selfe, but that which respecteth the end; for the affection of the interpretations shall be judged heerby, and by all such causes, whether they be well fitted & accommodate to the Poeme composed, which the agent hath taken in hand to treat of, to handle, to expresse and interpret. Semblable is the reason also of the affections and passions, which are lig-

nified in the Poemes, by Poefic. Our ancients then, as those who made principall account of the affection, preferred and esteemed best that fashion of antique Musicke, which was grave, not curious nor much affected. For it is said that the Argives did set downe in times past a punishment for those who brake the lawes of Musicke, yea, and condemned him to pay a good fine, who first used more than seven strings, & who went about to bring in the use of the Myxolydian Mulicke. But Pythagoras that grave and venerable personage, reproved all judgement of Mulicke which is by the eare, for he faid, that the intelligence and vertue thereof, was verice subtile & slender, and therfore he judged thereof, not by hearing, but by proportionall harmonie: and he thought it sufficient to proceed as farre as to Diapason, and there to stay the know-10 ledge of Mulicke: Whereas Mulicians in these daies disesteeme and reject wholly that kinde of Mulicke which was in greatest reputation among our ancestors, for the gravitie thereof: infomuch as the most part of them make no reckoning of any apprehension of Euharmonian intervals and spaces. So idle and lazie they be, that they thinke and say, the harmonicall diesis giveth no apparence at all, nor representation of those things that fall under the sense of hearing; yea, and banish it quite out of their tunes and songs, counting those no better than prating, vaine, and toyifh persons, who have either written or spoken thereof, or used that kinder and for proofe heereof, that they fay true, they suppose they have found a doubty good argument and demonstration, drawen from their owne groffe stupiditie and senselessie, as it all that which their sense apprehended not, must needs incontinently have no subsistence at all in 20 nature, and be altogether unprofitable. And then moreover they hold, that there can no magnitude be apprehended by fymphonie and confonance of voice, as the note, the halfe note, and other fuch intervals. Meane while they doe not perceive (fuch is their ignorance) that they may as well banish the third magnitude, the fifth, and the seventh; whereof the first consisteth of three, the second of five, and the third of seven Dieses: and generally they should reject and reproove all the intervals that be odde, as superfluous and good for nothing: inasmuch as none of them can be found by confent or fymphonie. And thefe they may be, which the least Diefis doeth measure in odde number: whereupon it followeth necessarily, that no division of the Tetrachord, is profitable, but this onely, by which we may use all even intervals: and this verily were that of Syntonos, Diatonos, and Tonizan Chroma. But to give out, or to conceive 20 fuchthings, were the partnot of those onely who contradicted that which is apparent and evident, but also of such as went against themselves: for they use more than any other such partitions of Tetrachords, wherein all the intervals be either odde or else proportionable to those that be odde: for evermore they mollifie all the notes, called Lichani, and Paranete: yea, and they let downe a little, those very notes which are stedfast and firme, by I wot not what intervall, without al reason; and together with them, they let flacke also very absurdly, the Thirds and the Paranetæ, & they suppose that the use of such compositions is most commendable, wherein the most part of the intervals, be without al reason & proportion, by letting downe not onely those founds which naturally are woont to stir & bemooved, but also some of them which are innumerable: as appeareth manifestly to those who are sufficient and able to judge of such things. To come now to the use of Musicke, how meet and seemely it is for a valiant man; gentle Homer hath given us very well to understand: for to proove unto us how commodious Musicke

To come now to the use of Mussicke, how meet and seemely it is for a valiant man; gentle Homer hath given us very well to understand; for to proove unto us how commodious Mussicke is in many respects, he seigned and devised Achilles to concoct his anger which he had conceived against Agamemon, by the meanes of Mussicke, which he had learned of that most prudent and wise Chiron: for thus he writeth:

They found him then, within his tent, with found of lute fo fertil.

His heart that was now his content, to folice and to fill:

Aninstrument right faire in fight this was, and trimly wrought:

The necke with filver richly dight, which he himfelfe had caught
Out of the fipoles there larely won of Thebes, that flately won of Thebes, that flately won, and citie of Ection, when it was rated downe:

Hecrewith

Of Musicke.

Heerewith I say, he pass d his time, this was his hearts delight, He sung withall the praise in rhyme of many a valiant knight.

Note heereby and learne (quoth Homer) what use we ought to make of Musicke: for he sung unto the lute, the noble exploits of brave men, and the glorious acts of woorthies and demigods: a thing that full well befeemed Achilles the sonne of most righteous Peleus. Over and befides, Homer teaching us the proper and convenient time of using Musicke, found out an exercife, both profitable and pleafant for a man at leifure, and not occupied otherwife in affaires. For schilles being a martiall man of action, yet for the anger that he had conceived against 10 Agamemnon, had no hand in the perils and hazards of warre: Homer thought therefore that it became very well this heroique and hardy knight, to whet his courage by these excellent songs, to the end that he might be provided and ready against that fallie and skirmish which soone after he undertooke: and this no doubt he performed very well, by calling to remembrance the doubty deeds and feats of armes achieved by others in times past. Such verily was the ancient Musicke, and for this purpose it served. For we doe heare that both Hercules made use of Musicke, and also Achilles, with many other valourous knights, whom Chiron that most sage and learned mafter and bringer up of youth taught, who was a teacher not of Musicke onely, but of justice beside and Physicke. In summe, a man of wisedome and found judgement, will thus deeme, that good sciences are not to be blamed, if haply they be not well used, but impute 20 all the fault unto them that abuse the same. And therefore if any one from his childhood, shall be well instructed and trained up in Musicke, and withall employ his labour and diligence therein, he will receive and approove that which is honest and commendable: blame also he will and reject the contrary: not in mulicke onely, but in all things elfe: and fuch a one will decline all unhonest and unwoorthy actions, and thus reaping from mulicke the greatest and best contenument that can be, he may benefit exceeding much, as well himselfe as his whole countrey, using no word nor deed unfeemely, but observing at all times and in every place, that which is befitting, decent, temperate and elegant. Moreover, that cities and states best governedby pollicie and good lawes, have alwaies had a speciall regard of generous and good muficke, many and fundry testimonies may be alledged: and namely, a man may very well cite 30 to this purpose Terpander, who suppressed in timespast, the great sedition and civill discord that was in Lacedamon: Thales also the Candiot, who went as it is said, by the commandement and oracle of Apollo, to Lacedemon, and there cured the citizens and delivered them from that great pestulence, which reigned in that citie, and all by the meanes of musicke, as writeth Pratinas. Homer also himselfe faith, that the plague which afficted the Greeks, was by musicke flaied and appealed:

Then all day long, the Grecian youth in long; melodious, Belought god Phocbus of his grace,
to be propitious:
Phocbus I fay, who from a fare doth shoot his arrowes nie
They chaums and praife, who takes great joy, to heare such humonic.

with these verses as with Corollarie, good master I will conclude this my discourse of Musicke, and the rather, because you first by the very same verses commended unto us the force and power of Musicke; for in very trueth, the principall and most commendable worke thereof, is thanksgiving unto the gods, and the acknowledgement of their grace and favour: the second, and that which next followeth, is a sanctisted heart, a pure, consonant and harmonicall estate of the soule. When Socrichus had said: Thus you have (quoth he) my good master heard us different of of Musicke round about the boord as we sit. And verily Socrichus was highly admired for that which he had delivered for he sheet evidently both by his voice and visage, how much he was affected unto Musicke, & what study he had emploied thereto. Then my master:

Over and above other things, this also I commend in you both, that you have kept your owne course and place, the one as well as the other. For Lyssus hath surnished our feast with those things which are proper and meet for a Musician, who knoweth onely to handle the lute of harpe, and hath no farther skill than manuall practife. Soterichus also hath taught us whatsoever concerneth both the profit and also the speculation thereof, yea and withall comprehendeth therein the power and use of Mussicke, whereby he hath mended out fare and seafted us most surprusously. And I suppose verily that both of them, have of purpose and that right willingly, left thus much into me, as to draw Musickeunto seafts and banquets: neither will scondenne them of timidity, as if they were ashamed so to doe: For if in any part of mans life, certes in such seafts and mery meetings it is right profitable. For according as good Honer saith:

Both fong and dannee, delight affoord, And things that well be seeme the boord.

To Neither would I have any man to inferre heereupon, that Homer thought Mulicke good for nothing elfe but to delight and content the company at a feast: confidering there is in those verses couched and hidden a more deepe and profound meaning. For he brought Musicke to those times and places wherein it might profit and helpe men most. I meane the feasts and meetings of our ancients: and expedient it was to have her company there, for that the is able to divert and temper the heat and strength of wine, according as our Aristoxenus also else where faith: Musicke (quoth he) is brought in thither, became that whereas wine is wont to pervert & overturne as well the bodies as the minds of those who take it immoderatly. Musicke by that order, fymmetry, and accord which is in it, reduceth them againe into a contrary temperature, and dulceth all. And therefore Homer reporteth that our ancients used Musicke as a remedy 20 and helpe, at fuch a time. But that which is principall and maketh Musicke above all things most venerable, you have my good friend let passe and omitted. For Pythagoras, Archias, Plato and all the rest of the old Philosophers doe hold that the motion of the whole world, together with the revolution of the starres, is not performed without Musicke: For they teach that God framed all things by harmonic. But to profecute this matter more at large, this time will not permit: and besides it is a very high point and most Musicall to know in every thing how to keepe a meane and competent measure. This faid, he sung an hymne, and after he had offered alibation of wine unto Saturne, and to all the gods his children, as also to the Muses, he gave his guests leave to depart

OF THE FORTVNE OR VERTUE OF

K. Alexander.

The Summarie.

A this treatife and that which followeth, framed both in forme of a declamation, Plutarch magnifieth Alexander, a praife worthy prince for many good parts that were in him: wherein he streeth alfo, that we ought to attribuse unto vertue and not to fortune, those brave exploits which he performed. By fortune, he meaneth that course of the assaurant in this world, whereby it falleth out many times that the wisess man are not

50 Awaies most happy and best advanced. To proove therefore, that Alexander was endued with exquisit qualities for execution of those enterprises which by him were atchieved asterwordes and brought to an end, he compareth him in the beginning of this treatise, with the kings of Persia raised up to their greatnesses by fortune: and them shows that Alexander being an excellent Philosopher, we ought not to wonder or he associated by his vertue he saw the end of many things which the most fortunate princes of the world durst never take in hand and begin. Now the bester to set out the excellencie of this Philosophy of Alexanders, he compareth his scholars with the disciples of Plato and O0000 2 Socrates:

Socrates: proving that those of this prince surpassed the others, as much as a good deed or benefit done to an infinit number of men surmounteth a good speech or instruction given to some perticular persons; the most part of whom make no account thereof. He proceedesh forward and discribes his he wisdome and sufficiencie of Alexander in politicke government, which he amplifieth by the consideration of his amiable behaviour and lovely cariage toward those nations which by him were subdued : also by the recitall of some notable sayings of his; likewise by the love and affection which he caried unto wisdome, and men of knowledge. In briefe bis acts ; be evident proofes of his versue, and in no wife of the teme. rity and rashmesse of fortune. But even in this very place, Plutarch hash broken off his treatise, lea. ving the end hereof defectuous : namely where he began to discourse of the contempt of death, and of the constant resolution of Alexander against the most churlish and boisterous assaulses of fortune. 10

OF THE FORTUNE OR vertue of K. Alexander.

Hefe are the fayings and allegations of fortune, affirming and proving that Alexander was her owne peculiar peece of worke, andto be afcribed unto her alone. But we must gaine say her in the name and behalfe of Philosophy, or rather of Mexander himselfe : who 20 takethit not wel, but is highly displeased, that he should be thought to have received his empire at fortunes hand gratin, and as a meere gift and benefit which he had bought and purchased with sheding much of his owne blood, and receiving many a wound one upon

Who many restlesse nights did passe Without all sleepe full broad awake: And many a bloody day there was, Whiles he in field did skirmifh make.

Whiles he fought against forces and armies invincible, against nations innumerable, tivers im- 40 passable, rocks inacceffible, and such as no shot of arrow could ever reach; accompanied alwaies with prudent counsell, constant patience, resolute valour, and staied temperance, And verily I am perswaded, that himself would say unto fortune, chalenging unto herselse he honor of his hautie & worthy acts, in this maner: Come not heere either to deprave my vertue, or to deprive me of my due honor, in afcribing it unto thy felfe. Darius was indeed a peece of worke made by thee, whom of a base servitor, no better than a currior or lackey to a king, thou diddest advance and make the lord of the Perfians. Sardanapalus likewife was thy handy worke, upon whole head, when he was carding and fpinning fine purple wooll among women, thou diddelt fet the imperiall diademe. As for me, I mounted up and ascended as farre as to Su/a with victory after the battell at Arbela. The conquest of Cilicia made the way open for me to enter into 40 Aegapt: and the field that I wan at the river Granicus; which I paffed over going upon the dead bodies of Mathridates and Spithridates leutenants to the king of Persia, gave me entrance into Cil cia. Vaunt now and boatt as much as thou wilt of thosekings, who never were wounded in fight, nor loft one drop of their blood. Thefe I fay may well be counted fortunate and thy derlings, Ochus I meane & Artaxerxes, whom immediately from the very day of their nativity, thou half entitalled in the rotal throne of Cyrus. But this body of mine carreth the markes & tokens of fortune not favourable and gracious, but contrariwile adverse and opposit unto me. First in Illyricum, I had my head broken with a great stone, and my necke bruted and crushed with a pestill. Asterwards in the journey and battell of Granicus, my head was cloven with a Barbarians cimeter. At the field fought neere Iffus, my thigh was run through with a fword before the city of 30 Gaza, I was thot through the ancle above my foot with one arrow, and into the shoulder with another, whereupon I was unhorfed, and falling heavy in mine armour out of my faddle, I lay there for dead upon the ground, Among the Maracadarts, my shin bone was cut in sunder with shotof quarels and arrowes. Besides many aknocke & wound which I gat among the Indians: and every where I met with hot fervice among them, untill I was shot quite through the should der. Another time as I fought against the Gandrida: I had the bone of my leg cut in twaine, with another shot likewise in a skirmish with the Mallotæ, I caught an arrow in my brest and bofome, which went fo farre and flucke fo fast that it left the head behinde : and with the rap and knocke of an iron peftill my necke bone was crushed. And at what time as the skaling ladders reared against the wals brake, fortune enclosed and shut me up alone to fight and maintaine combate, not against noble concurrents and renowmed enimies, but obscure and simple Barbarous foldiers, gracing and gratifying them thus farreforth, as that they went with in a little of taking away my life: And had not Ptoleman come betweene and covered me with his targuee; had not Limnem in defence of me opposed his owne body and received many a thousand datts, and there loft his life in the place for me; had not I say the Macedonians by force of to armes and refolute courage broken downe the wall and laid it along, certes that base village, that Barbarous burrow of no name, had bene at this day the sepulcher of Alexander. Furthermore, all that journey and expedition of mine, what was it elfe but temperations fromes, extreame heat and drought, rivers of an infinit depth, mountaines fo exceeding high, as no bird could flie over them, monftrous beafts and fo huge withall, as they were hideous and terrible to be feene, strange and favage fashions of life, revolts of dissolal states and governours, yea and afterwards their open treasons and rebellions? And as for that which went before his voiage: all Greece panting still and trembling for remembrance of the warres which they enduted under his father Philip, now put up their head. The city of Athens now thaking off from their armour the dust of the battell at Charonea, began to rife againe and recover themselves after that over-20 throw. To it joined Thebes and put forth their helping hand. All Macedonia was suspected, and stood in doubtfull termes, as enclining to Amyntas and the children of Acropus. The Illyrians brake out into open warres and made hostile invasions. The Scythians hung in equal ballance uncertaine which fide to take, expecting what their neighbours would doe, that began to fiir and revolt. Befides the good gold of Persia which had found the way into the purses of orators and governors of every citie, made all Peloponne fus to rife in armes. The coffers of Philip his father were emptic and had no treasure in them: but insteed thereof they were indebted and paid interest as Onesierities writesth for * two hundred talents. In these great wants, in such poverty * That is to and so troubled a state, see a yong mannewly come out of his infancie and childhood, durst fay,120000 hope and affiredly looke, for to be lord of Babylon and Sufa: nay to speake more truely and in French-30 aword, he intended in his defignements the conquest of the whole world; and that with a power crownes. onely of thirty thousand foomen, and some thousand horse: for no greater forces brought he into the field as An flobulus reporteth: or according asking Ptolemans writeth, they were thirty thousand foot and five thousand men of armes: or as Anaximenes putterhit downe, his army amounted to forty thousand three hundred footmen and five thousand five hundred horsemen. Now all the glorious meanes and great provision for the maintenance and entertainment of this power more or leffe, which fortune had prepared for him, came to feventy talents: as Aristobulus hath set it downe in writing, or as Duris recordeth he was furnished with mony and victuals to ferve for thirty daies and no longer. How then ? was Alexander fo inconfiderate, raffi and void of counfell, as to enterprise warre with so small meanes, against so pursuant an armie of 40 the Persians? No I wis : for never was their captaine, that went forth to warre better appointed and with greater and more fufficient helpes than he, to wit, magnanimity, prudence, temperance, & fortitude, wherewith Philosophy had furnished him, as with munition for his voiage: as being better provided for this enterprise against the Persians by that which he had learned of his mafter and teacher Aristotle, than by all the patrimonie and revenewes which his father Phihip had left him. Well, to beleeve those who write, that Alexander himselfe would otherwhiles fay, that the Ilias and Odyffæa of Homer accompanied him alwaies as his voiage provision to the warres, we may be easily enduced, for the reverence and honor which we owe unto Homer: but if a man should fay, that Homers Ilias and Odyssæa, were unto him an easement of his travels, or an honest pastime and recreation at his leafure, and that the true municion and voiage 50 Provision indeed for the maintenance of his wars, were the discourses & precepts which he had learned out of Philosophy, and the treatifes or commentaries as touching confidence & fearelefferefolution of proweffe, valour, magnanimity and temperance, we are ready to mocke and deride him: and why forbecause for footh he hath written nothing of Syllogishies, of Axiomes, or of the elements and principles of Geometry; because he hath not used to walke in the schoole of Lycen, nor held positions and disputed of questions in the Academie: for these be the things wheteby they measure and define Philosophy, who thinke that it consisteth in words and not in-deeds. And yet Pythagoras never writ ought, nor Socrates, nor Arcefilaus, no nor Carneades: who all, no doubt, were most renowmed Philosophers: neither were they imploied and occupied in so great warres, in reducing Barbarouskings to civillity, or in founding and building great cities, among favage nations: neither travelled they through the world visiting lawlesse and cruell people, to teach them to live peaceably and in order, who had never heard of peace or of lawes: but these great and famous personages, for all the leasure and rest that they had from imploiments and bufic affaires, left all writing for Sophisters onely. How came it then, that they were reputed Philosophers? Surely it arose either upon their sayings which they delivered or the maner of life that they led, and the actions which they did, or elfe the doctrine which they taught. Let us now therefore judge of Alexander also accordingly, by the same : for it will be 10 found and seene by the words which he said, the deeds that he wrought, and the lessons which he taught, that he was some great Philosopher: and in the first place, if you thinke good, consider (which at first fight may seeme most strange and wonderfull) what disciples Alexander had a and compare them with the scholars of Plate or of Socrates. These men raught those who were of quicke wit, and spake the same language that they did; and if they had nothing else, yetunderitood they at least wife the Greeke tongue: how beit for all this, many of their auditours and disciples there were whom they could never perswade to their rules and precepts : but such as Crinas, Alcibiades and Clestiphon, rejected and shoke off all their doctrine, as the bitte of a bridle. and turned another way. Whereas, if you marke and confider the discipline of Alexander, you shall finde, that he taught the Hyrcanians to contract mariage and live in wedlocke; the Ara-20 chosians to till the ground and follow husbandrie; the Sogdians he perswaded to nourish their aged fathers, and not to kill them; the Persians to reverence and honour their mothers, and not to mary them as they did before. O the admirable Philosophie of this prince! by meanes whereot, the Indians adore and worship the gods of Greece: the Scythians burie their dead and eate them not. We woonder at the powerfull and effectuall speech of Carneades, for that he knew how to make Clitomachus, named before Afdrubal, and a Carthaginian borne, to conforme himselse to the Greekes fashions and language. Wee admire the emphaticall gift of Zeno, who was able to perswade Diogenes the Babylonian, to give himselfe to the studie of Philosophic. But while Alexander conquered Aga, and reduced it to civilitic, Homer was read ordinarily: the sonnes of the Persians, Sustains, and Gedrosians, chaun- 30 ted the tragoedies of Euripides and Sophoeles. As for Socrates, condemned hee was and put to death by the Athenians, at the fute of fycophants and promoters, who enformed against him, that he had brought into Athens new gods: whereas by the meanes of Alexander, the inhabitants of Bactra and the mountaine Cancafus, even at this present, adore the gods of Greece. Plate hath left in writing one forme of policie and government of common wealth, but he could never perswade so much as one man to use and followit, so harsh and austere it was found to be. But Alexander having founded above threescore and ten cities among the barbarous nations, and lowen throughout all Asia, the mysteries, sacrifices, and ceremonies of Divine service which were used in Greece, reclaimed them from their favage and brutish life. And verily, few there be among us, who read and peruse the lawes of Plato: whereas there be infinit thou- 40 fands and millions of men, who have used, and doe at this day practise those of Alexanders ordeining; and fuch nations were much more happy whom he conquered and fubdued, than they that escapedhis puissance. For these had never any person who eased and delivered themout of their miserable life, but the other were forced by the conquerour to lead a bleffed life; in fuch fort, as that which Themistocles sometime said, when being banished out of Athens, and fled to the king of Persia, at whose hands having received rich gifts, and the donation besides of three cities which paid him yeerely tribute, one for bread, another for wine, and the third for his meat and other viands; be spake thus unto his sonnes: Oh, how had we bene undone, if we had not beene undone! The fame may more justly be verified of those who were then subdued by Alexander: Never had they beene civilized, if by him they had not beene vanquished and 50 brought under his subjection : there had beene no citie Alexandria built in Aegypt, no Selencia in Mesopotamia; no Prophthasia in the Sogdians countrey; no Bucephasia among the Indians; neither should the mountaine Caeaufus have had neere unto it the citie Hellas, inhabited and peopled; by the meanes of which cities, their rude bestiality being first stated and held under, by little and little was extinct, and by custome of the better, changed the woorle. To conclude therefore, if Philosophers stand most upon this point, and beare themselves alost, for that they are able to dulce and reforme rude maners, and not polifhed before by any doctrine. And if it be feene that Alexander hath altered and brought into order an infinite number of wilde nations, and beaftly natures; good reason there is, that he should be esteemed an excellent Philosopher.

Moreover, that pollicie and forme of government so highly esteemed, which Zeno the first founder of the Stoicks feet devifed, tendeth to this one principall point, that we who are men, should not live divided by cities, towns & divers countries, separated by distinct laws, rights, & customs in severall, but thinke all men our felow citizens, & of the same country : also that there ought to be but one kind of life, like as there is but one world, as if we were all of the fame flocke 10 under one herdman, feeding in a common pasture. Zeno hath set this downe in writing, as a very dreame & imaginarie Idea, of a common-wealth well governed by Philosophicall lawes; but Alexander hath put that in reall execution and practife, which the other had figured and drawen out in words: for he did not as his mafter Ariffetle gave him counfell to doe: namely, to cary himselfe toward the Greeks as a father; and toward the Barbarians as a lord : likewise, to have regard and care of some, as of his friends and kinsfolke; but to make use of others, as if they were brute beafts or plants, and no better: for in fo doing, he should have pestered his dominions and empire with banishments; which are evermore the secret seeds of warre, of factions and fidings most dangerous: but taking himselfe to be sent downe from heaven, as a common reformer, reconciler, and governour of the whole world; fuch as he could not draw to accord ao and agreement, by reason and speech, he compelled by force of armes, and so from every side reduced all into one 3 causing them to drinke round (as one would say) of one and the same cup of amitie and good fellow thip, wherein he tempered and mixed together, their lives and maners, their mariages and fathions of life, commanding all men living to thinke the whole earth habitable, to be their countrey; his campe their citadell and castle of defence; all good men to be their kinsfolke and allies; all leud persons, strangers and aliens. He commanded them moreover, to distinguish Greeks and Barbarians, not by their mantle, round targuet, cemeter turbants, or high crowned chaplets; butto marke and discerne Greece by vertue; Barbarie by vice: in reputing all vertuous folke Greeks, and all vicious persons Barbarians: to thinke also their habilliments and apparell common, their tables common, their mariages besides and 30 maner of life common, as being united all, by the mixture of bloud and communion of children. Demaratase verily the Corinthian, one of the friends that used to give interteinment to king Philip, when he saw Alexander in the citie of Su/a, greatly rejoiced thereat, infomuch as for very joy of heart, the teares ranne downe his checks, and he brake foorth into these words: That the Greeks, before departed out of this life, were deprived of exceeding contentment, and hearts delight; in that they had not seene Alexander sitting upon the regall throne of Darius. For mine owne part verily, I would not repute them very happy, for feeing fuch a fight as that, confidering it is the gift of fortune, and as much as that befalleth ordinarily to meaner kings: but I affure you, much pleasure could I have taken, if I had beheld those goodly and sacred espoulals, when under the roofe of one pavilion, seeled all over, and wrought with gold, he enterreined at once, all at one common feast and table, a hundred Persian Brides, maried to an hundred Bridegromes of Greece and Macedonie: at which folemnitie himselfe being crowned with a chaplet of flowers, was the first that began to sing the nuptial song Hymenæus, as a 40 canticle of generall amitie, when two of the igreatest and most puissant nations of the world came to be joined in alliance together by mariage, being himfelfe spouse unto one, but the maker of all their mariages, yea, and the common father and mediator to them all, being the meanes of that knot and conjunction. For willingly I would have faid; O barbarous, senselesse and blockish Xerxes, that tookest so great paines, and all to no purpose, about making a bridge over Hellespont. For after this maner thould wife kings and prudent princes, conjoine Europe and Asia together, not with wood and timber; not with boates and barges, nor with those 50 linkes and bonds which have neither life nor mutuall affection; but by lawfull love, by chafte and honest wedlocke, by communication also of children, to unite and affociate two nations together. To this comely ornament Alexander hadan eie, when he would not admit the habiliments and robes of the Medes, but the attire and apparell of the Persians, as being farre more fobre, modest and decent than the other: for rejecting & casting aside that outlandish, unusuall

and superfluous purple mantell Candys, their wide breeches and slacke sloppes Anaxyridæ; he

he wore himselfe a certeine kinde of robe, composed partly of the Macedonian, and in part of the Persian habit, according as Eratosthenes hath written. As a Philosopher he made use of things indifferent, neither good fimply, nor ill: and as a gracious ruler and courteous king, he wanne the love and heart of those whom he had subdued, by gracing and honouring upon his owne person their apparell: to the end that they should continue fast unto him, and sirme in loialtie; loving the Macedonians as their natural lords, and not hating them; as tyrannizing enemies. For it would have bewraied a foolish minde, and withall disdainfull and proud, to have made great account of a felfe-coloured homely mantell, and withall, to have taken of fence at a rich coate, embrodered all over with purple; or contrariwife, to have had this in admiration, and the other in contempt; like unto fome infant or little childe, keeping still pre- to cifely to that apparell, which the cultome of the countrey as a nurse or foster-mother hath once put on: whereas we fee, that huntimen who use to choose deere, are wont to clad themfelves with the skinnes and hides of those wilde beasts which they have taken; as for example, of flagges and hindes: foulers alfo, that lie for to catch birds, cast upon themselves, gabardines, and coates of fetherworke, or befer with wings and fethers. Those who weare red clothes, beware how they come in the way of buls: and fuch as be clothed in white, are as carefull not to be feene of elephants; for that these beasts fare as though they were wood and mad at the sight of fuch colours. Now iffo great a king as Alexander was, minding to tame warlike nations, like unto wilde beafts, or to dulce and keepe them gentle, who were fo fierce and untractable, used those robes and habilliments which were proper, usuall, and familiar to them; and all to gaine 20 their hearts by little and little, mollifying by that meanes the fierceneffe of their courage, pacifying their displeasure, and dulcing their grimnesse and austeritie: would any man blame or reproove, and not rather honour and admire his politicke wildome, in that with a little change and altering of his garments, he had the dexteritie and skill to gaine all Asia, and lead it as he would, making himselfe, thus by his armour, master and lord of their bodies; and by his apparell alluring and winning their hearts. And yet these men commend Aristippus the Philosopher, and disciple of Socrates, for that one while wearing a poore, thinne and thred-bare cloke, and another while putting on a rich mantell of tiffew wrought and died at Miletus, he knew how to keepe decorum, and decently to behave himselfe, as well in the one garment as the other: meane while, they blame and condemne Alexander, in that as he honored the habit of 30 his owne countrey, so he disdained not the apparell of another, which he had conquered by armes, intending therby to lay the ground-worke & foundation of greater matters: for his deffeigne and purpole was not to over-runne and waste Asia, as a captaine and ring-leader of a rable of theeves and robbers would doe, nor to facke and racke, harry and worrie it, as the praie and booty of unexpected and unhoped for felicity: like as afterwards Anniball did by Italy; and before time, the Tricrians delt by Ionia; and the Scythians by Asia, who made havocke and waste as they went: but as one, who meant to range all the nations upon earth, under the obedience of one and the fame reason, and to reduce all men to the same policie, as citizens under government of a common-weale, therefore thus he composed and transformed himselfe in his raiment and habit. And if that great God, who sent the soule of Alexander from heaven to 40 earth below, had not so suddenly called it away againe unto himselfe; peradventure there had beene but one law to rule and overlooke all men living, the whole world haply had beene governed by one and the same justice, as a common light to illustrate all places: whereas now, those parts of the earth, which never had a fight of Alexander, remaine in the shadow of datkneffe, as destitute of the very light of the sunne: and therefore the very first project of his expedition and voiage sheweth, that he caried the minde of a true Philosopher indeed, who aimed not at the gaining for himselfe daintie delights, and costly pleasures, but intended to procure and compasse an universall peace, concord, unitie and societie of all men living one with a

In the second place consider we his words and sentences; for that in other kings and poten-50 tates also, their maners and intentions of their minde, are principally bewrated by their speeches. Antigonia the elder, when a certeine Sophister upon a time presented and pronounced unto him certeine commentaries and treatises which he had composed as touching justice: Good sellow (quoth he) thou are a soole, to come and preach unto one of justice, when thou seed mue bending mine ordinance against the cities of other princes, and battering their wals as I do. Denys also the tyrant was wont to say, that we should deceive children with dies and cockal bones, but beguile men with othes: And upon the tombe of Sardanapalus was engraven this epitaph:

What I dideat and arinke, I have: the sports also remaine Whichlady Venus did vouchsave, all else I count but vaine.

Who can denie, but that by the last of those speeches and apophthegmes, sensual lust and voluptuous field was authorized; by the second, Atheisme and impietie; and by the first, injustice and avarice. Now if you take away from the sayings of Alexander his roiall crowne and diatode methe addition of Jupiter Amnon whose some he was stilled to be, and the nobility of his birth, certes you would say they were the sage sentences of Socrates, Plato or Pythagor as. For we must not stand upon the brave titles and proud inscriptions which Poets have devised to be imprinted or engraven upon his pictures, images and statues, having an eie and regard not to shew the modellie, but to magnifie the puissance of Alexander: as for example;

This image here that stands in braste fo bright, Of Alexander is the portraict right: Up toward heaven he both his cies dorb cast, And unto Jove seemes thus to speake at last: Mine is the earth, by conquest I it hold: Thou supicet in heaven may to be bold.

20 And another:

Of Jupiter that heavenly God of might, The sonne am I (Great Alexander hight.)

These were the glorious titles which glavering Poets I say, in flattery of his fortune fathered upon him. But if a man would recount the true apophthegmes indeed of Alexander, he may do well to beginne first at those which he delivered in his childhood: for being in footmanship the fwhich of all other yoong lads of his age, when his familiar play-feeres and mates were in hand with him very earnestly to runne a course at the Olympian games for a prise, he demanded of them againe, whether he should meet with kings there for his concurrents in the race: and when they answered, No: Then were the match (quoth he) not equally nor indifferently made, wherin if I have the woorfe, a king shall be foiled; and if I gaine the victorie, I shall but conquer private persons. When his father Philip chanced in a battell against the Triballians to be runne thorow the thigh with a launce; and albeit, that he escaped danger of death, yet was much grieved and difficulted to limpe and halt thereupon as he did: Be of good cheere good father (quoth he) and go abroad hardly in the fight of the whole world, that at every step you tread and set forward, you may be put in minde of your valour and vertue. How fay you now, proceed not these answeres from a Philosophicall minde? and shewthey not an heart, which being ravished with adivine inftinct and ardent love of good and honest things, careth not for the desects of the bodie? for how greatly thinke you joyed and gloried he in the wounds that he received in his owner 40 person, who in every one of them bare the testimony and memoriall of some nation subdued, fome battell won, of fome cities forced by affaile, or of fome kings that yeelded to his mercie? Certes, he never tooke care to cover and hide his fearres, but carried them about him, and shewed them where ever he went, as fo many marks and tokens engraved, to testifie his vertue and prowesse. And if at any time there grew some comparison, either by way of serious disputation in points of learning, or in table talke, as touching the verfes of Homer, which of them were best: when some seemed to commend this verse, others that, he would evermore preferre this, above all other:

aμφότεον, βαπλώς τ' άγαθές, κεατεείς τ' αίχωντίς.

and making this account, that the praife which another had given to king Agamemon beforetime, stood for a law unto himselfe; infomuch, as he would say, that Homer in that one vertiched recommended the vertue of Agamemon, and prophessed the prowesse of Alexander. And therefore, so often as he passed over the Streight of Hellesson, his maner was to goe and visit. Try, where he represented unto his owne minde, the woorthy seats of armes which those brave princes and noble worthies performed, who sought there. And when one of that country pro-

mifed to bestow upon him in free gift, if he would accept it, the harpe of Paris. I have no need (quoth he) of it, for I have already, that of Achilles : to the found whereof he was woont for his recreation,

Nowmost certaine it is, that to love wisdome, and to have in esteeme, sages and learned perfons is an infallible figne of a philosophicall spirit. And this was in Alexander, if ever in any other prince: for what kindneffe and affection he caried to his tutour and mafter, Ariffolle; al 10 fo, that hee did as great honour unto Anaxarchus the skilfull Musician, as to no favourite and familiar friend the like; I have alreadic shewed elsewhere. The first time that ever Pyrrho the Elian talked and conferred with him, hee gave unto the man tenne thousand pieces of golde. Unto Xenocrates one of Platoes disciples, he sent a present of fistic talents. And as most hiltoriographers doe report, he made One furitus, one of Diogenes his scholars, his admirallat fea. And himselfe meeting upon a time with Diogenes at Corinth, where he communed with him, he fo woondered at his maner of life, and had his gravitie in fuch admiration, that many a time after, in speaking of him, he would fay: Were I not Alexander, I would be Diogenes: which was as much to fay, as thus : I could willingly employ my whole life and fpend my time atmy booke and in contemplation, but that I am determined to be a Philosopher in deed and action, 20 He faid not: If I were not a king, I could finde in mine heart to be Diogenes: nor, If I were not rich, and one that loved to go gay and in sumptuous robes, &c. For he never in his life preferred fortune before wisdome; nor the purple mantle of estate, or the roiall diademe, before a ferip and a poore threedbare Philosophers cloake; but simply this was his faying: Were I not Alexander, I would be Diogenes: that is to fay, Had I not proposed to my selfe to joine together in mutuall focietie, Barbarous nations with the Greeks, and by travelling in voiage thorow the earth, to polith and make civill what favage people foever I find, fearthing from one end of the world to another, and vifiting all the coasts of the sea, to joine Macedonie unto the Ocean, to sow as it were, Greece in all parts, and to fpread thorowout all nations peace and justice, yet would I not fit still idle indelights, and take my pleasure, but imitate the simplicity and frugality of Dio 20 genes. But now pardon me, I pray thee, ô Diogenes: I follow Hercules, I take the way of Perfem, I tread the trace of god Bacchus, my stocke-father and author of my race and progeny; I would gladly, that the Greeks might once more dance with victory among the Indians, and reduce into the memory and remembrance of those mountainers and favage nations who dwell beyond the mountaine Caucasus, the joily feasts and meriments of the Bacchanales. And even there, by report, there be those who follow a certeine strict, austere, and naked profession of wisdome, called thereupon Gymnosophists, holy men, living according to their owne lawes, devoted altogether to a contemplative service of God, making lesse account of this life than Diogenes doth, and living more barely, as having no need at all of bagge and wallet; for, no provision make they of victuals, because the earth furnisheth them alwaies with that which is new and fresh to 40 their hand: the rivers affoord them drinke; the leaves falling from trees and the greene graffe of the earth together, serve for their beds: by my meanes shall they know Diogenes, and Diogenes them. I must also alter the stampe of the coine, and in stead of a Barbarian marke, signe it after the Greeke maner and according to their common wealth. Well, thus much of his words and fayings: come we now to his deeds. And doe they feeme to cary before them the blinde raftneffe and temerity of Fortune, and bare force of armes and violences of the hand? or rather, of the one fide, great proweffe and justice; on the other fide, much elemency and lenity, together with good order and rare prudence, of one managing all things by fober, different and considerate judgement? Certes, I am not able to say and discerne in all his acts thus much, as to pronounce, That this was a deed of valour; that, of humanity; and another, of patience or 50 continence: but every exploit of his, feemeth to have beene mingled and compounded of all vertues in one, to confirme the famous fentence and opinion of the Stoicks, That every act, a wife man doth effect by all vertues jointly together. True it is indeed, that in ech action there is one vertue or other, eminent and predominant alwaies above others; but the fame inciteth and directeth the rest to the same end : and even so we may see in the acts of Alexander, That as his mattiall valout is lumane, fo his humanitie is valourous; his bounty is thrifty, his liberality frugall; his choler foone appealed, his heat quickly cold; his loves temperate, his pastimes not idle; and his travels not without their folace and recreation; who, evermore tempered feafts with warre, milifary expeditions with games, masks and sports; who, interlaced among his sieges of cities, warlike exploits and executions, festivall Bacchanales, wedding and nuptiall songs of Hymeneus. Who was there ever, greater enemy to those that doe wrong, or more mercifull and gracious to the afflicted ? Who ever caried himfelfe more heavie to ftiffe necked and obftinate persons; and more friendly againe, to humble suppliants? And heere in this place it comes into my minde, for to alledge and cite the faying of king Porm, who being brought prifoner before king Alexander, and demanded by him, in what maner he wished that he should to use him : Roially (quoth he) of Alexander. And when Alexander replied againe, and asked what he had els to fay: Nothing, quoth Porm; for in that one word [Roially] is comprised all. And even so me thinks, that in all the actions of Alexander, a man may use this for a reffrein or faburden, All Philosophically. For this in deed conteineth all. He was enamoured of Roxane the daughter of Oxiathres, by occasion that he saw her to dance with a good grace among other captive ladies: howbeit, he would not force her, nor offer any violence to her dishonour; but espoused her for his wife: wherein he did as a Philosopher. When he saw his enemy Darius lying dead, with many an arrow and dart flicking in his body, he neither facrificed to the gods, nor founded the triumph for joy, that fo long a war by his death was come to an end; but taking the mantle from his owne shoulders, cast it over the dead corps, as if he would thereby have covered 20 and hidden the wofull destiny of a king. And this also was done like a Philosopher. He received one day a letter of fecrets from his owne mother, which whiles he perufed, it chanced that Hephaftion also sitting at that time by him , read it simply together with him , and thought nothing, Alexander debarred him not; onely he tooke the fignet from his owne finger, let it to his mouth, fealing as it were his filence, by the faith that he owed unto a friend. See how herein he thewed the part of a Philosopher: for if these be not Philosophicall acts, I know not what els be, Socrates was well enough content, that faire Alcibiades should lie with him; but Alexander, when Philoxenus his licutenant generall over the fea coasts of Asia, wrote unto him, that there was a yong boy within his government in Ionia; for fweet favour and beauty incomparable, demanding of him by his letters to know his pleafure, whether he should fend the said youth unto 30 him, he wrote sharply unto him, in this wife: What hast thou knowen by me, most leaud and wicked variet as thou art, that thou shouldest presume thus to allure and entice me with such pleatures? Xenocrates we have in admiration, for turning backe a prefent of fifty talents, which Alexander fent unto him; and shall we not wonder as well at the giver? shall we not thinke, that he made as small account of money, who gave so liberally, as he who refused it? Xenoerates had no need of riches, professing as he did Philosophy; but Alexander had use therefore, even in regard of Philosophy, because he might exercise his liberality in bestowing the same so bountifully upon fuch perfors. We honour theremembrance of those, who have left behinde them testimonies of their contempt of death: and how often thinke you, hath Alexander delivered as much, when he faw the darts and arrowes flying to thicke about his cares, and himfelfe, preffed 40 hard upon by the violence of enemies? We are perfinaded verily, that there is in all men whatfoever, some light of found judgement, for that nature herselfe frameth them to discerne that which is good and honest: bur a difference there is betweene the common fort and Philosophers, for that Philosophers excell the rest in this, that their judgements be more firme, settled and resolute in dangers than others; wheras the vulgar fort are not armed and fortified beforehand with fuch deepe impressions and resolutions as these:

eis ilwo dans G, &c. a tale and a tale and a The best presage by augury and bird flight, Is, in defence of countrey for to fight. Againe:

But the occurrences and occasions of perils presented unto them, doe breake their discourse of reason; and the imaginations of dangers imminent, doe drive out all counsell and considerate judgement. For feare doth not only maskre and aftonish the memory, as Thueydides faith, but The end of also driveth out every good intention, all motions and endevors of well doing: whereas Philo-this reatise fophy bindeth them fast with cords round about, that they cannot stirre. * * * *

Del Lutarch doth prosecute in this declamation, the argument and discourse beguninthe former: the some whereof is this, that the vertue of Alexander surmounted bis for- 20 tune, which was alwaies in maner contrary unto him. But before that he entrethinto this matter he opposeth unto the sufficiency and singular parts of this prince, the base demeanour and brutish vilany of certaine other kings and potentates, adjoining over and besides thus much that al his exercises and imploiments, are proofes every one of his hauty courage and magnanimity, Then discourseth he particularly, in what account and reputation good workemen were with Alexander, and what his selfe conceit was of his owne workes in comparison of theirs. Afterwards, he commeth to shew, that if Alexander be considered from his very first beginning to his last end, he will be found, to be the very handy worke of valour and fortitude. In proceeding forward, he faith, that fortune received more honor by Alexander than he by her. The which is verified by comlidering the flate of his armie, after his death. Uponthis, he entreth into a common place of mans 30 greatnesse, which serveth to cleere and illustrate the former points and matters handled. And by the consideration of the evill cariage and government of many other princes, as by a foile, he givetha most beautifull lustre unto the vertues of Alexander, which be desciphereth in particular. Thu done , he answereth those, who object that fortune rassed Alexander to that greatnesse. And to give the mightier force and weight to the reasons by him produced, he disputeth against fortune her selfe: wherein he examineth his severall exploits, wherein as vertue is evidently seene to accompany and asist, so fortune to oppose her selse and resist him. And this doth he particularize at large. After this digre sion, he commeth againe to his precedent matter, and bringeth out new proofes of the versue and magnanimity of this mighty Monarch even from his youth unto his dying day; comparing him as a Paragon, with the wifest Sages, and most valiant warriours both of Persia and of Greece. Shewing also that he surpassed them all, in commency, liberality, piety, prudence, justice, beneficence and valour. For the last point, be relateth the great jeopardy wherein Alexander was plunged one time among the rest, out of which, wertue caused him to retire fafe as it were, in despite of fortune: which is the very conclusion of this treatise, confirming the principall intenti-

THE FORTUNE OR vertue of K. Alexander.

The second Oration.

E forgat yesterday (as it should seeme) among other matters to say, that the age wherein Alexander lived was in this respect happy, for that it brought forth many excellent arts, and as many great and singular wits: or rather it may be said, that this was not so much the good fortune of Alexander, as of those cunning artisans and rare foirits, to have for their witnesses & spectator such a personage, who both knew best how to judge truely of good workemanship, and also was most able to reward the same as liberally. And verily to this purpose reported it is, that somtime after, in the age ensuing, when

Archestrasso a fine headed Poet and a pleasant, lived in great want and penury, for that no man made any reckoning of him to his defert, there came one unto him and faid : Had it beene thy hap Archestratus to have lived in the daies of Alexander, he would for every verse of thine 20 have bestowed upon thee either Cyprus or Phanice. Certes for mine owne part thus I conceive of it, that the artificers and workemen living in that age, became so famous and excellent not so much under Alexander and by Alexander. For it is the good temperature of the weather and subtilty of the ambient aire, that causeth abundance and plenty of fruits: but the gracious countenance, the fovor, honor, bounty and humanity of a prince, is it that provoketh and flirrethup good arts, yea and advanceth excellent wits: whereas contrariwife all the fame languisheth, decaieth, is extinguished and perisheth cleane by the envie, avarice, spary pinching, and peevilh frowardnesse of rulers and those in authority. And heere I must call to minde the report that goeth of Dionyfius the tyrant, who heering one day a famous minstrell playing passing well upon the lute and as fweet finging thereto, faid openly, that he would beflow upon him for 30 a reward a talent of filver. The morrow after comes this musician to call for the money according to promife: unto whom Dionylius made this answere: Sirrha (quoth he) yesterday as I tookecontentment by thee follong as I heard thee play and fing, fo I am fure I did thee a pleafure againe in the hope of this promife: thouwert paied therefore prefently for the delight which thou gavest me, by the joy that thou received throm me: goe thy waies therefore, thou halt thy reward already. Alexander, the tyrant of Phera, (whom indeed I should call by this addition onely [tyrant] and not steine and contaminate so good a name as Alexander, by stilling therewith fo wicked a wretch:) this tyrant I fay, whiles he beheld one day an excellent plaier acting in a traggedy, was so much moved with a certaine tickling delight comming upon him, that his heart began to relent even upon a tender commiferation and pitie: whereupon he fuddenly 40 left the theater, made hafte away, & went fafter than an ordinary pace untill he was out of fight, laying withall, that it were a great indignity for him to be feene for to weepe and fined teares, in compassion of the miseries and calamities of queene. Hecuba or lady Polyxena, who every day caused so many citizens and subjects throats to be cut. This monstrous tyrant was so mischievoully bent, that he want within a little of punishing that excellent actour most grieveously, because he had mollified his hard heart and made it melt like a peece of iron in the furnace. Archelsus king of Muedature formed to be not very free of gift, whereupon Timotheus the mulician finging to the harped, would efficience glaunce at him, and iterate this prety lcoffe as the foot of his fong; and home.

But Archelaus met with him, extempore againe, and replied not unwittily, in this wife,

And thou as faine would It silver have, And doest as shamelessely it * crave.

Aleas a king of the Scythians, having taken prisoner in warre, that samous minstrell Ismenias, commanded him to sound upon his stute or pipe, whiles he sat a dinner. Now when all the company besides wondred at his excellent musicke, and applauded him for his good playing, Pppp D hehimselfe sware a great oth, that he tooke more pleasure to heare his horse neigh, so unmusicall were his cares and so farre removed from the Muses: so much also was his minde setupon the stable and manger, fitter indeed to heare affes bray than horses neigh. What honour then or advancement may a cunning artifan, or fo absolute a master in musicke hope for at the hands of fuch kings? Certes no more than from those who would seeme themselves to be skilful, yea and dare contend with professours in the sufficiencie of their arte: and therefore upon envie or malice feeke to overthrow and deprave those that indeed be excellent artists. Such an one was Dionylius above named (whom heere I must bring in againe) who caused the Poet Philoxensus to be cast into the prison or dungeon called Latomie, that is to say, the Quarries, because when Dionysius had put into his hands a tragoedy of his owne making, commanding him to review 10 and correct the fame, he dashed it out and interlined it all from the beginning to the end. And even Philip alfoking of Macedonie, for that late it was ere he gave his minde to mulicke, was in this behalfe unlike himfelfe and not answerable to his greatnesse otherwise. Howbest upon an opinion that he had of his owne skill that way, he would needs (as the report goes) enter into disputation with a professed musician and plaier of instruments, and argue about the strokes and ftops, points and notes and fuch like terms, yea and feeme for footh to controle him in his owne art; whereat the minstrell smiling pleasantly upon him: God sorbid sir (quoth he) that you a king, should ever be so unfortunate and at so low aneb, as to have more skill in these matters than I. But Alexander knowing full well what things he should be a spectatour and auditour of, as also what he ought himselfe to practise and execute with his owne hand, studied continually 20 to be expert and accomplished in feates of armes, indevouring, as the Poet Aefehylus faith,

And terribly to force his foesto quake.

And this indeed was the hereditarie art which he received by fuccession from his auncestors the Aeacidæ, and Hercules: as for other sciences, he honored them in other men, without any emulation at all for their profession: and as he highly commended any excellency or grace therein, so for no pleasure & delight that he tooke thereby, was he easily surprized with any affection for to follow the same. In his time there flourished two noble Tragoedians above the rest Theffalus and Athenodorus; who when they contended one against another for the prise, who could act the better, the kings of Cyprus defraied the charges belonging to this folemne spectacle, 30 and pageant; but the principall and most renowmed captaines, were judges to decide the quarrell. In the end, when Athenodorus was declared victour; Alexander who stood better affected to Theffalus: I would I had (quoth he) lost the one halfe of my kingdome, fo I had not seene Theffalus take the foile: howbeit, he neither expostulated with the umpiers, nor complained of their judgement; for howfoever he thought that himselfe ought in other respects to outgoe all, yet he was to yeeld and give place to justice. Among Comedians in those daies, there was one Lycon a Scarphean: this actour in playing his part before him in a comedie, had interlaced handsomly a verse, wherein he seemed cleanly to crave some reward: Alexander laughed at the conceit of the fellow, and gave him ten tallents. Many excellent harpers there were, and plaiers of the lute, and one Aristonicus among others, who in a certeine battell running in to 40 rescue and succour him, fought manfully, and there was slaine, and sell dead at his soot: Alexander heereupon caused his statue to be made in brasse, and to be set up in the temple of Apollo Pythius holding a lute in the one hand, and a launce in the other. In fo doing henot onely honored the man, but also Musicke, as being an art which breedeth animostie in menshearts, filling those with a certeine ravishment of spirit and couragious heart to fight valiantly, who are naturally framed and bred up to action: for even himselfe one day, when Antigenides sounded the battell with his flute, and finging thereto a militarie fong, called Harmation, was thereat fo much mooved, and let in fuch an heat by his warlike tune, that he started out of the place where he fat, and caught up the armes that hung up thereby; ready to brandish them and to fight, the fact of the contract of the contract of Sweeily to play on Lute and Harpe; To fing thereto as pleafantly: Befeemeth thofe that love at sharpe, To fight it out right valiantly.

There lived also in the time of Alexander, Apelles the Painter, and Exsispens the Imager: the former of these two, painted Alexander holding a thunderbolt in his hand, but so exquisitely

egy you get a guidant de

to the life, and so like unto himselse, that it was a common saying; Of two Alexanders, the one, king Philips sonne, was invincible; the other of Apelles drawing, was inimitable. As for Lysppm, when he had cast the first image of Alexander, with his face up toward heaven, expersing thereby the very countenance of Alexander, who was woont so to looke, and withall, to turns his necke somewhat at one side; there comes me one and setteth over it this epigram, alluding very prettily to the said portraicture:

This image heere that stands in brasse all bright, The portraies is of Alexander, right: Up toward heaven, he both his cies doth cast, And unto Jove, stemes thus to speake at last: Thou Jupiter in heav nomais well be bold: Mine is the earth, by conquest I it hold.

And therefore Alexander gave commandement, that no other braffe founder, should cast his image, but only Lylippon: for he alone it was (as it should feeme) that had the feat to represent his naturall disposition in brasse, and to expresse his vertue answerable to the lineaments and proportion of his thape. As for others, howfoever they might be thought to refemble the bending of his necke, the cheerefull caft & amiable volubility of his quicke eie; yet could they neverobserve and keepe that virilitie of visage and lion-like looke of his. In the ranke of other rare workmen, may be ranged a famous Architect, named Stafferates, who would not feeme to bu-20 fie himselfe in making any thing, that was either gallant & pleasant, or delectable and gracious to the eie; but intended fome great matter, and fuch a piece of worke, and of that argument, as would require no leffe then the riches and treasure of a king to furnish and set foorth. This fellow comes up to Alexander, being in the high countries and provinces of his dominion, where before him he found fault with all his images, as well painted, and engraven, as call and pourtraied any way; faying, they were the hand-works of base minded and mechanical lattificers: But I (quoth he) if it may please your majestie, know how, and doe intend to found and establish the similitude of your rotall person, in a matter that is living and immortall, groundedupon eternall roots, the weight and ponderofitie whereof is immooveable, and can not beshaken: For the mountaine Athos (quoth he) in Thracia, whereas it is greatest, and ri-30 feth to a most conspicuous height; where the broad plaines and high tops are proportionate to it felfe every waie; having in it, members, lims, joints, diffances, and intervals, refembling for all the world, the forme of mans body, may be wrought and framed fo, as it would ferve verie well both to be called, and to be indeed, the statue of Alexander, and worthy his Greatnesse: the foote and base whereof, shall touch the sea; in one of the hands comprehending and holding a great citie peopled and inhabited by an infinit number of men: and in the right, a runingriver, with a perpetual current, which it powreth as it were out of a great pot into the fea: as for all these petty images and puppets made of gold, brasse, and ivorie, these wodden tables with pictures, away with them all, as little paltrey portracts, which may be bought and fold, theefe-stollen and melted, defaced and marred. Alexander having heard the man speake, 40 highly praifed him, as admiring his hautic minde, his bold courage, the conceit of his extraordinary invention: Good fellow (quoth he) let Athor alone, and permit it to stand a Gods name, in the place where it doth, and never alter the forme of it: it sufficeth that it is the monument of theoutragious pride, infolent vanitie and folly of one king already: and as for me, the mountaine Caucaling, the hilles Emodi, the river Tanan, and the Caspian sea, shall be the images and statues to represent my acts. But set the case I pray you, that such a piece of worke had beene rantyou. What fay we now to his image called Ceramophoros, that is to fay, the thunder-bolt-bearer? what fay we to another named the statement of the factorial statement of the factor forme, disposition, and tashion, that would thinke it grew so by chance & adventure? No I war-

Anti (thines

Antishenes said, very well and truely, that we should wish unto our enemies all the good things in the world, save onely valour and fortitude: for by that meanes they be not theirs who are in present possession of them, but become theirs who are the conquerors. And this is the reason men say, that nature hath set upon the head of an Hart for his defence, the most heartlesse and cowardly beast that is, woonderful hornes for bignesse, and most dangerous by reason of their sharpe and branching knagges: teaching us by this example, that bodily strength and amour, serveth them in no stead, who have not the courage and resolution to stand their ground and sight it out. And even thus we see, that fortune many times by heaping upon heartlesse cowards, and widesse soles, a great estate of riches and dominion; which they know not how to weld, and wherewith they discredit themselves, doeth honour and grace vertue, as upon to which onely dependentall the puissance, all the worship, glory, and reputation of men: for significant must faith,

then all the rest are blinde and dease, which be void of reason: for the senses seeme verilie to have their proper and peculiar functions. Now, that the minde is all in all, that the minde is availeable in all things, that the minde disposeth every thing in good order, that it is the minde which conquereth, which ruleth & reigneth over all; & whatsoever beside, blind, dease, & which could be complished by the experience and course of wordly affaires: for by the same pulsance and command, Semiramis being but a woman, tigged and manned armadoes at sea, seaved and armed maine battels of land forces, built Babylan, scoured and conquered all the coast of the red sea, substituted and brought to her obedience the Arabians and Aethiopians: whereas Sadanapalan, a manborne, sat within house at home, carding and spinning purple, tumbling and lying along, waltring among a fort of concubines: and when he was dead, they made for him a statue in stone, dauncing by himselfe alone after the Barbarian sathion, and knacking (as it were) with his singers over his head, like an antique, with this epigram set over it:

Eat, drinke, the wanton lecher play,

For nothing els is ought, I fay. Crates the Philosopher seeing upon a time within the temple of Apollo Pythiw at Delphi, the image of Phryne the curtisan, shrined all in golde, cried out: Behold heere stands the trium. phant Trophæc, over the loofe and lascivious life of the Greeks. But whosoever beholdeth the life or fepulture, whether you will (for in mine opinion there is no difference) of Sardanapalus, he may well and truely fay to the Trophæe of fortunes goods. What then? shall we fuffer fortune after Sardanapalus to meddle with Alexander, and to chalenge unto herselfe any part of his mightineffe and puissance? That were no reason at all: for what gave she ever unto him more than other kings have received at her hands? whether it were armour, horses, weapons, monie, foldiers, and a guard about their persons? Well, let her by these meanes make Aridden great if the can; let her magnifie (I fay) by these meanes Amasis, Ochus, Oarses; Tigranes the Atmenian, and Nicomedes the Bithynian: of whom the one, to wit, Tigranes, 40 flung downe his crowne and diadem at the feet of Pompeius, and Chamefully loft his kingdome, as a pray or escheat fallen into his enemies hand: the other, namely Nicomedes, having shaven his head, and wearing a cap upon it, declared himfelfe thereby, to be an affranchifed vaffall of the Romans? What? Say we then, that fortune maketh men cowards, fearefull, and base minded? Surely, it were no reason to impute cowardise upon infortunitie, no more than to attribute valour and wisdome to prosperitie. But well and truely may one say, that fortune herselfe was great, in regard of her lord and mafter Alexander: for in him the was glorious, invincible and magnanimous; not proud nor infolent, but full of clemencie and humanitie: no fooner was the breath out of his body, but prefently her power, that is to fay, his armie and forces, as Leofthenes faid wandring up and downe stragling and running upon it selfe, resembled that 50 fame Czelops Polyphemus, who after his eie was out of his head, went groping all about, putting forth his hands before him, but not knowing where to lay them : For even the greatnesse other puissance, after he was once dead, went to and fro, wandring it wist not where, and stumbling ever and anon, wanting a directour and governour, as in time of Anarchie, when there is no soveraigne ruler knowen; or rather it might be compared unto dead bodies when the life is newly departed out of them. For like as the parts are not knit together, nor hold one to another any longer, but fall away one from the other, and loofely withdraw themfelves apart: even to the armie of Alexander after it had loft and forgone him, did no more but fprunt, pant, ftruggle and firive for life, toffe and tumble to and fro, under the Perdiccaies, the Meleagers, the Seleuci, the Antegoni, and I wot not whom, like unto fome small vital spirits, yet remaining hot and beating within thearteries heere and there disorderly, and now and than like intermittent pulses, until fuch time as at the last it grew to putrifaction and corruption in maner of a dead carcase, and engendred wormes crawling within it: I meane such base kings, degenerat rulers & captaines who had no generosity nor heart in them. Certes, Alexander himselfe in his lifetime rebuking Hephastion when he quarelled with Craterio, tanted him & tooke him up in this wife: What power to halt thou of thy felfe? what couldeft thou do, and where wouldeft thou be, if aman should take Alexander from thee ? Semblably, I will not flicke to fay thus unto the fortune of that time : What is thy greatneffer what is thy glory? where is thy puiffance? where is thine invincible power, if one should bereave thee of Alexander? That is as much to say, as if one should deprive thine armes & weapons, of skill and experience to use them; thy riches, of liberality; thy sumptuolity and magnificence, of temperance; thy fights & combats, of refolute valor; thy victories and superiorities, of mildenesse and lenity. Make any other great if thou canst, who bestoweth nothis goods bountifully, who in the forefrunt of the battell hazzardeth not his owne person fieltbefore his armie, who honoreth not nor regardeth his friends, who taketh no pitie of his enimies captive, who is not in his pleasures continent, in his occasions & affaires vigilant, in his victories foone pacified and easie to be compounded with, and last of all, who in his prosperity and good fucceffe is not kind and courteous. How can a man possibly be great, what power and authority fo ever he have, if he be foolish, vicious, & wicked withal : for in one word, take vertue from a man otherwise fortunate, he is every way meane and of base account; meane in his gifts &donations, by reason of nigardife; meane in his travels, in regard of his cowardife and tendernes; meane in the fight of the gods, because of his superstition; meane among good men, for his envie; meane with valiant warriors, in respect of his timorous nesses and meane in the conceit of honest women, confidering his diffolute voluptuousnesse. For like as unskilfull workemen who set little statues upon great bases and large piedstals, shew thereby the smalnesse of their statues so much the more : even so when fortune raiseth up a man of base minde into high 30 place and to an estate wherein he is to be seene of the whole world, the discovereth his wants, the discrediteth and dishonoreth him the rather, waving and shaking every way through his levitie. So that, by this we must consesse, that greatnesse lieth not in the bare possession, but in the well using of good things: For many times it falleth out that very infants even from their cradle, inherite the realmes and feignories of their fathers; like as Charillus did, whom Lycurgus his uncle broght in his swadling bands into the common hall Phiditium, where the lords of Sparta were wont to dine together, fet him in the roiall throne, and in the stead of himselse, declared and proclaimed him king of Lacedamon. Now was not this babe for all this, great: but he rather might be accounted a great person, who rendring unto the new borne infant his fathers honor due unto him, would not intervert and derive it upon himselfe, and so defraud his 40 nephew thereof. As for Aridam, who could make him a great man, whom differing indeed nothing from a babe, Meleager swadled indeed and enwrapped onely within a purple robe and roiall mantell of estate, and so enstalled him in the throne of Alexander: wherein he did very well, to give the world to understand within a few daies after, how men reigne by vertue; and how by fortune: for he subrogated in the place of a true prince that managed the empire indeed, a very counterfect plaier and actor of a kings part; or to fpeake more truly, he brought a muteand dumbe diademe to walke through the world for a time, as it were upon a stage. The comical! * Poet faid:

A very woman may well a burden beare, If first a man upon her doe it reare.

So Butaman may contratiwife fay, that a filly woman or a yong child may take up, yea and charge upon the (houlders of another, a feignory, a realme, a great effate and empire, as Bagoas the Eunuch tooke and laid upon Oarfes and Darine the kingdome of the Perfians. Mary when as one hath taken upon him a mighty power and dominion, to beare, to weld & manage the fame, and not under the weight and heavy load of affaires belonging thereto, to be overwhelmed, brufed, or wrestled awry: that is the act of a man endued with vertue understanding and courage, such anone as alexander was: how soever some there be who reproch him that he loved wine to Ppppp 3 well well and would be drunke. But this great gift he had, that in his important affaires he was fober, neither was he drunke and overfeene, nor ever forgat himselse and grew to any outrage, for all the puissance, authority and liberty that he had: whereof others when they had some part and little tast, could not hold and containe themselves: For

With coine: or they to honor brought,
But they anon with pride are past,
And foone bewray that they be naught:
They kicke, they winse, they sling and prance,
No nemay stand safely in their way,
If fortume once their bouse advance
Some unexpected power to sway.

Clytus for having funke three or foure gallies of the Greeks, nere the Isle Amorgus, would needs be filled with the name of Neptune, and a three tined mace caried before him. Demetrius, upon whom fortune had bestowed a little skirt or lappet (as it were) which he tare from Alexanders dominion, was well content to heare himselse called Jupiter KarusGáns, that is to say, the vawter. Cities sent unto him not embassadors, but Theores, forsooth, that is to say, especiall persons deputed for to confult with the gods: and his answeres to them, must be termed (I would not else) Oracles. And Lysimachus who held the coasts of Thracia, which was but the border or edge of Alexanders kingdom, grew to that heigth of furly pride & intollerable arrogancy, that he would 20 breake out into these words: Now the Bizantines come to doe homage unto me, seeing how I reach and touch the skie with my launce. At which speech of his, Passades standing by, could not forbeare, but fay unto the company: Let us be gone my masters, with all speed, lest this man bore an hole in heaven with the point of his launce. But what should we speake more of these persons? who might be allowed in some fort to cary an hauty minde and beare their heads aloft, in regard of Alexander, whose souldiers they were? seeing that Clearchus the tyrant of Heraclea, caried upon his scepter as his device, the resemblance of lightning, and one of his sonnes he named xegunds, that is to fay, a thunderbolt. And Denys the yonger, called himselfe the sonne of Apollo, in a certeine Epigram to this effect:

Doris the Nymph, by Phoebus did conceive, And from them bothmy birth I do derive.

And in trueth, Depy, the elder, the naturall father of this man, who put to death ten thouland of his owne citizens and fubjects (if not more) who for very envie betraied his owne brother into the hands of his enemies; who had not the patience to flay for his owne mothers death, anaged woman, and who by the course of nature would have died within few daies after, but since thered and stopped her breath; who also himselse wrote in a traggedy of his owne making,

For why? know this, that lordly tyranny

The mother is of wrong and vilany. yet forfooth, of three daughters which he had, named one Arete, that is to fay, Vertue; another, Sophrofyne, that is to fay, Temperance; and a third, Diecosyne, that is to fay, Justice. Some there 40 were, who needs would be furnamed Euergera, that is to fay, Benefactors; others, Soreres, that is to fay, Saviours. Some called themselves Callinici, that is to fay, Victorious; others, Megali, that is to fay, Great. And yet as glorious additions as they caried in their filles, who is able to expresse in words, their marriages following thicke one in the necke of another, spending the long day continually, like a fort of stallions among a number of women, as if they had beene a flud of formany mares; their unkind abusing of faire boies, their violent rapes and enforcements of yong damosels, their drumming and tabouring with a fort of esseminate & womanlike wantons, their dice playing in the day time, their piping and founding the flute in open Theaters, their nights spent in suppers, and whole daies in long dinners? But Alexander gat up, and sat to his dinner by the breake of day, and went not to supper before it was late in the evening; he so dranke and made good cheere when he had first facrificed to the gods; he plaied at dice with Midia, one time, whiles he had a fever upon him; his pattimes and recreations were, 2012avell and march upon the way, and withall, to learne how to fhoot an arrow, how to launce a dart, how to mount a chariot nimbly, and difmount againe with facility. Roxane he espoused and wedded, onely for pure love, and to content his fancy and affection; but Statira the daughter of Darius he tooke to wife upon pollicy, because the state of his kingdome and affaires required fuch a match; for expedient it was, thus to mix and unite two nations together. As for other ladies and women of Persia, he went as farre beyond them in chastity and continence, as he did the Persian men in valour and fortitude; for he never would so much as see one of them against her will; and those whom he saw, he lesse regarded than such as he never set eie upon : and whereas otherwise to all persons he was courteous and popular, to such onely as were faite and beautifull he shewed himselfe strange, and used them in some fort proudly. As touching the wife of Dariue, a lady of furpaffing beauty, he would not endure fo much as one word that tended to the praise thereof; yet when the was dead, he performed her funerals with so sumptuous and princelike obsequies, he mourned and bewailed her death so piteously, that as his kindnesse to in that behalfe made the world miltruft and suspect his chaftity, so his bountifull courtesie incurred the obloquy and imputation of injustice. And verily, Darius was at the first mooved to conceive jealousse and a finister opinion of him that way, considering he had the woman in his hands, and was befides, a gallant and yoong prince: for he also was one of them, who were perfinaded that Alexander held the tenure of his mighty dominion and monarchy, by the goodnesse and favour of Fortune; but after he knew the trueth once, upon diligent search and inquisition by all circumstances into the thing: Well (quoth he) the Persians state I perceive is not interly overthrowen, neither will any man repute us plaine cowards and effeminate perfons, for being vanquished by such an enemie: for mine owne part, my first with and principall przier unto the gods is, that they would vouchfafe me fortunate successe, and at the last, an hap-20 py victory of this warre, to the end that I may furmount Alexander in beneficence; for an earneft defire I have and an emulation, to flew my felfe more milde and gracious toward him, than he is to meward: but if all be gone with me and my house, then, ô Jupiter the protectour of the Persians, and ye other tutelar gods and patrons of kings and kingdomes, suffer not any other but him, to be enthronifed in the roiall feat of Cyrus. Certes, this was a very adoption of Alexander, that passed in the presence and by the testimony of the gods. See what victories are atchieved by vertue. Aferibe now (if you will) unto Fortune, the journey of Arbela, the battell fought in Cilicia, and all other fuch like exploits performed by force of armes: let it be, that the fortune it was of warrewhich shooke the city of Tyrus, and made it quake before him, and opened Aegypt unto 30 him; grant, that by the helpe of Fortune Halicarnaffus fell to the ground, and Miletus was forced and won; that Mazeur abandoned the river Euphrates, and left it disfurnished of garifons; and that all the plaines about Babylon were overspred with dead bodies: yet it was not Fortune thatmade him temperant, neither was he continent by the meanes of Fortune; Fortune it was not, that kept and preferved his foule as within a fortreffe inexpugnable, fo as neither pleasures could it surprise and captivate, nor lusts and fleshly defires wound or touch. And these were the very meanes whereby he vanquished and put to flight the person of Darius himselse. All the reflwere, the discomfiture of his great barbe-horses, the overthrow and losse of his armour, skirmishes, battels, murders, executions, massacres and slights of his men. But the great soile and defaiture indeed, most confessed, and against which least exception can be taken, was that 40 wherein Darius himselfe was overthrowen; namely, when as he yeelded unto the vertue of Alexunder, to his magnanimity, fortitude and justice, admiring that heart of his, invincible of pleafure, unconquered by travels, and in gratuities and liberality immatchable. For in shields and fpeares, in pikes and targuets, in shouts and alarmes, in giving the charge and in buckling together with the classering of armour, right hardie and undaunted, aswell as he, were Tarrias the forme of Dinomenes, Antigones of Pellen, and Philotas the forme of Parmenio: but against ticklingpleasures, against the attractive allurements of women, against flattering silver and golde, they were no better, nor had more rule of themselves than slaves and captives. For Tarrias at what time as Alexander undertooke to pay all the debts of the Macedonians, and to make fatiffaction unto all those who had lent them any money, falfly belied himselfe, saying, he was in-50 debt, and withall suborned and brought foorth a certeine usurer, to the verie table where this discharge was made, who tooke it upon him, that he was a creditor of his. And afterwards when Tarries was detected and convict heereof, he had made himselfeaway for very shame and com-Punction of heart, but that Alexander being advertised thereof, pardoned his fault, yea and permitted him alfo to keepe the filver still, that he had disbursed for his counterfet debt; calling to minde, how at what time as his father Philip laid fiege to the citie Perinthus, the faid Tarrias in askirmish was shorinto the eie, and would not suffer the same to be dressed, nor the shaft to be well and would be drunke. All the rest were, the discomstitute of his great barbe-horses, the overthrow and losse of his armour, skirmishes, battels, murders, executions, massacres and slights of his men. But the great foile and defaiture indeed, most confessed, and against which least exception can be taken, was that 40 wherein Daries himselfe was overthrowen; namely, when as he yeelded unto the vertue of Alewander, to his magnanimity, fortitude and justice, admiring that heart of his, invincible of pleafure, unconquered by travels, and in gratuities and liberality immatchable. For in shields and fpeares, in pikes and targuets, in fhouts and alarmes, in giving the charge and in buckling together with the clattering of armour, right hardie and undaunted, as well as he, were Tarrias the fonne of Dinomenes, Antigones of Pellen, and Philotas the sonne of Parmenio: but against ticklingpleafures, against the attractive allurements of women, against flattering silver and golde, they were no better, nor had more rule of themselves than slaves and captives. For Tarrias at what time as Alexander undertooke to pay all the debts of the Macedonians, and to make fatiffaction unto all those who had lent them any money, fallly belied himselfe, saying, he was in-50 debt, and withall suborned and brought foorth a certeine usurer, to the verie table where this discharge was made, who tooke it upon him, that he was a creditor of his. And afterwards when Tarrias was detacted and convict heereof, he had made himselfe away for very shame and com-Punction of heart, but that Alexander being advertised thereof, pardoned his fault, yea and permitted him also to keepe the filver still, that he had disbursed for his counterfet debt; calling to minde, how at what time as his father Philip laid fiege to the citie Perinthus, the faid Tarrias in askirmish was shorinto the cie, and would not suffer the same to be dressed, nor the shaft to be plucked foorth, before the enemies were put to flight. Antigenes causing himselfe to be enrolled, and his name registred among others who were sent backe againe from the campe into Ma. cedonie, by occasion of sicknesse or maime, whereby they were not serviceable: being found afterwards to aile nothing, but to counterfet ficknesse, who otherwise was a good fouldior, and caried the marks of many a scarre in his body to be seene, offended Alexander heereby; and when the king demanded the reason, why he had so done; he confessed by and by, that he was in love with a yoong woman named Telesippa, whom he purposed to follow and accompanie, being minded to goe to the sea-coast, for that he could not find in his heart to be far from her. Then Alexander asked him, to whom the wench appertained, & who was to be dealt with, for to make her staie: Antigenes answered, she was her owne woman, & of free condition: Why then (quoth to Alexander) let us perswade her to tary still by faire promises & good gifts; for in no wise force her we may. So casie was he to pardon and beare with love, in any other rather than in himselfe. The first cause of the infortunate fall of Philoras the sonne of Parmenio, was in some fort his owne intemperance: for there was a yoong woman borne in the citie of Pella, named Antigona, who in the faccage of the citie of Damafeus, was taken prisoner among other captives, and indeed had bene thither brought before by Autophradates, who surprised her at sea, as the failed fro the coast of Macedonie, roward the Isle Samothrace: faire the was, & welfavored to fee to; and fo far had the entangled Philotas with her love, after he came once to be acquainted with her, that being a man otherwise as hard as iron, and steele to the very backe, she had so mollisted and made him pliable, that in the mids of his pleasures, poore man he, he was not master of himselfe and his 20 owne heart, but lying open unto the woman, revealed many fecrets unto her, and let fall foolith words in her hearing: For what had that Philip beene (would be formetimes fay) but for Paimenio; and what were this Alexander heere, without Philotas? what would become of his high addition, Jupiter Ammonius, where were those dragons of his, if we were not well pleased with him? Antigona told these speeches unto another woman one of her familiar friends; and she reported them againe to Craterus: Craterus brought Antigona herselfe secretly unto Alexander: and verily Alexander touched not her body, but absteined from her: howbeit, by her meanes, founding Philotas, & comming within him, he discovered fully what he was: yet in seven yeeres space and more, he never either at any feast where he dranke wine liberally, & was thought otherwhiles to be drunke, made he shew of this suspicion conceived of him, or in his 30 anger, being of nature hastic and cholericke; or to his friend Hephastion, untowhom he was woont to disclose all, and make partaker otherwise of his secrets: for one day by report, having opened a letter of secrets, sent from his owne mother, as he read it to himselfe, Hephastion held his head close to , and read it gently together with him; neither had he the heart to forbid him: onely after he had fuffred him to read it through, he tooke the fignet from his owne finger, fet it to his mouth, as it were to feale up his lips, that he should say nothing. But if a man should goe about to rehearfe at large all the notable examples, whereby it might be prooved that this prince used the greatnesse of his power exceeding well, and as most woorthily became a king; his strength and voice would faile him: for say, that by the goodnesse and savour of Fortune he became great: yet greater he is, in that he used his fortune aright, and wisely as he should: 40 and the more that a man extolleth his good fortune, the more doeth he amplifie that vertue of his, for which he was woorthy of fuch fortune.

But now its high time that I should proceed to the beginning of his growth, and the first entry of his mightie power: wherein I consider and looke every way about me, what act of fortune is therein, whereby men should suppose and mainteine, that *Alexander arole to such greatnesses ? How now? Tell me I befeech you for the love of God, placed she him in the regal throne of Cyrus, without drawing a sword, without striking one stroke, without bloudshed, without wounds, without a field fought, or expedition of armes made? by the neighing (forfooth.) of an horse, as sometime she did by that stist Darius, the sonne of *Histafees? or was it fome kinde husband wonne by the stattering perswasion of his wise, that crowned him king; 50 like as the same Darius made Xerxes king, induced by his wise Atossa, or haply the roial diademe came of it selfs to his very gates, as it came unto Parylais, by the meanes of *Baggus the eunuch; who did no more for it, but change and put off his lackies mandilion, put himselfse presently into the roiall robe, and set upon his head the pointed turbant, named Cydaris: or all on a sudden, beyond all expectation, by the fortunate fall of a lot, and the meere benefit of fortune, he became the monarch of the whole earth; like as at Athers their officers* Thesmothete, and Archontes are created by lotterie. But would you know how men come to be kings by the meanes of Fortune? This one example will tell you. The race of the Heraclidæ, defcending lineally from Hercules, out of which they were woont at Argos from time to time to elect their kings, chaunced to faile, and be utterly extinct: whereupon, when they had fent out to the oracle of Apollo, for to demand and enquire what to do in this case; this answer was made, That an eagle should direct them what was to be done. Some few daies after, an eagle was seene soaring aloft in the aire, and at length to fettle upon the house of one named Aegon : and thus was Aegondeclared for their king. Will you have another ? He who reigned for the time in the citie Paphos, was found to be wicked, unjust, violent, and a great oppressiour of his people: whereupon Alexander deposed him from his regall state and dignitie; and when he had so done, sought for another torulain his flead, out of the house & familie of the Cinyrada, which was thought in maner to be worne out, and uttelly extinct : howbeit, advertifed hee was, that there remained of that rade no more but one obscure and poore man, of whom there was no reckoning in the world made; and he dwelt in a certeine garden unregarded, where he lived in verie meane efface. Prefently he fent foorth to feeke for this man: they who were put in commission heereabout found him there indeed, watering certaine beds of leeks, and fuch like worts and potherbs. The man was woonderfully troubled and affrighted to feethefe fouldiers come toward him, and especially when they finde that he must come and speake with Alexander the king: thus was be brought unto him, in a fimple thin linner wastcote, and presently proclaimed king 20 of Paphos, received the purple rojall robe, and was reckoned in the number of those who are called the kings Minions: and his name was Alynomus. Lo how Fortune makes menkings, onely by altering their robes, by polymutation of their names, and changing their copies a little, all on a fudden, quickly in a trice, with great facilitie, beyond all hope, and without any expectation at all. Come now unto Alexander, what great matter did he ever attaine unto without his defert? what hapned unto him without the fweat of his browes, nay without the effusion of his bloud? what had he grain, that he paid not for? what got he, that did not cost him paines and travell ? Drunke he hath of rivers steined and coloured with bloud; passed he hath over them upon bridges made of dead bodies; for very hunger he hath beene glad to eat of graffe and greene herbes, the first hee could finde growing; he hath with much digging and 30 featching, discovered nations buried under deepe fnow, and cities lying in caves within the ground: failed he hath upon feas, warring and fighting against him: and traveling over the dry fands of the Gedrofians and Arhachofians, he faw trees and plants growing within the fea, before any upon the land. Now if a man might be allowed to addresse his speech unto Fortune, as unto some person in the defence of Alexander, might not one say unto her? When and where was it, that thou ever madeft way for the affaires of Alexander? what fortreffe wanne he through thy favour, without the loffe of bloud? what citie or towne didft thou cause to be yeeldedunto him without a garrison? or what army, without their weapons? where found he ever through thy grace any kings fluggish and flothfull; any captaine carelesse and negligent; any watder or porter of the gates drowfie and fleepie? nay , he never met with river that had farre 40 paffable, Winter that was tolerable, or Summer that was not painfull and it kefome. Goe thy waies, goe, to Antiochus the fonne of Seleucus; to Artaxerxes the brother of Cyrus; to Ptolomans Philadelphus. These were they, whom their fathers in their life time declared heires apparent, yea, and crowned them kings: these wonne fields and battels, for which never cie shed teare: these kept holiday continually: these celebrated festivall folemnities daily in theaters, with all maner of pompes and goodly fights: every one of these reigned in all prosperitie, untill they were very aged: whereas Alexander (if there were nothing elfe) lo how his body is wounded and piteoully mangled, from the crowne of his head, to the fole of his foot, gashed heere, thrust in there, drie beaten, brused and broken with all maner of hostile weapons,

At the river Granicus, his armer or morion was cleft with a curtelace, as farre as to the haire of his head: before the towne of Gaza he was shot into the shoulder with a dart: in the Maragandians countrey his shin was wounded with a javelin, in so much as the greater bone thereof was so broken and shattered, that it came out at the wound: in Hireania he gat a knocke with a great shoeke his neede, which shooke his head so, as that his eie-sight was dimmed thereby, so for certeine daies, he was afraid that he should have beene starke blinde for ever: in a skirning the should have beene starke blinde for ever.

mith with the Affacans, his ancle was wounded with an Indian datt: at what time when he faw it to bleed, he turned unto his flatterers and paralites, and shewing them the place, smiled and faid: This is very bloud indeed,

And not that humour, fay all what you will, Which from the gods most bleffed doth destill.

At the battell of Iffus his thigh was pierced with a fword, even by king Darius himselfe, as Chares writeth, who came to close with him at hand fight. And Alexander himselse writing simply and the plaine trueth to Antipater, I my selfe also caught a stab with a short sword in my thigh, but thanked be God (quoth he) I had no great hurt thereby either at the present or afterwards. Fighting against the Mallians he was wounded with a dare two cubits long, that being driven 10 through his cuirace entred in at his breft and came out againe at his necke, according as Ariflobuliu hath left in writing. Having paffed over the river Tanais for to march against the Scythians, when he had defaited them in battell, he followed the chase and pursued them on horse backe for a hundred and fifty stadia, notwithstanding all the while he was troubled with a fore laske or flux of the belly. Now truly fortune, much beholden is Alexander unto thee for advancing his effate: Is this thy making of him great, by fuffering him thus to be pierced through on every side? Here is a faire upholding of him indeed to lay open thus all the parts of his bodie: cleane contrary to that which Minerva did unto Menelain, who with her hand turned afide all the shot of the enimies, and made them light upon his armour where it was most sure and of the best proofe, to wit, upon his cuirace, his bawdricke or belt, or upon his helmet; and by that 20 meanes brake the force of the firoke before it could come to the bare bodie, fo as all the harme it could do, was but a little to rafe the skin and let out some smal shew and a few drops of blood: but thou contrariwife, hast exposed his naked and unarmed parts and those most dangerous to be wounded, cauling the flot to enter fo farre as to goe through the very bone, environing and hemming in his body round, befetting his cies and feet, impeaching him for chafing his enimies, diverting the traine of his victories, and overturning all his hopes. Certes I am of this opinion, that there never was king who had fortune more adverse & a shrewder stepdame than he; although the hath beene curft, envious and fpightfull enough to many befides : for whereas the hath fallen upon others violently like a thunderbolt or shot of lightning, whom she hath cut off and diftroied right out at once; hermalice and hatted unto Alexander hath bene cankted 30 obffinate and implacable even as it was before him unto Herales. For what Typhons or monstrous Giants of prodigious stature hath she not raised up as concurrents to fight with him? What enimies hath not the fortified and furnished against him with infinit store of armes, with deepe rivers, with prerupt and craggy rocks, or with extraordinary strength of most favage beafts? Now if the courage of Alexander had not bene undaunted, and the fame arifing from exceeding great vertue, firmely grounded and fettled thereupon to encounter fortune, how could it otherwise have bene, but the same should have failed and given over, as being wearied and toiled out with fetting fo many battels in array, arming his foldiers fo daily, laying feege fo many times unto cities and townes, chafing and purfuing his enimies fo often, checked with so many revolts and rebellions, croffed so commonly with infinit treasons, conspiracies and infurrections of nations, troubled with fuch a fort of stiffe necked kings who shooke off the yoke of allegeance? and in one word, whiles he conquered Bactra, Maracanda and the Sogdians, among faithleffe and trecherous nations who waited alwaies to fpie fome opportunity and occa-40 fion to do him a displeasure, & who like to the serpent Hydra, as fast as one head was cutoff, put forth another, and so continually raised fresh and new warres? I shall seeme to tell you one thing very strange and incredible, howbeit most true: Fortune it was and nothing but fortune by whose maligne and crosse aspect, he went very neere of losing that opinion that went of him, namely, that he was the sonne of Jupiter Ammon. For what man was there ever extract and defeended from the feed of the gods, who exploited more laborious, more difficult and dangerous combates? unlesse it were Hercules against the sonne of Jupiter? And yet one outrageous and 50 violent man there was who set him a worke, enjoining him to take sell lions, to hunt wide bores, to chase away ravenous fowles, to the end that he should have no time to be emploied in greater affaires whiles he visited the world, namely, in punishing such as Annaus, and in repreffing the ordinary murders which that tyrant Busin and such like committed upon the persons of guests and travellers. But it was no other thing than vertue alone that commanded Alexander to enterprise and exploit such a peece of worke as beseemed so great a king and one derived from a divine race: the end whereof was not a masse of gold to be carried along after him upon ten thousand camels backs, nor the superfiseous delights of Media, not sumptuous and dilicate tables, not faire and beautifull ladies, not the good and pleasant wines of Calydonia, nor the dainty fish of Hyreania out of the Caspian sea : but to reduce the whole world to be governed in one and the same order, to be obedient to one empire, and to be ruled by the same maner of life, And verily this defire was inbred in him, this was nourished and grew up with him from his veryinfancie. There came embaffadors upon a time from the king of Persia to his father Philip, who at the same time was not in the country but gone forth: Alexander gave them honorable intertainement very courteoutly as became his fathers sonne : but this especially was observed 10 in him, that he did not aske them childish questions as other boies did, to wit, about golden vines trailed from one tree to another, nor of the pendant gardens at Babylon hanging above in the aire, ne yet what robes and fumptuous habiliments their king did weare ? but all his talke and conference with them was concerning matters most important for the state of an empire : inquifitive he was, what forces and power of men the king of Perfucould bring out into the field and maintaine; in what ward of the battell the king himselfe was arranged when he fought a field: much like uuto that ulysses in Homer, who demanded of Dolon (astouching Hettor)

Which be the readiest and shortest waies for those who would travel from the coasts of the Me-

dered exceedingly and faid: Now furely this child is the * great king, and ours the rich. No *Fortheking fooner was his father Philip departed this life, but prefently his heart ferved him to passe over the called the Braights of Helle (pont, and being already fed with his hopes, and forward in the preparation and great kings provision of his voiage, he made what speed he could to set foot in Asia. But see heere how fortune croffed his designes: she averted him quite and drew him backe againe, raising a thousand troubles and busic occasions to stay & hinder his intended course. First the caused those barbarous nations bordering and adjoining upon him, to rife up in armes, and thereby held him occupied in the warres against the Illyrians and Triballians: by the meanes whereof he was haled away as farre as to Seythia and the nations inhabiting along the river Danubie, who diverted him 30 cleane from his affaires intended in the high provinces of Asia. Howbeit having overrunne thele countries and dispatched all difficulties with great perils and most dangerous battels, he fet in hand againe with his former enterprise, and made haste to his passage & voiage a second time. But lo, even there also fortune excited the city of Thebes against him, and laid the warre of the Greeks in his way to frop his expedition, driving him to extreame streights and to a very hard exigent, by fire and sword to be revenged of a people that were his owne countrymen, and of the same kinned and nation, the issue whereof was most grieveous and lamentable. Having exploited this, he croffed the feas at the last, furnished with provision of money and victuals as Phylarchus writeth: to ferve for thirty daies and no longer, or as Arifobulus reporteth having onely leventy, talents of filver to defray the whole charges of the voiage. For of his owne de-40 maine and possessions at home, as also of the crowne revenewes, he had bestowed the most part upon his friends and followers : onely Perdice as would receive nothing at his hands, but when he made offer to give him his part with the rest, demanded thus of him: But what reserve Hanforyour felfe, Alexanders Who answered, My hopes. Why then (quoth he) I will take part thereof: for inistor reason that we should receive your goods, but wait for the pillage of Dawith And what were those hopes of Alexander, upon which he passed over into Asia? Surely not Ahower measured by the strong wals of many rich & populous cities, not fleets of ships failing without himstelfe, a resolution of prowesse in a small power of armed men well trussed and com-36 partingether; an amulation to excell one another among yong men of the same age, a con-Binnion and the for vertue and glory in those that were his minions about him: But the great hopes indeed and most affured were in his owne person, to wit, his devout religion to Godward, shatualty confidence and affiance that he had in his friends, frugality, continence, bounty, consempt of death; magnanimity and refolution, humanity, courteffe, affable intertainement, a finple nature plaine without plaits, not faigned and counterfait, constancie in his counsell, cederity in his execution, foveraignty and priority in honor, and a resolute purpose to accomplish through the mountaines, not whips and tetters, testifying the folly and madnesse of barbarous

Princes , who thought thereby to punish and chastice the raging sea. But for external meanes any honest duty and office. For Homer did not well and decently, to compose and frame the beautifull personage of Agamemnon, as the patterns of a per sect prince out of three images, after this maner,

For eies aud head, much like he was in sight To Jove, who takes in lightning such delight: God Mars in wast and loines resembled he:

In brest compar'd to Neptune he may be. But the nature of Alexander (in case that God who made or created him, formed and compounded it of many vertues) may we not well and truly fay, that he endued with the courageous fpirit of Cyrus, the fober temperance of Agefilaus, the quicke wit and pregnant conceit of The- 10 missocles, the approaved skill and experience of Philip, the valourous boldnesse of Brasidas, the rare eloquence and fufficiencie of Pericles in State matters and politicke government? For to speake of those in ancient times, more continent he was and chast, than Agamemnon, who preferred a captive concubine before his owne espoused and lawfull wife: as for Alexander, he absteined from those women whom he tooke prisoners in warre, and would not touch one of them before he had wedded her: more magnanimous than Achilles, who for a little money yeelded the dead corps of Hetter to be ranfommed; whereas Alexander defraied great funmes in the funerals and interring of Darius bodie. Againe, Achilles tooke of his friends, for the appealing of his choler, gifts and prefents after a mercenary maner: but Alexander enriched his very enemies, when he had gotten the victorie. More religious he was than Diame des, a man who was 20 evermore ready to fight against the gods: whereas he, thought that all victory & happy successe came by the grace and favour of the gods. Deerer he was to his necre kinsfolke and friends, and more entirely beloved than ulyffes, whose mother died for forrow and griefe of heart: whereas when Alexander died, his very enemies mother, forkinde affection and good will died with him for company. In fumme, if it was by the indulgence of Fortune, that Solon established the common-wealth of Athens fo well at home, that Militades conducted the armies fo happily abroad; if it was by the benefit and favour of fortune, that Ariftides was so just : then farewell vertue for ever; then is there no worke at all effected by her; but onely it is a vaine name and speech that goeth ofher, passing with some shew of glorie and reputation thorow the life of man; seined and devised by these prating Sophisters, cunning Law-givers and Statists. Now if every one 30 of these persons, and such like, was poore or rich, feeble or strong, foule or faire, of long life or thort, by the meanes of fortune; againe, in case ech of them shewed himselse a great captaine in the field, a great politician or wife law-giver, a great governour and ruler in the city and common-wealth, by their vertue and the direction of reason within them; then consider (I pray you) what Alexander was in comparison of them all : Solon instituted at Athens, a general cutting off and cancelling of all debts, which he called Erodybia, which is as much to fay, as Adifcharge of burdens; but Alexander out of his owne purse paied all debts in the name of debtors, due unto their creditors. Pericles having imposed a tax and tribute upon the Greeks, with the money raifed by that levie, beautified the citadell or castle of Athens with temples and chapels whereas Alexander fent of the pillage and treasure which he gat from the Barbarians, to the 40 number of tenne thousand talents into Greece, with commandement to build therewith saved temples to the honour of the gods, Brasidau wan a great name and reputation of valour among the Greeks, for that he passed from one end to another thorow his enemies, caining, pitched long the fea fide before the towne Methon: but that wonderfull leape that Alexander made into a towne of the Oxydraques, which to them that he are it, is incredible, and to as many as faw it, was most fearefull; namely, at what time as he cast himselse from the battlements of the walles among his enemies, ready to receive him with pikes, with javelins, with dars and raked fwords; whereto may a man compare, but unto a very flash of lightning breaking violently out of a cloud, and being carried with the winde lighteth upon the ground, refembling a spiritor apparition resplendent all about with flaming and burning armours? insomuch as arthefirst 50 fight, men that faw it were fo affrighted, as they ran backward and fled ! but after that they beheld it was but one man fetting upon many, then they came againe, and made head against him. Heere Fortune shewed (no doubt) many plaine and evident proofs of her speciall good will so Alexander; namely, first when she put him into an ignoble, base and barbarous towne, and there inclosed him sure enough within the walles thereof; then, after that those without made haste to refeue him, and reared their fealing ladders against the walles for to get over and come unto him, the caufed them all to breake & fall in pieces, whereby the overthrew and cast them downe who were climbed halfe way up: againe, of those three onely whose hap it was to mount up to the top before the ladders brake, and who flang themselves desperatly downe, and stood about theking, to guard his person, the fell upon one immediatly and killed him in the place, before he could do his mafter any fervice: a fecond, overwhelmed with a cloud of arrowes and darts, was so neere death, that he could do no more, but onely see and seele. All this while, the Macedonians without, ranne to the walles with a great noise and outcry, but all in vaine, for artillerie they had none, nor any ordinance or engins of battery; onely they laied at the walles with their naked fwords and bare hands : and so earnest they were to get in, that they would have made to way with their very teeth, if it had beene possible. Meane while, this fortunate prince, upon whom Fortune attended at an inch, ready now to accompany and defend him, you may be fure, as at all times els, was taken and caught as a wilde beaft within toiles, abandoned and left alone, without aide and fuccour, not iwis to win the city of Sussa or of Babylon, nor to conquer the province of Bactra, nor to seize upon that mighty body of king Porus: for of great and renow med attempts, although the end alwaies prove not happy, yet there can redound no infamy. But to fay atrueth, Fortune was on his behalfe fo spightfull and envious, but on the other side, so good and gracious to the Barbarians, so adverte I fay she was to Alexander, that she went about as much as lay in her, to make him not onely lose his life and body, but also to forfeit his honour and glory: for if he had beene left lying dead along the river Euphrates, or Hydas spes, it had beene 20 no great defastre and indignitie : neither had it beene so dishonorable unto him, when he came to joine with Darius hand to hand, if he had beene maffacred among a number of great horfes, with the fwords, glawes, & battle-axes of the Perfians fighting for the empire: no, nor when he was mounted upon the wals of Babylon, if he had taken the foile and bene put by his great hope offorcing the city : for in that fort, lost Pelepidas and Epaminendas their lives; and their death wastather an act of vertue, than an accident of infortunitie, whiles they gave the attempt to execute fo great exploits, and to gaine fo worthy a prife. But as touching fortune, which now we examine and confider, what piece of worke effected the ? In a Barbarous countrey farreremoved, on the further fide of a river, within the walles of a base village in comparison, to shut up and enclose the king and sovereigne lord of the earth, that he might perish there shamefully, by 30 the hands & rude weapons of a multitude of Barbarous rascals, who should knocke him downe with clubs and staves, and pelt him with whatfoever came next hand; for wounded he was in the head with a bill that clove his helmet quite thorow, and with a mighty arrow which one dischargedout of a bow, his breft-plate was pierced quite thorow, whereof the stelle that was without his bodic weighed him downe heavily: but the yron head which stucke fast in the bones about one of his paps, was foure fingers broad and five long. And to make up the full measure of all milchiefs, whiles he detended himselfe right manfully before, and when the sellow who had shot the forefaid arrowadventured to approach him with his fword, to dispatch him outright with a dead thrust, him he got within, and with his dagger gave him such a stabbe, as he lated him along and killed him out of hand: but feethe malice of Fortune, there runnes me forth out of a 40 milhouse or backhouse thereby, another villaine with a pessle, and comming behinde him, gave him such a soule upon the very necke bone, that he was assonished the cewith, and there lay along in a swoone, having lost his fight and other senses for a time. But vertue it was that affished him, which gave both unto himselse a good heart; and also unto his friends strength, resolution and diligence to fuccour him: for Limnaus, Ptolemeus, and Leonnatus, with as many belides, as either had clambred over the walles or broken thorow, came in and put themselves betweene him and his enemies; they with their valour were to him in ftead of a wall and rampier; they for meercaffection and love unto their king, exposed their bodies, their forces and their lives beforehim, unto all dangers whatfoever. For it is not by fortune, that there be men who voluntatily prefent themselves to prefent death; but it is for the love of vertue; like as bees having 50 dunke (as it were) the annatorious potion of natural love and affection, are alwaies about their king and flicke close unto him. Now fay there had beene one there without the danger of thos, to have feene this fight at his pleasure, would not he have faid, that he had beheld a notable combat of fortune against vertue? wherein the Barbarians by the helpe of fortune prevailed above their defert; and the Greeks by meanes of vertue relisted above their power: and if the former get the better hand, it would be thought the worke of fortune and of some maligne and envious Spirit; but if these become superior, vertue, fortitude, faith and friendship should cary away the honour of victory; for nothing els accompanied Alexander in this place. As for the reft of his forces and provisions, his armies, his horses and his fleets, fortune set the wall of this vile towne betweene him and them. Well, the Macedonians in the end defaited these Barbarians, beat the place downe over their heads, and rafed it quite, and buried them in the ruins and fall thereof. But what good did all this to Alexander in this case? Caried he might well be and that speedily away out of their hands, with the arrow sticking still in his bosome; but the war was yet close within his ribbes, the arrow was set fast as a spike or great naile, to binde as it were the cuirace to his bodie; for, who foever went about to plucke it out of the wound, as from the root, the head would not follow withall, confidering it was driven fo fure into that folid breft bone which is over the heart; neither durft any faw off that part of the stelle that was without, for feare of 10 shaking, cleaving & cracking the faid bone by that means so much the more, and by that means cause exceeding and intolerable paines, besides the effusion of much bloud out of the bottome of the wound : himselfe seeing his people about him a long time uncerteine what to doe, set in hand to hacke the shaft a two with his dagger, close to the superficies of his cuirace aforesaid. and so to cut it off cleane; but his hand failed him, and had not strength sufficient for to do the deed, for it grew heavie and benummed with the inflammation of the wound: whereupon he commanded his chirurgians to fer to their hands boldly and to feare nought, incouraging (thus hurt as he was) those that were found and unwounded, chiding and rebuking some that kept a weeping about him and bemoned him; others he called traitours, who durst not helpehim in this diffresse; he cried also to his minions and familiars, Let no man be timorous and cowardly 20 for me, no not though my life lie on it: I shall never be thought and beleeved not to feare dytion, and not ing, if you be affraied of my death.

OF ISIS AND

The Summarie.

He wisdome and learning of the Aegyptians hath bene much recommended unto us by ancient writers, and not without good cause: considering that Acgypt hath bene the source and sountaine from whence have flowed into the world arts and liberall sciences, as aman may gather by the testimony of the first Poets and punny of the server were: But time, which consumeth all things, bath bereft us of the knowledge of 40 over were: But time, which consumeth all things, bath bereft us of the knowledge of 40

such wisdome : or if there remaine still with us any thing at all, it is but in fragments and peeces seattered heere and there, whereof many times we must divine or quesse, and that is all. But in recompense thereof, Plutarch, a man carefull to preserve all goodly and great things, hath by the meanes of this discourse touching lis and Olivis maintained and kept entier a good part of the Aegyptians doctrine: which he is not content to set down literally & there an end, but hath adjoined thereto also an interpretation thereof, according to the mystical sense of the Islake priests: discovering infew words an infinit number of fecrets hidden under ridiculous & monstrous fables in fuch fort, as we may calthutreatife a comentary of the Aegyptians Theologie and Philosophy. As for the contents thereof, a man may reduce it mo three principall parts : In the first, which may serve instead of a preface ; he yeeldeth a reason of his enterprise & upon the consideration of the rasture, vesture, continence and ab sinence of lis priests, 50 there is an entrie made to the rehearfall of the fable concerning His & Offices. But before he toucheth it he fi eweth the reason why the Acgyptians have thu darkly enfolded their devinity. Which done, he commeth to descipher in particular the said sable, relating it according to the bare letter : which is the second part of this booke. In the third be expoundeth the fable it selfe: and first discovereth the principles of the faid Acgyptian Philosophy, by a fort of temples, sepulchers and sacrifices. Afterwards having refuted certaine contrary opinions, he speaketh of Damons, ranging Isis, Oficis and Typhon

Typhon in the number of them. After this Theologicall exposition, he consideres his he fable according to naturall Philosophy; meaning by Osicis the river Nilus and all other power of moissine what Joever : by Typhon , Drineffe : and by Itis that nature which preferves hand governeth the world. Where he maketh a comparison betweene Bacchus of Greece and Ofiris of Aegypt, applying all unto naturall causes. Then expoundet hhe she fable more exactly and in particular maner, conferring, this interpretation thereof with that of the Stoicks: wherupon he doth accommodate and fit all to the course of the Moone, as she groweth and decreaseth, to the rising also and mundation of Nilus, mas king of all the former opinions accretaine mixture, from whence he draweth the explication of the fable. By occasion hereof, he entreth into a disputation as touching the principles and beginnings of all things, letting downerwaine, and alledging for the proofe and confirmation of his speech, the testimony of the ancient Mages and Philosophers: which done be entrethinto a discourse of Osicis, Ilis, and Typhon, referring and reducing allinto Physicks and Metaphysicks, with a certaine conference or comparison of Placocs doctrin with that of the Aegyptians, which maketh him take in hand a particular treatise of matter, forme, the idea, of generation also and corruption. Having thus examined and discussed the Acgyptians Theology & Philosophy, be ariset to the more hidden & secret mysteries of the flake priests, or then descendeth againe to the consideration of naturall causes, especially of the flate of the Moone, and drawing compendeously into one word, all his precedent discourse, he declares b what we ought to understand by Ilis, Olivis and Typhon. Consequently he adjoineth three observations, to make this treatise more pleasant and profitable: withdrawing thereby the reader and plucking him backe both from superstition and Atheisme. Then having condemned the Greeks for being taint with the fame folly that the Aegyptians were addicted to be brosheth many opinions concerning the transformation of the Pagans gods into fundry forts of beafts; discovering thereby the dotage and foolery, wifing from this argument and matter most corruptly under stood; and stretching the same yet further he rendreth areason of that honour which the Aegyptians did to such creatures : whereupon hewould not have us in any wife to reft, but rather to looke into the divinity represented by them. And for an end he entrethinto an allegoricall discourse of the habilliments, perfumes, and diversodoriferous confections made every day in the temple of Itis: but more especially he treateth of one named Cyphi : wherein there be to the number of sixteene ingredients: which composition they use in their very drinke, observing therein as in all the rest of their superstitions, a million of ceremonies, whereaf he 30 doth particularize especially in the third part of this discourse, even to the very end thereof. All the premises being reduced to their right use, do seem the vanity of men abandoned and given over to their owne senses : and prove that all their sufficience is nothing but blockish folly, and their intelligence a darke and mirke night, when the brightnesse and light of Gods word dorb failethem. For the more apparence they have both of celestiall and also human wisdome, the more appeareth their blinde Supersition: in such fort as in sted of resting upon the creatour they remaine fixed upon the creatures, and have a longing and languishing defire after discourses void of true instructions and consolations: which ought to incite so much the more all Christians to make great account of the effectuall grace of fired umo shem in the medication and practife of true Philosophy as well naturall as divine.

OF ISIS AND OSIRIS.

En that are wife, or have any wit in them (ô Clea) ought by praier to crave all good things at the hand of the gods: but that which we most wish for, and defire to obteine by their meanes, is the very knowledge of them, to farre footth as it is lawfull for men to have: for that there is no gift either greater for men to receive, or more magnificall and beleeming the gods to give, than the knowledge of thetrueth: for God bestoweth upon men all things else, whereof they fland in need, but this he referveth to himselfe, and keepeth for his owne use. Neither is the godhead and divine power in this regard counted happie and bleffed, because it possesses a great quantity of gold or filver, nor puiffant in respect of thunder and lightning, but for prudence and wildome. And verily of all those things which Homer hath well delivered, this simply is the best and most elegant speech, when as touching Jupiter and Neptune, he saith thus:

The felfe same parents they both had, one native soile them bred, But Jupico: the elder was, and had the wiser head.

and had the wifer head. whereby he affirmeth, that the preeminence and rule of Jupiter, being the elder, was more venerable, facred and fuller of majestie, for his knowledge and wisdome. And of this opinion I affure you am I, that the beatitude and felicitie of eternall life, which Jupiter enjoieth, confifteth heerein, that he is ignorant of nothing that is done: as also, that immortalitie if it be despoiled of the knowledge and intelligence of all things that be, and are done, is not life indeed, but bare time. And therefore we may very well fay, that the defire of deitie and divinity is all one to with the love of tructh, and especially of that trueth which concerneth the nature of the gods; the study whereof, and the searching after such science, is as it were a profession and entrance into religion, yea, and a worke more holy than is the vow or obligation of all the challity & purity in the world, or than the cloifter or fanctuarie of any temple what loever : right acceptable alfoisthis *goddeffe whom you ferve, confidering that the is most wife,& full of knowledge,according as the very derivation of her name doth imply, that skill & cunning appertement unto her more than to any other: for Isis a meere Greeke word; like as Typhon also the very adverfarie and enemie oppolite unto this goddesse, as one puffed up and swollen by his ignorance and error, diffipating, defacing, and blotting out the facred word and doctrine, which this goddeffe collecteth, composeth, and delivereth unto those who are initiated and professed in 20 this divine religion, by a continuall precise observance of a sober and holy life, in absteining from many meats, in depriving themselves of all fleshly pleasures, for to represse lust and intemperance; and in being acquainted long before to abide and endure within temples and churches, hard and painfull fervices performed unto the gods: of all which abstinences, paines, and fuffrances, the end is the knowledge of that first prince and lord, who is apprehended onely by intelligence and understanding, whom the goddesse exhorteth to search and seeke after, as converfing and companying with her. And verily, thename of her temple, doth manifeltly promise an intelligence or knowledge of that which is, for Ison it is called, which is as much to fay, as * eioviceror ro or, for that, if we enter into that facred place and holy religion of this goddesire, with reason and devotion, as we ought to doe, we shall atteine to the understanding of 30 all things whatfoever. Moreover, many have written, that she is the daughter of Mercurie, others of Prometheus, of which twaine, the one is reputed the author of wildome and providence, and the other, namely Mercurie, the inventor of Grammar and Musicke. And heereupon it is, that in the city Hermopolis, they call the former of the Muses, both Isis and also Juflice; as being wisdome herselfe, (according as hath elsewhere beene said) and thewing divine things to them who are justly furnamed Hierophori, and Hieroftoli, that is to fay, religious, and wearing the habits of holinesse and religion. And these be they that cary in their minde, and keepe enclosed as within a box or casket, the holy doctrine of the gods, pure and clensed from all superstition and affected curiositie: who also of that opinion which is held of the gods, declare forme things which are obscure & darke, others also which be cleere and lightsome; like as 40 be those, which are reported as touching their holy and religious habit. And therefore whereas the religious priests of 1/is, after they be dead, are thus clad with these holy habiliments; it is a marke and figne witneffing unto us, that this facred doctrine is with them, and that they be departed out of this world into another, and carie nothing with them but it: for neither to weare a long beard, nor to put on a frize rugge and course gabardine (dame Clea) makes a Philosopher; no more doth the furplice and linnen vestment or thaving, an Isiaque priest. But he indeed is aprieft of Iss, who after he hath seene and received by law and custome, those things which are shewed and practifed in the religious ceremonies about these gods, searcheth and diligently enquireth, by the meanes of this holy doctrine, and discourse of reason, into the trueth of the faid ceremonies. For very few there be who among them, who understand and know the cause 50 of this ceremony, which is of all other the smallest, and yet most commonly observed; namely, why the Isiaque priests shave their heads, and weare no haire upon them; as also, wherefore they goe in vettments of Line? And some of them there be, who care not at all for any knowledge of fuch matters: yet others fay, they forbeare to put on any garments of wooll, like as they doe to cat the flesh of those sheepe which carie the said wooll, upon a reverence they beare unto them: femblably, that they cause their heads to be shaven in token of dole and forrow: likewife that they weare furplices and veftments of linnen, in regard of the colour that the flower of line or flaxe beareth, which refembleth properly that celeftiall azure skie that environeith the whole world. But to fay a trueth, there is but one cause indeed of all: for lawfull it is, not for a man who is pure and cleane, to touch any thing (as Plato faith) which is impure and uncleane. Now it is well knowen, that all the superfluities and excrements of our food and non-sufflment, be foule and impure, and of such be engendred and grow, wooll, haire, shagge and nailes: and therefore a meere ridiculous mockenicitwere, if when in their expiatoric tanctifications and divine services, they cast off their haire, being shaven and made smooth all their bodies over, they should then be clad and arraied with the superfluous excrements of beasts: for so we must thinke that Hessaus the Poet when he writeth thus,

At feaft of gads and facred meriment, Take heed with knife, thy nailes thou do not pare, To cut I fay, that dry dead excrement, From lively flesh of fingers five, beware.

teacheth us, that we ought first to be cleansed and putified, then to solemnise sessivall holidaies, and not at the very time of celebration and performance of holie rites and divine service, to use fuch clenting and tidding away of superfluous excrements. Now the herbe Line groweth out of the earth which is immortall, bringeth foorth a frute good to be eaten, and furnitheth us wherewith to make a simple, plaine, and flender vestment, which sitteth light upon his backe as that weareth it, is meet for all featons of the yeere; and of all others, (as men fay) leaft breedeth lice or vermine; whereof I am to discourse else where. Now these Isiaque priests so much abhorre the nature and generation of all superfluities and excrements, that they not onely resule to cate most part of pulse, and of flesh meats, mutton and porke, for that sheepe and swine breed much excrement, but also upon their daies of fanctification and expiatoric folemnities, they will not allow any falt to be eaten with their wands; among many other reasons, because it whetteth the appetite, and giveth an edge to our stomacke, provoking us to cate and drinke more liberally: for to fay as Aristagor as did, That falt was by them reputed uncleane, because when it is congealed and growen hard, many little animals or living creatures, which were caught within it, die withall, is a very fooleric. Furthermore, it is faid, that the Acgyptian go priests have a certeine pit or well apart, out of which they water their bull or beese Apis : and be very precise in any wise not to let him drinke of Nilu, not for that they thinke the water of that tiver uncleane, in regard of the crocodiles which are in it, as some be of opinion (for contrariwife, there is nothing to much honored among the Aegyptians as the river Nilus) but it feemeth that the water of Nilus doth fatten exceeding much, and breed flesh overfast, and they would not in any case that their Apis should be sat, or themselves grosse and corpulent : but that their foules might be clothed with light, nimble, and delicate bodies; fo as the divine part in them should not be oppressed or weighed downe, by the force and ponderositie of that which is mortall. In Heliopolis, which is the citie of the Sunne, those who serve and minister unto their god, never bring wine into the temple, as thinking it not convenient in the day time to drinke 40 in the fight of their lord and king: otherwise the priests drinke thereof, but sparily: and besides many purgations and expiations they have, wherein they absteine wholly from wine; and during those daies, they give themselves wholly to their studies and meditations, learning and teaching holy things: even their very kings are not allowed to drinke wine their fill, but are flinted to the gage of a certeine measure, according as it is prescribed in their holy writings, and those kings also were priests, as Hecataus writeth. And they began to drinke it after the daies of king Pfammetichus; for before his time they dranke it not at all, neither made they libaments thereof unto their gods, supposing it not acceptable unto them; for they tooke it to be the verie bloud of those giants which in times past warred against the gods; of whom after they were flaine, when their bloud was mixed with the earth, the vine tree sprang: and this is the cause, say 50 they, why those who be drunke, lose the use of their wit & reason, as being full of the bloud of their progenitours. Now that the Aegyptian priests both hold and affirme thus much, Eudoxus hath delivered in the second booke of his Geographie. As concerning fishes of the sea, they doe not every one of them absteine from all indifferently; but some forbeare one kind, & some another: as for example, the Oxyrynchites will cate of none that is taken with an hooke; for adoring as they doe, a fish named Oxyrynchos, they are in doubt and feare lest the hooke should be uncleane, if haply the faid fish swallowed it downe with the baite. The Sienites will Q9999 3 not touch the fish. Phageus, for it should seeme that it is found, what time as Nilus beginnes to flow; and therefore the faid hish by his appearing, fignifieth the rising and inundation of Ni. lm, whereof they be exceeding joious, holding him for a certaine and fure messenger. But the priests absteine from all fishes ingenerall; and whereas upon the ninth date of the first moneth, all other inhabitants of Aegypt, feede upon a certaine broiled or rosted fish before their dores; the priefts in no wife talle thereof; mary they burne fishes before the gates of their houses; and two reasons they have the one holy, fine and subtile, which I will deliver hereaster: as that which accordeth and agreeth very well to the facred discourses as touching Ofirin and Typhon: the other plaine; vulgar and common tepresented by the fish, which is none of the viands that be necessary, rare and exquisit, according as Homer beareth withesse, when he brings to not in the Pheacians delicate men & loving to feed daintily, nor the Ithacefians, Ilanders, to eat fish at their feasts: no nor the mates and fellow travellers with ulyses, during the time of their long navigation and voiage by sea, before they were brought to extreame necessity. To be briefe, the very sea it selfe they thinke to be produced a part by fire, without the bounds & limits of nature, as being no portion nor element of the world, but a strange excrement, a corrupt superfluity and unkinde maladie: For nothing abfurd and against reason, nothing fabulous and superstitious, (as some untruly thinke) was inserted or served as a sacred signe in their holy ceremonies, but they were all markes grounded upon causes and reasons morall, and the same profitable for this life, or elfe not without fome historicall or naturall elegancy. As for example, that which is faid of the oinion; for that Dictys the foster father of Is, fell into the river of Wilm, 20 and was there drowned, as he was reaching at oinions and could not come by them, it is a mere fable and carieth no fense or probability in the world : but the trueth is this, the priests of Isis hate the oinion and avoid it as a thing abominable, because they have observed, that it never groweth nor thriveth well to any bigneffe but in the decrease and waine of the Moone: Neither is it meet and fit for those who would lead an holy and fanctified life, or for such as celebrate solemme feasts and holidaies, because it provoketh thirst in the former; and in the other causeth teares, if they feed thereupon. And for the same reason they take the sow to be a prophane and uncleane beaft, for that ordinarily the goeth a brimming and admitteth the bore, when the Moone is past the full: and looke how many drinke of her milke, they breake out into a kinde of leprofie or drie skurfe all over their bodies. As touching the tale which they inferre, who once 30 in their lives doe facrifice a fow when the Moone is in the full, and then eat her flesh: namely that Typhon hunting and chafing the wilde swine at the full of the Moone, chanced to light upon an arke or coffin of wood, wherein was the body of Ofiris which he diffnembred and threw away by pecce meale, all men admit not thereof, supposing that it is a fable as many others be, mitheard and milunderstood. But this for certaine is held, that our ancients in old time so much hated and abhorred all exceffive delicacy, superfluous and costly delights and voluptuous pleasures, that they said within the temple of the city of Thebes in Aegypt there stood a square columne or pillar, wherein were engraven certaine curses and execuations against their king Minis, who was the first that turned and averted the Aegyptians quite from their simple and frugal maner of life, without mony, without fumptuous fare & chargeable delights. It is faid also 40 that Technatiu the father of Bocchoreus, in an expedition or journey against the Arabians, when it chaunced that his cariages were far behind and came not induc time to the place where he incamped, was content to make his supper of whatsoever he could get, & so to take up with a very fmall and fimple pittance, yea and after fupper to lie upon a course and homely pallet, where he flept all night very foundly and never awoke : whereupon, he ever after loved fobrietie of life & frugality, & curfed the forefaid king Minis: which malediction of his being by the priefts of that time approved, he caused to be engraven upon the pillar abovesaid. Now their kings were created either out of the order of their priests, or else out of the degree of knights and warriors; for that the one estate was honored and accounted noble for valour, the other for wisdome and knowledge. And looke whom soever they chose from our of the order of knighthood, presently 50 after his election he was admitted unto the colledge of priefts, and unto him were difcoled and communicated the fecrets of their Philosophy, which under the vaile of fables and darke speeches couched and covered many mysteries, through which the light of the trueth in some fort thoughdimly appeare. And this themselves seeme to signific and give us to understand, by setting up ordinarily before the porches and gates of their temples, certaine Sphinges: meaning thereby, that all their Theologie containeth under ænigmaticall and covert words, the secrets of wildome. In the citie of Sais, the image of intinerva which they take to be 1/is, had fuch an infeription over it, as this: I am all that which hathbeene, which is, and which thall be, and never any man yet was able to draw open my vaile. Moreover many there be of opinion, that the proper name of Supiter in the Acgyptians language is Amoun, of which we have in Greeke, derived the word Ammon : whereapon we furname Jupiter , Ammon : but Manethos who was an Aegyptian himselfe of the citie of Sebenna; supposeth that by this word is signfied, a thing hiddenoroccultation; and Hecatemithe Abderite affirmeth, that the Aegyptians used this terme among themselves, when they called one unto another, for it was a vocative word, and for that they imagined the prince and foveraigne of the gods to be the fame: that Pan, that is to fay, an to univerfall nature, and therefore unfeene; hidden and unknowen; they praied and befought him for to disclose and make himselfe knowen unto them, by calling him Amoan. See then, how the Aegyptians were very ftrict and precise, in not profaning their wisdome, nor publishing that learning of theirs which concerned the gods: And this the greatest Sages and most learned clerkes of all Greece do tellific, by name, Solon, Thales, Plato, Eudoxus, Pythagorus, & as fome let notto fay, Lyeurgus himlelfe; who all travelled of a deliberate purpose into Acgypt, for to confer with the priefts of that country. For it is constantly held that Endoxus was the auditour of Chonapheus the priest of Memphis; Solon of Sanchis the priest of San, Pyth: goras of Oenupheus the priest of Heliopolis. And verily this Pythigor as last named, was highly esteemed among thole men, like as him felfe had them in great admiration, in fo much as he of all others feemed 20 most to imitate their maner of mysticall speaking under covert words, & to involve his doctrine and lentences within figurative & enigmaticall words: for the characters which are called Hicroglyphicks in Aegypt, be in maner all of them, like to these precepts of Pythagoras: Eat not upon a stoole or chaire; Sit not over a bushell; Plant no date tree; Stirre not the fire in the house, nor rake into it with a sword. And me thinks, that whereas the Pythagoreans call tinitie, Apollo, Tiro, Diana; the number of feven, Minerwa; and the first cubicke, Neptune; this refembleth very neere, that which the Aegyptians confectate & dedicate in their temples, and agreeth with that which they both do & write. For their king and lord Oficis, they depaint and pourtray, by an eie and a fcepter: and some there be, who make this interpretation of the name Osivi, as if it fignified, having many eies, for that Os in the Aegyptian tongue, betokeneth many, and 30 Iti, an eic. As for heaven, they deferibe by a yoong countenance, by reason of the perpetuity thereof, whereby it never waxeth old. An eie they let out by an heart, having under it an hearth with fire burning upon it. In the city of Thebes there stood up certaine images without hands, refembling Judges; and the chiefe or Prefident among them, was blindfolded or hoodwincked, to give us to understand, that justice should neither be corrupted with briberie, nor partiall and respective of persons. In the signet or seale ring of their marrials and militaric men, there was engraven the portracture of the great flie called the Beettill, because in that kinde there is no female, but they be all males: they blow or cast their seed in some of a pellet or round ball, under dung, which they prepare to be a place, not for their food more, than for their brood. Whenfoever therefore you shall heare the Aegyptians tell tales of the gods, to wit, of their vagarant 40 and wandring perigrinations, or of their difmembrings, and other fuch like fabulous fictions, you must call to minde, that which we have before said; and neverthinke that they meane any fuch thing is or hath beene done according to that litterall fenfe: for they do not fay, that Mercwie properly is a dog, but forasmuch as the nature of this beast is to be wary, watchfull, vigilant and wife, able to difftinguish by his taking knowledge and semblance of ignorance, a friend and familiar from an anemy and stranger: therefore (as Plate faith) they attributed and likened him to the most eloquent of all the gods. Neither doe they thinke, when they describe the Sunne, that out of the barke of the tree Lotus there arifeth a babenew borne; but in this wise doe they represent unto us the Sunne rising, giving thus much to understand covertly, that the light and illumination of the Sunne proceedeth out of the waters of the fea: for even after the fame ma-50 ner the most cruell and terrible king of the Perfians, Ochus, who put to death many of his nobles and subjects, and in the end sew their beefe Apis, and eathirn at a feast together with his friends, they called The fword; and even at this day, in the register and catalogue of their kings, he goeth under that name; not fignifying thereby his proper substance, but to expresse his hard and fell nature, and his mischievous disposition, they compared him to a bloudy instrument and weapon made to murder men. In hearing then and receiving after this maner, that which shalbe toldeunto you as touching the gods after an holy and religious maner, in doing also and observing alwaies diligently the accultomed rites ordeined for the facted fervice of the gods, and beleeving firmely, that you can not performe any facrifice or littingy more pleating unto them, than to study for to have a found and true opinion of them : by this meanes you shall avoid supersition, which is as great a sinne as impigue and Atheisme. Now the sable of Iss and Oficia, is as briefly as may be, by cutting off many superfluous matters that serve to no purpose, delivered in this wife: It is faid, that dame Rhea, at what time as Saturne lay fecretly with her, was espied by the Sunne, who curfed lier; and among other maledictions, praied that the might not be delivered, nor bring forth child, neither in any moneth nor yeere : but Mercurie being inamoured of this goddesse, companied likewise with her; and afterwards, as he plated at dice with the Moone and won from her the feventieth part of every one of her illuminations, which being all 10 put together, make five entire daies, he added the same unes the three hundred and threescore daies of the yeere; and those odde daies the Aegyptians do call at this present, the daies of the Epact, celebrating and folemnizing them as the birthdaies of their gods: for that when the full time of Rhea was expired, upon the first day of them was Ofirth borne; at whose birth a voice was heard, That the lord of the whole world now came into light: and some say, that a certeinewoman named Pamyle, as the went to fetch water for the temple of Jupiter in the city of Thebes, heard this voice, commanding her to proclaime aloud, That the Great King and Benefactour Ofris was now borne : alfo, for that Saturne committed this babe Ofris into her hands for to be nourfed, therefore in honour of her there was a feltivall day folemnized, named thereupon Pamylia, much like unto that which is named Phallephoria, unto Priapus. On the second 20 day the was delivered of Aroueris, who is Apollo, whom force likewife call the elder Orus. Upon the third day she brought forth Typhon, but he came not at the just time nor at the right place, but brake thorow his mothers side, and issued foorth at the wound. On the fourth day was Iss Or Nephaly, borne, in a watery place called Panhygra. And the fifth day the was delivered of * Nephthe, who of some is named also Teleute and Venue; others call her Nice. Nowit is said, that the conceived Ofris and Arouers by the Sunne, Ifis by Mercurie, Typhon and Mephthe by Saturne, which is the cause that the kings reputing the third of these intercalar dates to be desasterous and difmall, dispatched no affaires thereupon, neither did they cherish themselves by meat and drinke or otherwise, untill night : that Nephthe was honoured by Typhon; that Isis and Osais were in love in their mothers bellie before they were borne, and lay together feeretly and by 30 flealth; and fome give out, that by this meanes Aroueris was begotten and borne, who by the Aegyptians is called Orm the elder, and by the Greeks, Apollo. Well, during the time that Ofristreigned king in Aegypt, immediatly he brought the Aegyptians from their needy, poore and favage kinde of life, by teaching them how to fow and plant their grounds, by establishing good lawes among them, and by thewing how they should worthip and serve God. Afterwards, he travelled thorowout the world, reducing the whole earth to civility, by force of armes leaft of all, but winning and gaining the most nations by effectuall remonstrances & sweet perswafton couched in fongs, and with all maner of Musicke: whereupon the Greeks were of opinion, that he and Bacchus were both one. Furthermore, the tale goes, that in the absence of Ofinia, Typhon flirred not, nor made any commotion, for that Isis gave good order to the contrary, and was of 40 fufficient power to prevent and withstand all innovations; but when he was returned, Typhon complotted a confpiracy against him, having drawen into his confederacy seventy two complices, besides a certeine queene of Aethopia, who likewise combined with him, and her name was Aso. Now when he had fecretly taken the just measure and proportion of Ofirsbody, he caused a coffer or hutch to be made of the same length, and that most curiously and artificially wrought and fet out to the cie, he tooke order, that it should be brought into the hall, where he made a great feast unto the whole company. Every man tooke great pleasure with admiration, to beholde such a singular exquisit piece of worke; and Typhon in a meriment, stood up and promised that he would bestow it upon him, whose body was meet & fit for it: hereupon, all the company one after another affaied whose body would fit it; but it was not found proportionate nor of a 50 just fize to any of all the rest: at length, Ofiris gat up into it, and laied him there along; with that, the conspiratours ran to it, and let downe the lidde and cover thereof upon him, and partly with nailes, and partly with melted lead which they powred aloft, they made it fure enough; and when they had so done, caried it forth to the river side, and let it downe into the sea, at the verie mouth of Nilus named Tanitieus; which is the reason, that the said mouth is even to this day odious and execrable among the Aegyptians, infomuch as they call it Cataphyston, that is to fay, Abominable, or to be spitat. Over and besides, it is said, that this sell out to be done upon the feventeenth day of the moneth named Athyr, during which moneth, the Sunne entreth into the figne Scorpius, and in the eight and twentieth yeere of Ofo is reigne: howbeit, others affirme, that he lived in deed, but reigned not fo long. Now the first that had an inckling and intelligence of this hainous act, were the Panes and Satyres inhabiting about Chennis, who began to whifper one unto another, & to talke thereof; which is the reason, that all sudden tumults and troubles of the multitude and common people, be called Panique affrights. Moreover, it followeth on in the tale, that Isis being advertised hereof, immediatly cut off one of the treffes of her haire, and put on mourning weeds in that place which now is called the city Coptus, in re-10 membrance thereof 3 howfoever others fay, that this word Coptes, betokeneth Privation, for that water in Greeke, fignificth as much as to deprive. In this dolefull habit the wandred up and downe in great perplexity to heare tidings of Ofris, and whomfoever the met withall, the failed not to enquire of them; and the miffed not fo much as little children playing together, but afked them, whether they had feene any fuch coffer : at length, the light of those children who had seene it indeed, and they directed her to the mouth of the river 20 ilm, where the complices and affociats of Typhon had let the faid veffell into the sea. And ever fince that time, the Acgyptians are of opinion, that young children have the gift of revealing secrets, and they take all their words which they paffe in play and sport, as offes and presages, but especially within the temples, what matter foever it be that they prattle of. Moreover, when Isis understood that Osi-20 ris fell in love with her fifter Nephthys, thinking fhe was Ifis and fo carnally companied with her, and withall, found a good token thereof, to wit, a chaplet or garland of Melilot which he had left with Nephthe, the went for to feeke her babe (for prefently upon the birth of the infant, for feare of Typhon she hid it) and when with much adoc and with great paines taken, Isis had found it, by the meanes of certeine hounds which brought her to the place where he was, the reared and brought it up, in such fort, as when he came to some bignesse, he became her guide and squire, named Anubis, who also is faid to keepe the gods, like as dogs guard men. After this, the heard newes of the foresaid coffer, and namely, that the waves of the sea had by tides cast it upon the coast of Byblus, where, by a billow of water it was gently brought close to the foot of a thrubbe or plant called * Erice: now this Erice or Tamarix in a small time grew to faire, and spread . Gerson. 30 forth fo large and big branches withall, that it * compaffed, enclosed and covered the faid coffer * Or forme all over, so as it could not be seene. The king of Byblus wondring to see this plant so big, caused Gath strub. the branches to be lopped off, that covered the foresaid coffin not seene, and of the truncke or * Some transbody thereof, made a pillar to sustaine the roofe of his house: whereof 1/st by report being ad the also were vertiled by a certaine divine spirit or winde of slying same, came to Byblus, where she sat her inclosed water downe by a certaine fountaine, all heavie and in diffresse, pitiously weeping to herselse; in the truncke neither spake she aword unto any creature, onely the Queenes waiting maids and women that came by, she faluted and made much of, plaiting and broiding the tresses of their haire most exquisitly, and casting from her into them a marvellous sweet and pleasant sent issuing from her body, whiles the dreffed them. The queene perceiving her women thus curioufly and 40 trimly fee out, had an earnest defire to fee this stranger, aswell for that the yeelded such an odoriferous finell from her body, as because she was so skilfull in dressing their heads: so she sent for the woman, and being growen into some familiar acquaintance with her, made her the nourse and governoffe of her young fonne: now the kings name himselfe was Maleander, and the queenes, Aftarte, or rather Saofis, or as fome will have it, Wemanow, which is as much to fay in the Greeke tongue, as Athenais. And the speech goes, that Isis suckled and nourished this infant, by putting her finger in stead of the brest-head or nipple, into the mouth thereof; also, that in the night feafon the burnt all away that was mortall of his body : and in the end, was herfelfe metamorphized and turned into a fwallow, flying, and lamenting after a moaning maner about the pillar aforefaid, untill fuch time as the queene observing this, and crying out when the 30 faw the body of her child on a light fire, bereaved it of immortality. Then Isin being discovered to be a goddeffe, craved the pillar of wood: which she cut downe with facility, and tooke from underneath the truncke of the Tamarix or Erice, which the anointed with perfumed oile, and enwrapped within a linnen cloth, and gave it to the kings for to bekept: whereof it commeth, that the Byblians even at this day reverence this piece of wood, which lieth confecrate within the temple of Ils. Furthermore, it is faid, that in the end she *light upon the coffer, over which * means ein. the wept and lamented for much, that the yongest of the kings fonnes died for very pity of her;

but the herselfe accompanied with the eldest of them, together with the coffer, embarked, tooke fea & departed. But when the river Phadrus turned the wind formwhat roughly, about the dawning of the day, 1/1/1 was fo much displeased and angry, that she dried it quite. And so some as she came unto a solitary place, where the was by herselfe alone, she opened the coffer, where finding the corps of O/frin, the laid her face close to his, embraced it and wept. Herewith came the child fofily behinde and espied what she was doing: whom when she perceived, she looked backe, cafling an untoward cie, and beheld him with fuch an angry aspect, that the poore infant not able to endure so terrible a looke, died upon it. Some say it was not so; but that he sell into the sea. in maner aforefaid, and was honored for the goddeffe fake, and that he is the same whom the Acgyptians chaunt at their feasts, under the name of Maneros. Butiothers give out, that this 10 child was named Palestinus, and that the city Pelusium was built in remembrance of him by the goddeffe Isis and so tooke thename after him; and how this Maneros whom they so celebrate in their fongs, was the first inventour of mulicke. Howbeit others there are againe, who affirme, that this was the name of no person, but a kinde of dialect or language, proper and agreeable unto those who drinke and banquet together, as if a man should say, in good houre and happily may this or that come. For the Aegyptians were wont ordinarily to use this terme Maneros in fuch a fense: like as no doubt the drie sceletos or dead corps of a man which they used to carie about and shew in a bierre or cossin at the table, was not the representation or memoriall of this accident which befell unto Ofiris, as some doe imagine, but served as an admonition to put the guests in minde to be merry and take their pleasure and joy in those things that were pre- 20 fent; for that foone after they should be like unto it. This I say was the reason that it was brought in at their feafts and mery meetings. Furthermore when Isis was gone to fee her fonne Horus who was fostered and brought up in the city Butus, and had laid the foresaid coffer with Ofiris body out of the way, Typhon fortuned as he hunted in a cleere moone-shine night to meet with it, and taking knowledge of the body, cut it into four eteen peeces and flung them heere and there one from another: which when Is understood, she searched for them in a bote or punt made of papyr reed, all over the moores and marishes: whereof it comes that the Crocodiles never hurt those who saile or row in vessels made of that plant, whether it be that they are affraid of it, or reverence it for this goddesse sake I know not. And thus you may know the reason, why there be found many sepulchres of Ofiris in the country of Aegypt, for ever as the foundary 30 peece of him, she caused a tombe to be made for it : others say no : but that she made many images of him, which she left in every city, as if she had bestowed among them his very body indeed: to the end that in many places he might be honored: and that if happly Typhon when he fought for the true sepulcher of Ofiris (having vanquished and overcome Horus) many of them being reported and showed, he might not know which was it, and so give over seeking farther. Over and befides, the report goes, that Isis found all other parts of Osiru body but onely his privy member, for that it was immediately cast into a river and the fishes named Lepidotus, Phagrus and Oxyrynchus devoured it: for which cause Isis detesteth them above all other fishes: but in fted of that natural part, the made a counterfet one, called Phallus, which the confectated: and in the honor thereof the Aegyptians hold a folemne feast. After all this it followeth in the 40 fable, that Ofiris being returned out of the infernall parts, appeared unto Horse, for to exercise, instruct and traine him against the battell : of whom he demanded what he thought to be the most beautifull thing in the world: who answered, To be revenged of the wrong and injury which had benedone to a mans parents. Secondly, what beaft he thought most profitable to goe into the field withall : unto whom Horus should make answere, The horse : whereat Ofiris marvelled, and asked him why he named the horse and not the lion rather: Because (quoth Horun) the lion ferveth him in good fled, who flands upon his owne guard and defente onely and hath need of aid: but the horse is good to defait the enimy quite, to follow him in chace and take him prisoner. When Ofiris heard him sayso, he tooke great pleasure and contentment heerein, judging heereby that his some was sufficiently appointed and prepared to give battell 50 unto his enimies. And verily it is faid that among many that daily revolted from Typhon and fided with Horus, even the very concubine of Typhonnamed Thueris was one, who came to him: and when a certaine * ferpent followed after and purfued her, the fame was cut in peeces by the guard about Horus: in remembrance whereof, at this very day they bring forth a certaine cord, which likewise they chop in peeces. Well, they say the battell continued many daies: but in the end Horus had the victory: As also that Isis having Typhon prisoner fast bound in her hands, killed him not: but loofed him and let him goe: which Horm not able to endure with patience, laid violent hands upon his mother, and plucked from her head the roiall ornament that the had thereon: in fted whereof, Mercury fet one a morion made in maner of a cowes head. Then Typhon called Horm judicially into question, charging him that he was a bastard; but by the helpe of Mercury who pleaded his cause, he was judged by the gods, legitimate: who also intro other battels vanquished Typhon. And more than all this, the tale faith, that Jis after death, was with child by Osir 16, by whom she had Helitomenus and Harpocrates who wanted his nether parts. Thus you see what be in maner all the principall points of this sable, setting assed and excepting those which are most exectable, to wit, the dismembring of Horus and the beheading of 1/10s. To Now, that, if any there be who hold and affirme such fables as these touching the blessed and immortall nature, whereby especially we conceived in our minde the deity, to be true and that such things were really done or happed so indeed,

We ought to spit upon their face And curse such mouthes with all disgrace. as Aefehylus faith, I need not fay unto you, for that you hate and detell those enough alreadie of your felfe, who conceive to barbarous and abfurd opinions of the gods. And yet you fee veriewell, that these benot narrations like unto oldwives tales, or vaine and foolish sictions, which Poets or other idle writers devise out of their owne fingers ends, after the maner of spiders, which of themselves without any precedent, & subject matter, spin their threeds, weave and firetch out their webbes: for evident it is that they conteine some difficulties and the memorials of certeine accidents. And like as the Mathematicians fay, that the rainbow is a reprefentation of the Sunne, and the same diftinguished by fundry colours, by the refraction of our eie-fight against a cloud: even so this fable, is an apparence of some doctrine or learning, which doeth reflect and fend backe our understanding, to the consideration of some other trueth; much after the maner of facrifices, wherein there is mingled a kinde of lamentable dole, and forrowfull heavineffe. Semblably, the making and disposition of temples, which in some places have faire open Isles and pleasant allies open over head: and in other, darke caves vaults, and shrouds under the earth, resembling properly caves, sepulchers, or charnell vauts, wherein they put the bodies of the dead; especially the opinion of the Osirians: for albeit the bodie 30 of O/nu, be faid to be in many places, yet they name haply Abydus the towne, or Memphis a littlecitie, where they affirme that his true body lieth, in fuch fort, as the greatest and welthiest persons in Aegypt usually doe ordeine and take order, that their bodies be interred in Abydus, to the end they may lie in the same sepulchte with Ofiris: and at Memphis was kept the beese Apis, which is the image and figure of his foule, and they will have his body also to be there. Some likewise there be, who interpret the name of this towne, as if it should signific the haven and harbour of good men: others, that it betokeneth the tombe of Ofris: and there is before the gate of the citie, a little Isle, which to all others is inacceffible, and admitteth no entrance, informuch, as neither fowles of the aire will there light, nor fishes of the sea approach thither: onely at one certeine time, the priests may come in, and there they offer facrifices, and present 40 oblations to the dead; where also they crowne and adorne with flowers the monument of one Mediphibe, which is overthadowed and covered with a certeine plant, greater and taller than any olive tree. Eudoxuo writeth, that how many sepulchres soever there be in Aegypt wherein the corps of Office thould lie, yet it is in the civie Buffree; for that it was the countrey and place of his nativitie: so that now there is no need to speake of Taphosiris, for that the very name it felfe faith enough, fignifying as it docth, the fepulture of Ofirit. Well, I approove the cutting of the wood, and renting of the linnen, the effulions also and funerall libaments there performed, because there be many mysteries mingled among. And so the priests of Aegypi affirme, that the bodies not of these gods onely, but also of all others, who have been engendred, and are not incorruptible, remaine among them where they honoured and reverenced; but their 50 foules became starres, and thine in heaven: and as for that of Isis, it is the same which the Greekes call Cyon, that is to fay, the dogge-starre, but the Aegyptians Sothis: that of Orm is Orion, and that of Typhon, the Beare. But whereas all other cities and states in Aegypt contribute a certeine tribute imposed upon them, for to pourtray, draw and paint such beasts as are honored among them, those onely who inhabite the countrey Thebait, of all others give nothing thereto, being of opinion, that no mortall thing, subject to death, can be a god: as for him alone, whom they call Cmepb, as he was never borne, so shall he never die. Whereas therefore many fuch things as thefe, be reported and shewed in Aegypt, they who thinke, that all is no more but to perpetuate and eternize the memorie of marvelous deeds and strange accidents of fome princes, kings, or tyrants, who for their excellent vertue & mighty puissance, have adjoined to their owne glory, the authoritie of deitie, unto whom, a while after, there befell calamities; use heerein a very cleanly shift, and expedite evasion, transferring handsomly from the gods unto men, all finister infamie that is in these fable, and helpe themselves by the testimonies which they finde and read in histories: for the Aegyptians write, that Mercurie was but finall of stature, and slender limmed: that Typhon was of a ruddy colour; Orus white; Ofini of a blackith hew, as who indeed were naturally men. Moreover, they call Ofiris, captaine or generall, Canobus pilot or governor of a ship, after whose name they have named a starre: and as for 10 the shippe which the Greeks name Argo, they hold that it was the very resemblance of Ofitis thip, which for the honour of him, being numbred among the starres, is so situate in heaven, as that it mooveth and keepeth his course not farre from that of Orion, and the Cyon or doggeftarre; of which twaine, the one is confecrate unto Horus, the other to Ifis. But I feare me, that this were to stirre and remoove those facred things which are not to be touched and medled withall, and as much as to fight againft, not continuance of time onely and antiquitie, as simpnides faith, but also the religion of many forts of people and nations, who are long fince posses fed with a devotion toward these gods : I doubt (I say) lest in so doing they faile not to transfer fo great names as these out of heaven to earth, and so goe very neere and misse but a little to overthrow and abolish that honour and beliefe, which is ingenerate and imprinted in the hearts 20 of all men, even from their very first nativitie: which were even to set the gates wide open for a multitude of miscreants and Asheists, who would bring all divinity to humanity, and deitie to mans nature; yea and to give a manifest overture and libertie for all the impostures and jugling calts of Euemeras the Messenian, who having himselfe coined and devised the originals of fables, grounded upon no probability nor subject matter, but even against the course of reason and nature, spred and scattered abroad throughout the world all impietie, transmuting and changing all those whom we repute as gods, into the names of admirals, captaines generall, and kings, who had lived in times past, according as they stand upon record, by his faying, writ-Or, Panchee, ten in golden letters, within the citie * Panchon, (which never Gracian nor Barbarian fave himselfe faw) as having failed unto the countreies of the Panchonians and Triphylians; nati- 30 ons for footh that neither are, nor ever were in this world. And yet verily, a great name there goeth among the Assyrians, of the woorthy and renowmed acts of Semirami: as also in Aegypt of Selostris. As for the Phrygians, even at this day they terme noble exploits and admirable enterprises, by the name Manica, of one of their ancient kings, whom they called Manis, who in his time was a most prudent and valiant prince, and whom others named Majo des. Cyrus led the Perfians, and Alexander the Macedonians, with conquest still and victorie, from one end of the world in maner to another; and yet for all these brave acts, no otherwise renowmed they are, nor remembred, but onely for puilfant and good kings: and fay, there were haply some of them who upon an overweening and high conceit of themselves, helped forward with youth, and want of experience, as Plato faith, and whose mindes were puffed up and 40 inflamed with pride and vain-glory, tooke upon them the furnames of gods, and had temples founded in their names, yet this glory of theirs lasted but a while, and soon after being condemned by the posterity, of vanitie, and arrogancie together, with impletie and injustice,

Into the aire, doth vanish by and by. and now as fugitive flaves that may be brought backe againe where ever they be found, they are haled and pulled away from their temples and altars, and nothing remaineth for them but their tombs & fepulchers: and therefore that oldking Antigonus, when a certeine Poet named Hermodet us, in his verses called him the sonne of the Sun, yea, & a god. Well quoth he, my groome that daily voideth my close stoole, knowes no such matter by me. Lysppus also the Imager did 50 very well to reproove Apelles the painter, for that, when he drew the picture of Alexander, hee Portraied him with lightning in his hand; whereas Lysippus put in his hand a launce, the glory and renowme whereof, as due and proper unto him, yea, and befeeming his person indeed, no time nor age should ever be able to abolish. In which regard, I hold better with them who thinke that the things which be written of Typhon, Ofirin, and Isis, were no accidents or passions incident to gods or to men; but rather to some great Dæmons : of which minde were Pythager 44,

Plato, Xenocrates, and Chrysippus, following heerein the opinions of the ancient Theologians, who hold, that they were farre stronger than men, and that in puissance they much surmounted our nature: but that divinitie which they had, was not pure and simple; but they were compounded of a nature corporall and spirituall, capable of pleasure, of griefe, and other passions and affections, which accompanying these mutations, trouble some more, others lesse. For in these Damons, there is like, as also among men, a diversity and difference of vice and of vertue. For the acts of Giants and Titans, so much chaunted in every Greeke song, the abominable deeds likewife and practifes of one Saturne, the refiftance also of Python against opollo, the founds of Batchus, and the wanderings of Ceres, differ in no respect from the accidents of Osiris to and Typhon, and of all other fuch like fabulous tales, which every man may heare as much as he lift; as also what soever lying covered and hidden under the vaile of mystical facrifices and ceremonies, is kept close not uttered nor shewed to the vulgar people, is of the fame fort. And acding hereto, we may heare Homer how he calleth good men, and fuch as excell others diverfly, one while bear offer, that is to fay, like unto the gods; other while, arables, that is to fay, comparable to the gods: formetimes bein and what experses, that is to fay, having their wifdome and counfell from the gods. But the denomination or addition drawen from the Dæmons, he useth commonly as well to the good as the bad; indifferent to valiant persons and to cowards: to a timorous and fearefull foldior thus:

Damonian, approch thou neare: The Greeks why doest thou so much feare?

άλλ' ότε δι τό τεταρτιν επίσουτο βαίμονι έτος,

When he the charge in field the fourth time gave, Like to some Damon he did himselfe behave.

Δαιμονίη, τί νυ τὲ Πείαμος, Πειαμοίο τὲ παίθες, ξες.

* Dæmonian, what is that great offence, Which Priam and his sonnes committed have Against thee, for to make thy just pretence, In wrathfull tearmes upon them thus to rave, And them no grace and mercy to vouch fave,

Nor rest, untill thou seeft the stately towne, Of Ilion destroid and rased downe?

Giving us heereby thus much to understand, that the Dæmons have a mixtnature, and a will or affection which is not equall, nor alwaies alike. And heereupon it is, that Plato verily attri-buteth unto the Olympian and celestiall gods, all that which is dexterous and odde: but unto the Dæmons, what foever is finister and even. And Xenocrates holdeth, that those daies which 40 be unluckie and difmall, those festivall solemnities likewise, which have any beatings or knocking and thumping of brefts, or falting, or otherwife any curfed speeches and filthy words, are not meet for the honour & worthip either of gods or of good Damons: but he supposeth that there be in the aire about us, certeine natures great & puiffant; howbeit, shrewd, malicious and unsociable, which take some pleasure in such matters: and when they have obteined and gotten fo much to be done for their fake, they goe about no farther mischiefe, nor wait any shrewder turnes: whereas contrariwife, both Hesiadus calleth the pure and holy Dæmons, such also as be the good angels and keepers of men,

10 And Plato also termeth this kinde of Dæmons or angels Mercuriall, that is to say, expositours or interpretours, and ministeriall, having a middle nature betweene gods and men, who as mediatours, present the praiers and petitions of men heere unto the gods in heaven, and from thence transmit and convey unto us upon earth, the oracles and revelations of hidden and future things, as also their donations of goods and riches. As for Empedocles, he faith, that these Damons or fiends, are punished and tormented for their sinnes and offences which they have committed, as may appeare by these his verses:

Rrrrr

For why? the power of aire and skie,

not one yet doth them love. untill fuch time as being thus in this purgatory chaftifed and clenfed, they recover againethat place estate and degree which is meet for them and according to their nature. These things and fuch like for all the world they fay, are reported of Typhon, who upon envy and malice committed many outrages ; and having thus made a trouble and confusion in all things, filled sea and land with wofull calamities and miseries, but was punished for it in the end. For 1st the wife and fifter of Ofris in revenge plagued him in extinguithing and repreffing his fury and rage: and yet neglected not the the travels and paines of her owne which the endured, her trudging also and wandring to and fro, nor many other acts of great wildome and proweffe suffered $_{20}$ The to be buried in filence and oblivion: but inferting the fame among the most holy ceremonies of facrifices, as examples, images, memorials and refemblances of the accidents hapning in those times, the consecrated an enfiguement, instruction and consolation of piety and devout religion to godward, as well for men as women afflicted with mileries. By reason whereof the and her husband Oficis of good Dæmons were transmuted for their vertue into gods, like as afterwards were Hercules and Buchus, who in regard thereof, and not without reason, have honours decreed for them both of gods and also of \tilde{D} æmons intermingled together, as those who in all places were puissant, but most powerfull both upon and also under the earth. Forthey fay that Sarapis is nothing else but Pluto, and Isis the same that Proferpina, as Archemachus of Eube a and Heraclitus of Pontus tellific and he thinketh that the oracle in the city Canobus, is that of 30 father Dis or Pluto. King Ptolemeus furnamed Soter that is to fay, faviour, caused that hugestatue or coloffe of Pluto which was in the city Sinope, to be be taken from thence, not knowing, nor having scene before of what forme and shape it was, but onely that as he dreamed he thought that he faw Serapis, commanding him withall speed possible to transport him into A. lexandria. Now the king not knowing where this statue was, not where to finde it, in this doubtfull perplexity related his vision aforesaid unto his friends about him, and chanced to meet with one sofibine a great traveller and a man who had bene in many places, and he faid that in the city of simplehe had seene such a statue as the king described unto them. Whereupon Prolemans fent Soteles and Dionyfins, who in long time, and with great travell, and not without the efpeciall grace of the divine providence, ftole away the faid coloffe and brought it with them: 40 Nowwhen it was come to Alexandria and there feene, Timotheus the great Cosmographer and Antiquary, and Alaneshon of the province Sebennitis, gueffed it by all conjectures to be the image of Pluto, and namely by Cerber ut the hel-dog and the dragon about him, perswading the king that it could be the image of no other godbut of Serapis. For it came not from thence with that name; but being brought into Alexandria, it tooke the name Serapis, by which the Aegyptians doe name Pluto. And yet Heraelitus verily the Naturalist faith, that Hades and Dromiss, that is to say, Pluto and Bacchus, be the same. And in treeth when they are disposed to play the fooles and be mad, they are caried away to this opinion. For they who suppose that Hades, that is to fay, Pluto, is faid to be the body and as it were the sepulcher of the soule, as if it feemed to be foolish and drunken all the while she is within it, me thinkes they doe allegorize 50 but very baldly. And better it were yet to bring Ofiris and Bacchus together, yea and to reconcile Sarapis unto Ofiris, in faying that after he hath changed his nature, he became to have this denomination. And therefore this name Sarapis is common to all, as they know very well who are professed in the sacred religion of Osris. For we ought not to give eare and credit to the bookes and writings of the Phrygians, wherein we finde, that there was one Charopos the daughter of Hercules, and that of Islaces a sonne of Hercules was engendred Typhen: neither yet to make account of Phylarchia who writeth, that Baschia was the first, who from the Indians drave two beeles, whereof the one was named Apis, and the other Ofiris: That Sarapis is the proper name of him who ruleth and embelisheth the universall world, and is derived of the word Sairein, which some fay, fignifieth as much as to beautifie and adorne. For these be absurd to ies delivered by Phylarchus: but more monstrous and senselesse are their absurdities who write, that Sarapis is no god, but that it is the coffin or sepulcher of Apis that is so called: as also that there be certain two leaved brasen gates in Memphis, bearing the names of Lethe & Cocytus, that is to fay, oblivion and wailing, which being fet open when they interre and bury Apis, in the opening make a great found and rude noise: which is the cause that we lay hand upon every copper or 10 brasen vessell when it resoundeth so, to stay the noise thereof. Yet is their more apparence of trueth and reason in their opinion, who hold that it was derived of these verbes overs, and overs, which fignifieth to move, as being that which moveth the whole frame of the world. The priests for the most parthold, that Sarapis is a word compounded of Ofris and Apis together, giving this exposition withall and teaching us, that we ought to believe Apis to be an elegant image of the foule of Ofiris. For mine owne part, if Sarapis be an Aegyptian name, I suppose rather frat it betokeneth joy and mirth: And I ground my conjecture upon this, that the Aegyptians ordinarily call the feast of joy and gladnesse termed among the Athenians Charmosyna, by the name of Sairei. For Plato himselfe faith, that Hades which fignifieth Pluto, being the fonne of Aidos, that is to fay, of shamefaltnesse and reverence, is a milde and gracious god to 20 those who are toward him. And very true it is, that in the Acgyptians language, many other proper names are fignificant and carry their reason with them : as namely that infernal place under the earth, into which they imagine the foules of the dead doe defeend after they be departed, they call Ament hes, which terme is as much to fay, as taking and giving; but whether this word be one of those, which in old time came out of Greece and were transported thither, we will confider and discusse better hereafter: Now for this present let us prosecute that which remaineth of this opinion now in hand. For Ofiris and Isis of good Dæmons were translated into the number of the gods: And as for the puissance of Typhon oppressed and quelled, howbeit panting as yet at the last gaspe and striving as it were with the pangs of death, they have certame ceremonies and facrifices, to pacify and appeale. Other featts also there be againe on the 30 contrary fide wherein they infult over him, debafe and defame him what they can: In fo much as men of a ruddy colour they deride & make of them a laughing stocke. And as for the inhabitants of Coptos, they use at a certaine feast to throw an affe headlong downe from the pitch of an high rocke, because Typhon was ruddy and of ared asses colour. The Businitants and Lycopolites forbeare to found any trumpets, because they resemble the braying of an affe: and generally they take an affe to be an uncleane beaft and demonicall, for the refemblance in hiew that it hath withhim: and when they make certaine cakes in their facrifices of the moneths, Payni and Phaophi, they worke them in paiftry with the print upon them of an affe bound. Also in their folemue facrifice to the Sun, they command as many as will be there to worthip that god, notto weareany brooches or jewels of gold about their bodies, nor to give any meat or pro-40 vander unto an affe what need foever he have thereof. It feemeth alfo, that the Pythagoreans themselves were of opinion, that Typhon was some siend or damonical power; for they say that Typhon was borne in the even number of fix and fifty : againe, that the triangular number or figure, is the puissance of Pluto, Bacchus and Mars: of the quadrangle, is the power of Rhea, Venus, Ceres, Vefta, and Juno: that of twelve angles belongeth to the might of Jupiter: but that of fifty fix angles is the force of Typhon, as Endoxun hath left in writing. But the Acgyptians supposing that Typhon was of a reddish colour, doekill for facrifice unto him, kine and oxen of the same colour, observing withall so precisely, that if they have but one haireblacke or white, they be not facrificeable; for they thinke such factifices not acceptable, but contrariwise displeasant unto the gods; imagining they be the bodies which have received the foules of leand and wicked persons, transformed into other creatures. And therefore after they have cursed the head of fuch a factifice, they cut it off and cast it into the river, at least waies in old time: but now they give it unto strangers. But the oxe which they meane to facrifice indeed, the priests called Sphragiffa, that is to fay, the fealers, come & marke it with their feale, which as Caffor writeth, was the image of a man kneeling, with his hands drawen backe and bound behinde him, and having a sword set to his throat: Semblably they use the name of an affe also, as hath bene said, for his uncivill rudenesse and insolency, no lesse than in regard of his colour, wherein he resemblesh Rrrrr 2

Typhon; and therefore the Aegyptians gave unto Ochus aking of the Persians, whom they have ted above all others as most curied and abominable, the surname of asse: whereof Ochubeing advertised and faying withall, This affe shall devour your oxe; caused presently their beese A. ph to be killed and facrificed, as Dinon liath left in writing. As for those who say, that Typhonafter he had loft the field, fled fix daies journy upon an affe backe, and having by this meanes escaped, begat two fonnes, Hierofolymus and Judams, evidentit is heerein that they would draw the itory of the Iewes into this fable. And thus much of the allegorirall conjectures which this tale doth affoord. But nowfrom another head, let us (of those who are able to discourse somewhat Philosophically and with reason) consider first and formost such as deale most simply in this behalfe, And thefebe they that fay, like as the Greeks allegorize that Saturne is time, June the 10 aire, and the generation of Vulcan, is the transmutation of aire into fire; even so they give out that by Ofiris the Aegyptians meane Nilss, which lieth and keepeth company with I/is, that is to fay, the earth: That Typhon is the fea, into which Wilm falling lofeth himselfe, and is difpatched heere and there, unlesse it be that portion thereof, which the earth receiveth and whereby it is made fertill. And upon the river Nilm there is a facred lamentation, even from the daies of Saturne: wherein there is lamenting, how Nilus fpringing and growing or the left hand, decaieth and is lost on the right: For the Aegyptians doe thinke, that the east parts where the day appeareth, be the forefront and face of the world, that the North part is the right hand & the South part the left. This Nilm therfore, ariling on the left hand, and loft in the fea on the right hand, is faid truely to have his birth and generation in the left fide, but his death and cor- 20 ruption in the right. And this is the reason why the priests of Aegyps have the sea in abomination, and terme falt the fome and froth of Typhon. And among those things which are interdicted and forbidden this is one, that no falt be used at the boord by reason whereof they never falute any pilots or failers, for that they keepe ordinarily in the fea, and get their living by it. This also is one of the principall causes, why they abhorre fishes; in such fort as when they would describe hatred, they draw or purtray a fish : like as in the porch before the temple of Minerva within the city Sai, there was puttraied and engraven, an infant, an old man; after thema falcon or some such hauke, and close thereto a fish, and last of all a river-horse : which Hieroglyphicks, doe symbolize and fignifie thus much in effect. Oall year that come into the world and goe out of it: God hateth shamelesse injustice. For by the hauke they understand God, by the 30 fith hatred, and by the river-horfe impudent violence and vilany, because it is faid that hekilleth his father, and after that, forceth his owne mother and covereth her. And femblably it should feeme, that the faying of the Pythagoreans, who give out that the fea is a teate of Saturne, under covert words doe meane, that it is impure and uncleane. Thus have I beene willing by the way to alledge thus much, although it be without the traine of our fable, because they fall within the compasse of a vulgar and common received history. Butto returne to our matter: the priests as many as he of the wifer and more learned fort, understand by Ofiria, not onely the river Nilua, and by Typhon the fea: but also by the former, they fignifie in one word and fimply, all vertue and power that produceth moisture and water, taking it to be the materiall cause of generation, and the nature generative of feed: and by Typhonthey represent all deficcative vertue, all heat 40 of fire & drineffe, as the very thing that is fully opposite and adverse to humidity; and hereupon it is, that they hold Typhon to be red of haire and of skin yellow: and by the fame reason they willingly would not encounter or meet upon the way men of that hew, no nor delight to speake unto such. Contratiwise they seigne Osiris to be of a blacke colour, because all water, causeth the earth, clothes and clowdes to appeare blacke with which it is mingled. Also the moisture, that is in yong folke maketh their haire blacke; but grifled hoarinesse, which seemeth to be a pale yellow, commeth by reason of ficcity unto those who be past their flower, and now in their declining age: also the Spring time is greene, fresh, pleasant, and generative: but the latter seafon of Autumne, for want of moisture, is an enemie to plants, and breedeth diseases inman

To speake also of that oxe or beefe named Mneuis, which is kept and nourished in Heliopolis at the common charges of the city, confecrated unto Ofiris, and which some say, was the sire of Apu; blacke he is of haire, and honored in a fecond degree after Apis. Moreover, the whole land of Aegypt is of all others exceeding blacke, fuch a blacke I meane, as that is of the ele, which they call Chemia, and they liken it to the heart; for hote and moift it is, and enclineth to the left and South parts of the earth, like as the heart lieth most to the left side of a man. They

affirme also, that the Sunne and Moone are not mounted upon chariots, but within bardges or boates continually do moove and faile as it were round about the world; giving us thereby covertly to understand, that they be bred and nourished by moisture. Furthermore, they thinke, that Homer (like as Thales also) being taught out of the Aegyptians learning, doth hold and set downe this position, That water is the element and principle that engendereth all things : for they fay, that Ofiris is the Ocean, and Ifis, Tethys, as one would fay, the nourfe that fuckleth and feedeth the whole world. For the Greeks call the ejaculation or calting foorth of naturall feed, Aστοία, like as the conjunction of male and female Σωνεσία: likewife 4105, which in Greeke fignifieth a son, is derived of the wording, that is to say, water, and one betokeneth also to raine. Moreto over, Bacchus they furname Hyes, as one would fay; the lord and ruler of the moist nature; and he is no other than Ofiris. Furthermore, whereas we pronounce his name Ofiris, Hellanicus putteth it downe Hyfiris, laying, that he heard the very priests themselves of Aegypt to pronounce it fo. And thus verily calleth he the faid god in every place, not without good shew of reason, having regard unto his nature and invention. But that Ofris is the same god that Bacchus, who should in all reason better know than your selle (ô Clea) considering that in the city of Delphi you are the miftreffe and lady Prioreffe as it were of the religious Thyans, and from your infancy have beenea votary and Nun confectated by your father and mother to the fervice of Ofris. But if in regard of others, we must alledge restimonies, let us not meddle with their hidden secrets; howbeit, that which the priests do in publicke when the inter Apis, having broughthis corps in a boat or punt, differeth not at all from the ceremonies of Bacchus: for, 20 clad they be in stags skinnes, they cary javelins in their hands, they keepe a loud crying, and shaking of their bodies very unquietly, much after the maner of those who are transported with the fanaticall and facred fancy of Bacchus, And what reason els should there be, that many nations of Greece pourtray the statue of Bacches with a bulles head? and the dames among the Elians in their praiers and invocations do call vnto him, befeeching this god to come unto them with his bulles foot? yea, and the Argives commonly furname Bacchus, Bugenes, which is as muchto fay, as the fonne of a Cow, or engendred by a bull: and that which more is, they invocate and call upon him out of the water with found of trumpets, calling into a deepe gulfe, a lambe, as to the Portier, under the name of Pylaochos. Their trumpets they hide within their javelins, called 30 Thyrfi, according as Socrates hath written in his books of facred ceremonies. Moreover, the Titanicall acts, and that whole, entier and facred night, accord with that which is reported as touching the differenbring of Oficio, and the refurrection or renovation of his life : in like maner, those matters which concerne his buriall. For the Aegyptians shew in many places the sepulchres of Ofris: and the Delphians thinke, they have the bones and reliques of Bacchus among them, interred and bestowed neere unto the oracle: and his religious priests celebrate unto him a fecret facrifice within the temple of Apollo, when the Thyades who are the Priestresses begin to chaunt the fonnet * Lientes. Now that the Greeks are of opinion, that Bacchus is the * One of the lord and governour, not of wine liquor onely, but also of every other nature which is moist and furnames of liquid, the testimony of Pindarus is sufficient, when he saith thus: Baechus

Taking the charge of trees that grow, Doth cause them for to bud and blow: The verdure fresh and beauty pure Of lovely fruits he doth procure.

And therefore it is, that those who serve and worship Ofir is are streightly forbidden and charged, not to destroy any fruitfull tree, nor to stop the head of any fountaine. And not onely the tiver Nilm, but all water and moisture what soever in generall, they call the effluence of Ofris: by reason whereof, before their sacrifices they cary alwaies in procession a pot or pitcher of water, in honour of the faid god.

They describe also a king and the Southern or meridionall climat of the world, by a figuree to leafe, which fig leafe fignifieth the imbibition and motion of all things: and befides, it feemeth naturally to refemble the member of generation. Also, when they solemnize the feast called Pamylitia, which as before hath beene faid, was instituted in the honour of Priapus, they shew and cary about in procession an image or statue, the genitall member whereof, is thrice as bigge as the ordinary : for this god of theirs is the beginning of all things; and every such principle, by generation multiplieth it felfe. Now, we are wont moreover to fay, Thrice, for many times ; to wit, a finite number for an infinite; as when we use the word, Tecquarages, that is to fay, Thrice

happy, for most happy; and Three bonds, for infinite; unlesse peradventure this ternary or threefold number was expresly and properly chosen by our ancients. For the nature of moiflure being the principle that engendreth all things, from the beginning hath engendred these three elements or primitive bodies, Earth, Aire and Fire. For that branch which is fet unto the fable, to wit, that Typhon flung the genitall member of Ofiris into the river, that Iss could not finde it, but caused one to be made to resemble it, and when she was provided thereof, ordeined that it should be honoured and caried in a foleime pompe; tendeth to this, for to teach us, that the generative and productive vertue of god, had moisture at the first for the matter, and by the meanes of the faid humidity, was mixed with those things that were apt for generation. Another branch there is yet, growing to this fable, namely, that one Apopis brother to the Sunne, 10 warred against Jupiter; that Ofiris aided Jupiter and helped him to defait his enemie; in regard of which merit he adopted him for his fonne, and named him Diony fus, that is to fay, Bacchus, Now the Muthology of this fable, as it evidently appeareth, accordeth covertly, with the trueth of Nature : for the Acgyptians call the winde, Jupiter, unto which nothing is more contrary, than ficeity and that which is firy : and that is not the Sunne, although some confanguinity it hath unto it : but moisture comming to extinguish the extremity of that drinesse, fortifieth and augmenteth those vapors, which nourish the wind and keepe it in force. Moreover, the Greeks consecrate the Ivie unto Bacchus, and the same is named among the Aegyptians, Chenosiris. which word, (as they fay) fignifieth in the Aegyptian tongue, the plant of Ofris: at leastwife Ariston who enrolled a colonic of the Athenians, affirmeth that he light upon an epiftle of 20 Anaxarchus, wherein he found as much; as alfo, that Bacchus was the fonne of a water nymph, Nains. Other Aegyptians also there be, who hold, that Bacchus was the fonne of Isis, and that he was not called Ofiris, but Arfaphes, in the letter Alpha, which word fignifieth proweffe or valour. And thus much giveth Hermaus to understand, in his first booke of Aegyptian acts; where he faith also, that Ofiris by interpretation, is as much, as * flout or mightie. Heere I forbeare to alledge Mnafas, who referreth and afcribeth unto Epaphus, Bacchus, Ofiris, and Sarapis. I overpasse Anticlides likewise, who affirmeth, that Isis was the daughter of Prometheus. and married unto Bacchus. For the very particular properties that we have faid were in their feafts and facrifices, yeeld a more cleere evidence and proofe, than any allegations of witneffes whatfoever. Also they hold, that among the starres, the dogge or Sirius was confecrate un- 30 to Iss, the which starre draweth the water. And they honour the lion, with whose heads and having the mouth gaping and wide open, they adorne the dores and gates of their temples, for that the river Nilus rileth

So soone as in the circle Zodiake,

The Sunne and Lco signe, encounter make. And as they both hold and affirme, Nilm to be the effluence of Ofris; even to they are of opinion, that the body of Isis is the earthor land of Aegypt; and yet not all of it, but so much as Willus overfloweth, and by commixtion maketh fertile and fruitfull: of which conjunction, they fay, that Orus was engendred, which is nothing else but the temperature and disposition of the aire, nourishing and maintaining all things. They fay also, that this Orus was nourished with-40 in the mores neere unto the citie Buius, by the goddeffe Latona; for that the earth being well drenched and watered, bringeth foorth and nourifheth vapors, which overcome, extinguish, and represse, (nothing so much) great ficcitie and drinesse. Furthermore, they call the marches and borders of the land, the confines also of the coasts which touch the sea, Nephthys: and this is the reason why they name Nephthys, Teleut ea, that is to say, finall or last; and say that she was married unto Typhon. And when Nilus breaketh out and overrunneth his banks fo, as he approcheth these borders, this they call the unlawfull conjunction or adultery of Ofir is with Nephthys, the which is known by certeine plants growing there, among which is the Melilot: by the feed whercof, faith the tale, when it was friedde and left behinde, began Typhon to perceive the wrong that was done unto him in his mariage. And hecreupon they fay, that Orus was the 50 legitimate sonne of Ir is, but Anubis was borne by Nephthys in bastardie. And verily in the fuccession of kings they record Nephthys maried unto Typhon, to have beene at first barren. Now if this be not meant of a woman, but of a goddeffe, they understand under these anigmaticall speeches, a land altogether barren and untruitfull, by reason of hardnesse and stiffe soliditie. The lying in wait of Typhon to surprise Ofrin, his usurped rule and tyranny, is nothing els but the force of drinesse, which was very mightie, which dissipated also and spent all that humi-dirie that both engendreth and also encreaseth Nilus to that height. As for that queene of Acthiopia, who came to aid & affifthim, the betokeneth the Southerly winds comming from Aethiopia: for when these have the upper hand of the Etesian windes, which blow from the North, and drive the cloulds into Aethiopia, and fo hinders those showers and gluts of faine which power out of the clouds, and make the river Nilus to swell : then Typhon, that is to say, drouth, is faid to winne the better, and to burne up all; and to having gotten the mattery cleane of Nilus, who by reason of his weaknesse and feeblenesse, is drivening and forced to retire a contrary way, he chafeth him, poore and low into the fear. For whereas the fable faith, that Ofiris was thus fall within an arke or coffer, there is no other thing fignified thereby; but this departure backe of the water, and the hiding thereof within the fea: which is the cause also, that they say Ofiris went out of fight in the moneth Athyr, and was no more feene; at what time as when all the Etesian windes are laid and given over to blow, Nilm returners into his chanell, leaving the land discovered and bare. And now by this time as the night groweth longer, the darknesse encreafeth, like as the force of the light doth diminish and is impaired; and then the priests among many other ceremonies, tellifying their fadnesse and heavie cheero, bring foorth and fhew abeefe with golden hornes, whom they cover all over with a fine vaile of blacke filke, thereby to represent the heavy dole and mourning of the goddesse for Ofiris: (for thus they thinke, that the faid beefe is the image of Ofiris: and the veltment of blacke aforefaid, tellifying the earth, doth fignific Iss) and this shew exhibit they foure daies together; to wit, from 20 the seventh unto the tenth following: And why? Foure things there be for which they make demonstration of griefe & fortow: the first is the river Nilus, for that he seemeth to retire and falle: the second are the North-windes, which now are husht and still, by reason of the Southern winds, that gaine the mastrie over them: the third is the day, for that now it waxeth shorter than the night: and last of all, the discovering and nakednesse of the earth, together with the devesting of trees, which at the very fame time begin to shed and lose their leaves. After this, upon the ninteenth day at night, they goe downe to the sea side, and then the priests revested in their facred Stoles and habits, carie foorth with them, a confecrated cheft, wherein there is a veffell of gold, into which they take and powre fresh and potable water; and with that, all those who are prefent fet up a note and shout, as if they had found Offris againe: then they take a 30 piece of fatty and fertile earth, and together with the water, knead and worke it into a paste, mixing therewith most precious odors, perfumes and spices, whereof they make a little image in forme of the Moone croiffant, which they decke with robes and adorne, flewing thereby evidently that they take these gods to be the substance of water and earth.

Thus when Isu had recovered Ofru, nourished Orus, and brought him up to some growth, so that he now became strengthned & fortified, by exhalations, vapors, mists and clouds, Typhon verily was vanquished, howbeit, not flaine, for that the goddesse, which is the ladie of the earth, would not permit & fuffer, that the power or nature which is contrary unto moifture, should be utterly abolished : onely she did slacken and let downe the vehement force thereof, willing that this combat and strife thould still continue; because the world would not have beene entier and perfect, if the nature of fire had beene once extinct & gone. And if this goe not currant among them, there is no reason and probability, that any one should project this affertion also, namely, that Typhon in times past overcame one part of Ofiris: for that in olde time, Aegypt was sea: whereupon it is, that even at this day, within the mines wherein men dig for mettals, yea, and among the mountaines, there is found great flore of fea fish. Likewife, all the fountaines, welles and pits (and those are many in number) cary a brackith, faltith and bitter water, as if some remnant or residue of the oldesea were reserved, which ranne thither. But in processe of time, Orus fubdued Typhon, that is to fay, when the feafonable raine came, which tempered the excessive heat, Niliw expelled and drave forth the fea, discovered the champian ground, and filled it continually more and more by new deluges and inundations, that laied formewhat still unto it. And 50 hereof, the daily experience is presented to our cies; for we perceive even at this day, that the overflowes and tiling of the river, bringing new mud, and adding fresh earth still by little and little, the fea giveth place and retireth: and as the deepe in it is filled more and more, fo the fuperficies tifeth higher, by the continuall shelves that the Nile casts up, by which meane, the sea runneth backward : yea, the very Isle Pharos, which Homer knew by his daies to lie farre within the sea even a daies failing from the continent & firme land of Aegypt, is now a very part thereof not for that it re mooved and approched neerer and neerer to the land; but because the sea which was betweene, gave place unto the river that continually made new earth with the mudde that it brought, and so mainteined and augmented the maine land. But these things resemble very neere, the Theologicall interpretations that the Stoicks give out for they holde, that the generative and nurritive Spirit, is Bacchue; but that which firiketh and divideth, is Hercules; that which receiveth, is Ammon; that which entreth and pierceth into the earth, is Ceres and Proferpina; and that which doth penetrate farther and passe thorow the sea, is Neptune. Others, who mingle among naturall causes and reasons, some drawen from the Mathematicks, and principally from Aftrology, thinke that Typhon is the Solare circle or sphære of the Sunne; and that Ofiris is that of the Moone; inafmuch as the Moone hath a generative and vegetable light, multiplying that sweet and comfortable moisture which is so meet for the generation of living crea- 10 tures, of trees and plants: but the Sunne having in it a pure firy flame indeed without any mixture or rebatement avail, heateth and drieth that which the earth bringeth forth, yea, and whatfoever is vetdant and in the flower; infomuch, as by his inflamation he caufeth the greater pare of the earth to be wholly defert and inhabitable, and many times subdueth the very Moone. And therefore the Aegyptians evermore name Typhon, Seth, which is as much to fay, as ruling lordly, and oppreffing with violence. And after their fabulous maner they fay, that Hercules sitting as it were upon the Sunne, goeth about the world with him; and Mercurie likewise with the Moone: by reason whereof, the works and effects of the Moone resemble those acts which are performed by eloquence and wifedome: but those of the Sunne are compared to such as be exploited by force and puiffance. And the Stoicks fay, that the Sunne is lighted and fet on fire by 20 the Sea, and therewith nourished but they be the fountaines and lakes which fend up unto the Moone a milde, sweet and delicate vapour. The Aegyptians faine, that the death of Ofiris hapned on the seventeenth day of the moneth, on which day, better than upon any other, the is judged to be at the full: and this is the reason why the Pythagoreans call this day, The obstruction, and of all other numbers they most abhorre and detest it: for whereas sixteene is a number quadrangular or foure-fquare, and eighteene longer one way than another; which numbers onely of those that be plaine, happen for to have the ambient unities, that environ them equall to the spaces conteined and comprehended within them; seventeene, which falleth betweene, separateth and disjoineth the one from the other, and being cut into unequall intervals, distractes the proportion fesquioctave. And some there be who say, that Ofiris lived, others that he reigned, cight and twenty yeeres: for so many lights there be of the Moone, and so many daies doth she turne about her owne circle: and therefore in those ceremonies which they call The sepulture of Ofris, they cut a piece of wood, and make a certeine coffin or case in maner of the Moone croiffant, for that as the approcheth neere to the Sunne, the becommeth pointed and cornered, untill in the end the come to nothing, and is no more seene. And as for the dismembring of Osiris into foureteene pieces, they fignific unto us under the covert vaile of these words, The daies wherein the faid planet is in the wane, and decreafeth even unto the change, when the is renewed againe. And that day on which the first appeareth, by passing by and escaping the raies of the Sunne, they call an unperfect good: for Ofiris is a doer of good: and this name fignifieth many things, but principally an active and beneficiall power, as they fay: and as for the other 40 name Omphis, Hermaus faith, that it betokeneth as much as a benefactour. Alfo, they are of opinion, that the rilings and inundations of the river Nilus, answere in proportion to the course of the Moone; for the greatest height that it groweth unto in the countrey Elephantine, is eight and twenty cubits; for fo many illuminations there be, or daies, in every revolution of the Moone : and the lowest gage about Mendes and Xois, fixe cubits, which answereth to the first quarter: but the meane betweene, about the city Memphis, when it is just at the full, commeth to four etcene cubits, correspondent to the full Moone. They holde moreover, Apisto be the lively image of Ofiris, and that he is ingendred and bred at what time as the generative light descendeth from the Moone and toucheth the Cow desirous of the male: and therefore Apis refembleth the formes of the Moone, having many white spots obscured and darkened with the 50 shadowes of blacke. And this is the reason, why they solemnize a feast in the new Moone of the moneth Phamenoth, which they call The ingreffe or entrance of Ofirit to the Moone; and this is the beginning of the Spring feason: and thus they put the power of Ofris in the Moone. They fay also, that 1/is (which is no other thing but generation) lieth with him; and so they name the Moone, Mother of the world; faying, that the is a double nature, male and female: female, in that the doth conceive and is replenithed by the Sunne : and male, in this regard, that the fendeth forth and fprinkleth in the aire, the feeds and principles of generation: for that the drie distemperature and corruption of Typhon is not alwaies superior, but often times vanquished by generation, and howfoever tied it be and bound, yet it rifeth fresh againe, and fighteth against Orus, who is nothing els but the terrestriall world, which is not alrogether free from corruption, nor yet exempt from generation. Othersthere be, who would have all this fiction coverily to represent no other thing but the ecclipses: for the Moone is ecclipsed, when the is at the full directly opposite to the Sunne, and commeth to fall upon the shadow of the earth : like as they fay, Ofir is was put into the cheft or coffer above faid. On the other fide, the feemeth to hide and darken the light of the Sunne, upon certeine thirtieth daies, but yet doth not wholly a-10 bolish the Sunne, no more than Isis doth kill Typhon : but when Nephthys bringeth forth Anubis Ilis putteth herselfe in place : for Nephthys is that which is under the earth and unseene; but Is, that which is above, and appeareth unto us: and the circle named Horizon, which is common to them both, and parteth the two hemisphæres, is named Anubis, and in forme resembleth a dogge: for why? a dogge feeth aswell by night as by day: fo that it should seeme, that Anulis among the Aegyptians hath the like power that Proferpina among the Greeks, being both terrestriall and coelestiall. Others there be, who thinke, that Anubis is Saturne, and because he is conceived with all things, and bringeth them foorth, which in Greeke the word zeen fignifieth, therefore he is furnamed Kvwr, that is to fay, Adogge. So that there is some hidden and mysticall fecret in it, that causeth some, even still to reverence and adore A dogge: for the time was, 20 when more worship was done unto it in Aeg ypt, than to any other beast; but after that Cambyses hadkilled Apis cut him in pieces, and flung the fame heere and there, no other creature would come neere to tafte thereof, fave the dogge onely; whereupon he loft that prerogative and preeminence to be more honoured than other beafts. Others there are, who would have the shadow of the earth, which causeth the Moone to be ecclipsed when she entreth into it, to be named Typhon. And therfore me thinks, it were not amiffe to fay, that in particular there is not any one of these expositions and interpretations perfect by it selfe and right, but all of them together cary some good costruction: for it is neither drought alone, nor winde, nor sea, ne yet darkneffe; but all that is no isome and hurtfull whatfoever, and which hath a special part to hurt and destroy, is called Typhon. Nether must we put the principles of the whole world into bodies 30 that have no life and foule, as Democrit us and Epicurus doe: nor yet fet downe for the workman and framer of the first matter, a certeine reason and providence, without quality (as do the Stoicks:) fuch a thing as hath a fublistence before and above all, and commandeth all: for impossible it is, that one fole cause, good or bad, should be the beginning of all things together; for God is not the cause of any evill, and the coagmentation of the world bendeth contrary waies, like as the composition of a lute or bow, as Heraslisus saith, and according to Euripides,

And therefore this opinion fo very auncient, is descended from Theologians and Law-givers unto Poets and Philosophers, the certeine author and beginning whereof, is not yet knowen; 40 howbeit, fo firmely grounded in the perswasion and beliefe of men, that hard it is to suppresse or abolish the same; so commonly divulged not onely in conferences, disputations, and ordinary speeches abroad, but also in the facrifices and divine ceremonies of gods service, in many places, as well among the Barbarians as Greeks, to wit, that neither this world floteth and waveth at aventure, without the government of providence and reason, nor reason onely it is that guideth, directeth, and holdeth it (as it were) with certeine helmes or bits of obeifance, but manie things there be confused and mixed, good and bad together: or to speake more plainely, there is nothing heere beneath that nature produceth and bringeth foorth, which of it felfe is pure and fimple: neither is there one drawer of two tunnes, to disperse and distribute abroad the affaires of this world, like as a taverner or vintner doeth his wines or other li-30 quors, brewing and tempering one with another. But this life is conducted by two principles and powers, adverse one unto another; for the one leadeth us to the right hand directly, the other contrariwise turneth us aside and putterh us backe: and so this life is mixt, and the verie world it felfe, if not all throughout, yet at leastwife, this beneath about the earth, and under the Moone, is unequall, variable, and subject to all mutations that possibly may be. For if nothing there is, that can be without a precedent cause, and that which of it selfe is good can never minister cause of evill; necessarie it is, that nature hath some peculiar cause and beginning by it

felfe, of good aswell as of bad. And of this opinion are the most part of the ancients, and those of the wifelt fort. For some thinke there be two gods as it were of a contrary mystery & profesfion; the one, author of all good things, and the other of bad. Others there be who call the better of them god; and the other Dæmon, that is to fay, divell, as Zoroaftres the Magician did, who by report, was five thousand yeeres before the warre of Troy. This Zoroastres (Isay) na. med the good god Oromazes , and the other Arimanius. Moreover, he gave out, that the one resembled light, more than any sensible thing else whatsoever: the other darknesse and ignorance: alfothat there is one in the middes between them, named Mithres: (and heereupon it is, that the Persians call an intercessor or mediator, Mithres.) He teacheth us also to sacrifice unto the one of them, for petition of good things, and for thanke giving: but to the other, for to divert and turne away finifer and evill accidents. To which purpose they used to stampe in a 10 morter a certeine herbe which they call Omomi, calling upon Pluto and the darkneffe: then temper they it with the bloud of a woolfe which they have killed in facrifice : this done, they catie it away, and throw it into a darke corner, where the Sunne never shineth. For this conceit they have, that of herbes and plants, fome appertaine unto the good god, and others to the evill damon or divell. Semblably, of living creatures, dogs, birds, and land urchins, belong to their good god: but those of the water, to the evill fiend. And for this cause they repute those very happic, who can kill the greatest number of them. Howbeit these Sages and wise men report many fabulous things of the gods: as for example, that Oromazes is engendred of the electeft and purest light, and Arimanius of deepe darknesse: also that they watre one upon another. And the former of these created fixe other gods, the first of Benevolence; the second of Verity; the third of good discipline and publike Law; and of the rest behinde, one of Wisedome, another of Riches; and the fixth, which also is the last, the maker of joy for good and honest deeds. But the * later produceth as many other in number, concurrents as it were and of adverse operation to the former above named. Afterwards when Gromazes had augmented and amplified himselfe three times, he remooved as farre from the Sunne, as the Sunne is diffant from the earth, adoring and embeliffing the heaven with starres: and one starre above the rest heordeined to be the guide, mistresse, and overseer of them all, to wit, Sirius, that is to say, the Doggestarre. Then, after he had made foure and twentie other gods, he enclosed them all with in an egge. But the other, brought foorth by Arimanius, who were also in equall number, never ceafed untill they had pierced and made a hole unto the faid fmooth and polithed egge: and foat 30 ter that , evill things became mingled pel-mell with good. But there will a time come predeftined fatally, when this Arimanius who brings into the world plague and famine, shall of necesfitiebe rooted out and utterly destroied for ever, even by them; and the earth shall become plaine, even, and uniforme: neither shall there be any other but one life, and one commonwealth of men , all happie and speaking one and the same language. Theepompus also writeth, that according to the wife Magi, thefe two gods must for three thousand yeetes, conquer one after another, and for three thousand yeeres be conquered againe by turnes; and then for the space of another three thousand yeeres, levie mutuall warres, and fight battels one against the other, whiles the one shall subvert and overthrow that which the other hath set up: untill in the end Pluto shall faint, give over, and perish: then shall men be all inhappie estate, they shall 40 need no more food, nor cast any thadow from them; and that god who hath wrought and effected all this, shall repose himselfe, and rest in quiet, not long (I say) for a god, but a moderate time as one would fay for a man taking his sleepe and rest. And thus much as touching the fable devised by the Magi. But the Chaldwans affirme that of the gods, whom they call Planets or wandring starres, two there be that are beneficiall and dooers of good; two againe mischievous and workers of evill; and three which are of a meane nature and common. As for the opinion of the Greeks, concerning this point, there is no man I suppose ignorant thereof: namely, that there be two portions or parts of the world, the one good, allotted unto Jupiter Olympius, that is to fay, Celeftiall; another bad, appertaining to Pluto infernall. They fable so moreover, and seigne, that the goddesse Harmonia, that is to say, Accord, was engended of Mars and Venus: of whom, the one is cruell, grim, and quarrellous; the other milde, lovely, and generative. Now confider the Philosophers themselves, how they agree heerein: For Herachitus directly and difertly nameth warre, the Father, King, and Lord of all the world; saying,

Both out of heaven and earth to banish warre, that Homer when he wisheth and praieth, wift not how (ere he was aware) he curfed the generation and production of all things, which indeed have their effence and being by the fight and antipathie in nature. He was ignorant that the Sunne would not paffe the bounds and limits appointed unto him; for otherwhich the furies and curfed tongues which are the ministresses and coadjuttesses of justice would finde him out. As for Empedocles, he faith, that the beginning and principle which worketh good, is love and amity, yea, and otherwhiles is called Harmonie by Merops: but the cause of evill,

to Come now to the Pythagoreans, they demonstrate and specifie the same by many names : for they call the good principle, One, finite, permanent or quiet, straight or direct, odde, quadrat or fquare, right and lightforme : but the bad, twaine, infinite, moving, crooked, even, longer one way than another, unequall, left and darke, as if these were the sountaines of generation. Anaxagors calleth them the minde or understanding and infinity. Aristosle termeth the one forme, the other privation. And Plato under darke and covert termes hiding his opinion, in many places calleth the former of these two contrary principles, The Same, and the later, The other. But in the bookes of his lawes, which he wrote when he was now well flept in yeeres, he giveth them no more any obscure and ambiguous names, neither describeth he them symbolically and by an igmaticall and intricate names, but in proper and plaine termes, he faith, that this worke 20 is not moved and managed by one fole cause, but haply by many, or at leastwife no sower than twaine: whereof the one is the creatour and worker of good, the other opposite unto it and operative of contrary effects. He leaveth also and alloweth a third canse betweene, which is neither without foule nor reasonlesse ne yet unmoovable of it selse, as some thinke, but adjacent and adherent to the other twaine, howbeit enclining alwaies to the better, as having a defire and appetite thereto, which it purfueth and followeth, as that which heercafter we will deliver shall show more manifestly, which treatise shall reconcile the Aegyptian Theologic with the Greeks Philosophy, and reduce them to a very good concordance: for that the generation, composition, and constitution of this world is mingled of contrary powers, howbeit the same not of equall force: for the better is predominant: but impossible it is that the evill should utter-30 ly perish and be abolished, so deepely is it imprinted in the body & so far inbred in the soule of the univerfall world, in opposition alwaies to the better, and to warre against it. Now then, in the foule, reason and understanding, which is the guide, and mistresse of all the best things, is Ofris. Also in the earth, in the windes, in water, skie and the starres, that which is well ordained, flajed, disposed and digested in good fort, by temperate seasons and revolutions, the same is called the defluxion of Oficis, and the very apparent image of him: Contrariwife, the paffionate, violent, unreasonable, brutish, rash and soolish part of the soule, is 7 yphon : Semblably in the bodily nature, that which is extraordinarily adventitious, unholfome & difeafed, as for example, the troubled aire and tempeltuous indifpolitions of the weather, the obscuration or ecclipse of the Sunne, the defect of the Moone and her occultation, be as it were the excursions, deviations 40 out of course, and disparations: and all of them be Typhons; as the very interpretation of the Aegyptian word fignifieth no leffe: for Typhon, they name Seth, which is as much to fay, as violent and oppreffing after a lordly maner. It importeth also many times reversion, & other whiles aninfultation or supplantation. Moreover some there be who say, that one of Typhons samiliar friends was named Bebaon. But Manethos affirmeth, that Typhon himselfe was called Bebon, which word by interpretation is as much as cohibition, restreint or impeachment, as if the puiffance and power of Typhon were to stay and withstand the affaires that are in good way of proceeding, and tend as they should doe, to a good end. And hecreupon it is that of tame beafte they dedicate and attribute unto him, the most groffe and indocible of all others, namely an affe: but of wilde beafts the most cruell and favage of all others, as the crocodiles and river-50 horfes. As for the affe, we have spoken before of him. In the city of Mercury, named Hermupolis, they thew unto us the image of Typhon, purtraied under the forme of a river horfe, upon whom fitteth an hauke, fighting with a ferpent. By the foresaid horse they represent Typhon: and by the hauke, the power and authority which Typhon having gotten by force, maketh no care oftentimes, both to be troubled and allo to trouble others by his malice. And therefore when they folemnize a facrifice, the feventh day of the moneth Tybi, which they call the comming of Iss out of Phanicia, they devise upon their halowed cakes for facrifice, a river-horse, as if he were tied and bound. In the city of Apollo the maner and cultome confirmed by law was, that every one must eat of acrocodile: and upon a certaine day they have a solemne chase and hunting of them, when they kill as many of them as they can, and then cast them all before the temple: and they say, that Typhon being become a crocodile hath escaped from Orus: attributing all dangerous wicked beatls, all hurtfull plants and violent passions unto Typhon, as if they were his workes, his parts or motions. Contrariwife they purtray and depaint unto us Ofrei, by a fepter and an eie upon it : meaning by the eie forelight and providence, by the fepter authority and puissance: like as Homer nameth Jupiter who is the prince, lord and ruler of all the world. Hypatos, that is, fovereigne, and Meftor, that is, forefeeing: giving us to understand, by fovereigne, his supreme power, by foreseeing his prudence and wildome. They represent Osiria al. 10 fo many times by an hanke, for that the hath a wonderfull cleere and quicke fight, her flight also is as fwift, and the is wont naturally to fultaine her felfe with very little food. And more than that (by report) when the flieth over dead bodies unburied, the cafteth mould and earth upon their cies. And looke whenfoever the flieth downe to the river for to drinke the fetteth up her fethers straight upright, but when she hath drunke she laieth them plaine and even againe, by which it appeareth that fafe the is and hath escaped the crocodile: For if the crocodile feife upon her and catch her up, her pennache abideth stiffe and upright as before. But generally throughout wherefoever the image of Ofiris is exhibited in the forme of a man, they purtray him with the natural member of generation stiffe and straight, prefiguring thereby the generative and nutritive vertue. The habiliment also, wherewith they clad his images is bright, shi. 20 ning like fire: For they repute the * Sunne to be a body reprefenting the power of goodneffe, as being the visible matter of a spirituall and intellectuall substance. And therefore their opinion descriveth to be rejected who attribute unto Typhon the sphere of the Sunne, considering that unto him properly appertaineth nothing that is resplendent, healthfull and comfortable, no disposition, no generation or motion which is ordered with measure or digested by reason: But if either in the aire or upon the earth there be any unseasonable disposition of windes, of weather, or water, it hapneth when the primitive cause of a disordinate and indeterminate power commeth to extinguish the kinde vapours and exhalations. Moreover in the facred hymnes of Ofris, they invocate and call upon him who lieth at repose hidden within the armes of the Sunne. Also upon the thirtieth day of the moneth Epophi, they solemnize the seast of the nativi- 30 ty or birth of Orus cies: at what time as the Sunne and Moone be in the same direct line: as being perswaded that not onely the Moone but the Sunne also is the cie and light of Horm: Likewise upon the twenty eight day of the moneth Phaopi they celebrate another feast of the Sunnes basons or staves, and that is after the Aequinox in Autumne, giving covertly thereby to understand that the Sunne buth need of an appuy or supporter to rest upon and to strengthen him, because his heat beginnes then to decay and languish sensibly, his light also to diminish and decline obliquely from us. Moreover about the foltice or middle of winter, they cary about his temple feven times a cow: and this procession is called the seeking of Osiris, or the revolution of the Sunne, as if the goddeffe then defired the waters of winter: And so many times they doe it, for that the course of the Sunne, from the Winter solftice unto the Summer sol- 40 Rice is performed in the feventh moneth. It is faid moreover, that * Horus the fonne of Isis was the first who sacrificed unto the Sun, the source enth day of the moneth, according as it is written in a certaine booke as touching the nativity of Horses: howfoever every day they offer incense and sweet odors to the Sunne three times: First at the Sunne rising, Rosin: secondly about noone, Myrrh: and thirdly at the Sunne fetting, a certaine composition named Kiphi. The myfficall meaning of which perfumes and odors I will heereafter declare: but they are perfuaded that in all this they worship and honor the Sunne. But what need is there to gather and collect a number of fuch matters as these? seeing there be some who openly maintaine that Osiris is the Sunne, and that the Greeks call him Sirius, but the article which the Aegyptians put before, to wit, [O] is the cause that so much is not evidently perceived: as also that Isis is 50 nothing else but the Moone: and of her images those that have hornes upon them, fignifie no other thing but the Moone croiffant: but fuch as are covered and clad in blacke, betoken those daies wherein the is hidden or darkened, namely, when the runneth after the Sunne: which is the reason that in love matters they invocate the Moone. And Eudoxus himselfe faith, that Isis is the prefident over amatorious folke. And verily in all these ceremonies there is some probabilitie and likelihood of trueth. But to fay that Typhon is the Sunne, is so absurd, that we ought not fo much as give eare to those who affirme so. But returne we now to our former matter, For Ist is the feminine part of nature, apt to receive all generation, upon which occasion called the is by Plato, the nurse and Pandeches, that is to say, capable of all: yea and the common fort name her Myrionymu, which is as much to fay, as having an infinite number of names, for that the receiveth all formes and thapes, according as it pleafeth that first reason to convertand turne her. Moreover, there is imprinted in her naturally, a love of the first and principall effence, which is nothing else but the foveraigne good, and it the defireth, feeketh, and purfuethafter. Contrariwife, The flieth and repelleth from her, any part and portion that proceedeth from ill. And howfoever the be the fubject matter, and meet place apt to receive as to well the one as the other, yet of it felfe, enclined the is alwaies rather to the better, and applicth herselfe to engender the same, yea, and to differninate and sowe the defluxions and similitudes thereof, wherein she taketh pleasure and rejoiceth, when she hath conceived and is great therewith, ready to be delivered. For this is are presentation and description of the substance engendred in matter, and nothing elfe but an imitation of that which is. And therefore you may fee it is not besides the purpose, that they imagine and devile the soule of Ofir is to be eternall and immortall: but as for the body, that Typhon many times doth teare, mangle, and abolifhit, that it cannot be seene: and that Is goeth up and downe, wandring heere and there, gathering together the dismembred pieces thereof, for that which is good and spirituall, by consequence isnotany waies subject to change and alteration; but that which is sensible and materiall, doth 20 yeeld from it selfe certeine images, admitting withall and receiving fundry porportions, formes, and fimilitudes, like as the prints and stamps of seales set upon waxe, doe not continue and remaine alwaies, but are subject to change, alteration, disorder and trouble, and this same was chased from the superor region, and sent downe hither, where it fighteth against Horus whom Is engendred fensible, as being the very image of the spiritual and intellectual world. And hecreupon it is, that Typhon is faid to accuse him of bastardie, as being nothing pure and fincere, like unto his father, to wit, reason, and understanding; which of it selfe is simple, and not medled with any passion: but in the matter adulterate and degenerat, by the reason that it is corporall. Howbeit, in the end the victorie is on Mercuries fide, for hee is the discourse of realon, which testifieth unto us, and sheweth, that nature hath produced this world materiall 30 metamorphozed to the spiritual forme: for the nativity of Apollo, engendred betweene 1/is & Ofres, whiles the gods were yet in the belly of Rhea, symbolizeth thus much, that before the world was evidently brought to light and fully accomplished, the matter of reason, being found naturally of it felferude and unperfect, brought foorth the first generation: for which cause they say, that god being as yet lame, was borne and begotten in darkenesse, whom they call the elder Horses. For the world yet it was not, but an image onely and defigne of the world, and a batefantafie of that which should be. But this Horse heere is determinate, definit and perfect, who killeth not 7 yphon right out, but taketh from him his force and puillance that he can doe little or nothing. And heereupon it is, that (by report) in the citie Coptus, the image of Horus holdeth in one hand the generall member of Typhon: and they fable befides, that Mercurie ha-40 ving bereft him of his finewes, made thereof strings for his harpe, and so used them. Heereby they teach, that reason framing the whole world, set it in tune, and brought it to accord, framing it of those parts which before were at jarre and discord: howbeit remooved not, nor abolished altogether the pernicious and hurtfull nature, but accomplished the vertue thereof. And therefore it is, that it being feeble and weake, wrought also (asit were) and intermingled or intellaced with those parts and members which be subject to passions and mutations, causeth earthquakes and tremblings, excellive heates, and extreame drineffe, with extraordinarie windes in the aire, besides thunder, lightnings and firie tempests. It impossoneth moreover the waters and windes, infecting them with peltilence, reaching up and bearing the head aloft, as farre as to the Moone, obfcuring and darkning many times even that which is by nature cleane 50 and thining. And thus the Acgyptians do both thinke and fay, that Typhon fometime strooke theeie of Horse, and another while plucked it out of his head and devoured it, and then afterwards delivered it agains unto the Sunne. By the striking aforesaid, they meane anigmatically the wane or decreate of the Moone monethly: by the totall privation of the cie, they understand her ecclipse and defect of light: which the Sunne doth remedy by relumination of her freight waies, as soone as the is gotten past the shade of the earth. But the principall and more divine nature is composed and consistest of three things, to wit, of an intellectuall nature, of matter, matter, and a compound of them both, which we call the world. Now, that intellectuall part, Plato nameth Idea, the patterne also of the father: as for matter, he termeth it a mother, nurse, a foundation also and a plot or place for generation: and that which is produced of both, he is woont to call the iffue and thing procreated. And a man may very well conjecture, that the Aegyptians compared the nature of the whole world, especially to this, as the fairest triangle of all other, And Plate in his books of policy or common wealth, seemeth also to have used the fame, when he composeth and describeth his nupriall figure: which triangle is of this fort: that the fide which maketh the right angle, is of three, the basis of foure, and the third line called Hr. posinusa of five, aquivolent in power to the other two that comprehend it: fo that the line which directly falleth plumbe upon the base, must answer proportionably to the male; the base to the to female, and the Hypotimusa to the iffue of them both. And verily, Osiris representeth the beginning and principle: Is that which receiveth; and Horus the compound of both. For the number of three is the first odde and perfect: the quaternarie is the first square or quadrate number, composed of the first even number, which is two; and five resembleth partly the father, and in part the mother, as confifting both of two and three. And it should seeme also that the very name Hay, which is the univerfall world, was derived of Heyzethat is to fay, five, and so in Greeke ுமாய்கள், mold time fignified as much as to number : and that which more is, five being multiplied in it felfe, maketh a quadrat number, to wit, twentie five, which is just as many letters as the Acgyptians have in their alphabet, and so many yeeres Apis also lived. And as for Horse. they used to call him Kaimin, which is as much to fay, as seene, for that this word is sensible and 20 visible. Is likewise is sometime called Mouth, otherwhiles Athyri or Methyer. And by the first of these names, they signific a Mother: by the second, the faire house of Horus, like as Plato termeth it to be the place capable of generation: the third is compounded of Full and the cause: for Matter is full of the world, as being maried and keeping companie with the first principle, which is good, pure, and beautifully adorned. It should seeme haply also, that the Poet Hestodus, when he faith, that all things at the first, were Chaos, Earth, Tartarus and Love, groundeth upon no other principles than those, which are fignified by these names, meaning by the Earth Is; by Love Ofris; and by Tartarus Typhon; as we have made demonstration. For by Chaos it seemes that he would understand some place & receptacle of the world. Moreover, in some fort these matters require the sable of Plato, which in his booke entituled Symposium, So- 30 crates inferred, namely, wherein he setteth downe the generation of Love: saying that Penia, that is to fay, povertie, defirous to have children, went and lay with Poros, that is to fay, riches, and flept with him, by whom the conceived with childe, and brought foorth Love; who naturally is long and variable; and begotten of a father who is good, wife, and al-fufficient; and of a mother who is poore, needy, and for want, defirous of another, and evermore feeking and following after it. For the forefaid Poros, is no other, but the first thing amiable, desireable, perfeet and fufficient. As for Pema, it is matter, which of it felfe is evermore bare and needy, wanting that which is good, whereby at length the is conceived with childe, after whom the hath a longing defire, and evermore ready to receive somewhat of him. Now Horus engendred betweene them (which is the world) is not eternall, nor impassible, nor incorruptible, but being 40 evermore in generation, he endevoreth by viciffitude of mutations, and by periodicall paffion, to continue alwaies yoong, as if he should never die and perish. But of such fables as these we must make use, not as of reasons altogether really subsisting: but so, as we take out of ech of them, that which is meet and convenient to our purpose. When as therefore we say Matter, we are not to rely upon the opinions of some Philosophers, and to thinke it for to be a bodie without foule, without qualitie, continuing in it felfe idle, and without all action whatfoever: for we call oile the matter of a perfume or ointment; and gold the matter of an image or flatue, which notwithstanding is not voide of all similitude: and even so we say, that the very soule and understanding of a man, is the matter of vertue and of science, which we give unto reason, for to bring into order, and adorne. And some there were, who affirmed the minde or under-50 standing to be the proper place of formes, and as it were, the expresse mould of intelligible things: like as there be Naturalists who hold, that the feed of a woman hath not the power of a principle serving to the generation of man, but standeth in stead of matter and nourishment onely: according unto whom, we also being grounded heerein, are to thinke that this goddesse having the fruition of the first and chiefe god, and conversing with him continually, for the love of those good things & vertues which are in him, is nothing adverse unto him, but loveth him as her true spouse and lawfull husband; and like as we say, that an honest wife who enjoieth ordinarily the company of her husband, loveth him nevertheleffe, but hath still a minde unto him; even to giveth not the over to be enamoured upon him, although the be continually where he is, and replenished with his principalland most fincere parts. But when and where as Typhon in the end thrufteth himselfe betweene, and setteth upon the extreme parts, then and there the feemeth to be fadde and heavy, and thereupon is faid to mourne and lament, yea and to feeke up certaine reliques and pieces of Ofirit, and ever as the can finde any, the received and arraicth them with all diligence, and as they are ready to periff and corrupt, the carefully tendeth and keepeth them close, like as againe the produceth and bringeth foorth other things to light of her felfe. For the reasons, the Idaae, and the influences of God which are in heaven 10 and among the starres, doe there continue and remaine; but those which be diffeminate among the fensible and passible bodies, in the earth and in the sea, diffused in the plants and living creatures, the same dying and being buried, doe many times revive and rife againe fresh by the meanes of generations. And hecreupon the fable faith thus much more, that Typhon cohabitethand lieth with Nephthys, and that Osiris also by stealth and secretly, keepeth company with her: for the corruptive and destroying power, doesn principally possesse the extreme parts of that matter which they name Nephibys and death: and the generative & prefetving vertue, conferreth into it little feed, & the fame weake and feeble, as being marred and destroiced by 7 yphon: unleffe it be fo much as Isis gathereth up & faveth, which the alfo norithech & mainteineth. But in one word, & to speake more generally, he is still better, as Plato & Aristotle are of opinion: for thenaturall pufflance to engender & to preferve, moveth toward him as to a fubfiflance and being whereas that force of killing & destroying moveth behind, toward non subsistence: which isthereason, that they call the one Ists, that is to say, a motion animate and wife; as if the word were derived of hear, which fignifieth to move by a certaine science and reason, for a barbarous word it is not. But like as the generall name of all gods and goddeffes, to wit, Thees, is derived of ಷಾಹಿನಡನ್, that is to fay, of vilible, and ಹಾನೆ ೨೯೮೯ , that is to fay, of running; even fo, both we and also the Aegyptians have called this goddesse, and 1/1/18, of intelligence and motion together. Semblably Plato faith, that in old time, when they faid Isia, they meant Ofu, that is to lay, facted; like as Noesis also and Phronesis, quasi reposes, that is to say, the stirring and motion of the understanding, being caried and going forward; and they imposed this word ours rest to those who have found our and discovered goodnesse and vertue: but contrariwise, have by reprocedull names noted fuch things as impeach hinder and flay the course of natural things, binding them fo, asthey can not go forward, to wit, zazua, vice, ameia, indigence, Junia, cowardife, and area, griefe, as if they kept them from ieras, or ies, that is to fay, free progresseand proceeding forward. As for Ofiris, a word it is composed of on@ and ison, that is to say, holy and sacred; for he is the common reason or Idea, of things above in heaven, and beneath of which, our ancients were woont to call the one fort, isex, that is to fay, facred; and the other, one, that is to fay, holy. Thereafon also which sheweth celestiall things, and such as move upward, is called Analis, and otherwhiles Hermanubis; as if the one name were meet for those above, and the other for them beneath: whereupon they facrificed unto the former a white cocke, and to the other a yellow or offaffron colour; for that they thought those things above, pute, simple and thining; but those beneath, mixed of a medley colour. Neither are we to marvell, that these termes are disguisted to the faithion of Greeke words; for an infinit number of more there be, which have been ctrans-Potted out of Greece with those men who departed from thence in exile, and there remains untill this day as ftrangers without their native countrey: whereof fome there be which cause Poety to be flandered, for calling them into use, as if it spake barbarously, namely, by those who terme fuch Poeticall and obscure words, Glottas. But in the books of Herimes or Mercurie, so called, there is written by report, thus much concerning facred names, namely, that the power ordeined over the circular motion and revolution of the Sunne, the Acgyptians call Horus, and o the Greeks Apollo: that which is over the wind, tome name Ofi is, others Sarapis, & fome againe in the Aegyptian language Sothi, which fignifieth as much as conception or to be with childe: and the tempon it is, that by a little deflexion of the name, in the Greeke tongue that Canicular or Dogge starre is called Know, which is thought appropriate unto 1/15. Well I wote, that we are not to thrive as touching names, yet would I rather give place unto the Aegyptians about the name Sarapis than Ofiris; for this is a meere Greeke word, whereas the other is a stranger; but as well the one as the other fignifieth the same power of Divinity. And heereto accordeth SIIII 2

the Acgyptian language; for many times they terme Isis by the name of Minerva, which in their tongue fignificth as much, as I am come of my felfe. And Typhon, as we have already faid, is named Seth, B. ebon and Smy, which words betoken all, a violent stay and impeachment, a contrariety and a diversion or turning aside another way. Moreover, they call the loadstone or Sederitis, the bone of Horus; like as iron, the bone of Typhon, as Manethos is mine author: for as the iron feemeth otherwhiles to follow the faid loadstone, and sufferethit selfe to be drawen by it, and many times for it againe, returneth backe and is repelled to the contrary : even fo, the good and comfortable motion of the world endued with reason, by perswasive speeches doeth convert. drawinto it, and mollifie that hardnesse of Typhon: but otherwhiles againe, the same returneth backe into it ielte, and is hidden in the depth of penurie and impossibility. Over and besides, Eu- 10 dox us faith, that the Acgyptians devise of Jupiter this fiction, that both his legs being so growen together in one, that he could not goe at all, for very shame he kept in a desert wildernesse: but Is, by cutting and dividing the same parts of his body, brought him to his found and upright going againe. Which fable giveth us covertly thus to understand, that the understanding and reason of God in it selfe going invisibly, and after an unseene maner, proceedeth to generation by the meanes of motion. And verily, that brafen Timbrel which they founded and rung at the facrifices of Isis, named Sistrum, sheweth evidently, that all things ought origins, that is to fay, to bestirre and shake, and never cease moving, but to be awakened and rassed, as if otherwise they were drowfie, lay afleepe and languished: for it is faid, that they turne backe and repulse Typhon with their Timbrels aforefaid, meaning thereby, that whereas corruption doth bind and 20 flay nature, generation agains unbindeth and letteth it a worke by the meanes of motion. Now the faid Sistrum being in the uppert partround, the curvature and Absis thereof comprehendeth foure things that are flirred and mooved: for that part of the world which is subject to generation and corruption, is comprehended under the sphære of the Moone, within which all things move and alter by the meanes of the foure elements, Fire, Earth, Water and Aire, upon the Absis or rundle of the Sistrum toward the toppe, they engrave the forme of a cat with a mans face; but beneath, under those things which are thaken, one while they engrave the visage of Ilis, another while of Nephthys; fignifying by these two faces, nativity and death: for these be the motions and mutations of the elements. By the cat, they understand the Moone, for the variety of the skin, for the operation and worke in the night feafon, and for the fruitfulneffe of this creature: for it is faid, that at first she beareth one kitling, at the second time two, the third time three, then foure, afterwards five, and fo to feven; fo that in all the brings foorth 28, which are the daies of every Moone. And howfoever this may feeme fabulous, yet for certeine it is true, that the appuls or fights of these cats are full and large when the Moone is at full; but contrariwile, draw in and become finaller as the Moone is in the wane. As for the vilage of aman, which they attribute unto the cat, they represent thereby the witty subtilty and reason about the mutations of the Moone. But to knit up all this matter in few words, reason would, that wee should thinke neither the Sunne nor the water, neither earth nor heaven to be Iss or Osriu; no more than exceeding drouth, extreame heat, fire and fea, is Typhon: but fimply, what loever in fuch things is out of measure & extraordinary either in excesse or defect, we ought to attribute 40 it unto Typhon: contrariwife, all that is well disposed, ordered, good and profitable, we must beleeve it to be the worke verily of Isis, but the image, example and reason of Osis: which if we honour and adore in this fort, we shall not sinne or do amisse: and that which more is, we shall remoove and flay the unbeliefe and doubtfull scrupulosity of Eudoxus, who asked the reason, why Ceres had no charge and superintendance over Love matters, but all that care lay upon 1/s, and why Bacehus could neither make the river Nilus to fwell and overflow, nor governe and rule the dead: for if we should alledge one generall and common reason for all, we deeme these gods to have beene ordeined for the portion and dispensation of good things, and whatsoever in nature is good and beautifull, it is by the grace and meanes of these deities; whiles the one yeeldeth the first principles, and the other receiveth and distributes the same : by which meanes 50 we thall be able to fatisfie the multitude, and meet with those mechanicall and odious fellowes; whether they delight in the change & variety of the aire, according to the feafons of the yere, or in the procreation of fruits, or in feednesse and tillings, appropriating and applying therto what hath beene delivered of these gods; wherein they take pleasure, faying, that Ofiris is interted, when the feed is covered in the ground; that he reviveth and rifeth againe to light, when it beginneth to spurt, And hecreupon it is said, that Isis when she perceiveth herselfe to be conceived and with childe, hangeth about her necke a prefervative the fixth day of the moneth Phasphi, and is delivered of Harpocrates about the Solflice of Winter, being as yet unperfect, and come to no maturity in the prime of the first flowers and buds: which is the reason that they offerunto her the first fruits of Lentils new sprung, and solemnize the feast and holidates of her childbirth and lying in after the Acquinox of the Spring : for when the vulgat fortheare this, theyrest therein, take contentment, and beleeve it straightwaies, drawing a probability for beleele, out of ordinary things which are daily ready at hand. And verily, heerein there is no inconvenience, if first and formost they make these gods common, and not proper and peculiar unto the Aegyptians, neither comprise Nilus onely and the land which Nilus watereth, under to these names, nor in naming their Meeres, Lakes and Lotes, and the nativity of their gods, deprive all other men of those great gods, among whom there is neither Wilm, nor Butus, nor Memphis; yet nevertheleffe acknowledge and have in reverence the goddeffe Isis and other gods about her, of whom they have learned not long fince to name fome with the Aegyptian appellations: but time out of minde they knew their vertue and power, in regard whereof they have honoured and adored them. Secondly, which is a farre greater matter, to the end they fhould take heed and be affraied, left ere they be aware, they diffolve and diffipate these divine powers in tivers, winds, fowing, plowing and other paffions and alterations of the earth; as they do, who holde, that Bacches is wine, Fulcan the flame of fire, and Proferpina (as Cleanthes faid in one place) the spirit that bloweth and pierceth thorow the fruits of the earth. A Poet there was, 20 who writing of reapers and mowers, faid:

And in no respect differ they from those, who thinke the failes, cables, cordage and anchor, are the pilot; or that the thred and yarne, the warpe and woole, be the weaver; or that the goblet and potion cup, the Ptisane or the Mede and honied water, is the Physician. But verily in so doing, they imprint abfurd and blasphemous opinions of the gods, tending to Atheisme and impiety, attributing the names of gods unto natures and things lenselesse, livelesse and corruptible, which of necessity men use as the need them, and can not chuse but marre and destroy the fame. For we must in no wife thinke, that these very things be gods; for nothing can be a god 30 which hath no foule, and is subject to man and under his hand : but thereby we know, that they be gods who give us them to use, and for to be perdurable and sufficient: not these in one place, andthose in another, neither Barbarians nor Greeks, neither Meridionall nor Septentrionall; but like as the Sunne and Moone, the heaven, earth and fea, are common unto all, but yet in diversplaces called by fundry names: even so of one and the same intelligence that ordereth the whole world, of the same providence which dispenseth and governethall, of the ministerial powers subordinate over all, stundry honors and appellations according to the diversity of lawes have beene appointed. And the priests and religious, protessed in such ceremonies, use mysteries and facraments, some obscure, others more plaine and evident, to traine our understanding to the knowledge of the Deity: howbeit, not without perill and danger; for that fome miffing 40 the right way, are fallen into superstition; and others avoiding superstition as it were a bogge or quavernire, have run before they could take heed, upon the rocke of impiery. And therefore, it behoveth us in this case especially to be inducted by the direction of Philosophy, which may guide us in these holy contemplations, that we may woorthily and religiously thinke of every thing faid and done; to the end, that it befall not unto us as unto Theodorus, who faid, that the doctrine which he tendered and reached out with the right hand, some of his scholars received and tooke with the left; even fo, by taking in a wrong fenfe and otherwife than is meet and convenient, that which the lawes have ordeined touching feafts and facrifices, we grofly offend. For, that all things ought to have a reference unto reation, a man may fee and know by themfelves: for celebrating a feaft unto Mercurie the nineteenth day of the first moneth, they cat 50 hony and figges, faying withall, this Mot, Sweet uthe trueth. As to that Phylactery or prefer-Vative, which they fame Is to weare when she is with childe, by interpretation it signifiesh, A true voice. As for Harpocrates, we must not imagine him to be some young god, and not come to tipe yeeres, nor yet a man: but that he is the superintendant and reformer of mens language as touching the gods, being yet new, unperfect, and not diffinct nor articulate; which is thereason, that he holdeth a seale-ring before his mouth, as a signe and marke of taciturnity and filence. Also in the moneth Melori, they present unto him certeine kindes of Pulse, faying withall, The tongue is Fortune: The tongue is Damon. Now of all plants which Agypt bringeth foorth, they confectate the Peach tree unto him especially, because the fruit resembleth an heart, and the lease a tongue: For of all those things which naturally arein man, there is nothing more divine than the tongue and speech, as touching the gods principally, neither in any thing commeth he necret unto beatitude : and therefore I advise and require every man who repaireth hither and commeth downe to this Oracle, to entertaine holy thoughts in his heart, and to utter feemly words with his tongue, whereas the common fort of people in their publicke feaths and folemne processions doe many ridiculous things, notwithstanding they proclaime and pronounce formally by the voice of the Crier and Bedil in the beginning of fuch folemnities, to keepe filence or speake none but good words: and yet to afterwards they cease not but to give out most blasphemous speeches and to thinke as basely of the gods. How then shall men behave and demeane themselves in those heavy and mournefull factifices from whence all mirth and laughter is banifled: if it be not lawfull either toomit any thing of the accustomed and usuall ceremonies, or to confound and mingle the opinions of the gods with abford and false suspicions? The Greeks doe many semblable things unto the Aepyptians even in maner at the very fame time: For at Athens in the feast called Thesmophoria to the honor of Ceres, the women doe fast, fitting upon the ground: And the Becotians make a rifling and remooving of the houses of Achea, naming this feast in the total fay, odious: as if Ceres were in heavineffe and forrow for the descent of her daughter Proferpma into hell; and this is that moneth wherein the starres called Pleiades appeare, and when the hus- 20 bandmen begin to fow, which the Aegyptians name Athyr, the Athenians Pyanepsion, and the Bocotians Damatrios, as one would fay Cerealis. And Theopompus writeth, that the people in habiting westward, doe both thinke and also call the Winter Saturne, the Summer Venu, and the Spring Proferpina: and that of Saturne and Venus all things be engendred. The Phrygians also imagining that God sleepeth all Winter, and lieth awake in Summer; thereupon celebrate in the one feafon, the feaft of lying in bed and fleeping; in the other of experiection or waking, and that with much drinking & belly chere, But the Paphlagonians fay, that he is bound and kept in ward as a prisoner during Winter, & in the Spring inlarged againe and set at liberty when he beginneth to stir and move. Now the very time giveth us occasion to suspect, that the heavy countenance & aufterity which they flow, is because the fruits of the earth be the hidden: 30 which fruits our ancients in times past never thought to be gods, but the profitable and necesfary gifts of the gods, availing much to live civilly, and not after a favage and beaftly maner. But at what time of the yeere as they faw the fruits from the trees to fall and faile at once; and those which themselves had sowen, with much adoe, by little and little opening and cleaving the earth with their owne hands and fo covering and hilling the fame, without any affired hope what would betide thereupon, and whether the fame would come to any proofe and perfection or no, they did many things like unto those that commit dead bodies to the earth, and mourne therefore. Moreover, like as we say, that he who buieth the bookes of Plato, buieth Plato: and who is the actour of Menandres comedies, is faid to act and play Menander: Semblably, they did not spare and sorbeare to give the names of the celestiall gods unto their gifts and inventi-40 ons, honouring the same with all reverence, for the use and need they had of them. But they who come after taking this grofely and foolifhly, and upon ignorance unskilfully returning upon the gods the accidents of their fruits; not onely called their presence and fruition, the nativity of the gods; and their abfence or want of them, the death and departure of the gods; but alfo beleeved to much and were perswaded fully so : In such wife, as they have filled themselves with many abfurd, leand and confused opinions of the faid gods. And yet verily, the error and abfurdity of their opinions they had evidently before their eies presented by Xenophanes the Colophonian, or other Philosophers after him, who admonished the Aegyptians, that if they repute them gods, they should not lament for them: and if they mourned, they should not take them for gods: as also that it was a rediculous mockery, in their lamentations to pray 50 unto them for to produce new fruits and bring them unto perfection for them, to the end that they might be confumed againe, & lamented for. But the case stands not so for they bewaile the fruits that are gone and spent, but they pray unto the gods the authors and givers thereof, that they would vouchfafe to bestow upon them new, and make them grow in supply of those which

not learned to heare and take words aright, receive also and use the things themselves amisse as for example, the Greeks who were not taught nor accustomed to call the statues of brasile and stone or painted images, the statues and images made to the honor of the gods, but the gods themselves : and afterwards were so bolde, as to say, that Lachares despoiled and stripped Minerva out of her clothes, and that Dionysius the tyrant polled Apollo who had a perruke or bulh of golden haire; also that Jupiter Capitolinus during the civill warres was burnt and confumed with fire. And thus they fee not, how in fo doing they draw & admit false and erroncons opinions which follow upon fuch maner of speeches. And herein the Aegyptians of all other nations, have faulted most, about the beasts which they honor & worship. For the Greeks verily in this point both beleeve and also speake well, saying that the dove is a bird facred unto Ve-10 nm, the dragon to Minerva, the raven or ctow to Apollo, and the dog to Disma, according to

But the Aegyptians, at least wise the common fort of them, worthipping and honoring these very beafts as if they were gods themselves, have not onely pettered with laughter and ridiculous mockery their Leiturgie and divine service, (for ignorance and folly in this case is the least finne of all others) but allo there is crept into the midft of men a ftrong opinion, which hath fo farre possessed the simple and weaker fort, as that it bringeth them to mere superstition. And as for such as be of more quicke and witty capacity, and who besides are more audacious, those it 20 driveth headlong into beaftly cogitations and Athifticall discourses : And therefore I hold it not amiffe, curfarily and by the way to annexe hereto fuch things as cary fome probability and likelihood with them. For to fay, that the gods for feare of Typhon were turned into these creatures, as if they thought to hide themselves within the bodies of the blacke storkes called Hides, of dogges and haukes, paffeth all the monstrous woonders and fixions of tales that can be devifed. Likewise to hold, that the soules of those who are departed, so many as remaine still in being, are regenerate againe onely in the bodies of these beasts, is as absurd and incredible as the other. And as for those who will seeme to render a civilland politicke reason hecreof; fomegive out that Ofris in a great expedition or voiage of his, having divided his armie into many parts (fuch as in Greeke are called 2000 and and 5000, that is to fay, bands and companies) he 30 gave unto every of them for their severall enfignes the portractures and images of beasts: and each band afterwards honored their owne & had in reverence as some holy and facred thing, Others affirme, that the kings who fucceeded after Ofirin, for to terrify their enimies went forth to battell, carying before them, the heads of fuch beatls made in gold and filver, vpon their armes. Somethere beagaine, who alledge, that there was one of these their subtile and fine headed kings, who knowing that the Aegyptians of their owne nature were lightly disposed, ready to revoltand given to change and innovations, also that by reason of their great multitude, their power was hardly to be restrained and in maner invincible, in case they joined together in counfell and drew jointly in one common line, therefore he fowed among them a perpetual superstition, which gave occasion of diffention and enmity among them that never could be 40 appealed: For when he had given commandement unto them, for to have in reverence those beafts which naturally disagreed and warred together, even such as were ready to cat and devour one another, whiles every one endevoted alwaies to faccor and maintaine their owne, and were moved to anger if any wrong or displeasure were done to those which they affected; they sell together themselves by the cares ere they were aware and killed one another, for the enmity and quarell which was betweene those beasts whom they adored, and so fostered mutuall and mortall hatted. For even at this day, of all the Aegyptians the Lycopolitans onely, eat mutten, becanfe the wolfe whom they adore as a god is enimy unto theepe. And verily in this our age, the Oxyrinchites, because the * Cynopolites, that is to say, the inhabitants of the city Cynopolis, * Who work eat the fish named Oxyrinehos, that is to say, with the sharpe becke, when soever they can entrap shop the deg. 50 or catch a dogge, make no more adoe but kill him for a facrifice and cat him when they have done. Vpon which occasion having levied warre one against the other, and done much mischiefe reciprocally, after they had beene well chastisfed and plagued by the Romans, they grew to attonement and composition. And for as much as many of them doe say, that the soule of Typhon, departed into these beasts, it seemeth that this fiction imported thus much, that every brunish and beastly nature, commeth and proceedeth from some cvill dæmon, and therefore to Pacific him that he doe no mischiese, they worship and adore these beasts. And if paradvenLaties or

ture there happen any great drought or contagious heat which causeth pestilent maladies or other unuftiall and extraordinary calamities, the priefts bring forth some of those beafts which they serve and honor in the darke night, without any noise in great silence, menasing them at the first and putting them in fright. Now if the plague or calamity continue still, they kill and facrifice them, thinking this to be a punishment and chastisement of the faid evill dæmon, or else some great expiation for notable sinnes and transgressions. For in the city verily of Idithya. as Manethos maketh report, the maner is to burne men alive, whom they called Typhoni; whose ashes when they had boulted through a tamise, they scattered abroad, untill they were reduced to nothing: Butthis was done openly at a certaine time in those daies which are called Cynades or Canicular. Mary the immolation of these beasts, which they accounted facred, 10 was performed secretly and not at a certaine time or upon perfixed daies, but according to the occurrences of those accidents which happned. And therefore the common people neither knew nor faw ought, but when they folemnize their obsequies and funerals for them, in the prefence of all the people they show some of the other beasts and throw them together into the sepulcher, supposing thereby to vex and gall Typhon, and to represse the joy that he hath in doing mischiefe. For it seemeth that Apis with some other few beasts was consecrated to Ofiris : howfoever they attribute many more unto him. And if this be true, I suppose it importeth that which we feeke and fearch all this while, as touching those which are confessed by all, and have common honors; as the forefaid ftorke Ibis, the hauke and the Babian or Cynecephalia, yea and Api himselfe, for so they call the goat in the city Mendes. Now their remaineth the utility and fymbolization heereof: confidering that some participate of the one, but the most part of 20 both. For as touching the goat, the sheepe and the Ichneumon, certaine it is, they honor them for the use and profit they receiveby them : like as the inhabitants of Lemnos honor the birds called * Cerydali, because they finde out the locusts nests and quash their egges. The Theslalians also have the storkes in great account, because whereas their country is given to breed a number of ferpents, the faid florks when they come, kill them up all. By reason whereof they made an edict, with an intimation, that who foever killed a storke should be banished his country. The ferrent Aspir also, the wezill and the flie called the bettill, they reverence, because they observe in them I wot not what little slender images (like as in drops of water we perceive the refemblance of the Sunne) of the divine power. For many there be even yet, who both thinke and fay, that the male wezill engendreth with the female by her care, and that the bringeth forth her yoong at the mouth: which fymbolizeth as they fay, and representeth the making and generation of speech. As for the beetils, they hold, that throughout all their kinde there is no female, but all themales doe blow or cast their feed into a certaine globus or round matter in forme of bals which they drive from them and roll to and fro contrary waies, like as the Sunne, when he moveth himselfe from the west to the east, seemeth to turne about the heaven cleans contrary. The Affin also they compare to the planet of the Sunne, because he dothnever age and wax old, but mooveth in all facility, readineffe and celerity without the meanes of any instruments of motion. Neither is the crocodile set so much by among them, without some probable cause: For they say that in some respect he is the very image representing god: as being the onely creature in the world which hath no tongue: for as much as divine speech needeth neither voice nor tongue:

And of all beafts living within the water, the crocodile onely (as men fay) hath over his eies a certeine thinne filme or transparent webbe to cover them, which commeth downe from his forehead in fisch fort, as that he can fee and not be seene: wherein he is conformable and like unto the sovereigne of all the gods. Moreover looke in what place the semale is discharged of her spawne, there is the utmost marke and limit of the rising and inundation of X_i fus: for being not able to lay their egges in the water, and affraid withall to sit far off, they have a most perfect and exquisit foresight of that which will be; insomuch as they make use of the rivers approach when they lay: and whiles they sit and cove, their egges be preserved drie, and are never drenched with the water. A hundred egges they lay, in so many daies they hatch, and as manic yeeres live they, which are longest lived: And this is the first and principall number that that they use who treat of celestial matters. Moreover, as touching those beasts which are ho noted for both causes, we have spoken before of the dogge: but the Ibis or blacke storke, besides that it killeth those serpents whose pricke and sting is deadly, she was the first that taught us the use of that evacuation or clenfing the body by cliffre, which is so ordinarie in Physicke: for perceived the is to purge, clenfe, and mundifie her-felfe in that fort: whereupon the most religious priests, and those who are of greatest experience, when they would be purified, take for their holy water to sprinckle themselves with, the very same out of which the Ibis drinketh, for the never drinks of empoisoned and infected water, neither will the come neere unto it, Moreover, with her two legges standing at large one from the other, and her bill together, the to maketh an absolute triangle with three even sides, besides, the varietie and speckled mixture of her plume, confisting of white feathers and blacke, representeth the Moone when the is past the full. Now we must not marvell at the Aegyptians, for pleasing and contenting themselves in such slight representations and similitudes, for even the Greeks themselves as well in their pictures as other images of the gods, melted and wrought to any mould, used many times such refemblances: for one statue in Creta they had of Jupiter without cares, because it is not meant for him who is lord & governour of all, to have any instruction by the hearing of others, tinto the image of Pallas, Phidias the Imager fet a dragon; like as to that of Venus in the city of Elis a Tottoife: giving us by this to understand, that maidens had need of guidance and good custodie, and that maried woman ought to keepe the house and be filent. The three-forked mace of no Neptune, fignifieth the third place, which the fea and element of water holdeth, under heaven and aire; for which cause they called the sea Amphitrite, and the petie sea gods Tritons. Also the Pythagoreans have highly honored the numbers and figures Geometricall, by the gods names: for the triangle with three equal fides, they called Pallas, borne out of Jupiters braine, and Tritogenia, for that it is equally divided with three right lines, from three angles drawen by the plumbe. One or unitie they named Apollo,

As well for his perfusione grace; as plaine simplicitie, That doeth appeere in youthfull face, and this is unitie.

Two, they termed Contention and Boldneffe: and three Justice. For whereas to offend and be offended, to doe and to fuffer wrong, come the one by exceffe, and the other by defect, Just remaineth equally betweene in the middes. That famous quaternarie of theirs, named 7 etractrs. which confisteth of four enines, and amounteth to thirtie fixe, was their greatest oth, so rife in every mans mouth, & they called it the World, as being accomplished of the first four even numbers, and the first foure odde, compounded into one together. If then the most excellent and best renowned Philosophers, perceiving in things which have neither body nor soulc. some type and figure of deitic, have not thought it good to neglect or despise any thing herein, orpaffe it over without due honour, I suppose we ought much lesse so doe in those properties and qualities which are in natures fenfitive, having life, and being capable of paffions and 40 affections, according to their inclinations and conditions. And therefore we must not content our selves and rest in the worshipping of these and such like beasts, but by them adore the divinitie that shineth in them, as in most cleere and bright mirrors, according to nature, reputing them alwaies as the instrument and artificiall workemanship of God, who ruleth and governeith the univerfall world: neither ought we to thinke, that any thing void of life, and destitute offense, can be more woorthy or excellent than that which is endued with life and senses; no not although a man hung never formuch gold or a number of rich emerands about it: for it is neither colours nor figures, nor polished bodies, that deitie doeth inhabite in: but whatsoever doeth not participate life, nor is by nature capable thereof, is of a more base and abject condition than the very dead. But that nature which liveth and feeth, which also in it selfe hath the so beginning of motion and knowledge of that which is proper and meet, as also of that which is strange unto it, the same (I say) hathdrawen some influence and portion of that wise providence, whereby the univerfall world is governed, as Heraclitus faith. And therefore the deitie is no leffe represented in such natures, than in works made of braffe and stone, which are likewife subject to corruption and alteration, but over and besides, they are naturally voide of all lense and understanding. Thus much of that opinion, as touching the worthip of beasts, which 1 approove for best.

Morcover

Moreover the habilliments of I/n be of different tinctures and colours: for her wholepower confifteth and is emploied in matter which receiveth all formes, and becommeth all maner of things, to wit, light, darkneffe, day, night, fire, water, life, death, beginning and end. But the robes of Ofiris, have neither shade nor varietie, but are of one simple colour, even that which is lightforme and bright. For the first & primitive cause is simple; the principle or beginning, is without all mixture, as being fpiritual & intellegible. Whereupon it is that they make shew but once for all of his habiliments, which when they have done they lay them up againe and bestow them fafe and keepe them fo straightly, that no man may fee or handle them : whereas contrariwife they ale those of Isis many times: For that sensible things be in usage, and seeing they are ready and ever in hand, and be subject evermore to alternative alterations, therefore they be laid to abroad and displaced, for to be seene often. But the intelligence of that which is spirituall and intellectuall, pure, fimple, and holy, thining as a flath of lightning, offereth it felfe unto the foule but once, for to be touched and seene. And therefore Plato and Arifforle call this part of Philosophie Emorgically, for that those who discourse of reason, have passed beyond all matters fubject to mingled & variable opinions, leape at length to the contemplation of this first principle, which is simple, and not materiall: and after they have in some fort attained to the pure and fincere trueth of it, they suppose that their Philosophy as now accomplished is come to finall perfection. And that which the priefts in these dates are very precise and wary to shew, keeping it hidden and fecret with fo great care and diligence, allowing not fo much as a fight thereoffectely & by the way: also that this god raigneth & ruleth over the dead, and is no other 20 than he whom the Greeks name Hades and Pluto: the common people not understanding how this is true, are much troubled; thinking it very strange that the holy & facred Ofris should dwell within or under the earth, where their bodies lie who are thought to be come unto their finallend. But he verily is most farre removed from the earth, without staine or pollution, pure and void of all fubftance or nature, that may admit death or any corruption whatfoever. Howbeit the foules of men, fo long as they be heere beneath clad within bodies and paffions, can have no participation of God, unleffe it be formuch onely as they may attaine unto the intelligence of, by the study of Philosophy, and the same is but in maner of a darke dreame. But when they shall be delivered from these bonds, and passe into this holy place, where there is no patition, nor patible forme: then, the fame god is their conduction and king: then they cleave 30 unto him, as much as possible they can: him they contemplate and behold without fatietie: defiring that beautic, which it is not possible for men to utter and expresse: whereof according to the old tales, Ifis was alwaies inamoured: and having purfued after it untill the enjoied the fame, the afterwards became replenished with all goodnesse and beautiethat heere may be engendred. And thus much may fuffice for that fenfe and interpretation which is most befeeming the gods. Now if we must besides speake as I promised before of the incense and odors which are burnt every day: let a man confider first in his minde and take this with him, that the Aegyptians were men evermore most studious in those matters which made for the health of their bodies, but principally in this regard, they had in recommendation those that concerned the ceremonies of divine service in their fanctifications and in their ordinary life, and conversation; 40 wherein they have no leffe regard unto holfomnesse then to holinesse: For they thinke it neither lawfull nor befeeming to ferve that effence which is altogether pure, every way found and impolluted, either with bodies or foules corrupt with inward fores and subject to secret maladies. Seeing then, that the aire, which we most commonly use, and within which we alwaies converse, is not evermore alike disposed nor in the same temperature: but in the night is thickned and made groffe, whereby it compresset and draweth the body into a kind of sadnesse and pensivenesse, as if it were overcast with darke mists and waighed downe: so soone as ever they be up in a morning, they burne incense by kindling Rosin, for to clense and purific the aire by this rarefaction and fubrilization, awaking as it were and raifing by this meanes, the inbred fpirits of our bodies which were languishing and drowste : for that in this odor there is a forcible 50 vertue which vehemently flriketh upon the fenses. Againe, about noone, perceiving that the Sunne draweth forcibly out of the earth by his heat, great quantity of ftrong vapours, which be intermingled with the aire, then they burne myrth: For the heat of this aromaticall gum and odor is fuch, as that it diffipateth & dispatcheth whatsoever is groffe, thicke and muddy in the aire. And verily in the time of peftilence Physicians thinke to remedy the fame by making great fixes, being of this opinion, that the flame doth subtiliate and rarefie the aire:

which it effecteth no doubt the better in case they burne sweet wood, as of the Cypresse trees, of Juneper, or * Pitch tree. And hecreupon reported it is that the Phylician Acron, when there raigned a grievous plague at Athens, wan a great name and reputation, by caufing good fires to be made about the ficke persons: For he saved many by that meanes. And Aristotle writeth that the fweet fents and good finels of perfumes, ointments, flowers and fragrant medowes, ferve no leffe for health than for delight and pleasure. For that by their heat and mildenesse they gently diffolve and open rhefubltance of the braine, which naturally is cold and as it were congealed. Againe, if it befo that the Aegyptians call myrrh, in their language Bal, which if a man interpret fignifieth as much as the discussing and chasing away of idle talke and ravings to this also may serve for a testimonie to confirme that which we say. As for that composition among them named cyphi, it is a confection or mixture receiving fixteene ingredients. For thereenter into it, hony, wine, railins, cyperous, rofin myrrh, afpalathus & fefeli. Moreover, the fweetrush Schanos, Bitumen, Mosse, and the docke: Besides two forts of the juniper berries, the greater & the leffe, Cardamomum and Calamus. All these speeches are compounded together not at a venture and as it commeth into their heads: but there be read certaine facred writings unto the Apothecaries and Perfumers, all the while that they mix them. As for this number, although it be quadrate, and made of a fquare, and onely of the numbers equal, maketh the space contained within equall to his cercumference, we are not to thinke that this is any way materiall to the vertue thereof: but most of the simples that goe to this composition being 20 aromaticall, cast a pleasant breath from them and yeeld a delectable and holsome vapour, by which the aire is altered: and withall, the body being mooved with this evaporation, is gently prepared to repose, and taketh an attractive temperature of sleepe, in letting slacke and unbinding the bonds of cares, wearineffe and forrowes incident in the day time, and that without the helpe of furfet and drunkeneffe: polishing and smoothing the imaginative part of the braine which receiveth dreames in maner of a mirrour, caufing the fame to be pure and neat, as much or rather more, than the found of harpe, lute, viole, or any other instruments of musicke; which the Pythagoreans used for to procure sleepe, enchanting by that device, and dulcing the unreafonable part of the foule which is subject to passions. For sweet odors, as they doe many times excite and stirre up the sense when it is dull and beginneth to faile : so contrariwise they make 30 the same as often drowsie and heavy, yea and bring it to quietnesse, whiles those aromaticall finels by reason of their smoothnesse are spred and defused in the bodie: According as some Phylicians fay, that fleepe is engendred in us, when the vapour of the food which we have received, creepeth gently along the noble parts and principall bowels, and as it toucheth them, caufetha kinde of tickling which fulleth them afleepe. This Cyphi they use in drinke, as a compofition to feafon their cups and as an ointment befides: for they hold, that being taken in drinke, it scowreth the guttes within and maketh the belly laxative: and being applied outwardly as a liniment, it mollifieth the bodie. Over and above all this, Rosin is the worke of the Sunne: but Myrth they gather by the Moone light, out of those plants from which it doth destill: But of those simples whereof Cyphi is compounded, some there be which love the night better, as ma-40 ny Imeane as be nourished by cold windes, shadowes, dewes, and moisture. For the brightneffe and light of the day is one and fimple: and Pindarus faith that the Sunne is seene through the pure and folitarie aire: whereas the aire of the night is a compound and mixture of many lights and powers, as if there were a confluence of many feeds from every starre running into one. By good right therefore they burne these simple persumes in the day as those which are engendred by the vertue of the Sunne: but this being mingled of all forts and of divers qualities, they fet on fire about the evening, and be-

OF THE ORACLES THAT HAVE CEASED TO GIVE ANSWERE.

The Summarie.

He spirit of errour hath endewoured alwaies and assaich the best be can, tomainteine his power and dominion in the world, having after the revolt and fall of Adam beene summished within struments of all sorts to tyrannize over his slaves. In which number we are to range the oracles and predictions of certaine idoles erected in many places by his instigation; by meanes whereof, this sworne enemy to the glory of the true God, hath much prevailed. But when it pleased our heavenly father to give us his sonne for to be our Savi- 20 our, who descending from heaven to earth, tooke upon him our humane nature, wherein he susteined the paine and punishment due for our sinnes, to deliver us out of hell, and by vertue of his merits, to give us entrance into the king dome of heaven, the trueth of his grace being published and made knowenin the world by the preaching of the Apostles and their faithfull successours; the Divell and his angels, who had in many parts and places of the world abused and deceived poore idolaters, were forced to acknowledgetheir Sovereigne, and to keepe silence and suffer him to speake unto those whom he meant to call unto salvation or els to make them unexcusable if they refused to heare his voice. This cessition of the Oracles put the priests and sacrificers of the the Painims to great trouble and woonderfull perplexitie, in the time of the Romane Emperours: whiles some imputed the cause to this, others to that. But our authour in this Treatife discourseth upon this question, shewing thereby, how great and lamentable is 30 the blindnesse of mans reason and wisedome, when it thinketh to atteine unso the secrets of God. For all the speeches of the Philosophers, whom he bringeth in heere as interlocutours, are meere tales and fables devised for the nonce, which every Christian man of any meane judgement will at the first sight condemne. Yet thus much good there is in this discourse, that the Epicureans are here taxed and condemned in fundry paffages. As touching the contents of this conference, the occasion thereof wiseth from the speech of Demetrius and Cleombrotus, who were come unto the Temple of Apollo : for the one of them having rehearfed a woonder as touching the Temple of Jupiter Ammon, moveth thereby a further defire of disputation : but before they enter intoit, they continue still the former speech, of the course and motion of the Sunne. Afterwards, they come to the maine point, namely, Why all the Oracles of Greece (excepting that onely of Lebadia) ceased ? Towhich demand, Planetis des 40 a Cynique Philosopher answereth, That the wickednesse of men is the cause thereof. Ammonitisentravivise attributesh all unto the warres which had consumed the Pilgrims that used to resort unto the faid Oracles. Lamprias proposeth one opinion, and Cleombrotus inferring another of his, fall int sa discourse and common place as touching Damons, whom he verily raungeth betweene gods and inen, diffusing of their nature, according to the Philosophie of the Greeks. Then he proveth, that these Damons have the charge of Oracles, but by reason that they departed out of one countrey into another, or died, these Oracles gave over. To this purpose he telleth a notable tale as touching the death of the great Pan, concluding thus, that feeing Damons be mortall, we ought not to woonder at the coffation of Oracles. After this, Ammonius confuteth the Epicureans, who holde, That there be no Darrons. Andupon the confirmation of the former positions, they enter together into the examinatio of the 10 opinions of the Epicureans and Platonifts, concerning the number of the worlds, to wit, whether they be many or infinit ? growing to this resolution after long dispute, that there bemany, and nanely, to the number of five. Which done, Demetrius reviving the principall question, movet halfo a sew one Why the Damons have this power to speake by Oracles? Unto which there be many and dispers on weres made, which determine all in one Treatife according to the Platonists Philosophie, of the principall, of fictent and finall cause, of those things that are effected by reason, and particularly of sevenations and predictions:

predictions: for which, he maket b to concurre, the Earth, the Sunne, Exhalations, Damons, and the Soule of man. Now all the intention and drift of Plutarch groweth to this point, that the earth being incited and moved by a natural vertue, and that which is proper unto it, and in no wife divine and perdurable, hath brought forth certaine powers of divination: that these inspirations breathing and ariling out of the earth, have touched the under standings of me with such efficacy, as that they have cauleathem to foresee future things afarre off and long ere they hapned; yea, and have addressed and framed them to give answere both in verse and prose. Item, that like as there be certeine grounds and lands more fertile one than the other, or producing some particular things according to the divers and peculiar proprietie of ech: there be also certeine places and tracts of the world endued with this tem-10 perature, which both ingender and also incite these Enthusiaque and divining spirits. Furthermore, that this puissance is meere divine indeed; howbest, not per peruall, eternall, unmoveable, nor that which is for ever perdurable; but by processe and succession of sime, doth diminish and decay by little and little, untill at length through age it consume to nothing. Semblably, that this great number of spirits are not engendred incessantly, neither proceed they forward or retire backe continually; but this vertue of the earth moveth of it felfe incerteiner evolutions, and by that meanes is enchafed and puffed up: and after that in time it hath gathered abundance of new vapours, it filleth the caves and holes fo full untill they discharge & send them up againe. Wheruponit commeth to passe, that the exhalations stirred in the laid caves, and desirous to iffue forth, after that they have beene beaten backe againe, violently affaile the foundations, and stirre the temples built upon them, in such fort, as being shaken as it were by 20 earthquakes, more or leffe in one place than another, according to the avertures and paffages madefor theexhalation, they finde is fue through the streights, breake forth with forcible violence, and so produce these Oracles. In summe, the intention and minde of Pluvarch is to prove that the beginning, progresse and end of these Oracles proceed all from naturall causes, to wit, the exhalations of the carth. Wherein he is fouly and grofty deceived, confidering that fuch Oracles in Greece have been einspired by the divell, who hath kept an open shop there of imposture, deceits, and the most horrible seducements that can bedevised. For mine owne part, I impute this whole discourse of Plutarch unto the ignorance of the true God, the very mother of this dispight, which bringeth forth this present treatise, saved by the Pagans, for to darken the resplendent light of that great King of the world and his trueth: which bath discussed and brought to nothing all the subtill devices of Satan, who triumphed over all Greece by 30 themeanes of his Oracles. Thus after large discourses upon these matters, Plutarch conclude this he whole disputation: the conclusion whereof he enricheth with an accident that befelunto the Prophetesse of Delphi; where aman may evidently fee the imposture and fraud of divels and of malicious spiries (and those be the Damons which Plutarch would designe) and their horrible tyranny over men destituteof Gods grace.

OF THE ORACLES THAT have ceased to give answers.

Here goeth a tale, my friend Teremius Priscus, that in times past certeine Eagles, or els Swannes, stying from the utmost ends of the earth opposit one unto the other, toward the mids there of encounted & met together at the very place where the temple of Apollo Pz-thius was built, even that which is called Omphalos, that is fay, the Navill. And that afterwards, Epimenides the Phæstian being desirenses know whether this fable was true, sought unto the Oracle for to be resolved; but having received from the god a doubtfull and uncerteine answere; by reason thereof, made these verses:

Now (ure in mids of land or fea, there is no Navill fuch; Or if there be, the gods it know: men must not see so much.

And verily the god Apollo chatticed and punished him well enough, for being so curious as to fearch into the triall or proofe of an olde received tale, as if it had beene some antique picture. But true it is, that in our daies, a little before the solemnity of the Pythique games, which were Ttttt held held during the magistracy of Calliffratus, there were two devout & holy personages, who comming from the contrary ends of the earth, met together in the city of Delphi: the one was Demetrius the Grammarian, who came from as farre as * Britaine, minding to returne unto Tarfusin Cilicia, the city of his nativity; and the other, Cleombrosus the Lacedæmonian, who had travelled and wandered long time in Acgret within the Troglodytique province, and failed a good way up into the Red sea, not for any traffique or negotiation of merchandise, but onely as a traveller that defired to fee the world and to learne new fashions abroad. For having wherewith fufficiently to mainteine himselfe, and not caring to gather more than might serve his owne turne, he emploied that time which he had, this waies, and gathered together a certeine hiftory. as the subject, matter and ground of that Philosophy, which proposed for the end thereof (ashe 10 himselse said) Theologie. This man having not long before beene at the temple and Oracle of Jupiter Ammon, made semblance as if he woondered not much at any thing that he sawthere; only he reported unto us a strange thing, worth the observation, and better to be considered of. which he learned of the Priefts there, as touching the burning lampe that never goeth out: for by their faying, every yeere it spendeth lesse oile than other. Whereby they gather certainly (quoth he) the inequality of the yeeres, whereby the latter is evermore thorter than the former: for great probability there is, that feeing leffe oile is confumed, the time also is in proportion fo much leffe. Now when all the company there prefent made a woonder heereat, Demetrius among the rest made a very jest of it, and said it was a meere mockery to search into the knowledge of matters fo high, by fuch flight and finall prefumptions : for this was not, as Alcaus 20 faid, to paint a lion by meature of his claw or paw, but to move and alter heaven, and earth, and all the world, by the conjecture onely of a weike and lampe; yea, and to overthrow at once all the Mathematicall sciences. It is neither so nor so, good fir, quoth Cleombrotus; for neither the one nor the other will trouble these men. For first, they will never yeeld and give place unto the Mathematicians in the certitude of their proofs; for looner may the Mathematicians mifreckon the time, and miffe in their calculation and accounts, in fuch long motions and revolutions fo farre remote and diffant, than they faile in the measure of the oile which they observe continually and marke most precisely, in regard of that which they see so strange and against all discourse of reason. Againe, not to grant and allow (ô Demetrius) that petie things may many times serve for signes and arguments of great and important matters, would hinder and preju-30 dice many arts, confidering that it is as much as to take away the proofs from many demonstrations, conclusions and predictions. And verily, even you that are Grammarians, will seeme to verific and avow one point which is not of the least consequence: namely, that those heroique princes and Worthies, who were at the Trojane warre, used to thave their haire, and keepe their skin smooth with the rasour; because for sooth in reading of Homer you meet with some place where he maketh mention barely of the rafour. Semblably, that in those daies men used to put forth their money upon usury, for that in one passage the said Poet writeth thus:

But as daies come and goe, it * growes withall.

Meaning by the verbe $783255, that his debt did grow unto him by the interest for use. Further- 40 more, because ever and anon the same Homer attributeth unto the night, the epithet boil, which fignifieth Quicke and sharpe; you Grammarians are much affected to this word, faying: He understandeth thereby, that the shadow of the earth being round, groweth point-wife or sharp at the end, in maner of a cone or pyramis. And what is he, who standing upon this point, that small things may not be the proofes and signes of greater matters; will approove this argument in Phylicke: namely, that when there is a multitude of spiders seene, it doeth prognotticate a peffilent Summer : or in the Spring feafon, when the leaves of the olive tree refemble the crowes-feet? Who (I fay) will ever abide to take the measure of the Sunnes body, by clepsydres or water-dials, with a gallon or pinte of water or that a tyle-formed tablet, making a sharpe angle by the plumbe, enclining upon a plaine superficies, should show the just measure of the 50 elevation of pole from the Horizon, which alwaies is to befeene in our Hemisphære? Loc, what the priests and prophets in those parts may alledge and say. And therefore we ought to produce some other reasons against them, in case we would mainteine the course of the Sunne to be constant and unvariable, as we hold heere in these countries. And not of the Sunne onely, (cried out with a loud voice Ammonius the Philosopher, who was then in place) but also of the whole heaven, which by this reckoning commeth in question. For if it be granted, that the yeeresdecrease: the race of the Sunne which he runneth betweene the one Tropique and the other, must of necessity be cut shorter, and that it taketh not up so great apart of the Horizon. as the Mathematicians fet downe; but that it becommeth shorter, and lesse according as the Southernor Meridionall parts be contracted, and gather alwaies toward the Septentrionall and Northerne. Whereupon it will enfue that our Summer will be shorter, and the temperature of the aire by confequence colder; by reason that the Sunne turneth more inwardly, and defenbeth greater paralelles, or equidiffant circles, than those be about the Tropicks, at the longest and shortest daies of the yeere. Moreover, this would follow hecreupon, that the Gnomons in the dials at Syene in Agypt, will be no more shadowlesse at the Summer Tropicke to or Solftice; and many of the fixed starres will runne under one another; fome also of them wil beforced for want of roome to runne one upon another, and be hudled pell-mell together. And if they shall say, that when other starres hold their owne, and keepe their ordinary courfes, the Sunne onely observeth no order in his motions, they cannot alledge any cause that should so much as hasten his motion alone among so many others as there be, but they shall trouble and disquiet most of those things which are seene evidently above : and namely, those generally which happen unto the Moone in regard of the Sunne. So that we shall have no need ofthose, who observe the measures of oile, for to proove the diversitie of the yeeres; because the ecclipses both of the Moone and Sun will sufficiently shew if there be any at all, for that the Sun thall many times meet with the Moone, and the Moone reciprocally fall as often within 20 the shadow of the earth: so as we shall need no more to display and discover the vanity and falfitte of this reason. Yea, but I my felfe (quoth Cleombrotus) have feene the faid measure of oile, for they thewed many of them unto me; and that of this prefent yeere when I was with them, appeared to be much leffe than those in yeeres past. So that Ammonius made answer in this wife: And how is it that other men who adore the inextinguible fires, who keepe and preferve the same religiously for the space of an infinit number of yeeres, one after another, could not as well perceive and observe so much? And say that a man should admit this report of yours to betrue as touching the measures of the oile: were it not much better to ascribe the cause thereof unto some coldnesse or moisture of the aire; or rather contrariwise to some drinesse and heat, by reason whereof, the fire in the lampe being enseebled is not able to spend so much nu-30 timent, and therefore hath no need thereof? For I have heard it many times affirmed by some: That in Winter the fire burneth much better, as being more stronger & more fortified, by reafon that the heat thereof is drawen in, more united and driven closer by the exterior colde: whereas great heats and droughts doe weaken the strength thereof, so as it becomment faint, loofe, and rawe without any great vehemencie and vigour; nay, if a mankindle it against the Sunne-shine, the operation of it is lesse, hardly catcheth it hold of the wood or sewell, and more flowly confumeth it the fame. But most of all, a man may lay the cause upon the oile it selfe; forit goeth not against reason to say, that in old time the oile was of lesse nutriment, and stood moreupon the waterish substance than now it doth, as pressed out of olives which grew upon yoong trees: but afterwards being better concocted, and riper in the fruit, comming of plants 40 more perfect and fully growen in the fame quantity, was more effectuall, and able longer to nourish and mainteine the fire. Thus you see how a man may falve and save that supposition of the Ammonian priefts, although it feeme very strange and woonderfully extravagant, After that Ammonius had finished his speech: Nay rather (quoth I) Cleombrotus, I beseech you tell us somewhat of the oracle: for there hath gone a great name, time out of minde of the deity residentthere; but now it feemeth that the reputation thereof is cleane gone. And when Cleambrotus made no answer hecreto, but held downe his head, and cast his cies upon the ground: There is no neede (quoth Demetrius) to demaund or make any question of the oracles there, when as we see the oracles in these parts to faile, or rather indeed (all fave one or two) brought to nothing. This rather would be enquired into, what the cause should be, that generally they 50 all doe cease? For to what purpose should we speake of others, considering that Beesia it selfe, which heeretofore in old time refounded and rung againe with oracles; now is quite voide of them, as if the springs and fountaines were dried up, and a great ficcitie and drought of oracles had come over the whole land? For there is not at this day, goe throughout all Baotia, (unleffeit be onely in Lebadia) one place where a man may, would he never to faine, draw any divination, what need foever he hath of any oracle: for all other parts are either mute, or altogether defolate and forlorne. And yet in the time of the Medes warre, the oracle of Ptous Apollo Ttttt 2

was in great request, and that of Amphiaraus was in no lesse reputation; for both the one and the other was fought unto. And in that of Ftous Apollo when the prieft or prophet who ferved in the oracle, used the Acolian language, and made answer unto those who were sent thither from the Barbarians, infomuch as none of the affiftants understood one word: this Enthusiasmeor divine inspiration, covertly gave thereby thus much to understand, that these oracles perteined nothing unto the Barbarians, neither were they permitted to have the ordinary Greeke language at their command. As for that of Amphiaraus, the servant who was thither sent, falling a fleepe within the fanctuarie, thought as he dreamed, that he faw and heard the minister of the god, as if with his word and voice he feemed at the first to drive him out, and command him to depart foorth of the temple, faying, that his god was not there; but afterwards to thrust him to away with both his hands: but in the end, feeing that he staid still, tooke up a great stone, and therewith finot him upon the head. And verily all this answered just to that which afterwards befell, and was a very prediction and denunciation of a future accident: for Mardoniwas vanquished not by the king himselfe, but by the Tutour and lieutenant of the king of La. cedamon, who at that time had the conduct and command of the Greeks armie; yea and with a flone felled to the ground, according as the Lydian fervant aforefaid imagined in his fleepe that he was fmitten with a stone. There stonrished likewise about the same time the Oracle of Tegyra, where the report goeth that the god Apollo himselfe was borne: and verily two rivers there are that runne neere one to the other, whereof the one fome at this day call Phanix, that is to fay, the date tree; the other Elea, that is to fay, the olive tree. At this Oracle, during the 30 time of the Medes warre, when the prophet Echecrates there ferved, god Apollo answered by his mouth, that the Greeks should have the honour of the victory in this warre, and continue fingerior. Also in the time of the Peloponnesiaque warre, when the Delians were driven out of their Island, there was brought unto them an answer from the Oracle at Delphi; by vertue whereof, commanded they were, to fearch and feeke out the place where Apollo was borne, and there to performe certeine facrifices: whereat, when they marvelled, and in great perplexity demaunded againe, whether Apollo were borne any where elfe, but among them? the propheteffe Pythia added moreover & faid: That a crow should tell them the place. Whereupon these deputies who were fent unto the Oracle, in their returne homeward chanced to paffethrough the city Cheronea, where they heard their hostessein whose house they lodged, talking with some 30 patterngers and guests (who were going to Tegyra) as touching the Oracle; and when they departed and tooke their leave, they faluted her, and bad her farewell in these termes: Adieu dame Cornice, for that was the womans name, which fignifieth as much as Crow. By this meanes they understood the meaning of the forfefaid Oracle or answer of Pythia: and so when they had sacrificed at Tegra, not long after they were reflored and returned into their native countrey. Moreover, there were other apparitions besides of Oracles, more fresh and later, than those which we have alledged; but now they are altogether cealed: fo that it were not amiffe, confidering that we are met neere unto Apollo Pythius, for to enquire into the cause of this so great change & alteration. As we thus communed & talked together, we were now by this time gone out of the temple, so farre as to the very gates of the Guidian hall: and when we were entred 40 into it, we found those friends of ours fitting there within, whom we defired to meet withall, and who attended our comming. Now when all the reft were at leifure, and had nothing elfe to doe (being at fuch a time of the day) but either to anoint their bodies, or elfe looke upon the champions and wreftlers, who there exercised themselves; Demetrius after a smiling maner began and faid:

What? were I best to tell some lie, Or makereport of truth shall 1?

It feemeth as fare as I can perceive, that you have in hand no matter of great consequence: for I sawyou sitting at your case, and it appeareth by your cheerefull and pleasant looks, that you have no busic thoughts hammering in your heads. True it is indeed (quoth Heraeleo the Mesogarians) for we are not in serious argument & disputation about the verbe sainway, whether in the Future tense it should lose one of the two Landaes meither reason we about these two comparatives sain as shower (that is to say, Worse and better) of what Positives they should come more of what Primitives these two Superlatives sains & Banner (that is to say, Worst and best) be derived? For these questions & such like, are those that make menkint and bend their browes: but of all other matters we may reason and Philosophize well enough and quietly, without making any furrowes in our forheads, and looking with an auftereand foure countenance for the matter upon the companie present with us. Why then (quoth Demetrius) admit and receive us into your focietie, and together with us, enterteine the question also, which erewhile was moved among us, being as it is, meet for this place, and in regard of god Apollo, pertinent unto us all as many as we be: but I befeech you of all loves, let us have no frowning nor knitting of browes whiles we reason upon the point. Now when we were set intermingled one with another, and that Demetrius had propounded the foresaid question, immediately Didymus the Cynique Philosopher, furnamed Planetiades, started up, and stood upon his feete; and after he had stamped with his staffe twife or thrice upon the floore, cried out in this maner: O God! Come you heto ther with this question indeed, as if it were a matter so hard to be decided, and had need of fome long and deepe inquisition? for a great marvell no doubt it is, if seeing so much sinne and wickednesse is spred over the face of the whole world at this day, not onely shame and just indignation or Nemefis (according as Hefiodus prophefied before) have abandoned mans life; but also the providence of God being dislodged and carying away with it all the Oracles that be, is cleane departed and gone for ever? But contrariwife I will put foorth unto you another matter to be debated of : namely, how it comes to passe, that they have not rather already given over every one? and why Hercules is not come againe, or some other of the gods, and bath not long fince plucked up and carried away the three-tooted table and all, being fo full ordinarily of shamefull, vilanous and impious demands, proposed there daily to Apollo? whiles some preferre matters unto him as a Sophifter, to trie what he can fay; others aske him concerning treature hidden; some againe would be resolved of succession in heritages, and of incessions and unlawfull marriages? Infomuch as now Pythagoras is manifefully convinced of errour and lefing, who faid, that men were then best, and excelled in goodnesse, when they presented themfelves before the gods: for fuch things as it would well before to hide and conceale in the presence onely of some ancient personage (I means the soule maladies and passions of the foule) the fame they discover and lay abroad naked before Apollo. And as he would have gone forward ftill, and profecuted this theame, both Heracleon plucked him by the cloke, and I also (who of all the company was most familiar & inward with him) Peace (quoth I) my good friend Planetiades, and ceafe to provoke Apollo against you: for a cholericke and testic god he is, and 30 not milde and gracious; but according as Pindarus faid very well:

And were he either the Sunne, or the lord and father of the Sunne, or a fubstance beyond all visible natures, it is not like and probable, that he would distance to speake any more unto men at this day living, of whose generation, nativity, nourithment, being, and understanding, he is the cause and author; neither is it credible, that the divine providence, which is a good, kinde, and tender mother, produceth and preserveth all things for our use, should shew herselfe to be malicious, in this matter onely of divination and prophesse; and upon an old grudge and rankot, to be reave us of that which at first she gave us, as if for sooth even then when Oracles were tis in all parts of the world, there was not in so mightie a multitude of men, the greater number of wicked. And therefore make Pythicke truce (as they say) for the while with vice and wickednesse, which you are ever woont to chastice and rebuke in all your speeches, and come and sit downe heere by us againe, that together with us you may tearch out some other cause of this generall echipse and cellation of Oracles, which how is in question: but with all remember that you keepe this god Apollo propitious, and moove him not to wrath and displeasure.

But these words of mine wrought so with Planeriades, that without any word replying, out of the dores he went his waies. Now when the company sat still for a prety while in great silence, Immonius at length directing his speech to me: I beseech you (quoth he) Lamprias, take better heed unto that which we doe, and looke more neerely into the matter of this our difformation, to the end that we cleere not the god altogether, and make him to be no cause at all that the Oracles doe cease. For he who attributes this sessation unto any other cause than the will and ordinance of God, giveth us occasion to suspect him also, that he thinkes they never were not be at this present by his disposition, but rather by some other meanes: for no other cause and putiliance there is, more noble, more mighty, or more excellent, which might be able to desitoy and about the divination, if it were the worke of God. And as touching the discourse that Planeriades made, it please them never a whit: neither can I approace thereof, as well for other causes, as for that he admitteth a certaine inequality and inconstance in the god. For one while he maketh him to detest and abhorre vice, and another while to allow and accept thereof: much like unto some king or tyrant rather, who at one gate driveth out wicked persons, and receiving them in at another doth negotiate with them. But seeing it is so, that the greatest worke which can be fufficient in it felfe, nothing superfluous, but fully accomplished every way is most beforming the dignity and majesty of the gods, let this principle be supposed and laied for a ground, and then a man in mine opinion may very well fay, that of this generall defect and common scarcity of men, which civill feditions and warres before time have brought generally into the world, Greece hath felt the greatest part : infomuch as at this very day, hardly is all Greece able to make three thousand men for the warres, which are no more in number than one city in times past (to wit, Megara) fet forth and sent to the battell of Plataa : and therefore, whereas the god Apollo in this our age hath left many oracles, which in ancient time were much frequented, if one should inferre hecreupon and fay, that this argueth no other thing but that Greece is now much depopulate & dispeopled, in comparison of that which it was in old time, I would like well of his invention, and furnish him sufficiently with matter to discourse upon. For what would it boot, and what good would come of it, if there were now an Oracle at Tegra as sometime there was , or about Proum? whereas all the day long a man shall paradventure meet with one, and that is all, keeping and feeding cattell there. And verily it is found written in histories, that this very place of the Oracle where now we are, which of all others in Greece is for antiquity right antient, and for reputation most noble and renowmed, was in times past 20 for a great while defert and unfrequented; nay unacceffable altogether, in regard of a most venimous and dangerous beaft, even a dragon which haunted it. But those who write this, doe not collect hecreupon the ceffation of the Oracle aright, but argue cleane contrary : for it was the solitude and infrequency of the place that brought the dragon thither, rather than the dragon that caused the said desert solitarinesse. But afterwards when it pleased God, that Greece was fortified againe and replenished with many cities, and this place well peopled and frequented, they used two Prophetesses, who one after the other in their course descended into the cave and there fat; yea and a third there was befides chosen, as a fuffragane or affiltant to fit by them and helpe if need were: but now there is but one Propehtesse in all, and yet we complaine not; for the onely is sufficient for all commers that have any occasion to use the Oracle. And 30 therefore we are in no wife to blame or accuse the god: for that divination and spirit of prophefie which remaineth there at this day, is sufficient for all, and sendeth all suiters away well contented, as having their full dispatch and answere for whatsoever they demand. Like as therefore Agamemnon in Homer had nine Heraults or Criers about him, and yet hardly with them could he containe and keepe in order the affembly of the Greeks being fo frequent as then it was; but now within these sew daies you shall see heere the voice of one man alone able to resound over the whole Theater, and to reach unto all the people their contained: even fo, we must thinke, that this divination and spirit of prophely in those daies used many organs and voices to speake unto the people, being a greater multitude than now there be. And therefore we should on the other tide rather wonder, if God would suffer to run in vaine like waste water, this propheticall divination: or to refound againe, like as the defert rockes in the wide fields and mountaines ring with the refonance and ecchoes of heard-mens hollaing, and beafts bellowing. When Amenonius had thus faid, and I held my peace, Cleombrotus addressing his speech unto me : And grant you indeed (quoth he) thus much, that it is the god Apollo, who is the authour and overthrower also of these Oracles? Not so, answered I, for I maintaine and hold, that God was never the cause of abolishing any Oracle or divination whatsoever: but contrariwise, like as where he produceth and prepareth many other things for one use and behoofe, nature bringeth in the corruption and utter privation of some; or to say more truely, matter being it selfe privation, or subject thereto, avoideth many times and dissolveth that which a more excellent cause hath composed: even so I suppose there be some other causes, which darken and abolish the vertue of 50 divination, confidering that God bestoweth upon men many faire & goodly gifts, but nothing perdurable & immortall: in such fort as the very workes of the gods do die, but not themselves, according as Sophoeles faith. And verily the Philosophers and naturalists, who are well exercifed in the knowledge of nature and the primitive matter, ought indeed to fearch into the substance, property and puissance of Oracles, but to reserve the original and principal cause for God, as very meet and requifit it is that it should so be. For very foolish and childish it is that the god himfelfe, like unto those spirits speaking within the bellies of possessed folkes, such as in old time they called Eugastrimithi, and Euryclees, and be now termed Pythons, entred into the bodies of Prophets, spake by their mouthes, and used their tongues and voices as organs and instruments of speech : for he that thus intermedleth God among the occasions and neceffities of men, maketh no spare as he ought of his majesty, neither carieth he that respect as is meet, to the preservation of the dignity and greatnesse of his power and vertue. Then Cleombrotus: You say very well and truely (quoth he:) but for as much as it is a difficult matter to comprise and define in what maner, and how farre forth, and to what point we ought to employ this divine providence: in my conceit, they who are of this minde, that fimply God is cause of to nothing at all in the world, and they againe, that make him wholly the authour of all things; hold not a meane and indifferent course, but both of them misse the very point of decent mediocrity. Certes as they fay paffing well, who hold that Plato having invented and devised that element or fubject, upon which grow and be engendred qualities, the which one while is called the primitive matter, and otherwhile nature, delivered Philosophers from many great difficulties: even so me thinks, they who ordained a certaine kinde by themselves of Dæmons betweene god and men, have affoiled many more doubts and greater ambiguities by finding out that bond and linke (as it were) which joineth us and them together in fociety: Were in the opinion that came from the ancient Magi and Zoroasties, or rather a Thracian doctrine delivered by Orpheus; or els an Aegyptian or Phrygian tradition, as we may conjecture by feeing the fa 20 crifices both in the one countrey and the other: wherein, among other holy and divine ceremonies, it feemeth there were certeine dolefull ceremonies of mourning and forrow intermingled, favouring of mortality. And verily of the Greeks, Homer hath used these two names indifferently, terming the Gods Dæmons, and the Dæmons likewife Gods. But He fiedne was the first who purely & distinctly hath set downe source kinds of reasonable natures, to wit, the Gods: then the Dæmons, and those many in number and all good: the Heroes and Men; for the Demi-gods are ranged in the number of those Heroicke worthies. But others hold, that there is a transmutation as well of bodies as soules: and like as we may observe, that of earth is ingendred water, of water aire, and of aire fire, whiles the nature of the substance still mounteth on high: even so the better soules are changed, first from men to Heroes or Demi-gods, and afterwards 30 from them to Dæmons, and of Dæmons some sew after long time, being well refined and purified by vertue, came to participate the divination of the gods. Yet unto some it befalleth, that being not able to holde and conteine, they fuffer themselves to slide and fall into mortall bodies againe, where they lead an obscure and darke life, like unto a smoaky vapour. As for He sodus, hethinketh verily, that even the Dæmons also, after certeine revolutions of time, shall die; for speaking in the person of one of their Nymphs called Manades, covertly and under anigmaticall termes he defigneth their time, in this wife:

Nine * ages of men * in their flower, doth live The * railing Crow: foure times the Stags furmount The life of Crowes : to Ravens dothnature give Athreefold age of Stags, by true account: One Phanix lives as long as Ravens nine; But you faire Nymphs, as the daughters verily Of mighty Jove and of nature divine, The Phanix yeeres ten fold do multiply.

But they that understand not well, what the Poet meaneth by this word goed, make the totall sum of this time to amount unto an exceeding great number of yeeres. For in trueth it is but one yeere and no more. And so by that reckening, the whole ariseth in all to nine thousand seven hundred and twenty yeeres just; which is the very life of the Dæmons. And many Mathematicians there be, by whose computation it is lesse. But more than so Pindarus would not have it, 50 when he faith, that the Nymphs age is limited equall to trees; whereupon they be named Hamadryades, as one would fay, living and dying with Okes. As he was about to fay more, Demetriuinterrupted his speech, and taking the words out of his mouth: How is it possible, quoth he, ô Cleombrotus, that you should make good and mainteine, that the Poet called the age of man, a yeere onely and no more? for it is not the space either of his flower and best time, nor of his olde age, according as some reade it in Hesiodus: for as one reads is the row, that is say, flourithing; so, another readeth preferror, that is to say, aged. Now they that would have it to be il division, put downe for the age of man, thirty yeeres, according to the opinion of Heraelitus which is the very time that a father hath begotten a sonne able to beget another of his owne: but fuch as follow the reading that bath greetrer, attribute unto the age of man an hundred and eight yeeres, faying that foure and fifty is the just moity or one halfe of a mans life: which num. ber is composed of an unitie; the two first plaines, two squares, and two cubiques: which numbers Plato also tooke to the procreation of the soule which he describeth. But it seemeth verily, that Heliodus by these words covertly did signific that generall conflagration of the world; at what time, it is very probable, that the Nymphs together with all humors and liquid, matters fliall perifh:

Those Nymphs I meane, which many a tree and plant In forrests faire and goodly groves do hant, Or neere to fprings and river streames are seene, Or keepe about the medowes gay and greene.

Then Cleombrotins: I have heard many (quoth he) talke hereof, and I perceive very well how this conflagration which the Stoicks have deviled, as it hath crept into the Poems of Heraelitus and Orpheus, and so perverted their verses: so it hath seized upon and caught hold of Hesiodus, and given a perverse interpretation of him aswell as of others. But neither can I endure to admitthis place, Some confummation and end of the world, which they talke of, nor any such impossible matters; and namely, those speeches as touching the life of the Crow and the Stag or Hinde, which yeeres, if they were furnised together, would grow to an exceffive number. Moreover, a yere containing 20 in it the beginning and the end of all things which the feafons thereof doe produce, and the earth bring forth, may in mine opinion not impertinently be called wear, that is to fay, the age of men: for even your felves contesse, that Hespodus in one passage called mans life ford. How fay you, is it not fo? Then Demetrius avowed as much. This also (quoth Cleombrotus) is as certone toften teine, that both the measure, and also the things which be measured, are called by one and the fame names : as it appeareth by Coryla, Chanix, Amphora and Medimnus. Like as therefore we name timitie, a number, which in leed of all numbers is the leaft measure and beginning onely of them: lemblably, Hefiodus termed Yeere the age of man, for that with it principally we meafure his age, and to communicate that word with the thing that it measureth: as for those numtime reduced hers which they make, there is no fingularity at all or matter of importance in themas touching 30 the renowmed numbers indeed. But the number of 9720 hath aspeciall ground and begininnes) amount ning, as being composed of the foure first numbers arising in order from one and the same, added together or multiplied by foure, every way arise to fortie. Now if * these be reduced into triangles five times, they make the just fumme of the number before named. But as touching these maltiplied by matters, what need I to contend with Demetrius? for whether there be meant thereby a longer time or athorter, a certeine or uncerteine, wherein Hesiodus would have the soule of a Dæmon sanorem une to change, or the life of a Demi god or Heros to end, it skilleth not; for he prooveth nevertheleffe that which he would, and that by the evidence of most ancient and wife witnesses, that there way to work: be certaine natures neuter and meane (as it were) fituate in the confines betweene gods and men, and the fame subject to mortall passions, and apt to receive necessarie changes and mutati-40 ons: which natures according to the traditions & examples of our forefathers, meet it is that we call Dæmons, and honour them accordingly. And to this purpole, Xenocrates one of the familiar friends of Plato, was woont to bring in the demonstration and example of triangles, which agreed very well to the present matter in hand : for that triangle which had * three sides and angles equall, he compared unto the nature divine and immortall; that which had * all fides unequall, unto the humane and mortall nature; and that which had * two equall and one unequall, gle, it is 3000: unto the nature of the Dæmons: for the first is every way equall, the second on every fide unequall, and the last in some fort equall and in other unequall; like unto the nature of the Dztiphed by an. mons, having humane passions and affections, yet withall, the divine power of some god. But nature herfelle hath proposed unto us sensible figures and similitudes visible above; of gods ve- 50 maketh 9000 tilly the Sunne and other starres; but of mortall men, sudden lights and slashes in the night, blazing comets, and shooting of starres: for unto such Euripides compared them, when he faid:

Who was ere while and lately in the floure, Of his fresh youth, at sudden in an houre, Became extinct (as ftarre which feemes to fall From skie) and into aire fent breath and all.

Now for a mixt body, representing the nature of Dæmons or Angels, there is the Moone; which they feeing to be to subject to growing and decreasing, yea and to perishing altogether. and departing out of fight, thought to accord very well, and to be fortable unto the mutability of the Damons kinde. For which cause, some have called her a terrestriall starre; others an Olympian or celeftiall earth; and there be againe who have named her The heritage and poffertion of Proferpina, both heavenly and earthly. Like as therefore, if one tooke the aire out of the world, and remooved it from betweene the Moone and the earth, he should diffolye the continuation, coherence and composition of the whole universall frame, by leaving a voide and emptie place in the middes, without any bond to joine and linke the extremes together; 10 even for they who admit not the nation and kind of the Dæmons, abolish all communication, convers and conference betweene gods and men, confidering they take away that nature which ferveth as a hanchman, interpreter, and minister betweene both, as Plato said: or rather they would drive us to confound and huddle together, yea and to jumble all in one, if we came to intermingle the divine nature and deity among humane paffions and actions, and fo plucke it out of heaven, for to make it intermeddle in the negocies and affaires of men; like as they faie. the wives of Theffalie draw downe the Moone from heaven. Which devife & fiction hath taken roote, and is believed among women, by reason that Aglasmica, the daughter of Agetor (by report) being a wife dame, and well feene in Aftrologie, made femblance and perfwaded the vulgar fort, that in every ecclipte of the Moone, the used alwaies some charmes and enchant-20 ments; by vertue whereof, the fetched the Moone out of heaven. As for us, give we no care and credit unto them, who fay, there be some Oracles and divinations without a deity, or that the gods regard not facrifices, divine fervices, and other facred ceremonies, exhibited muo them: neither on the other fide let us believe, that God is present to intermeddle or employ himselse in person, but betaking and referring that charge unto the ministers of the gods, as it ismeet and just; like as if they were deputies, officers, and secretaries: let us constantly hold. that those be the Dæmons which are their espies and escouts, going too and fro throughout all parts, some to oversee and direct the facrifices, and facred rites and ceremonies performed to the gods: others to chaftice and punish the enormious and outragious offences and wrongs committed by men : and others there are befides, of whom the Poet Hefindus speaketh most ic-30 verently faying:

> Pure, holy, and syncere they be, the Donors of good things: This bonour is allotted them. beseeming noble kings.

Giving us by the way thus much to understand, that to doe good and be beneficiall is a roiall office and function: for a difference there is, and fundry degrees there be in the gifts and vertues of Dæmons, like as among men. For in some of them there remaine still certaine small reliques (and the fame verie feeble and fcaree fenfible) of that passionate and fensitive part of the foule which is not reasonable, even as a very excrement and superfluitie lest behind of the rest: 40 but in others againe, there abideth a great deale, and the fame hardly to be extinguished, whereof we may fee lively the works and evident tokens in many places, differninate in fome facrifices, feafts and ceremonies celebrated unto them; yea, and in the tales reported by them. Howbeit, as touching the mysteries and sacred services (by which & through which a man may more cleerely perceive than by any other meanes whatfoever, the true nature of the gods) I will not speake a word: let them lie close and hidden still for me, as Herodorus faith. But as for certeine festivall solemnities and sacrifices, which are held as dismall, unfortunate and heavy daies; when fometimes they use to eatraw flesh, and teare humane bodies piece-meale; or otherwhile to fast and knocke their brests; and in many places utter most filthy and beastly words during the facrifices:

> Wagging their beads in frantike wife, With strange all armes and hideous cries.

I will never believe that this is done for any of the gods: but will fay rather, it is to avert the ire and appeare the furie of fome maligne divels, Neither carieth it any likelihood and probability, that ever any god would require men to be facrificed unto them, as they were in old time : or stand well pleased with any such sacrifices. Neither was it for nought that kings and great captaines gave their owne children thus to be flaines yea, and with their owne hands killed them for facrifice:

10

factifice: but we are to believe that it was to turne away and divert the rankor and wrath of fome perverse spirits and malicious fiends, or to fatisfie such hurtfull divels; yea, and to sulfill the violent, furious and tyrannicall lufts of fome, who either could not, or would not enjoy them with their bodies, or by their bodies. But like as Hercules befreged the city of Oechalia, for a virgins fake who was within: even to these powerfull and outragious fiends, demaunding some humane foule clad and compaffed within a body, to be given unto them, and yet not able to fulfill their lust by the body, bring pestilence, famine, dearth, and sterility of the ground upon cities, raife wars and civill diffentions, untill fuch time as they come to have and enjoy that which they loved: and some doe cleane contrary; as it was my hap to observe in Candie, (where I abode a long time) how they celebrated a certaine monstrous feast, in which they made shew of 10 an headlesse mans image, saying it was Molus, the father of Meriones: for having forced or defloured a Nymph, he was afterwards found without an head. Moreover, what ravifhment foever, what wandring voiages, what occultations, flights, banishments, ministeries and services of the gods be reported and fung in fables or hymnes, certes they be all of them no passions and accidents that befell to gods indeed, but to some Dæmons, whose fortunes were recorded in memoriall of their vertue & puissance: neither meant the Poet Aeschylus (a god) when he said:

20

Nor Admetus in Sophocles:

My chaunting cocke that crowes so shrill, Hath raised him and brought to mill.

Also the Divines and Theologians of Delphi, are in a greaterror, and farre from the truth, who thinke, that fometimes in this place, there was a combat betweene Apollo and a dragon, about the hold and possession of this Oracle. They are to blame also, who suffer Poets and Oratours, striving one against another in their Theatres, to act or relate such matters; as if of purpose and expresly they contradicted and condemned those things which themselves performe in their most facred solemnities. Heereat, when Philippus woondered much (for the Historiographer of that name was present in this companie) & demanded withall, what divine rites and ceremonies they might be, which were contradicted and testified against by these who contended in the Theaters? Mary even those (quoth Chombrotus) which concerne this very Oracle of Del- 30 phi, and by which this citie not long fince hath admitted and received into the facred profession of holy mysteries, all the Greeks without Thermopyla, and excluded those that dwell as farre as the vale of Tempe. For the tabernacle or cotage heere of boughes (which is erected and fet up every ninth yeere, within the court-yard of this temple) is not a representation of the dragons cave or denne, but rather of some tyrants or kings house: as also the assault or surprise thereof in great filence, by the way called Dolonia, Likewife, that a little after they bring thither aboy who hath both father and mother living, with torches light burning: and when they have fet the faid tabernacle or tent on fire, and overthrowne the table, runne away as hard as they can through the dotes of the temple, and never looke behinde them. And finally, the wanderings of this boy in divers places, and his fervile ministeries, together with the expiatory facrifices and 40 ceremonies about Tempe, move suspicion that there should be represented thereby some notorious outrage, and audacious fact perpetrated there in old time. For it were a meete mockery (my friend Philippus) to fay, that Apollo for killing the dragon, fled as farre as to the utmost coasts and marches of Greece, for to be purified and affoiled: also, that he offered thereon certeine expiatorie libations and effusions, and performed all such duties and services which men doe, when they would appeale the wrath and indignation of fuch Dæmons and curst fiends, whom we call Alastoras and Palamnaos, as one would say, The revengers of such enormities and crimes as could not be forgotten, and those who bare still in minde some old sinnes, and purfued the fame. As for that tale, which I my selfe of late have heard as touching this slight and banishment, it is woonderfull strange and prodigious: but if it conteine some trueth among, 50 we must not thinke, that it was a small and ordinary matter that befell in those daies about the faid Oracle. But for feare I might be thought as Empedosles sometimes faid:

To Stitch the heads of fundry tales together, And goe in divers pathes I know not whether:

Suffer me I beseech you to make a convenient end heere of my light discourses. For now are wee just come to farre, as we may also be bold after many others to affirme and pronounce, that seeing the Dæmons ordained for the presidence and superintendance of prophesics and Oracles doe faile, of necessity these Oracles also and divinations must cease with them; and when they be fled and gone, or change their refidence, it cannot chuse but the former places mult loofe their propheticall power and vertue: also, that when after long time they be returned thither, the faid places will begin againe to speake and found, like unto instruments of musicke; namely, if they be present who have the skill to handle and use them accordingly. After that Cleombrotus had thus discourfed: There is not (quoth Heracleon) any one of this companie that is a prophane miscreant and infidell, not protested in our religion, or who holdeth any opinions as touching the gods, discordant from us. Howbeit, let us take beed our selves & Philippus, 10 lest ere we be aware, we doe not in our discourse & disputation put downe some erroneous suppositions and such as may make great ground workes of implicity. You say very well (quoth Philip) but what point is it of all those that Cleombrotus hath put downe, that is to offensive and feandalizeth you most? Then Herackon: That they be not gods indeed who are the presidents of Oracles (because we ought to believe of them, that they be exempt from all terrettrial affaires) but that they be Damons rather, or the angels and ministers of the gods; in my conceit is no bad nor impertinent supposall: but all at once & abruptly, by occasion of Empedacles his verses, to attribute unto these Dæmons crimes, plagues, calamities, transgressions, inquietudes and errours fent from the gods above, and in the end to make them for to die, as mortall men; this I raketo be fomewhat to prefumpteoufly spoken, and to smell of barbarous audacity. Then Cle-20 ambrotus asked Philippus, who this youg man was, and from whence he came? And when he hadheard his name and his country, he answered in this wise: We are not ignorant our selves (ô Heracleon) that we are fallen into a speech savoring somewhat of absurdity : but a man cannot possibly discourse of great matters, without he lay as great foundations at the beginning, for to proceed unto probability and prove his opinion. And as for your felfe, you are not aware, howyou overthrow even that which you grant : for confesse you doe, that there be Dæmons; but when you will needs maintaine that they be neither lewd nor mortall, you cannot make it good that they be at all. For wherein I pray you doe they differ from gods, in case they beinsubstance incorruptible, and in vertue impassible, or not subject to sinne? Hecreupon Heracleon, when he had mused with himselfe not saying a word, and studied what answere to-30 make, Chembrosus went on and faid: It is not Empedecles alone who hath given out there were evill Dæmons, but Plato also himselfe, Xenocrates also and Chrysppus; yea and Democritus when he wished and praied that he might meet with lucky images, both knew and gave us (no doubt) thereby to understand, that he thought there were others of them crooked and shrewd, and such as were badly affected and had evill intentions. But as touching the death of fuch, and how they are mortall, I have heard it reported by a man who was no foole nor a vaine lying person: and that was Epitherses the father of Aemilianus the oratour, whom some of you (Idare well fay) have heard to plead & declaime. This Epitherfes was my fellow-citizen and had beene my schoolemaster in grammar, and this narration he related: That minding upon a time to make a voiage by fea into Italy, he was embarqued in a thip fraught with much marchandize 40 and having many paffengers befide aboord. Now when it drew toward the evening, they hapned (as he faid) to be calined about the Isles Echinades; by occasion whereof their thip hulled with the tides untill at length it was brought neere unto the Islands Paxe, whiles most of the paffengers were awake, and many of them still drinking after supper: but then, all on a sudden there was heard a voice from one of the Islands of Pane, calling aloud unto one Thamus; infomuch as there was not one of all our company but he wondred thereat. Now this Thamus was a Pilot and an Aegyptian borne: but knowen he was not to many of them in the ship by that name. At the two first calles, he made no answere; but at the third time he obeied the voice, and answered: Here I am. Then he who spake, strained his voice and said unto him: When thou art come to * Palodes, publish thou and make it knowen: That the Great Pan is Dead. And as E- * Some take it 50 ptherses made report unto us, as many as heard this voice were wonderfully amazed thereat, to be a place and entred into a discourse and disputation about the point, whether it were best to doe accor. of manie ding to this commandement, or rather to let it paffe and not curiously to meddle withall; but thall; but that that that the but that the but that that the but the b neglect it? As for Thamus, of this minde he was and refolved: If the winde ferved, to faile by the Place quietly and fay nothing; but if the windes were laid and that their enfued a calme, to crie and pronounce with a loud voice that which he heard. Well, when they were come to Palodes aforefaid the winde was downe and they were becalmed, so as the sea was very still without waves.

Whereupon

Whereupon Thamus looking from the poupe of the ship toward the land, pronounced with a loud voice that which he had heard, and faid: The great Pan is Dead. He had no fooner fpoken the word but there was heard a mighty noise, not of one but of many together, who seemed to groane and lament, and withall to make a great wonder. And as it falleth commonly out when as many be prefent, the newes thereof was foone spred and divulged through the city of Rome, in fuch fort as Tiberius Cafar the emperour fent for Thamus : and Tiberius verily gave so good credit unto his wordes, that he searched and enquired with all diligence who that Pan might be. Now the great clerks and learned men (of whom he had many about him) gave their conjecture that it might be he, who was the fonne of Mercurie by Penelope. And verily Philippus had fome of the companie present to beare witnesse with him, such as had beene Ac. of milianus scholars and heard as much. Then Demetrius made report, that many little desert and defolate Isles there were lying dispersed and scattering in the sea about Britaine, like unto those which the Greeks call Sporades; whereof some were named the Isles of Dæmons, and Heroes or Demi-gods: also that himselfe by commission and commandement from the emperour, failed toward the necreft of those desert Isles for toknow and see somewhat; which he found to have very few inhabitants, and those all were by the Britaines, held for facrosained and inviofable. Now within a while after he was arrived thither, the aire and weather was mightily troubled, many portenteous fignes were given by terrible tempests and stormes, with extraordinary windes, thunders, lightnings, and fire impressions: but after that these tempests were ceased. the Handers affured him, that one of those Dæmons or Demi-gods (who surmounted the na- 20 ture of man) was departed. For like as a lampe (fay they) or candle, follong as it burneth light offendeth no bodie; but when it is put out or goeth forth, it maketh a stinke offensive unto many about it : even so, these great Soules whiles they shine and give light, be milde, gracious, and harmeleffe; but when they come to be extinct or to perish, they raise (even as at that present) outragious tempests, yea and oftentimes infect the aire with contagious and pestilent maladies. They reported moreover, that in one of those Ilands Briareus kept Saturne prisoner in a found fleepe (for that was the devise to hold him captive) about whose person there were many other Damons of his traine and his fervitours. Chombrotus then taking occasion for to fpeake: I am able my felfe alfo (quoth he) to alledge many fuch examples if I lift; but it may fuffice for this present matter in hand, that this is nothing contrary nor opposit unto that 30 which by us hath beene delivered. And verily we know full well, that the Stoicks hold the same opinion not onely of Damons that we doe, but also of the gods: that there being so great a multitude of them, yet there is but one alone immortall and eternall; whereas all the relt had their beginning by nativity and shall have an end by death. And as for the scoffes, scornes, and mockeries that the Epicureans make, we ought not to regard them, nor be affraid of them: for fo audacious they are, that they use the same even in the divine providence, terming it a very fable and oldwives tale. But we contrariwise hold, that their infinity of worldes is a fable indeed: as also to say, that among those innumerable worlds, there is not so much as one governed by reason or the providence of God; but that all things were first made and afterwards maintained by meere chance and fortune. Certes, if it be lawfull to laugh, and that we must need smake 40 game in matters of Philosophy, we should rather mocke those who bring into their disputations of naturall questions, I woundt what deafe, blinde, dumbe and inanimate images; remaining I know not where, and continuing in appearance infinit revolutions of yeeres, wandring round about and going to and fro: which fay they, iffue and flowe from bodies partly yet living, and partly from those who long agoe were dead, burnt, yea and rotten and putrified to nothing. These men(I say) we should doe well to laugh at, who draw such ridiculous toics and vaine shadowes as these, into the serious disputations of nature.

Meanwhile for footh, offended they are and angry, if a man should say there be Dæmons: and that not onely in nature but in reason also it standeth with good congruity, they should cotinue and endure a long time. These speeches thus passed, Ammonius began in this wife : *Cleombrotus 50 thrastumome in mine opinion (quoth he) hath spoken very well: and what should impeach us, butthat we may admit and receive his fentence, being fo grave as it is, and most beseeming a Philosopher? For reject it once, we shall be forced to reject also and denie many things which are, and usually happen, whereof no certeine cause and reason can be delivered: and if it be admitted, it draweth after it no traine and consequence of any impossibility whatsoever, nor of that which is not fublistent. But as touching that one point, which I have heard the Epicureans alledge against

Empedacles, and the Dæmons which he bringeth in, namely: That they cannot possibly be happy and long lived, being evill and finfull as they are, for that vice by nature is blind, and of it felle falleth ordinarily headlong into perils and inconveniences which destroy the life; this is a very fortish opposition: for by the same reason they must confesse, that Epicurus was worse than Gorgius the Sophister; and Metrodorus, than Alexis the Comicall Poet : for this Poet lived twice as long as Metrodorus; and that Sophister, longer than Epicurus, by a third part of his age. For it is in another respect, that we say Vertue is puissant, and vice feeble, not in regard of the lasting continuance or diffolution of the bodie: for we fee, that of beafts there be many dull, flow and blockish of spirit; many also by nature libidinous, unruly and difordered, which live longer to than those that are full of wit, wily, wary and wife. And therefore they conclude not aright, in faying, that the divine nature enjoieth immortality, by taking heed and avoiding those things that be notione and mischievous. For it behooved, in the divine nature which is bleffed and happy, to have fet downe an impossibility of being subject to all corruption and alteration, and that it standeth in no need of care and labour to mainteine the said nature. But peradventure it feemeth not to fland with good maners and civility, to dispute thus against those that are not present to make answere for themselves: it were meet therefore, that Chombrotus would resume and take in hand that fpeech againe, which he gave over and laied afide of late, as touching the departure and translation of these Dæmons from one place to another. Then Cleombrotus: Yesmary, quoth he: but I would marvell, if this discourse of mine would not seeme unto you 20 much more abfurd than the former delivered already: and yet it feemen to be grounded upon naturall reason, and Plato himselse hath made the overture thereto, not absolutely pronouncing and affirming fo much; but after the maner of a doubtfull opinion and under covert words, cafling out a certeine wary conjecture tending that way, although among other Philosophers it hathbeene disclaimed and cried out against. Bur forasmuch as there is set a cup on the boord, full of reasons and tales mingled together, and for that a man shall hardly meet in any place againe with more courteous and gratious hearers, among whom he may paffe and put away fuch narrations, as pieces of forren coine, and strange money: I will not thinke much to gratific you thus farre foorth, as to acquaint you with a narration that I heard a stranger and a Barbarian relate: whom (after many a journey made to and fro for to finde him out, and much money given 30 by me for to heare where he was) I met with at length by good hap, necre unto the Red fea. His maner was to speake and converse with men but once in the yeere; all the rest of his time (as he faid himfelfe) he spent among the Nymphs, Nomades and Dæmons. Well, with much adoc Ilight upon him, I communed with him, and he used me courteously. The fairest man he was to lee to, of all that ever I fet eie on : neither was he subject to any disease : once every moneth he fedupon a medicinable and bitter fruit of a certeine herbe; and this was the fare he lived upon. A good linguist he was, and used to speake many languages; but with me he talked commonly in Greeke, after the Doricke dialect. His speech differed not much from song and meeter: and when soever he opened his mouth for to speake, there issued forth of it so sweet and fragrant a breath, that all the place about was filled therewith and fmelled most pleasantly. As for 40 his other learning and knowledge, yea, the skill of all histories, he had the fame all the yere long: but as touching the gift of divination, he was inspired therewith one day every yeere, and no more; and then he went downe to the fea fide and prophefied of things to come : and thither reforted unto him the Princes and great Lords of that countrey, yea and Secretaries of forten kings, who there attended his comming at a day prefixed: which done, he returned. This perfonage then attributed unto Dæmons the spirit of divination and prophesie : most pleasure tooke he inhearing and speaking of Delphi: and looke whatsoever we hold here as touching Bacchiu, what adventures befel unto him, & what facrifices are performed by us in his honor, he had bene enformed thereof, and knew all well enough, faying withall: That as these were great accidents, that hapned to Dæmons; fo likewife was that, which men reported of the ferpent Python: whom 50 he that flew was neither banished for nine yeres, nor fled into the valley of Tempe, but was chafed out of this world, and went into another; from whence (after nine revolutions of the great yeeres) being returned all purified and Phabus indeed, that is to fay, cleere and bright, he recovered the superintendance of the Delphicke Oracle, which during that while was left to the cu-Itodie of Themis. The fame was the case (said he) of the Titons and Typhons. For he assirance, they were the battels of Dæmons against Dæmons: the flights and banishments also of those who were vanquished : or rather the punishments inflicted by the gods upon as many as had

Surely, this fellow as Iweene,

*O., Calum. committed fuch outrages as Typhon had done against Ofiris, and Saturne against * Calus or the heaven : whose honours were the more obscure or abolished altogether, by reason that them. felves were translated into another world. For I understand and heare, that the Solymians who border hard upon the Lycians, highly honoured Saturne when the time was: but after that he having flaine their princes, Arfalus, Dryus and Trofebius, fled & departed into fome other countrey (for whither he went they knew not) they made no more any teckoning of him: but Arla. lus and the other, they termed by the name of Scleroi, that is to fay, fevere gods: and in trueth. the Lycians at this day, as well in publicke as private, utter and recite the forme of all their curles and execrations in their names. Many other femblable examples a man may draw out of Theologicall writings, as touching 10 the gods. Now if we call fome of these Damons by the usuall and ordinary names of the goes, we ought not to marvell thereat (quoth this stranger unto me:) for looke unto which of the gods they do reteine, upon whom they depend, and by whose meanes they have honour and puiffance; by their names they love to be called: like as heere among us men, one is called Joving of Jupiter; another, Palladius or Athenaus of Minerva; a third, Apollomius of Apollo; or Dionsfins and Hermans of Bacchus and Mercurie. And verily, fome there be who although they be named thus at aventure, yet answer very fitly to such denominations; but many have gotten the denominations of the gods, which agree not unto them, but are transposed wrong and misgiven. Herewith Cleombrotus paufed: and the speech that he had delivered seemed very strange unto all the company. Then Heraeleon demanded of him, whether this doctrine concerned Pla. 20 to? and how it was, that Plato had given the overture and beginning of fuch matter? You doe well (quoth Cleombrotus) to put me in minde heereof, and to reduce it into my memory. First and formost therefore, he condemnethevermore the infinity of worlds: mary about the just and precise number of them he doubteth: and howsoever he seemes to yeeld a probability and apparence of trueth unto those who have set downe five, and attributed to every element one; yet himselfe sticketh still to one, which seemeth indeed to be the peculiar opinion of Plato: wheras other Philosophers also have alwaies mightily seared to admit a multitude of worlds; as if necesfarie it were, that those who staied not by the meanes of matter in one, but went out of it once, could not chuse but fall presently into this indeterminate and troublesome infinity. But this your stranger, (quoth I) determined he nothing of this multitude of worlds, otherwise than Pla- 30 to did? or all the whiles that you converfed with him, did you never move the question thereof unto him, to know what his opinion was thereof ? Thinke you (quoth Cleombrotus) that I failed herein, and was not (howfoever otherwife I behaved my felfe) a diligent scholar and affectionate auditor of his in these matters, especially seeing he was so affable, and thewed himselfe fo courteous unto me ? But as touching this point, he faid: That neither the number of the worlds was infinit, nor yet true it was, that there were no more but one, or five in all : for there were 183, and those ordeined and ranged in a forme triangular; of which triangle, every side contained threefcore worlds; and of the three remaining still, every corner thereof had one: that they were fo ordered, as one touched and interteined another round, in maner of those who arein a ring dance: that the plaine within the triangle, is as it were the foundation and altar 40 common to all the worlds, which is called The Plaine or Field of Trueth: and within it lie immovable the defignes, reasons, formes, idea and examples of all things that ever were or shall be : and about them is eternity, wherof time is a portion, which as a riverer, runneth from thence to those things that are done in time. Now the fight and contemplation of these things was presented unto the soules of men, if they lived well in this world, and that but once in ten thoufand yeeres: as for our mysteries heere beneath, and all our best and most facred ceremonies, they were but a dreame in comparison of that spectacle and holy ceremonies. Moreover, he faid: That for the good things there, and for to enjoy the fight of those beauties, men emploied their study in Philosophy here: or els all their paines taken was but in vaine, and their travellost. And verily (quoth he) I heard him discourse of these matters plainly and without any art, no o- 50 therwise than if it had beene some religion wherein I was to be professed, in which he instructed me without using any proofe and demonstration of his doctrine. Then I (turning to Demetriu) called unto him, and asked what were the words that the woers of Penelope spake, when they beheld with admiration uliffes handling his bow? And when Demetrize had prompted unto me the verse out of Homer: Surely (quoth I) it comes into my minde to say the very same of this ftranger:

Some * prying fie or theefe hath beene, not of bowes, as he faid of ulysses, but of tentences, resolutions and discourses of Philosophie: that to say, he hath beene converlant, I fay, no doubt in all maner of literature: and I warrant you, no itran- a humer. gernor Barbarian borne, but a Grecian, thorowly furnished with all knowledge and doctrine of the Greeks. And verily, this number of the worlds whereof he talketh, bewraieth not an Aegyptian nor an Indian, but favoureth of some Dorian out of Sieilie, and namely, of Petron, borne in thecity of Himera, who wrote a little booke of this argument; which I have not read my felfe, neither doe I know whether it be now extant : but Hippys the Rhegine (of whom Pharias the Eto reffian maketh mention) writeth, that this was the opinion and doctrine of Petron; namely, that there were 183 worlds, which raught one another in order and traine: but what he meant by this Reaching one another in order or traine, he declared not; neither annexed he any other probable reason thereof. Then Demetriue: And what likelihood or probability (quoth he)may there be in fuch matters, confidering that Plato himselfe alledging no argument or conjecture that carieth with it any shew of trueth and reason, hath by that meanes overthrowen that opinion? And yet (quoth Heracleon) we have heard you Grammarians fay, that Homer was the first authour of this opinion, as if he divided the universall frame of All into five worlds; to wit, Heaven, Water, Aire, Earth, and Olympus: of which, he leaveth two to be common, namely, Earth, to Allbeneath; and Olympus, to All above: but the three in the middles betweene them, hee attributeth unto three gods. Semblably, it feemeth that Plate allotting unto the principall parts and members of the faid univerfall nature, the first formes and most excel-lentigures of the bodies, called them five worlds; to wit, of the Easth, the Water, the Aire, the Fire, and finally, of that which comprehendeth the other; and that hee called the forme of Dodecaedron, that is to fay, with twelve bases or faces, which amply extentendeth it selfe, is very capable and mooveable, as being a figure proper and meet for the animall motions and revolutions of the foules. What need we at this prefent (quoth Demetrius) to meddle with Homer ? wee have had fables enough already, if that be good. As for Plato, hee is farre enough off from naming those five different substances of the world, five worlds: considering that even in that very place where he dispute th against those who maintein an infinit number of wor'ds, he affirmeth there is but one created by God, and beloved by him, as his onely begot-30 ten childe, composed of all nature, having one entier bodie, sufficient in it selfe, and standing in need of nothing elfe. Whereupon a man may very well woonder and thinke it strange, that having himselfe delivered a trueth, he should give occasion to others thereby, to take hold of a falle opinion, and wherein there is no apparence of reason. For, if he had not itucke hard to this unity of the world, in some fort he might have laid the foundation for those who hold them tobeinfinit: but that he should precisely affirme there were five, and neither more nor fewer is exceeding abfurd, and farre from all probabilitie; unleffe haply, you (quoth he, cafting his cie upon me) can fay fomewhat to this point. How now (quoth I then) are you minded thus to leave your first disputation of Oracles, as if it were fully finished and ended, and to enter upon ano-40 ther matter of fuch difficulty? Nay (quoth Demetrius) we will not passe it over so; but this here that presenteth it selfe now, and taketh us as it were by the hand, we cannot put by: for we will not dwell long upon it, but onely touch it fo, and handle it by the way, as that we may finde out fome probability, and then will we prefently returne unto our former question proposed in the beginning. First and formost therefore, I say: The reasons which permit us not to allow an infinit number of worlds, impeach us not, but that we admit more than one. For as well in many worlds as in one, there may be divination, there may be providence, and the least intercurrence of fortune: but the most part of the greatest and principall things shall have and take their generations, changes and mutations ordinarily: which cannot possibly be in that infinity of worlds. Over and befides, more conforant it is to reason, and accordeth better with the na-50 ture of God, to fay, that the world is not created by him, one onely and folitary: for being (as he is) perfectly and absolutely good, there is no vertue wanting in him, and least of all others that which concerneth justice and amity; which as they be of themselves most beautifull, fo they are best besitting the gods. Now such is the nature of God, that he hath nothing either unprofitable or in vaine and without use: and therefore needs there must be beside and without him, other gods and other worlds, unto whom and which he may extend those sociall vertues that he hath. For neither in regard of himselse, nor of any part in him, needeth he to use, ju-VVVVV 2

flice, gracious favour and bounty, but unto others. So that it is not likely that this world flotethand mooveth without a friend, without a neighbour, and without any focietie and comnunication, in a vast and infinit voidnesse; especially seeing we behold how nature encloseth, environeth, and comprehendeth all things, in their feverall genders and diffinet kinds, as it were within veffels or the husks and covertures of their feeds. For looke throughout the univerfall nature, there is nothing to be found one in number, but it hath the notion and reason of the effence and being thereof, common to others: neither hath any thing fuch and fuch a denomination, but beside the common notion it is by some particular qualities distinct from others of the fame kind. Now the world is not called so in common: then must it be such in particular: and qualified it is in particular, and diftinguished by certeine differences, from other 10 worlds of the fame kinde, and yet hath a peculiar forme of the owne. Moreover, confidering there is in the whole world, neither man alone, nor horse, nor starre, ne yet God or Dzmon folitarie: what should hinder us to say, that nature admitteth not one onely world, but hash many? Now if any man shall object unto me and fay, that in nature there is but one earth, or one fea: I answer, that he is much deceived and overfeene, in not perceiving the evidence that is of fimilare parts: for we divide the earth into parts fimilare, that it is to fay, of the semblable and the same denomination, like as we doe the sea also; for all the parts of the earth are called earth, and of the fea likewife: but no part of the world is world, for that it is composed of divers and different hatures. For as touching that inconvenience which some especially seare, who fpend all matter within one world, left for footh if there remained any thing without, it should 20 trouble the composition and frame thereof, by the jurres and resistances that it would make: furely there is no fuch cause why they should feare; for when there be many worlds, and ech of them particularly having one definit and determinate measure and limit of their substance and matter, no part thereof will be without order and good disposition, nothing will remaine superfluous, as an excrement without, to hinder or impeach; for that the reason which belongeth to ech world, being able to rule and governe the matter that is allotted thereto, will not suffer any thing to goe out of course and order, and wandring to and fro, for to hit and run upon another world; nor likewife that from another ought thould come for to rush upon it because in nature there is nothing in quantity infinit & inordinate, nor in motion without reason & order. But fay there should happly be some deflux or effluence that passeth from one world to ano- 30 ther, the fame is a brotherly fweet and amiable communication, and fuch as very well agreeth to all: much like unto the lights of starres, and the influences of their temperatures, which are the cause that they themselves doe joy in beholding one another with a kinde and favourable aspect; yea and yeeld unto the gods, which in every starre be many (and those good) meanes to intertaine and embrace one another most friendly. For in all this, verily, there is nothing impossible, nothing fabulous nor contrary unto reason: Unlesse paradventure some there be who will suspect and feare the reason and sentence of wisfotle, as consonant unto nature. Forif as he faith, every body hath a proper and naturall place of the owne; by reason thereof necessarily it must be, that the earth from all parts should tend toward the midst, and the water afterwards upon it, serving (by meanes of their weight and ponderosity) in stead of a foundation to 40 other elements of a lighter substance. And therefore (quoth he) if there were many worlds, it would fall out oftentimes that the earth should be found situate above are and fire, and as often under them: likewife the aire and fire formetime under, other whiles in their naturall places, and againe in others contrary to their nature. Which being impossible, as he thinketh, it must follow of necessity, that there be neither two nor more worlds, but one alone, to wit, this which we visibly s. ecomposed of all forts of substance, and disposed according to nature, as is meet and convenient for divertity of bodies. But in all this there is more apparent probability than vertty indeed. For the better proofe heereof, confider I pray you my good friend Demetrius, that when he faith, among simple bodies some bend directly to the midst, that is to say downward: others from the midft that is to fay upward: and a third fort move round about the midft and 50 circularly: in what respect taketh he the midst? Certaine it is, not in regard of voidnesse, for there is no fuch thing in nature, even by his owne opinion : againe, according unto those that admit it, middle can it have none, no more than first or last: For these beends and extremities: and that which is infinite must consequently be also without an end. But suppose, that some one of them should enforce us to admit a middle in that voidnesse, impossible it is to conceive and imagine the difference in motions of bodies toward it : because there is not in that void.

neffe any puissance attractive of bodies; nor yet within the same bodies, any deliberation or inclination and affection to tend from all fides to this middle. But no leffe impossible is it to apprehend, that of bodies having no foule any should moove of themselves to an incorporals place, and having no difference of fituation; than it is that the fame should draw them or give them any motion or inclination to it. It remainesh then, that this middle ought to be underfloodnot locally but corporally, that is to fay not in regard of place, but of body. For, feeing this world is an union, or maffe compounded of many bodies different and unlike conjoigned together; it must needs be, that their diversities engender motions discrepant and differing one from the other: which appeareth by this; that every of these bodies changing substance, change their place also withall. For the subtilization and rarefaction distributes thround about the matter which arifeth from the midst and ascendeth on high: contrariwise, condensation and constipation depresset and driveth it downeward to the middle. But of this point, we need not discourse any more in this place. For what cause soever a man shall suppose to produce fuch paffions and mutations, the fame thall containe in it a feverall world: for that each of them hath an earth and sea of the owne, each one hath her owne proper middle, as also passions and alterations of bodies, together with a nature and power which preferveth and maintaineth evetyone in their place and being. For that which is without, whether it have nothing at all, or elfe an infinite voidnesse, middle can it affoord none, as we have said before: but there being many worldes, each of them hath a proper middle apart; in fuch fort, as in every one there thall be motions proper unto bodies, some falling downe to the midst, others mounting aloft from the midft, others mooving round about the midft, according as they themselves doe diffinguish motions. And he who would have, that there being many middles, weighty bodies from all parts should tend unto one alone; may very well be compared unto him, who would have the blood of many men to run from all parts into one vaine: likewife that all their braines thould becontained within one and the fame membraine or pannicle; supposing it a great inconvenience and abfurdity, if of natural bodies all that are folide be not in one and the fame place, and therare also in another. Abfurd is he that thus faith; and no lesse foolish were the other, who thinketh much and is offended, if the whole should have all parts, in their order, range and fituation naturall. For it were a very groffe abfurdity for a man to fay, there were a world, which hadthe Moone in it fo fituate, as if a man should carry his braine in his heeles, and his heart in the temples of his head: but there were no abfurdity nor inconvenience, if in fetting downe mamy diffinct worldes and those separate one from another, a man should diffing unth with all and separate their parts. For in every of them, the earth, the sea, and the skie, shall be so placed and fituate in their naturall feats, as it is meet and appertaineth: and each of those worlds shall have Superior, inferiour, circular, and a centre in the midst; not in regard of another world nor of that which is without, but in it selfe and in respect of it selfe. And as for the supposition which some make of aftone without the world, it cannot be imagined how possibly it should either rest or moove : for how can it hang still, seeing it is ponderous and waighty? or moove toward the midst of the world as other heavy bodies, considering it is neither part of it, nor counted in the fubstance thereof?

Asconcerning that earth which is contained in another world and fast bound, we need not to make doubt and question, how it should not fall downe hither by reason of the wieght, nor be plucked away from the whole; feeing as we doe, that it hath a naturall strength to containe every part thereof. For if we shall take high and low, not within and in respect of the world, but without forth, we shall be driven unto the same difficulties and distresses, which Epicurus is fallen into, who maketh his little Atomes or indivisible bodies to move and tend toward those Places which are under foot: as if either his voidnesse had feet, or the infinity which he speakethof, permit a man to imagine either high or low. And therefore fome cause there is to marvell at Chrysippus, or rather to enquire and demand what fansie hath come into his head, and 50 mooved him to fay, that this world is feated and placed directly in the midft; and that the fubstance thereof, from all eternity having taken up and occupied the place of the midst, yet nevertheleffe it is so compact and tied together that it endureth alwaies and is (as one would fay) immortalized: for so much hath he written in his fourth booke acid twarter, that is to say, Of polfible things; dreaming (to no purpose) of a middle place in that vast emptinesse: and yet more abfurdly attributing unto that middle (which is not, nor hath any substittence) the cause of the places, that the substance is governed and mainteined partly by the motions tending to the mids, and partly by others from the mids of it. As for other oppositions belides, that the Stoicks make, who is there that feareth them? as namely, when they demand, How it is poffible to mainteine one fatall necessity, and one divine providence? and how it can otherwise be, but that there should be many DIES and ZENES, that is to say, Joves and Jupiters, if we grant that there be many worlds? For to begin withall, if it be an inconvenience, to allow many fuch foves and Jupiters, their opinions verily be farre more abfurd: for they devise an infinit fort of Sunnes, Moones, Apolloes, Dianaes and Neptunes, in innumerable conversions & revolutions of worlds. Moreover, what necessitie is there, to enforce us to avow many Jupiters, if there be many worlds? and not rather, in every of them a feverall god, as a fovereigne governor and ruler of the whole, to furnished with all understanding and reason, as he whom we surname the Lord and Father of all things: Or what should hinder, but that all worlds might be subject to the providence & destiny of Jupiter: and he reciprocally have an cie to overfee all, to direct, digest and conduct all, in miniftring unto them the principles, beginnings, feeds and reasons of all things that are done and made ? For it being so that we do see even here many times, a bodie composed of many other diffinct bodies; as for example, the affembly or congregation of a city, an armie, and a daunce; in every one of which bodies there is life, prudence, and intelligence, as Chrysppus thinketh: impossible it is not likewise, that in this universall nature, there should be ten, fifty, yea and a hundred worlds, using all one and the same reason, and correspondent to one beginning. But contrariwife, this order and disposition is best beseeming the gods. For we ought not to make the 20 gods like unto the kings of a swarme of bees, which go not forth, but keepe within the hive; nor to holde them encloted and imprisoned (as it were) rather, and shut up fast within Matter, as these men do, who would have the gods to be certeine habitudes or dispositions of the aire; and fuppoling them to be powers of waters and of fire infused and mixed within, make them to arise and be engendred together with the world, and so afterwards, to be burnt likewise with it, not allowing them to be loofe and at libertie, like as coatch-men and pilots are; but in maner of statues or images are fet fast unto their bases with nailes, and sodered with lead : even so they enclose the gods within bodily matter, and pin them hard thereto; so as being jointed (as it were) fute unto it, they participate therewith all changes and alterations, even to finall corruption and diffolution. Yet is this opinion fare more grave, religious and magnificent, in my conceit: to 30 holde that the gods be of themselves free, and without all command of any other power. And like as the firy light Caffor and Pollux fuccour those who are toffed in a tempest, and by their comming and prefence

and not failing themselves, nor partaking the same perils with the mariners, but onely appearing in the aire above, fave those that were in danger : even so the gods for their pleasure goe from one world to another, to visit them; and together with nature, rule and governe every one of them. For Jupiter verily in Homer, call not his cies far from the city of Troy, either into Thracia, or the Nomades and vagrant Scythians along the river Ister or Daunbie: but the true Jupiter in 40 deed hath many faire paffages & goodly changes befeeming his majefty out of one world into another, neither looking into the infinit voidnesse without, nor beholding himselfe and nothing els, as fome have thought; but confidering the deeds of men and of gods, the motions also and revolutions of the statres in their sphæres. For surely, the deity is not offended with variety, nor hateth mutations: but taketh much pleasure therein, as a man may guesse by the circuitions, convertions and changes which appeare in the heaven. I conclude therefore, that the infinite of worlds is a very fenteleffe and false conceit, such as in no wise will beare and admit any god, but emploieth fortune and chance in the managing of all things: but contratiwife, the administration and providence of a certeine quantity and determinate number of worlds, feemeth unto mencither in majestic and worthinesse inferior, nor in travell more laborious, that which is 50 emploied and restreined to the direction of one alone; which is transformed, renewed and metamorphozed (as it were) an infinit fort of times. After I had delivered this speech, I pauled and held my peace. Then Philippu, making no long stay: As for me, I will not greatly strive nor stand upon it (quoth he) whether the trueth be so or otherwise: but in case we force God out of the superintendance of one onely world, how is it, that we make him to be Creatout of five worlds, neither more nor leffe? and what the peculiar and speciall reason is of this number to aplurality of worlds, rather than of any other, I would more willingly know, than the occafion or cause, why this Mot [EI] is so consecrated in this Temple. For it is neither a triangular, nor a quadrat, nor a perfect, ne yet a cubique number: neither seemeth it to represent any other elegancie unto those, who love and esteeme such speculations as these.

And as for the argument inferred from the number of elements, which Plate himselfe obscurely and under covert tearmes touched, it is very hard to comprehend; neither doeth it carie and shew any probabilitie, whereby he should be induced to conclude, and draw in a consequence: that like it is, considering in matter there be engendered five forts of regular bodies, having equall angels, equall fides, and environed with equall superficies; there to should semblably of these five bodies, be five worlds made and formed, from the very first beginning. And yet (quoth I) it should feeme, that Theodorus the Solian, expounding the Mathematicks of Plato, handleth this matter not amiffe, nor mifinterpreteth the place; and thus goeth he to worke: The Pyramis, Octaedron, Dodecaedron, and Icolaedron (which Plate fetteth downe for the first bodies) are right beautifull all, both for their proportions, and also for their equalities: neither is there left for nature any other, to devife and forme better than they, or indeed answerable and like unto them. Howbeit, they have not all either the same constitution, nor the like originall: for the least verily and smallest of the five is the Pyramis; the greatest and that which consisteth of most parts, is Dodecaedron; and of the other two behind, the Icofaedron is bigger by two fold and more, than Octaedron, if you compare their num-20 ber of triangles. And therfore impossible it is, that they should be all made at once of one and the fame matter; for the small and subtile, and such as in composition are more simple than the rest, were more pliable no doubt, and obedient unto the hand of workemen, who mooved and formed the matter, and therefore by all consequence sooner made and brought into subfiftence, than those which had more parts and a greater masse of bodies: of which, and namely of fuch as had more laborious making, and a buffer composition, is Dodecaedron. Whereupon it followeth necessarily, that the Pyramis onely was the first body, and not any of the other as being by nature created and produced afterwards. But the remedie and meanes to falve and avoid this abfurditie also, is to separate and devide the matter into five worlds: for here the Pyramis came foorth first; there the Octaedron, and elsewhere the Icosaedron; and in eye-30 ry of these worlds, out of that which came first into effe, the rest drew their originall, by the concretion of parts, which causeth them all to change into all, according as Plate doth infinuate, discoursing by examples in maner throughout all: but it shall suffice us briefly to learne thus much. For aire is engendred by the extinction of fire: and the fame againe being fubtilized and rarefied, produceth fire. Now in the feeds of these two, a man may know their passions, and thetransmutations of all. The seminary or beginning of fire is the Pyramis, composed of foure & twenty first triangles: but the seminary of the aire is Octaedron, confishing of triangles of the fame kind, in number fortice ight. And thus the one element of aire, flandeth upon two of fire, composed and conjoined together: and againe, one body or element of the aire, is devided and parted into twaine of fire; which becomming to be thickned and conflipate more still 40 in it felfe, turneth into the forme of water; in fuch fort, as throughout, that which commeth first into light, giveth alwaies a ready and easie generation unto all the rest, by way of change and transmutation: and so, that never remaineth solitary and alone which is first; but as one maffe and constitution hath the primitive & antecedent motion in another of originall beginning: so in all there is kept one name and denomination. Now furely (quoth Ammonius) it is stoutly done of Theodorus, and he hath quit himselfe very well, in setching about this matter so industriously, But I would much marvell if these presuppositions of his making, do not overthrow and refute one another: for he would have, that these five worlds were not composed all at once together; but that the smallest and most subtile which required least workmanship in the making, came foorth first: then as a thing consequent, and not repugnant at all, he suppo-30 feth that the matter doth not thrust foorth alwaies into effence, that which is most subtile and imple; but that otherwhiles the thickest, the most groffe and heaviest parts, show first in generation. But over and besides all this, after a supposall made, that there be five primitive bodies or elements, and confequently thereupon five worlds; he applieth not his proofe and probabilitie but unto four onely. For as touching the cube, he subtracteth and remooyeth it quite away, as they doe who play at nine holes, and who trundle little round stones: for that such a square & quadrate body every way is naturally unfit, either to turne into them, or to yeeld them any meanes to turne into it for that the triangles of which they be composed, are not of the fame kind: for all the rest do in a common consist of a demi-triangle, as the base; but the proper subject whereof this cube particularly standeth, is the triangle Hoscetes, which admitteth no inclination unto a demi-triangle, nor possibly can be concorporate or united to it. Now if it be fo, that of those five bodies there be consequently five worlds, & that in ech one of those worlds the beginning of their generation and constitution, is that body which is first produced and brought to light: it would come to passe, that where the cube commeth foorth first for the generation of the reft, none of the other bodies can possibly be there, forasmuch as the nature of it is not to turne or change into any one of them. For I let paffe heere to alledge, that the element or principle whereof Dodecaedron is composed, is not that triangle which is called 10 Scalenon, with three unequall fides, but some other as they fay, how ever Plato hath made his Pyramis, Octaedron, and Icofaedron of it: And therefore (quoth Ammonius, finiling thereat) either you must dissolve these objections, or else alledge some new matter as touching the question now presently in hand. Then answered I: For mine owne part alledge I am notable at this time any thing that carieth more probability: but peradventure it were better for a man to yeeld reasons of his owne opinion rather, than of anothers. To begin againe therefore I fav. that nature being parted and devided at the first in two parts, the one sensible, mutable, subject to generation and corruption, and varietie every way; the other spirituall and intelligible, and continuing evermore in one and the same state, it were very strange and absurd my good friends, first to say that the spiritual nature receiveth division, and hath diversity and difference in it: and then to thinke much and grow into heat of cholar and anger, if a man allow not the paffible and corporall nature wholly united and concorporate in it felte, without dividing or separating it into many parts. For more meet it were yet, and reasonable, that natures parmanent and divine should cohere unto themselves inseparably, and avoid as much as is possible all distraction and divultion: and yet this force and power of The Other, medling also even with these, causeth in spirituall and intellectuall things, greater diffociations and diffimilitudes in forme and effentiall reason, than are the locall distances in those corporall natures. And therefore Place confuting those who hold this position, that all is one, affirmeth these five grounds and principles of all, to wit , Effence or feeing , The fame, The other , and after all , Motion , and Station. Admitthele five, no marvell is it, if nature of those five bodily elements hath framed proper figures and re- 30 presentations for every one of them, not simple and pure, but so, as every one of them is most participant of each of those properties and pulssances. For, plaine and evident it is that the cube is most meet and sortable unto station and repose, in regard of the stability and stedy firmitude of those broad and slat faces which it hath. As for the Pyramis who feeth not and acknowledgeth not incontinently in it the nature of fire, ever mooving in those long and slender fides and sharpe angles that it hath. Also the nature of Dodecaedron apt to comprehend all other figures, may feeme properly to be the image reprefenting Ens, or That which is, in respect of all corporall effence. Of the other twaine, Icofaedron refembleth The Other, or Diverfe: but Octaedron, hath a principall reference to the forme of The fame. And fo by this reckoning, the one of them produceth foorth Aire, capable of all substance in one forme; and the 40 other exhibiteth unto us Water, which by temperature may turne into all forts of qualities. Now it so be that nature requireth in all things and throughout all, an equal and uniforme distribution, very probable it is, that there be also five worlds, and neither more nor fewer, than there be moulds or patterns: to the end that ech example or patterne may hold the first place and principall puissance in ech world, like as they have in the first constitution and composition of bodies. And this may fland in some fort for an answer, and to satisfie him who mervaileth, how we devide that nature which is subject to generation and alteration, into so many kinds : but yet I befeech you, confider and weigh with me more diligently this argument. Certeine it is, that of those two first and supreme principles, I meane unity, and Binary or Duality; this latter being the element and original primative of all difformity, disorder and confusion, 50 is called Infinity: but contrariwise the nature of Unitie, determining and limiting the void infinity, which hath no proportion nor termination, reduceth it into a good forme, and makethit in some fort capable and apt to receive a denomination, which alwaies accompanieth sensible things. And verily these two generall principles shew themselves; first in number, or rather indeed to speake generally, no multitude is called number, untill such time as unitie comming to be imprinted as the forme in matter, cutteth off from indeterminate infinity, that which is superfluous, fuperfluous, heere more and there leffe; for then ech multitude becommeth and is made number, when as it is once determined and limited by unitie: but if a man take unitie away, then the indefinite and indeterminate Dualitie, comming againe in place to confoundall, maketh it to be without order, without grace, without number, and without measure. Now confidering it is fo, that the forme is not the destruction of matter, but rather the figure, ornament and order thereof; it must needs be, that both these principles are within number, from which proceedeth the chiefe diffimilitude and greatest difference. For the indefinite and indeterminate principle, to wit, Duality, is the author and cause of the even number: but the better, to wit, unitie is the father (as one would fay) of the odde number; so as the first even number is two, and the first 10 odde number three, of which is compounded five, by conjunction common to both, but in the owne puiffance odde. For it behooved, & necessary it was, in as much as that which is corporall & fentible for composition sake, is divided into many parts by the power and force of $Th\varepsilon$ Other, that is to fay, of Diversitie, that it should be neither the first even number, nor yet the first uneven or odde, but a third confifting of both: to the end that it might be procreate of both principles, to wit, of that which engendreth the even number, and of that which produceth the odde; for it could not be, that the one should be parted from the other, because that both of them have the nature & puissance of a principle. These two principles then being conjoined together, the better being the mightier, is opposed unto the indeterminate infinitie, which divideth the corporal nature; & fo the matter being divided, the unitie interposing it selfe between, 20 impeacheth the univerfall nature, that it was not divided and parted into two equall portions: but there was a pluralisic of worlds caused by The Other, that is to say, by Diversitie, and difference of that which is infinit and determinate; but this ploralitie was brought into an odde and uneven number, by the vertue and puissance of The same and that which is finite, because the better principle suffred not nature to extend farther than was expedient. For if one had beene pure and fimple without mixture, the matter should have had no separation at all; but in as much as it was mixed with Dualitie, which is a divifive nature, it hath received indeed and fuffred by this meanes separation and division: howbeit, staied it hath in good time, because the odde was the master and superior over the even. This was the reason that our anneients in old time were wont to use the verbe Pempasesthai, when they would fignific to number or to reckon: 30 And I thinke verily that this word mein, that is to fay, All, was derived of Pente, that is to fay, Five, & not without good reason, because that five is compounded of the two first numbers; and when other numbers afterwards be multiplied by others, they produce divers numbers: whereas five if it be multiplied by an even number and dubled, bringeth forth Ten, a perfect number; but if by the odde, it represente th it felfe againe. Heere I omit to say, that it is compofed of the two first quadrate numbers, to wit of unity and Foure; and that it is the first number which is equivalent to the two before it, in fuch fortas it compounded the fairest triangle of those that have right angle, and is the first number that containeth the sesquialterall proportion. For haply these reasons be not well surable nor proper unto the discourse of this present matter : but this rather is more convenient to alledge, that in this number, there is a naturall vertue 40 and facultie of dividing, and that nature divideth many things by this number. For even in our owne felves the hath placed five exterior fences, as also five parts of the foule, to wit, naturall, sensitive, concupifcible, irascible, and reasonable: likewise so many fingers in either hand . Also the generall feed is at the most distributed into five portions: for in no history is it found written, that a woman was delivered of more than five children at one birth. The Aegyptians also in their fables doe report, that the goddeffe Rhea brought forth five gods and goddeffes: fignifying heereby under covert words, that of one and the same matter five worldes were procteated. Come to the universall fabricke and frame of nature, the earth is divided into five zones: the heaven also in five circles, two Arctiques, two Tropickes, and one Aequinoctiall in the midft. Moreover five revolutions, there be of the Planets or wandring starres: for that the 50 Sunne, Venus and Mercurie run together in one race. Furthermore the very world it selfe is composed harmonically respective to five, Like as even among us our musicall accord and concent confifteth of the politure of five tetrachords, ranged orderly one after another, to wit, of Hypates, Meses, Synnemenæ, Diezeugmenæ, and Hyperboliææ likewise. The intervals likewifein fong which we use be five in number, Deelis, Semitonion, Tonus, Triemitonion, and Duonon. So as, it feemeth that nature taketh more pleasure in making all things according to the number offive, than after a Sphæricall or round forme; as Ariffotle writeth. But what is the cause will some one say, that Plate hath reduced the number of five worldes to the five primitive figures of regular bodies, faying, that God in ordaining and describing the whole world used the Quinarie construction? and yet afterwards having proposed the doubtfull question of the number of worldes (to wit, whether we should hold, there was but one, or rather that there were five in truth ?) he sheweth plainely that his conjecture is grounded upon this very argument. If therefore we ought to apply the probability to his minde and opinion, then of neceffity with the divertity of these figures and bodies there must ensue presently a difference also of motions, according as he himselfe teacheth, affirming: Whatsoever is subtilized or thickned, with the alteration of substance changeth withall the place. For so, if of the aire is ingendred fire, namely when the Octaedron is diffolved and parted into Pyramides: and contratiwife to aire of fire being driven close and thrust together into the force of octaedron: it is not possible that it should be in the place where it was afore, but flie and runne into another, as being forced and driven out of the former, and so fight against whatsoever standeth in the way and maketh refiftance. And yet more fully and evidently declareth he the fame by a fimilitude and example of fuch things, as by fannes or fuch like instruments whereby come is clensed & shaken out, or winowed and tried from the reft: faying that even fo the elements shaking the matter, and likewife shaken by it, went alwaies to bring like to like, and some tooke up this place, others that, before the universall world was of them composed as nowit is. The generall matter therefore being in such estate then (as by good likelihood All must needs be where god is away) presently the first five qualities, or rather the first five bodies, having every one of them their proper in. 20 clinations and peculiar motions, went apart: not wholly and altogether, nor fevered fincerely afunder one from another, for that when all was hudled pell-mell confusedly, such as were surmounted and vanquished, went evermore even against their nature with the mightier and those which conquered. And therefore when fome were haled one way, and others caried another way, it hapned that they made as many portions and diffinctions in number just as there were divers kindes of those first bodies: the one of fire, and yet the same not pure, but carying the forme of fire: another of a celettial nature, not fincere heaven indeed, but standing much of the skie: a third of earth, and yet not fimply and wholy earth, but rather earthly. But principally, there was a communication of aire and water, as we have faid heeretofore, for that these went their waies filled with many divers kindes. For it was not God who separated and disposed the 30 fubstance, but having found it fo rashly and confusedly diffipated of it selfe, and ech part caried diverfly in fo great dilorder, he digested and arranged it by Symmetrie and competent proportion. Then, after he had fet over every one, Reason as a guardian and governesse, he made as many worldes as there were kindes of those first bodies subsistent. And thus let this discourse for Ammonius sake, be dedicated as it were to the grace and favour of Plato. For mine owne part, I wil never fland fo precifely upon this number of worlds: mary of this minde I am rather, that their opinion who hold that there be more worldes than one (howbeit not infinit but determinate) is not more abfurd than either of the other, but founded upon as much reason as they: feeing as I doe, that Matter of the owne nature is fpred and diffused into many parts, not resting in one, and yet not permitted by reason, to runne in in finitum. And therefore, especially heere 40 (if elfe where) putting our felves in minde of the Academie and the precepts thereof let us not be over-credulous, but as in a flippery place restraine our affent and beleefe: onely in this point of infinity of worldes, let us frand firme and fee we fall not butkeepe our felves uptight. When I haddelivered these reasons above said: Beleeve me (quoth Demetrius) Lamprias giveth us a good and wife admonition, For

as Euripides faith: but of their deeds & works, when we prefume and dare pronounce of fo high and great matters, as if weknew them certainely. But as the man himfelfe faid even now, we must recall our speech unto the argument which was first proposed. For that which heeretofore 50 hath beene faid, namely that the Oracles are become mute and lie still without any validity, because the Dæmons which were wont to governe them, be retired and gone, like as instruments of musicke yeeld no found and harmonie when the Musicians handle them not: this (Iay) giveth occasion to moove another question of greater importance, as touching the cause and power, by which the Dæmons use to make their prophets and prophetesses to be ravished with an Enthusiasme or divine sury and full of santasticall visions. For it is to no purpose to say, that the Oracles are filent, because they be abandoned and for saken of the Damons; unlesse we be first perswaded, that when they be present and president over them, they set them a worke, and cause them to speake and prophesic. Then Ammonius taking his turne to speake: Thinke you (quoth he) that these Damons becalled any thing els,

Then spirits clad with substance of the aire, Which walke about the earth, now here now there, as faith Hesiodus? For it seemeth unto me, that looke how one man different from another, playing either in a Comedie or a Tragedie: the fame difference the weth in the foule, which is arraied and clothed within a bodie during this life. There is nothing therefore herein, either strange of or without apparence of reason, if soules meeting with other soules, imprint in them visions and fansies of future things: like as we also shew many accidents done and past, yea and foretell and prognosticate of such as are to come, not all by lively voice, but some by letters and writings, hay by touching onely and the regard of the cie; unlesse peradventure, you have somewhat els (ô Lamprus) to say against this. For it was not long fince told us, that you had much disputation and conference with certaine strangers in Lebadia; but he who related this newes unto us, could not call exactly to minde what talke paffed betweene you. Marvell not thereat (quoth 1:) for many affaires and occurrents fell out at once betweene, by occasion that the Oracle was open, and a facrifice folemnized, which caused our speeches to be dispersed, distracted and scattered disorderly. But now (quoth Ammenius) your auditors be at good leasure, willing also 20 to aske questions and to learne, not defirous to contest and contradict in a litigious and quarrelfome humor; before whom you may have good leave to speake what you will, and for that liberberry of speech have pardon at their hands and be held excused, as you see. Now when the rest of the company invited and exhorted me likewife, after fome paufe made and filence for a while, I began againe in this maner: Certes (quoth I,) ô Ammonius, it fortuned to, I wot nor how, that even your felfe gave the overture and first occasion of those discourses which then and there were held. For if Dæmons be spirits and soules separate from bodies, and having no felowship with them (as your selfesaid, following heerein the divine Poet Hesiodus who calleth

why deprive we those spirits and soules which are within the bodies, of this same puissance. whereby the Dæmons are able to foresee and foretell things to come? For it is not like, that the foules acquired any new propriety or power, when they have abandoned the bodies, wherewith they were not endued before: but thinke we must that they had the same parts and faculties alwaies, although worfe I must needs say, when they be mixed with bodies. And some of them verily appeare not at all, but be hidden: others are but obfcure and feeble, fuch as heavily and flowly performe their operations (much like unto those who see through a thicke mist, or moove in fome moist and waterish substance) desiring greatly to be cured, and to recover that facultie which is their owne; to be discharged also and clensed of that which hindreth and de-40 fraudeth them of it. For the foule, even while it is bound and tied to the body, hath indeed a power to foresee and know future things: but blinded it is with the terrestrial limixture of corporall substance; for that, like as the Sunne becommeth not then to be cleere, and not afore, when he is past the clouds; but being of himselfe alwaies shining, he seemeth unto us darke and troubled through a mist even so the soule, getterh not then a new power of divination and prophefie when the departeth out of the body, as if the were escaped out of a cloud; but having the faine before it is dimmed and obscured by the commixtion and consustion with that which is mortall and corruptible. Neither ought we to make a wonder hecreat, and thinke it incredible, feeing as we do (if there were nothing elfe in the foule) how that faculty which we call Memory, is equipollent and answerable in an opposite respect unto the pullance of divination; and con-50 fidering the great effect thereof, in preferving and keeping things past or rather indeed kee-Pingthem whiles they be. For to fay truely, of that which is once passed nothing remaineth nor substitteth in effe, were they actions, wordes, or passions : for all things be transitory and passe away as foone as they are, because time, in maner of a current or streame, carieth all away betore it: but this memorative faculty of the foule catching hold thereof I know not how, and flaying it for flipping away, giveth an imagination of effence and being to those things, which in trueth are not. For the Oracle verily which was given to the Theffalians as touching the city Arna, willed them to utter and speake

But memory is unto us the hearing of the deafe, and the fight likewise of the blinde; in such fort, as no marvellit is (as I have already faid) if our foule in retaining still things which are no more, doth anticipate many of those also, which are not yet. And such objects indeed concome it rather, and therewith is it affected more. For the bendeth and inclineth towards things that are to come: whereas of fuch as be already past and come to their end, she is freed and delivered, but onely that the remembreth them. Our foules then having this puillance in them inbred and naturall, though feeble, obfcure, and hardly able to expresse and represent their imaginations; yet nevertheleffe some of them shew and put them forth many times in dreames and in certaine facred ceremonies and mysteries, namely, when the body is well purified, or receiveth a fit temperature therefore, or elfe for that the reasonable and speculative faculty being then freed from the cares of things prefent, joineth with the unreasonable and imaginative part, and turnethit to thinke upon the future. For I approove not that which Euripides faith:

but he verily who is directed by the reasonable and intelligent part of the soule, and solloweth the conduct and leading there of by all probabilitie. Now that power or facultie of divination (like unto a paire of blanke writing tables, wherein there is nothing written) void of reason and not determinate of it felfe, but onely apt and meet to receive fanfies, affections, and prefenfions, without any discourse of reason, or ratiocination, hitteth upon that which is to come, at what time as it is most removed from that which is present; and in this extaste is it transmuted, by a certaine temperature and disposition of the body, which we call Enthusiasme or inspiration. Now such a disposition as this, many times the body of it selfe hath; but the earth putteth foorth and yeeldeth unto men the fources and fountaines of many other powers and faculties: some of which transport them out of their wits, bringing maladies, contagions, and mortalities: others againe be fometime good, kinde, and profitable, as they know full well who make experience thereof. But this fpring, this winde, or propheticall fpirit of divination, is most divine and holy, whether it arise and breath up alone by it selfe through the aire, or be drawen up with fome liquid humour, For comming once to be infused and mixed within the 30 body, it caufeth a strange temperature and unusuall disposition in the soules: the property whereof, a right hard matter it is to declare exactly, and expresse certainly; but a man in reason may atteine thereto by conjecture fundry waies: for by heat and dilatation, it openeth (I wot not what) little holes, by which in a'l likelihood the imaginative facultie is fet on worke about future things; much like as wine which working and boiling in the body fumeth up, and among other motions, it revealeth and discovereth many hidden secrets. For the fury of Bacchus and of drunkennesse, if we may believe Euripides, conteneth much divination: when the soule being enchased and enslamed, expellethall seare, which humane wisdome bringeth in, and by that meanes many times averteth and quencheth the divine inspiration. And heerewithall a man may alledge very well, and not without great reason, that ficeitie comming intermingled with 40 hear, fubrilizeth the spirit, and maketh it pure, and of the nature of fire (for according to Herachtus, The foule it selfe is of a dry constitution:) whereas humiditied oth not onely dim the fight, and dull the hearing, but also being mingled with the aire, and touching the superficies of mirrours, dusketh the brightnesse of the one, and taketh away the light of the other. On the contrary fide, it is not impossible that by some refrigeration and condensation of this spitit, after ter the maner of the tincture and hardnesse of iron, this part of the foule which doth pringhostil cate, should shewit selfe and get a perfect edge. And like as tinne being melted with brasse (which of it felfe is a mettall in the oare, rare, spongious, and full of little holes) doth drive it neerer, and maketh it more massic and solid, and withall, causeth it to looke more bright and refplendent: even fo, I fee no inconvenience to hinder, but that this propheticall exhalation har 50 ving fome congruence and affinity with the foules, should fill up that which is lax and empty and drive it close together more inwardly. For many things there be, that have a reference and congruitie one unto the other: thus the beane is fortable unto the purple die; Sal-nitre likewise helpethmuch the tincture of a rich scarlet or crimson colour, if it be mixed therewith, according also as Empedocles said:

And we have heard you speake (good friend Demetrica) of the river Cydnus, and the facred cutting knife of Apollo in Tarfus; and namely, how the faid river onely clenfeth that iron whereof the knife is made, neither is there any other water in the world able to fcoure that knife : like as in the city Olympia, they temper the after that commeth of the facrifices, with the water of the river Alpheni, and make thereof a mortar, wherewith they plaifter the altar there; but if they affay to doe it with the water of any other river elfe, it will not flicke to, nor binde one jot. No marvell therefore it is, if the earth fending up out of it many exhalations, these onely are found to transport the soules with an enthusiasme or divine sury, and represent the imaginations and fanfies of future things. But without all question and contradiction, the report that goeth of the Oracle in this place, accordeth well to this purpose. For it is said, that this propheticall and divining power heere, shewed it selfe first, by occasion of a certeine heardman, who chanced heeretofall; who thereupon began to cast foorth certaine fanaticall cries and voices, as if he had bene possessed with such a divine inspiration. Whereof the neighbors and those that came about him, at first made no account; but afterwards, when they faw that it fell out so indeed, as behad foretold, they had the man in great admiration: and the greatest clerks and wifest men of all the Delphians, calling to remembrance his name, gave out that it was Coretas, So that it feemeth to me, that the foule admitteth this temperature and mixtion with this propheticall spirit, as the sight of the eie is affected with the light. For albeit the eie hath naturally a property and power to fee, yet the fame is not effectuall without the light: even to the foule having this puissance and facultie, to foresee future things, like unto the eie had need of some proper and convenient thing to kindle it as it were, and fet an edge upon it. And heereupon it is, that many of our auncients have thought Apollo, and the Sunne, to be one and the fame god. They also who know what this beautifull and wile proportion is, and withall doe honour it; looke what reference or respect there is of the body to the soule, of the sight to light, and of the * under- * Our and & flanding to the trueth; the same force and power they esteemed there is of the Sunnes power flanding, unto the nature of Apollo: saving, that he is the iffue and geniture proceeding from Apollo who or light. unto the nature of Apollo: faying, that he is the iffue and geniture proceeding from Apollo who is eternall, and who continually bringeth him foorth. For like as the one kindles, bringeth foorth and stirreth up the visuall power and vertue of the sense: even so doth the other by the propheticall vertue of the foule. They therefore who thought that it was one and the felfe fame 30 god, by good right dedicated and confecrated this Oracle unto Apollo, and unto the Earth: judging, that the Sunne it was which wrought that temperature and imprinted this disposition in the earth, whereof arose this propheticall evaporation. And verily as Hesiodus upon good confideration, and with much more reason than some Philosophers, called the Earth;

The ground-worke fure Of all nature:

even so we deeme it to be eternall, immortall, and incorruptible: mary of the vertues and faculties which are in it, we hold that some faile in one place, and others breed a new and engender in another : and great probability there is, that there be transmutations and changes from one place to another, and that fuch revolutions as thefe, in the course and processe of long time turne and returne circularly often in it; as a man may conjecture and certainly collect by fuch things as manifestly do appeere. For in divers and fundry countries, we see that lakes and whole rivers, yea and many more fountaines and fprings of hot waters, have failed and beene quite loft, as being fled out of our fight, and hidden within the earth; but afterwards in the very fame places they have in time shewed themselves againe, or else run hard by. And of mettall mines, we know that some have been espent cleane and emptied; as namely, those of filver about the territory of Attica: femblably the vaines of braffe oare in Eubara, out of which they forged fometime the best swords, that were hardned with the tincture of cold water: according to which the Poet Aefchylus faid:

He tooke in hand the keene and douty blade, Which of Eubocan steele sometime was made.

The tocke also and quarry in Carystia, it is not long since it gave over to bring foorth certaine bals or bottomes of fost stone, which they use to spin and draw into three, in maner of flax : for Isuppose that some of you have seene towels, napkins, nets, caules, kerchieses and coifes woven of fuch thred, which would not burne and confume in the fire; but when they were foule and foiled with occupying, folke flung them into the fire, and tooke them footth againe cleane and faire: but now althis is quite gone, and hardly within the faid delfe shall a man meet and conceit of fuch a caule, as Euripides devileth Cyclops to alledge in the Tragoodie bearing

The earth must needs bring forth grasse, this is flat,

Will she or nill she, and feed my cartell fatte. This onely is the difference, because he faith not that he sacrificed his beasts unto the gods, but unto himselfe and his belly, the greatest of all the Damons: but we both facrifice and also powre forth our praiers unto them, forto have their answere from the Oracles: and to what purpose I pray you, if it be true, that our owne soules bring with them a propheticall facultie and vertue of divination, and the cause which doth excite and actuate the same, be some tempe-10 rature of the aire, or rather of winde? What meanes then, the facred inflitutions and creations of these religious prophetesses ordained for the pronouncing of answeres? And what is the reason that they give no answere at all, unlesse the host or facrifice to be killed, tremble all over even from the very feet, and shake whiles the libaments & effusions of halowed liquors be powred upon it. For it is not enough to wag the head, as other beafts doe which are flaine for fa crifice, but this quaking, panting and thivering must be throughout all the parts of the body, and that with a trembling noise. For if this be wanting, they fay the Oracle giveth no answere, neither doe they fo much as bring in the religious priestesse Pythia. And yet it were probable that they should both doe and thinke thus, who attribute the greatest part of this propheticall inspiration, either to God or Dæmon. But according as you say, there is no reason or likeli-20 hood therof: for the exhalation that arifeth out of the ground, whether the beaft tremble or no. will alwaies if it be prefent, cause a ravishment and transportation of the spirit, and evermore dispose the soule alike, not onely of Pythia, but also of any body else that first commeth or is presented. And thereupon it followeth, that a meere folly it is, to employ one filly woman in the Oracle, and to put her to it (poore foule) to be a votary and live a pure maiden all the daies of her life, sequestred from the company of man. And as for that Coretas, whom the Delphians name to have beene the first that chancing to fall into this chinke or crevasse of the ground, gave the hanfell of the vertue and property of the place, in mine opinion he differed nothing at all from other goteheards, or shepheards, nor excelled them one whit: at least wife if this be a truth that is reported of him, and not a meere fable and vaine fiction, as I suppose it is no better. 30 And verily when I confider and discourse in my selfe, how many good things this Oracle hath beene cause of unto the Greeks, as well in their warres and martiall affaires, as in the foundations of cities, in the distresses of famine and pestilence, me thinkes it were a very indignity and unworthy part, to attribute the invention and originall thereof unto meere fortune and chance. and not unto God and divine providence. But upon this point, I would gladly, ô Lamprias, (quoth he) have you to dispute and discourse a little: how say you Philippus, may it please you to have patience the while? Most willingly (quoth Philippus) for my part: and so much I may be bold alfo to promise in the behalfe of all the company, for I see well that the question by you proposed hath moved them all. And as for my selfe (quoth I) ô Philippus, it hath not onely moved, but also abashed and dismaied me, for that in this so notable assembly and conference of 40 formany worthy parfonages, I may feeme above mine age, in bearing my felfe and taking pride in the probability of my wordes, to overthrow or to call into question any of those things, which truely have beene delivered, or religiously beleeved as touching God and divine matters. But satisfie you I will, and in the defence of my selfe produce for my witnesse and advocate both, Plato. For this Philosopher reprooved old Anaxagor as, in that being to much addicted to naturall causes and entangled with them; following also and pursuing alwaies that which necesfarily is effected in the paffions and affections of naturall bodies, he overpaffed the finall and efficient causes, for which and by which thinges are done, and those are indeed the better causes and principles of greater importance: whereas himselse either before, or else most of all other Philosophers hath prosecuted them both: attributing unto God the beginning of all things 30 wrought by reason: and not depriving in the meane while the matter of those causes which are necessary unto the worke done: but acknowledging heerein, that the adorning and dispose of all this world fenfible, dependeth not upon one fimple cause alone, as being pure and uncompound, but was engendred and tooke effence, when matter was coupled and conjoined with reafon. That this is fo, doe but confider first the workes wrought by the hand of Artisans : as for example (not to goe farther for the matter) that fame foot heere and basis so much renowmed, of the standing cup, among other ornaments and oblations of this temple (which Herodotus XXXXX 2 with some few hairie threds of that matter, running here & there among the hard stones digged out from thence. Now of all these things Aristotle and his sectaries hold: That an exhalation within the earth, is the onely efficient cause, with which of necessity such effects must faile and passe from place to place; as also otherwhiles, breed againe therewith. Semblably are we to thinke of the spirits and exhalations prophetical which iffue out of the earth; namely, that they have not a nature immortall, and fuch as can not age or waxe olde, but subject to change and alteration. For probable it is, that the great gluttes of raine and extraordinary flouds, have extinguithed them quite, and that by the terrible fall of thunder-bolts the places were fmitten, and they withal diffipated and difpatched: but principally, when the ground hath beene thaken with carthquakes, and thereupon fetled downward and fallen in, with trouble and confusion of what, or foever was below; it cannot chuse but such exhalations conteined within the holow caves of the earth, either changed their place and were driven forth, or utterly were stifled and choked. And fo in this place also, there remained and appeared some tokens of that great earth-quake, which overthrew the city and staied the Oracle heere: like as, by report in the city Orchomenos, there was a plague which swept away a number of people; and therewith the Oracle of Tiresias the prophet, failed for ever, & so continueth at this day mute and to no effect. And whether the like befell unto the Oracles which were woont to be in Cilicia, as we heare fay, no man can more certainly enforme us than you Demetrius. Then Demetrius: How things stand now at this prefent, I wor not; for I have beene a traveller and out of my native country a long time, as yee all know: but when I was in those parts, both that of Mopfus, and also the other of Amphile- 20 chu, flourished and were in great request. And as for the Oracle of Mopfus, I am able to make reportunto you of a most strange and woonderfull event thereof, for that I was my selfe present, The Governour of Cilicia is of himselfe doubtfull and wavering, whether there be gods or no? upon infirmity, as I take it, of miscredance and unbeliefe (for otherwise he was a naughty man, a violent oppressour, and scorner of religion.) But having about him certaine Epicureans, who standing much upon this their goodly and beautifull Physiologie for footh (as they terme it) or else all were marred, scoffe at such things; he sent one of his aftranchised or freed servants unto the Oracle of Mopfus indeed, howbeit, making femblance as if he were an espiall, to discover the campe of his enemies: he fent him (I fay) with a letter furely fealed, wherin he had written without the privity of any person whatsoever, a question or demaund to be presented unto the Ora- 30 cle. This messenger, after the order and custome of the place, remaining all night within the fanctuary of the temple, fel there afleepe, and rehearfed the morrow morning what a dreame he had; and namely, that he thought he faw a faire and beautifull man to prefent himselfe unto him, and fay unto him this onely word Blacke, and no more : for prefently he went his way out of his fight. Now wee that were there, thought this to be a foolish and absurd toy, neither wish we what to make of it. But the governour aforesaid was much astonied thereat, and being firicken with a great remorfe and pricke of conscience, worshipped Mopfus and held his Oracle most venerable; for opening the letter, he shewed publikely the demaund conteined therein which went in these words: Shall I facrifice unto thee a white Bull, or a blacke? insomuch as the very Epicureans themselves who conversed with him, were much abashed and ashamed. So he 40 offied the facrifice accordingly, and ever afterwards to his dying day honoured Mapfus right

Demetrius having thus faid, held his peace: but I defirous to conclude this whole disputation with fome corollary, turned againe and cast mine eie upon Philippus and Ammonius who sat together. Now they feemed as if they had fomewhat to speake unto me, and thereupon I staied my selse againe. With that, Ammonius : Philip (quoth he) ô Lamprias, hath somewhat yetto fay of the question which hath beene all this while debated. For he is of opinion, as many others beside him are, that Apollo is no other god than the Sunne, but even the very same. But the doubt which I moove, is greater and of more important matters. For I wot not howerewhile, in the traine of our discourse, we tooke from the gods all divination and ascribed the 50 fame in plaine termes to Dæmons and angels : and now we will feeme to thrust them out againe from hence, and to diffeize them of the Oracle and three footed table of which they were possessioning the beginning and principall cause of prophesie, or rather indeed the very substance and power it selfe, upon windes, vapours, and exhalations. For even those temperatures, heats, tinctures, and confolidations (if I may fo fay) which have beene talked of, remove our minde and opinion farther off still from the gods, and put into our heads this imagination called, Hypocreteridion) this hath for the materiall cause verily, sire, iton, the mollesying by the meanes of fire, and the tincture or dipping in water, without which this peece of worke could not possibly have bene wrought. But the more principall cause and mistresse indeed, which mooved all this, and did worke by all these, was att and reason applied unto the worke. And we rily we see that over such peeces, whether they be pictures or other representations of things, the name of the artissee and workeman is written, as for example:

This picture Polygnotus drew, of Iroy won long beforne, Who father had Aglaophon, and was in Thasos borne.

And verily he it was indeed as you see, who painted the destruction of Troy: but without colours ground, confused and mingled one with another, impossible had it beene for him to have exhibited such a picture, to faire and beautifull to the eie as it is. If then some one come now and will needs medle with the materiall cause, searching into the alterations and mutations thereof, particularizing of Sinopre mixed with Ochre, or Ceruffe with blacke, doth he impaire or diminish the glory of the painter Polyeletus? Healfo, who discourseth how iron is hardned, and by what meanes mollified: and how being made foft and tender in the fire, it yeeldeth and obaieth them who by beating and knocking drive it out in length and bredth: and afterwards being dipped and plunged into fresh waters still, by the actuall coldnesse of the said water (for that the fire heats had foftened and rarefied it before) it is thrust close together and condensate: by 20 meanes whereof it getteth that stiffe, compact and hard temper of steele, which Homer calleth the very force of iron; referveth he for the workeman any thing leffe heereby, in the principall cause and operation of his worke? I suppose he doth not. For some there be who make proofe and triall of Physicke drogues, and yet I trow they condemne not thereby the skill of Physicker like as Place also himselfe, when he faith: That we doe see, because the light of our eie is mixed with the electenesse of the Sunne; and heare by the percussion and beating of the aire, doth not deny that we have the facultic of feeing and power of hearing by reason and providence. For in fumme, as I have faid and doe still averre, whereas all generation proceedeth of two caufes, the most ancient Theologians and Poets, vouchsafed to set their mindeupon the better onely and that which was more excellent, chaunting evermore this common refraine and foot 30 (as it were) of the fong in all things and actions whatfoever:

Jove is the first, the midst, the tast; all things of him depend: By him begin they, and proceed; in him they come to end.

After other necessary and natural causes they never sought farther, nor came neere unto them: whereas the moderne Philosophers who succeeded after them and were named naturalists, tooke a contrary course; and turning cleane aside from that most excellent and divine principle, ascribed al unto bodies, unto passions also of bodies, and I wot not what percussions, mutations and temperatures. And thus it is come to paffe, that as well the one fort as the other, are in their 40 opinions defective and come short of that which they should. For as these either of ignorance know not, or of negligence regard not to fet downe the efficient principall cause, whereby, and from which : fo the other before, leave out the materiall causes, of which; and the instrumentall meanes, by which things are done. But he who first manifestly touched both causes, and coupled with the reason that freely worketh and moveth, the matter which necessarily is subject and fuffreth; he (I fay) for himfelfe & us, answereth all calumniations, and putteth by all furmizes and suspicions whatsoever. For we bereave not divination either of God, or of reason: for as much as we graunt unto it for the subject matter, the soule of man; and for an instrument and plectre (as it were) to fet it aworke, we allow a spirit or winde, and an exhalation enthuliaflicke. First and formost, the earth it is that engendreth such exhalations: then, that which gi- 50 veth unto the earth all power and vertue of this temperature and mutation is the Sunne, who (as we have learned by tradition from our forefathers) is a god. After this we adjoine thereto, the Damons as superintendants, overfeers and keepers of this temperature (as if it were some harmony and confonance) who in due and convenient time let downe and flacke, or elfe fet up and firetch hard the vertue of this exhalation: taking from it otherwhiles the over-active efficacy that it hath to torment the foule and transport it beside it selfe: tempering therewith a motive vertue without working any paine, or hurt and damage to them that are infpired and possels therewith. Wherein me thinkes, we doe nothing that seemeth either absurd or impossible: neither in killing sacrifices before we come to moove the Oracle, and adorning them with coronets of slowers, and powring upon them facred liquors and libations, doe we ought that is contrary to this discourse and opinion of ours. For the priests and facrificers, and whosoever have the charge to kill the beast, and to powre upon it the holy libations of wine or other liquors; who also observe and consider the motion, trembling and the whole demeanour thereof, doe the same for no other end or cause but to have a signe, that God giveth care unto their demaund. For necessary it is that the beast facrificed unto the gods be pure, sound, entier, immaculate, and uncorrupt both in soule and bodie. And verily, for the body it is no hard matter to judge and know the markes: as for the soule they make an experiment, by setting before bulles, meale: by presenting unto swine, cich-pease: for if they will not fall to, nor tast thereof, it is a certaine token that they be not right. For the goat, cold water is the triall. Now if the beast make no shew and semblance of being mooved or affected, when as the said water is powred aloft on it, be sure the soule thereof is not disposed as it ought to be by nature.

Now, fay it go for currant and be constantly believed, that it is an undoubted and infallible figne, that the God will give answer, when the host or facrifice thus drenched doth stire; and contrariwife, that he will not answer, if the beast quetch not: I see nothing herein repugnant unto that, which we have before delivered. For every natural power produceth the effect for which 20 it is ordained, better or worse, according as the time and season is more or lesse convenient: and probable it is, that God giveth us certeine fignes, whereby we may know when the opportunity is palt. For mine owne part, I am of this minde, that the very exhalation it felfe which arifeth out of the earth, is not alwaies of the fame fort; but at one time is flacke and feeble, at another ftretched out and ftrong. And the argument which maketh me thus to judge, I may eafily confirme and verifie by the testimonie of many strangers and of all those ministers who serve in the temple. For the chamber or roume, wherein they are fet and give attendance who come to demand the answer of the Oracle, is filled thorow(not often, nor at certeine set times, but as it fallethout after some space betweene) with so fragrant an odour and pleasant breath, as the most pretious ointments and sweetest perfumes in the world can yeeld no better. And this ariseth from the fanctuarie and vault of the temple, as out of some source and lively sountaine: and very like it is, that it is heat, or at least wife some other puissance, that sendeth it forth. Now if peradventure, this may feeme unto you not probable nor to found of trueth: yet will ye at leastwife confesse unto me, that the Prophetesse Pythia hath that part of the soule, unto which this winde or propheticall spirit approacheth, disposed some time in this sort and otherwhiles in that, and keepeth not alwaies the same temperature, as an harmonic immutable. For many troubles and passions there be that possesses but, and enter likewise in her soule, some apparent; but more, secret and unseene: with which she finding herselfe seized and replenished, better it were forher not to present and exhibit herselfeto this divine inspiration of the god, being not altogether cleane and pure from all perturbations; like unto an instrument of Musicke well fer in 40 tuneand founding sweetly, but passionate and out of order. For neither wine doth surprise the drunken man alwaies alike, and as much at one time as at another; nor the found of the flute or shaulme affecteth after one and the same fort at altimes, him who naturally is given to be soone ravilhed with divine infpiration: but the same persons are one time more, and another while leffe transported befide themselves; and drunken likewise, more or lesse. The reason is, because in their bodies there is a divers temperature: but principally, the imaginative part of the foule, and which receiveth the images and fantafies, is possessed by the body, and subject to change with it, as appeareth evidently by dreames: for fometimes there appeare many visions and fantics of all forts in our fleeps; otherwhiles againe, we are free from all fuch illusions, and rest in great quietnesse and tranquillitie. We our selves know this Cleon here of Daulia, who all his life time 50 (and many yeeres he lived) never (as he faid himfelfe) dreamed nor faw any vision in his sleepe: and of those in former times, we have heard as much reported of Thrasymedes the Hoereian. The cause whereof, was the temperature of the bodie: whereas contrariwise it is seene, that the complexion of melancholicke persons is apt to dreame much, and subject to many illusions in the night; although it feemeth their dreames and visions be more regular, and fall out truce than others, for that fuch persons touching their imaginative faculty with one fansie or other, it can not chuse but they meet with the truth otherwhiles: much like as when a man shoots many shafts, it goeth hard if he hit not the marke with one. When as therefore the imaginative part and the propheticall faculty is well disposed and sutable with the temperature of the exhalation. as it were with some medicinable potion, then of necessitie there must be engendred within the bodies of Prophets an Enthuliasme or divine surie: contrariwise, when there is no such propor. tionate disposition, there can be no propheticall inspiration; or if there be, it is fanaticall, un. feafonable, violent and troublefome: as we know, how of late it befel to that Pythias or Propheteffe, who is newly departed. For there being many pilgrims and strangers come from forcen parts to confult with the Oracle, it is faid, that the hoft or beaft to be facrificed, did endure the first libaments and liquors that were powred upon it, never stirring thereat nor once quetching for the matter: but after that the Priests and Sacrificers powred Itill, and never gave over to to call liquor on, beyond all measure; at length (after great laving and drenching of it) hardly and with much adoc it yeelded and trembled a little. But what hapned hereupon to the Prophetesse or Pythias aforefaid? Went the did indeed downe into the cave or hole, againft her will (as they faid) and with no alacrity at all: but incontinently, when the was come up againe, at the very first words and answers that the pronounced, it was well known by the horsenesse of her voice, that the could not endure the violence of possession, being replenished with a maligne and mute fpirit, much like unto a thip caried away under full failes with a bluftering gale of wind. Infomuch as in the end being exceedingly troubled, and with a fearefull and hideous crie, making haste to get out, she slung herselfe downe, and fell upon the earth: so that not onely the forefaid pilgrims fled for feare, but Nicander also the High-priest, and other Sacrificers and religi- 20 ous ministers that were present. Who notwithstanding afterwards taking heart unto them, and entring againe into the place, tooke her up lying still in an extasse besides herselse: and in very trueth, the lived not many daies after. And therefore it is, that the faid Pythias keepeth her bo. die pure and cleane from the company of man, and forbidden she is to converse or have commerce al her life time with any stranger. Also, before they come to the Oracle, they observe certeine fignes; for that they thinke it is knowen unto the God, when her bodie is prepared and disposed to receive (without danger of her person) this Enthusiasme. For the force and vertue of this exhalation, doth not move and incite all forts of persons, nor the same alwaies after one maner, nor yet as much at one time as at another: but giveth onely a beginning, and fetteth to (as it were) a match to kindle it, as we have faid before; even unto those onely who are prepared 30 and framed aforehand to fuffer and receive this alteration. Now this exhalation (without all question) is divine and celestiall: howbeit for all that, not such as may not faile and cease, not incorruptible, not subject to age and decay, nor able to last and endure for ever: and under it, all things fuffer violence, which are betweene the earth and the moone, according to our doctrine: however others there be who affirme, that those things also which are above, are not able to refift it; but being wearied an eternall and infinite time, are quickely changed and renewed (as one would fay) by a fecond birth & regeneration. But of these matters (quoth I) advise you I would and my selfe also, eftsoones to call to minde, and consider often this discourse, for that they be points exposed to many reprehenfions, and fundry objections may be alledged against them. All which, the time will not fuffer us now to profecute at large: and therefore let us put them off unto another opportunity, together with the doubts and questions which Philippus moved as touching Apollo and the

Mong infinite testimonies of the fury of maligne spirits and evillangels (who having beene created at first good, kept not their originall, but fell from the degree and state of happinesse, wherein continue by the grace and favour of God the good angels, who minister and attend upon those who stall receive the inheritance of salvation and everlasting life) these may be reckoned for the chiefe and principall, that such reprobate spirits and accursed fiends, endewour & practise by all meanes possible to make themselves to be adored by men: and faine would they be set in the throne of him, who having imprisoned and tied them fast in a deepe dungeon, with the chaine of darknesse, reserveth them to the judge. ment of that great day of doome. And so farre proceeded they in pride and presumption, as to cause themselves to be stiled by the name of God; yea, and to be adorned with those titles, which are due and apperteine unto the Acternall, their foveraigne judge. Their devices and artificial meanes to bring thu about, be woonderfull, and of exceeding variety: according as the infinit numbers of idols 30 Swarming in all parts, and so many strange and uncouth superstitions, wherewith the world hath beene diffamed unto this present day, doe testifie and give evident proofe. But if there be any place in the whole earth, wherein Satanhath actually (hewed his furious rage against God and man, it is Greece: and above all, in that renowmed temple of Delphi, which was the common feat, upon which this cursed enemy has breceived the homages of an infinit number of people of all fores and qualities, under the colour and pretence of resolving their doubtfull questions. Here then especially presumed he and was fo bold, as to take upon him the name of God: and for to reach thereto, hath fee out and garnished his Oracles, with ambiguous speeches, short and sententious, intermingling some trueths among lies: even as it pleased the just judge of the world, to let the reines loose unto this notorious seducer, and to give him power for to deceive and abuse the world: as also by certaine notable say-40 ings (as thefe: Know thy felfe. Nothing too much: and fuch like) he hath kept bound unto him, persons of highest spirit and greatest conceit: causing them to thinke, that in delivering so goodly precepts for the rule and direction of this life, it must needs be the true friend of mankinde, yea and the very heavenly wisdome, that spake by these Oracles. But his audacious pride, together with most intolerable impudence, hash appeared in the inscription of this bareword, EI, upon the porch of the temple of Apollo in Delphi, in that he pretended title and claimed thereby (according to the last interpretation thereof in this prefent discourse) to put himselfe in the place of the eternall God: who onely Is, and giveth Being unto all things. And that which worse is, the blindnesse was so horrible, even of the wifest Sages, that this opinion hath beene seated in their heads whiles this tyrant posses-Sed them, in such fort, as they tooke pleasure to suffer themselves so to be consened by him. But hereby good cause have we to praise our God, who bath discovered and laid open to us such impostures, and maketh his majestie knowen unto us by his word, to be the onely true and eternall deitie; in adoring and worst ipping whom, we may safely and truely say E1, that is to say, Thou art: as contrariwise, the deceitful wiles and illusions of latan and his complices, do declare how fearefull and horrible the judgement of God is upon such rebellious spirits. Now if some over-busic and curious head, will beere di-Spute and reason against the justice of him who is the disposer of all things, and enterprise to controlle that eternall wisedome which governeth the world, for having mercy upon such as it pleases h him, and suffering to fall from so excellent an estate, the Apostatate and disobodient angels, and yet permittine them to have such a powerfull hand over the most part of Adams children; we answer in one word: Man, what art thou, that thus wilt plead against God? shall the thing formed, say unto him who formedit, Why hast thou made me fo? Hath not the potter full power to make of the same masse of earth or clay, one welfell for honor, and another for distronor? The judgements of God are unsearchable, they have neither bottom nor brinke : the riches of his wisdome and knowledge are inscrutable, and beyond all computation : his waies are hidden and impossible to be found out. If then there be any place in the consideration of the secrets of God, where we ought to be retentive, warie and discret, it is in this. where every man hash just occasion to thinke upon this notable lesson and advertisement: Not to presume for to know over and above that which he should, but to be wise unto sobrietie: and that no man ought to be pussed up with pride, but rather to searce. Moreover, as touching the contents of this dif. 10 courfe the author having used an honest and decent Preface, faith in generall: That by this present infeription, Apollo intended to make himfelfe knowen, and to incite every man to inquire into time, But becrein the enemie of mankind heweth his audacity and holdnesse sufficiently, as also how he deludeth and mocketh his flaves; in that after he had deprived them of right and found judgement, he flirreth them up to know, who he is : which is as much as if one should plucke out the eies, and cut in twaine the ham firings of a traveller or wasfaring min; and then bid him seeke out his way, and goe onward on hu journey. Now he brings in foure divers personages, delivering their minds as touching this Mot, Et. Lamptias opining in the first place, thinketh that the first and principall wife Sages of Greece devised it, for that they would be knowen and discerned from others. Ammonius secondly, 20 referreth and applieth it to the Wishes and Questions of those who resort unto the Oracle. Theon the third, attributeth this mysteric unto Logicke, and doth all that possibly he can to mainteine his opinion. Eustrophus the Mathematician feaking in the fourth place, and feconded by Plutarch, Philo-Sophizeth at large upon the number of 5. represented by the letter E: he discourseth and runneth through all the Mathematikes, and divers parts of Philosophy, and all to approove and make good his conceit : but his drift and end is , to shew under the mysticall sense of numbers , the perfection of his Apollo, which he draweth and fetcheth also from the consideration of his titles, epithets and attributes. But Ammonius gathering together their voices, and closing or flopping up the diffuration, seemeth to hit the marke : prooving by most strong and learned reasons, that Apollo would by this word instruct pilgims, how they ought to salute and call him, to wit, in saying thus, E it that is to say, 20 Thou art he: which is opposite unto that salutation which this false god (usur ping the name of the true Jehovah, or alwaies Existent) greeteth men with , in setting just before their eies, in the entrie and forefront of his temple, thefe two words, Irabi oreavor that is to fay, Know the felfe. Having enriched this with two evident proofes, the onetaken from the uncerteine condition of creatures; the other from the firmitude and true estate or being of the Creator; he exhorteth hufellowes to lift up themselves to the contemplation of the essence of God, and to honour the Sunne, his expresse image. Which done, herefuteth certaine contrary opinions: and after a new confirmation of his discourse, he endethwhere he first began; to wir, that the knowledge of God and our selves, are opposite in such fort, as yet neverthelesse they must meet and concurre in us. But all the application of this discourse unto Apollo (whom you must take for the very divell) in no wise u 40 fit and agreeable. And heerein aman may see better yet, what madnesse and folly is the wifdome of man : and in how thicke and palpable darknesse they goe groping with their hands before them, who are no otherwise guided than by the discourse of their owne reason. Which teacheth us once againe to adore the secrets of God: to recognize and apprehend his mercies in thematter of our falvation: to dread also his justice, which sheweth it selfe in the deplorable and piteous blindnesse of so many nations ; even from the time that sinne fir st entred into the world,

WHAT SIGNIFIETH THIS

word E1, engraven over the dore of Apolloes temple in the city of Delphi.

Light of late in my reading (friend Sarapion) upon certeine pretie [lambique] verses, not unelegantly endited, which Diezarchus supposeth that the Poet Euripides delivered unto king Archelaus, to this effect:

No. gifts will I to you present, Since poor e I am, and wealth you bave: Lest I for folly of you be shent, Or by such giving seeme to crave.

For he, who of that hitle meanes which he hash, bestoweth some small present upon them that are rich and possesse much, gratifieth them nothing at all, nor deserveth any thanks : and that which worse is, because no man will beleeve that he giveth (be it never fo little) for nothing, he incurreth the fulpicion and obloquie of being cautelous, illiberall, and fimply naught. But forasmuch as the gifts that be in the nature 20 of filver, gold and temporall goods, be in regard of beautie and liberall courtefie, farre inferiour to those which go in the kinde of good letters, and proceed from learning: it standeth well with honesty, both to give such, and also to demand the like of those who receive the same. And therefore, in fending prefently unto you, and for your fake unto those friends about you in those parts, certaine discourses gathered together as touching the Temple and Oracle of Apollo Pythim, as an offering of first fruits; I confesse that I expect from you others againe, both more in number and better in value, confidering that you live in a great city, have more leafure, and enjoy the benefit of more books, and all fort of scholasticall conferences and learned exercises. And verily it feemeth, that our good and kinde apollo doth indeed remedy, eafe and affoile the doubtfull difficulties ordinarily incident to this life of ours, by giving answer unto those who re-30 paire unto his Oracle: but fuch as concerne matter of learning, he putteth forth and propofeth himselse unto that part of our minde, which naturally is given to Philosophize and study wisedome, imprinting therein a covetous defire to know and understand the trueth: as may appeare by many other examples, and namely, in this petie mot, E1, confecrated in his temple. For it is not like, that it was by meere chance and adventure, nor by a lotterie (as it were) of letters fluffled together, that this word alone should have the preeminence with this god, as to precede and goe before all others; ne yet, that it should have the honour to be confecrated unto God, or declared in the temple as a thing of speciall regard for to be seene and beheld : but it must needs be, that either the first learned men (who at the beginning had the charge of this temple) knew some particular and exquisit propertie in this word, or elsused it as a device to 40 symbolize some matter of singularity, or covertly to signific a thing of great consequence. Having therefore many times before, cleanly put by and avoided, or paffed over this question propoled in the schooles for to be discussed and discoursed upon 3 of late I was surprized and set upon by mine owne children, upon occasion that I was debating with certeine strangers, as delitous to fatisfie them: whom being ready to depart out of the city of Delphi, it was no part of civility either to deteine long, or altogether to reject, having so earnest a minde to heare me say fomewhat. When therefore, as we were fet about the temple, I beganne partly to looke unto fome things my felfe, and partly to demand and enquire of them; I was put in minde and admonished by the place and matters then handled, of a former question which before time (when Nero passed thorow these parts) I heard Ammonius to discourse, and others besides, in this ve-50 ry place; and as touching aquestion of the same difficultie likewise propounded. For, considering that this god Apollo is no leffe a Philosopher than a Prophet, Ammonius then delivered, that in regard thereof the furnames might very well be fitted and applied, which were attributed unto him very rightly and with good reason; thewing and declaring, that he is Pythus, a Questionist to those who begin to learne and enquire; Delim and Phanaus, that is to fay, cleere and lightfome unto fuch as have the trueth a little thining and appearing unto them; Ifmenius, that is to fay, skilfull and learned unto as many as have atteined unto knowledge already; and Lesche-norum, as one would fay, Eloquent os Discoursing, when they put their science in practise and make use thereof, proceeding for to conferre, dispute and discourse one with another. And for that it appertemeth unto Philosophers, to enquire, admire and cast doubts, by good right the most part of divine matters belonging to the gods, are couched & hidden under darke anigmes and covert speeches, and thereupon require that a man should demand, why? and whether ? as also to be instructed in the cause. As for example, about the maintenance of the immortall or eternall fire, Why of all kinds of wood they burne the Firre only? Alfo, Wherefore they never make any perfume but of the Laurell? Likewife, What is the reason, that in this temple there be no more but two images of two destinies or fatall fisters, named Parse, whereas in all places els therebethree of them? Semblably, What should be the cause, that no woman (whatsoever she be) is permitted to have accesse unto this Oracle for counsell or resolution ? Againe, What is the reason of that fabricke or three sooted table? and such other matters which invite, allure and draw those who are not altogether witlesse, void of sense and reason, to aske, to see and heare formewhat, yea and to dispute about them, what they should meane? And to this purpose, doe but marke and confider these inscriptions standing in the forestront of this Temple: Know the felfe, and Nothing 100 much: what a number of questions and learned disputations they have moved: alfo, what a multitude of goodly discourses have sprung & proceeded from such writings, as out of some seed or graine of corne. And this will I say unto you, that the matter now in queftion, is no leffe fertile and plentifull, than any one of the other.

When Ammonius had thus faid, my brother Lamprius began in this wife: And yet (quoth he) 20 the reason which we all have heard as touching this question, is very plaine and short. For reported it is, that those ancient Sages or wise men, who by some are named Sophisters, were indeed of themselves no more than five: to wit, Chilon, Thales, Solon, Biss , and Pittaciss. But when first Cleobulus the tyrant of the Lindians, and then Periander the tyrant likewise of Corinth (who had neither of them any one jot of vertue or wildome) by the greatnesse of their power, by the number of their friends, and by many benefits and demerits whereby they obliged their adherents, acquired forcibly this reputation, in despite of all usurped the name of Sages: and to this purpole caused to be spred sowen and divulged throughout all Greece certaine odde sentences and notable fayings, as well as those of the others, wherewith the former Sages above named were discontented. Howbeit for all this, these five wisemen would in no hand discover and convince 30 their vanity, nor yet openly contest and enter into termes of quarell with them about this reputation, ne yet debate the matter against so mighty personages, who had so great meanes of countenance in the world: but being affembled upon a time in this place, after conference together they confectated and dedicated here the letter [E] which as it standeth fifth in the order of the Alphabet, so in number it fignifieth five : as if they testified and deposed heere before the god, that they were but five; protesting that the fixth and the seventh they rejected and excluded out of their focietie, as who had no right to belong unto them. Now that this conjecture is not befide the purpose, a man may know, who hath but heard them speake who have the charge and superintendance of this temple; namely, how they call that E1, which is written in gold, the E1 of Livia Augusta the empresse and wife of Augustus Cafar : the other in braffe, the 40 E1 of the Athenians: and the first, which is most ancient, and for the matter and substance thereof no better than cut in wood, at this very day they name, the E 1 of the Sages; as being dedicated not by one of them alone, but by all together. Heereat Ammonius pleafantly smiled, as supposing this to be the proper and peculiar conceit of Lamprias himselfe, howsoever he seemed to father it upon others, feigning that he heard it else where, to the end that he might not be called to account, and put to the maintenance and defence thereof. Then another of the company who were there prefent, faid that this was much like unto a foolish toy which a Chaldwan stranger, and by profession an Astrologer, not long since set abroch: That seven letters there were for footh in all the Alphabet, which were vocall and of themselves rendered a voice: like as seven starres there were in the heaven, which had their proper motions apart, at liberty, 50 and not bound and linked to others. Also that among those vocall letters or vowels, E was the fecond; even as the Sunne of all the Planets was next unto the Moone: and that all the Greeks in maner, with one accord, hold Apollo and the Sunne, to be both one. But this, when all is done, favoureth altogether of his counting table of judiciall Astronomic, and of his triviall discourfing head. Moreover it feemeth that Lamprias taketh not heed, but ere he is aware, stirreth up all those who have the charge of the temple, against this reason of his. For there is not a man in al the citic of Delphi, who knoweth ought of that which he hath faid, but they alledge the common opinion, & that which runneth currant throughout the world, which is: That it is neither the outward forme and flew, nor the found; but the very Mot only as it is written, contcineth foine fecret fignification: for it is as the Delphians doe conceive of it. And with that the high priest. Nicander himselfe (who was present) faid, that this E 1 is the forme and maner that they use, who come to consult with the god apollo, and to conver their questions unto him: and ordinarily, it carieth the first place in al their interrogatories. For usuall it is with them thus to demamaund; El purisum; El paurisum, &c. that is to fay, If, or whether they shall have victorie? if they shall marry? if it will be expedient for them to goeto sea? if they were best to till 10 the ground ? or if they should do well to make a voiage and travell into forren parts? And herein the God (who is wife and learned, mocking the Logicians, bidding them farewell who hold, that of this particle or Conjunction E 1, that is to fay, If, and of what Subjunctive proposition foever following after it, nothing can be made, nor categorically affirmed) both understandeth all interrogations annexed unto E 1, as reallthings in effe, and so accepteth of them. And for as much as this E1 is proper for an interrogation proposed unto him as a Divinor or Prophet : and common it is with us, by it to pray unto him, as to a god; they thinke that this word Ex is of no leffe validity to pray and with by, than it is to demand or aske a question: for everic one that praieth, ufeth ordinarily this forme: EI of error, that is to fay, ô if it might please god. And thus Archilochus wrote:

EI as, inco Morro xinge Neosians Sivers:

O if my lucke and hap were such,

As Neobules hand to touch.

And it is faid, that in the adverbe of withing EIOE, which fignifieth, Would God; the fecond fyllable 8s, is an adjunction idle and superfluous, for that 11 alone fignifieth as much: like as 600 in this verse of the Poet Sophron:

άμα τέννου θιωδ doωθόα: De firom alfoin their need Of children, for their jay and meed:

as also in Homer: Ως δίω κὴ σὸν ἐχὰ λύσω μθώνος:

As I will now, even thee difgrace,

And foile thy strengthin present place. Where & fignifieth just nothing. Thus you see, how in this little word E1 there is an optative power sufficiently declared. When Wieander had delivered these words, Theon (for I presuppose you know him, being a familiar friend of ours) demanded of Ammonius, whether Logike might have the libertie to speake in her owne defence, being thus wronged and troden under foote? when Ammonius willed him to speake hardly, and to say all that he could, and for to helpe her out of the mire: Certes, quoth he then, there be many Oracles which beare witnesse & evidently shew, that god Apollo is a most skilful Logician. For in some fort it belongeth 40 to one and the fame artiff, both to moove doubtfull ambiguities, and also to associate and electe the same. Moreover, according as Plato said, that there being in old time an Oracle given unto the Greeks, that they should double the altar within the temple of Delos, (which is a piece of worke for an expert Geometrician to performe, and who had the very habit and perfection of that Art) it was not that indeed which the god commanded the Greeks to doe, but he enjoined them to studie Geometrie: even so, in giving otherwhiles ambiguous answers, and doubtfull Oracles, he recommended thereby and augmenteth fo much the more, the credit of Logike, as being a science right necessary for as many as would gladly understand his speech. Now in Logike this Conjunction E1, that is to fay, If (which is fo apt to continue a speech and pro-Position) hath a great force, as being that which giveth forme unto that proposition, which is 50 most agreeable to discourse of reason and argumentation. And verily of this nature be all these Hypotheticall propositions,, copulative, disjunctive, &c. And who can deny it ? considering that the very brute beafts themselves have in some fort a certeine knowledge and intelligence of the substitence of things: but nature hath given to man alone the notice of consequence, and the judgement for to know how to differne that which followeth upon every thing. For that it is day; and, that it is light, the very woolves, dogs, and cocks doe perceive: but that, if it be day of necessitie it must make the aire light, there is no creature save onely man, that knoweth:

for he alone hath intelligence of the beginning and of the end, of the antecedent and the gonfement, of the proceeding and finishing of things: as also of the coherence and bringing together of both ends and extremes, of the conference of one to another; what habitude, Correspondence, or difference there is betweene; and this is it whereof all demonstrations take their chiefe originall and beginning. Now fince it is so, that all Philosophic whatsoever , confifteth in the knowledge of the trueth; and the light which cleereth the trueth; is demonstration; and the beginning of demonstration, is the collectence and knitting of propositions together: by good right that power which maketh and mainteineth this, was dedicated and confecrated by the Sages and wife men unto this god, who above all others loveth the trueth. Againe, this god is a Divinor and Prophet; but the arte of Divining is as touching future things, by the 10 meanes of fuch as are either prefent or past. For as nothing is done or made without canse; fo there is nothing foreknowen without a precedent reason: but forasmuch as all that is, dependent dethand followeth upon that which hath beene; and confequently all that shall be, hath a stint and dependance of that which is, by a certeine continuitie, which proceedeth from the beginning to the end the who hath the skill to fee into causes, and by naturall reason how to combose and joine them together, knoweth and is able to discourse

What things are now, what shall beereafter come,

As also what are past, both all and some; according as Homer faith: who very well and wifely fetteth in the first place the present, then the future, and that which is past. For of the present dependent all Syllogisme and reasoning, and 20 that by the vertue & efficacie of a conjunction: for that if this thing be, fuch a thing went before: and conversim, if this be; that thall be. For all the artificiall feat and skill of discourse and argument, is the knowledge of consequence, as hath beene said already but it is the sense, that giveth anticipation unto the discourse of reason. And therefore although haply it may seeme to stand little with decent honesty, yet I will not be affraid to affirme that this reason properly is the Tripode or three footed table as one would fay, and Oracle of trueth:namely, when the disputer supposeth a consequence upon that which was premised and went before: and then afterwards affurning that which is extant and subfistent, commeth in the end to induce and inferre a finall conclusion of his demonstracion. Now if it be so, that Apollo Pythius, as the report goeth, loveth musicke, and be delighted in the singing of swans, and sound of lute and harpe; what mar- 30 vell is it then, if for the affection that he beareth unto logicke, he likewife embrace and love that part of speech, which he seeth Philosophers most willingly and oftenest to use? Hercules before that he had loofed the bonds wherewith Prometheus was tied, and having not as yet conferred and talked with Chiron and Atlans two great Sophisters and professiours of disputation, but being a yong man still, and a plaine Bœotian, abolished all logicke at first, and scoffed at this little Mot E1: but soone after seemed as if he would plucke away by force the three sooted table of Apollo, yea and contest with the god, about the art of divining; for that together with age and processe of time he proceeded so farre, as that he became by that meanes a most skilfull prophet, and as subtile and excellent a logician. When Theon had made an end of this speech, Enflrophus the Athenian, as I take it, directed his wordes unto us & faid : See you not how vali- 40 antly Theon defendeth the art of logicke, & hath in maner gotten on the lions skin of Execules? It is not therfore decent, that we who in one word referre all affaires, all natures and principles jointly together, as well of divine as of humane things into number, and making it the author, mafter, and ruler even of fuch matters as fimply are most faire and precious, should fitte still and say never a word: but rather for our part, offer the fruits of the Mathematicks unto god Apollo. For we fay and affirme that this letter E, of it selfe, neither in puissance, nor in forme, ne yet in name & pronounciation, hath any thing in it above other letters : howbeit we thinke, that preferred it hath beene before all the rest, in this regard that it is a charracter and marke of the number five, which is in all things of greatest vertue and validity, and is named Pemptas. Whereupon our Sages and great clerks in times past, when they would expresse the verbe [to 50 number] used Pempazein, as one would fay, to count and reckon by fives. And verily Eustrophis in faying thus, addressed his speech unto me, not merily but in good earnest, for that I was very affectionate and much addicted then unto the Mathematicks; but yet fo, as in all things I observed and kept still the old rule: Tomuch of nothing, as being a schollar of the Academie schoole. I answered therefore, that Eustrophus had solved passing well the difficulty of the question by this number. For feeing it is so (quoth I) that number in generality is divided into even and odde, unity is in power and efficacy common to them both: in such fort, as being put unto the even, it maketh it odde; and likewise added to the odde, causeth the same to be even. Nowthe beginning and ground of even numbers is Two; and of odde, Three is the first; of which being joined together is engedted Five, which by good right is highly honored as being the first compound of the first simple numbers, whereupon it is worthily named rates, that is to fay, Mariage; because the even number hath some resemblance to the semale, and the odde, a reference to the male. For in the sections & divisions of numbers into equal parts, the even is altogether cleane parted and fevered afunder, leaving a certaine void space betweene the parts, as abeginning of capacity apt to receive fomewhat more: contrariwife in the odde number, if a to mandoe as much by it, and cut it into two numbers, there remainethalwaies somewhat in the midft betweene, fit for subdivition, yea and generation of new numbers : whereby it appeareth that more generative it is than the other. And whenfoever it commeth to be mixed with the other, it carieth the preeminence, and is mafter alwaies, but never maftered. For what mixture foever you make of them twaine, you shall never come thereby to an even number: but mix and compose them as often and in what maner you will, there shall arise alwaies thereof an odde number. And that which more is, both the one and the other added to it selfe, or compounded with it felfe, sheweth the difference that is betweene them. For never shall you see an even numher joined with another that is even, to produce an odde; for it goeth not out of his proper nature, as having not the power to beget any other than it felle, to feeble it is and imperfect: 20 but odde numbers coupled and mingled with others that be odde, bring forth many even numbers, so powerfull it is to engender every way. As for all the other properties and different puilfances of numbers, the time will not now ferve to discourse throughly of them all. But heereby youse, wherefore the ancient Pythagorean Philosophers called Five, the Mariage; as being compounded of the first male and of the first female. The same also is sometime named 2 ature; for that being multiplied by it felte, it falleth out still to determine in * it felfe. For like * For stimes as nature taking a graine of wheat in the nature of feed, and fo diffuling it, produceth many 5 maketh 25. formes and divers kindes of things betweene, through which the paffeth and proceedeth, untill at laft the bringeth her worke to an end; and when all is done theweth a corne of wheat againe, rendring the first beginning, in the end of all : even so, when other numbers multiply them-30 felves, and end by growing and multiplication in other numbers, only five & fix, if they be multiplied by themselves, do bring forth and regenerate likewise themselves : for fix times fix, maketh thirty fix; and five times five, artifeth to twenty five. But take thus much withall againe, that Six doth this but once and after one maner onely, when of it selfe it becommeth that * foure * That is to fquare number: but unto Five the same befalleth, when it is multiplied by it selse; and besides say, 36, made particularly, it hath this property, that by addition of it felfe it produceth also it felfe, in as much of 4 nines, as it maketh ten; which it doth alternatively, and holdeth on this courfe in infinite, as farre as any numbers will extend: fo as this number refembleth, that principle or first cause, which doth conduct and governe this univertall world. For like as it, of the owne felfe preferveth the world; and reciprocally, of the world returneth into it felfe, according as Heraelitus faid of the fire; like as golde is exchanged for wates, and wates likewife for golde: even fo the meeting of five with it felfe, howfoever it be, can engender and bring forth nothing either imperfect or itrange, but all the changes that it hath, be limited and certeine. For either it begetteth it selfe, or els produceth ten; that is to fay, that which is proper and familiar, or els perfect and accomplished. Now if a man should come unto me and demand: What is all this (good sir) unto Apollo?

I will answer againe: That this concernethnot Apollo alone, but * Bacchus also, who hath no Alluding to 50 leffe to do with the city of Delphos, nor is of leffe anthority there, than Apollo himselfe. For we the proverbe, have heard the Theologians (partly in verte and partly in profe) fing and fay, That this god be. nages Annual the Theologians (partly in verte and partly in profe) fing and fay, That this god be. naveheard the Theologians (partly in verte and partly in prote) mig and ray 1 that mis god beobject the series of the series o fatall he is transmuted and changed in many forts. Sometime he is all on a light fire, and causes and to be feth all things to be of the fame nature, and like unto all things: otherwhiles most variable, in all different which maner of formes, paffions & pursuances all different, and becommeth (as now he is) the World; norto the fo called by a most common and best knowen name. But the Sages and water fort, willing to purpose.

conceale and keepe these secrets hidden from common people, name this mutation & change of his into sire, Apollo; signifying thereby, a kinde of sole unity whereunto it reduceth all things, and negation of plurality: and Phabus likewise; betokening thereby his purity and electenesse from filth and pollution. As for his conversion into winds, water, earth, startes, and into sundry kinds of plants and living creatures, together with the order and slipsofition thereof, such as we see; all this passion (I say) and mutation, they covertly do signific under the name of a certeine distraction and dismembring: and in these regards, they call himselse Dionysus, Zagreus, Nystetions, stegenerations also, and resurrections: which be sables all, and ænigmaticall sictions, devitions; regenerations also, and resurrections: which be sables all, and ænigmaticall sictions, devitions; regenerations also, and resurrections. And verily, to Bacebus they do chant in their songs so certeine Dithyrambicke ditties and tunes, sull of passion and change, with motions and agitations to and fro. For according as Assembles last:

But unto the other (that is to (ay, Apollo) they fing the Pæan, which is a fetled kind of fong, and Musicke modest and sober. Moreover, in all their pictures and portraictures of images and statues, they make Apollo alwaies with a yong face, and never aging: but the other, to wit, Bacelua, they represent in many shapes, and as many formes and vilages. And in one word, to the one they attribute a constancy uniforme and evermore the same, a regular order, a serious and syncere gravity: but unto the other, mixed sports, games, wantonnesse and insolency; in summe, 20 sinch a gravity as is interlaced with fury, madnesse and inequality: they invocate and call upon him by the name of Bacehus Eüim:

Bacchus (Isay) surna ved Eüius, Who women doth to rage incite: And in such service surnous, And franike worship, takes delight:

noting hereby not unfitly and without good purpose that which is proper to the one and the other mutation. But for that the time of the revolutions in these changes is not equal and alike, but of the one (which is called Coros, and fignifieth plenty or fatiety) longer; and of the other (named Chresmosyne, which betokeneth want and necessity) shorter: observing even herein the 20 proportion, they use the canticle Paran, during all the rest of the yeere, in their factifices: but in the beginning of winter, they stirre up the Dithyrambe, and downe goeth Paan; and so invocate this god for three moneths space in stead of the other, supposing that there is the same proportion of the conflagration of the world to the refloring and reparation thereof, as is of three to one. But peradventure we have dwelt longer upon this point than we should confidering the time: howbeit this is certaine, that they attribute the number of five unto this god Apollo, as proper and peculiar unto him; faying, that one while it begetteth it selfe by multiplication, as fire; and another while maketh of it felfe ten, as the world. Moreover, thinke we not, that this number hath no focietie with Musicke, which is so agreeable unto this god, as nothing so much? Certes, harmonic is (to fay at once) occupied most of all about accords, which we call Sym-40 phonies: and that those are in number five, and no more, reason prooveth, and experience will convince it to be fo, even unto him who shall make the triall, either with strings or pipe-holes, by the very sense of hearing only, without any other reason. For al these accords take their generation by proportion in number. Now the proportion of the Musicke or Symphonic Diatessaron, is Epitritos or Sesquitertiall, that is to say, the whole and a third part over : of Diapente, Hemolios or Sesquialterall, that is to say, the whole and halfe as much more: of Diapason, duple : of Diapaton with Diapente together, triple: & of Dis-diapaton, quadruple. And as for that which the Musicians bring in over and above these, to wit, Diapason and Diatesfaron (for so they name it) they are not worthy to be admitted and received, as transcending all meane and measure to gratifie forfooth the unreasonable pleasure of the care against all proportion, and so breaking as it were the ordinance of the law.

To let passe therefore the five positures of the Tetrachords, as also the first five tones, tropes, changes, notes or harmonies, (call them what you will) for that they change and alter by setting up or letting downe the strings, more or lesse, or by streining or easing the voice; all the reit are considered as bases and trebles. For see you not that there being many, or rather infinit intervals, yet five there be onely used in song; namely, Diess, Hemitonium, Tonos, Trisemitonium, nion, and Ditonos? Neither is there any space or intervall greater or lesse in voices, distinguifhed by base and treble, high and low, that can be expressed in song. But to passe by many other fuch things (quoth I) onely Plate I will alledge, who affirmeth, that there is indeed but one world: mary if there were more in number, and nor the same one alone; it must needs be that there are five in all, and not one more. But grant that there be no more in truth than one, as Ariftetle holdeth; yet fo it is, that the same seemeth to be composed and coagmented in some fort of five other worlds: whereof one is that of earth, another of water, the third of fire, the fourth of aire; as for the fifth, fome call it heaven, others light, and fome againe, the skie; and there be, who name it a quint-effence : unto which onely it is proper and naturall (of all other 10 bodies) to turne round, not by violent force, nor otherwise by chance and aventure. Plato therefore observing and knowing well enough, that the most beautifull and perfect figures of regular bodies which be in the world & within compaffe of nature, are five innumber (namely, the Pyramis, the Cube, the Octaedron, Icofaedron & Dodecaedron) hath very fitly appropriated and attributed ech of these noble figures unto one or other of those first bodies. Others there be alfo who apply the faculties of the naturall fenfes, which likewife be in number five, unto the faid primitive bodies: to wit, Touching, which is firme, folid and hard, to Earth; Tafting, which judgeth of the qualities of favors by the meanes of moilture, to Water; Hearing, to the Aire, for that the aire being beaten upon is the voice and found in the eares : of the other twaine, Smelling hath for the object Sent or odour, which being in maner of a perfume, is ingendred and e-20 levated by heat, and therfore holdeth of the Fire; as for the Sight, which is cleere and bright, by a certeine affinitie and confanguinity which it hath with the heaven and with light, hath a temperature and complexion mingled of the one and the other: neither is there in any living creature other sense, nor in the whole worldany other nature and substance simple and uncompound; but a marvellous distribution there is and congruity of five to five, as it evidently ap-

When I had thus faid, and made a ftop withall, after a little pause betweene: O what a fault (quoth I) ô Eustrophon, had I like to have committed: for I went within a little of paffing over Homer altogether, as if he had not beene the first that divided the world into five parts; allotting three of them which are in the middes unto three gods, and the other two which be the ex-30 tremes (namely, heaven and earth, whereof the one is the limit of things beneath, the other the bound of things above) in common and not distributed like the others. But our speech must remember to returne againe, as Euripides faith, from whence it hath digreffed. For they who magnisie the quaternarie or number of foure, teach not amisse nor beside the purpose, that everie folidebody hath taken the beginning and generation by reason of it. For it being so, that every folide confisteth in length and bredth, having withall a depth: before length there is to be supposed a positure and situation of a point or pricke, answerable to unitie in numbers; and longitude without bredth is called a line; and the mooving of a line into bredth, and the procreation of a superficies thereby, confisteth of three: afterwards, when there is adjoined thereto profundity or depth, the augmentation growth by foure, untill it become a perfect folidity. So 40 that every man feeth, that the quaternary having brought nature to this point, as to performe and accomplish a body, in giving it a double magnitude or masse with firme soliditie apt to make refistance, leaveth it afterwards destitute of the thing which is greatest and principall. For that which is without a foule, to speake plaine, is in maner of an Orphan, unperfect and good for nothing, folong as it is without a foule to use and guide it : but the motion or disposition which putteth in the foule, ingenerated by meanes of the number of five, is it that bringeth perfection and confummation unto nature. Whereby it appeareth that there is an effence more excellent than the foure, inafmuch as a living body endued with a foule, is of a more noble nature, than that which hath none: but more than so, the beauty and excellent power of this number five, proceeding yet farther, would not fuffer a body animate to be extended into in-50 finite kinds, but hath given unto us five divers forts of animate and living natures in al. For there be Gods; Dæmons, or Angels, Demi-gods, or Heroës: then after thele, a fourthkind, of Men; and last of all, in the fift place, is that of brute Beasts and unreasonable. Furthermore, if you come and divide the foule according to nature, the first and obscurest part or puissance thereof, is the vegetative or nutritive faculty: the second is the sensitive: then the appetitive: after it the italcible, wherein is engendred anger. Now when it is once come unto that power which difcourfeth by reason, and brought nature as it were to perfection, there it resteth in the fift, as in the very pitch & top of all. Since then this number hath fo many, and those fo great puissances & faculties, the very generation thereof is beautiful to be confidered; I meane not that whereof we have already heeretofore discoursed, when we faid, that composed it was of two and three, but that which is made by the conjunction of the first principle, with the first square and quadrate number. And what is that principle or beginning of all numbers even one or unitie, and that first quadrat is Foure: and of these twaine (as a man would say, of forme and of matter) being brought to perfection, is procreated this Quinarie or number of five. Now if it be true, as fome do hold, that unitie it selfe is quadrat and foure-square, as being that which is the power of it selfe, and determineth in it selfe, then five being thus compounded of the two first quadrat numbers, ought fo much the rather to be esteemed so nobleand excellent as nonecan be comparable unto it. And yet there is one excellency behind, that paffeth all those which went to before. But I feare me (quoth I) lest if the same be uttered, it would debase in some fort the honor of our Plato, like as himselfe said, the honour and authority of Anaxagor as was deptessed and put downe by the name of the Moone, who attributed unto himselfe the first invention of the Moones illuminations by the Sunne; whereas it was a very ancient opinion long before he was borne, How fay you, hath he not faid thus much in his Dialogue entituled Cratylus? Yes verily, answered Eustrophus; but I see not the like consequence for all that. But you know (quoth I) that in his booke entituled: The Sophister, he setteth downe five most principall beginnings of all things : to wit, That which is : The same : The other: Motion, the fourth : and Reft for the fift. Moreover in his Dialogue Philebu, he bringeth in another kinde of partition and division of 20 these principles, where he faith: That one is Infinite: another Finite, or the end: and of the mixture of these twaine, is made and accomplished all generation: as for the cause whereby they are mixed, he putteth it for the fourth kinde: but leaveth to our conjecture the fift: by the meanes whereof, that which is composed and mixed is redivided, and separate againe. And for mine owne part, I suppose verily, that these principles be the figures and images (as it were) of those before: to wit, of That which is, The thing engendred : of Motion, Infinite : of Reft, the End or Finit: of The same, the Cause that mixeth of The other, the Cause that dothseparate. But say they be divers principles, and not the same: yet howsoever it be, there are alwaies still five kinds, & five differences of the faid principles. Some of them before Plate, being of the fame opinion, or having heard so much of another, consecrated two E. E. unto the god of this temple, 30 as a very figne to fymbolize that number which comprehendeth all. And peradventure, having heard alfo, that Good appeareth in five kinds: whereof the first is Meane or Measure; the second, Symmetrie or Proportion; the third, Understanding; the fourth, The Sciences, Arts and True Opinions, which are in the foule; the fifth, Pure and Syncere Pleasure, without mixture of any trouble and paine: they staied there, reciting this verse out of Orpheus:

It bootesh nos to chaunt fo long. After these discourses passed betweene us: Yet one briefe word more (quoth he) will I say unto Nicander, and those about him;

For fing I will

Tomen of skill.

The fixth day of the moneth when you lead the Prophetesse Pythia into some hal named Prytanium, the first casting of lots among you, of three, tendeth to five: for the casteth three; and you, two: how fay you is it not fo? Yes verily, quoth Nicander: but the cause heereof we dare not reveale and declare unto others. Well then (quoth I, finiling thereat) untill fuch time as god permitteth us after we are become holy and confectate, for to know the trueth thereof, meane while let that also be added unto the praises which have bene alledged in the recommendation of the number Five.

Thus ended the discourse as touching the commendations attributed unto the number of five, by the Arithmeticians and Mathematicians, as far as I can remember or call to mind. And 50 Ammonius (as he was a man who bestowed northe worst and least part of his time in Mathematicke Philosophy) tooke no fmall pleasure in the hearing of such discourses and faid: Needlesse it is and to no purpose, to stand much upon the precise and exact consutation of that which these yong men heere have alledged, unlesse it be that every number will affoord you also fufficient matter and argument of praise, if you will but take the paines to looke into them: for, to fay nothing of others, a whole day would not be enough to expresse in words all the vet-

tues and properties of the facred number Seven, dedicated to Apollo. And moreover we shall feeme to pronounce against the Sages and wifemen, that they fight both against common law received, and all antiquity of time; if diffeizing the number of feven of that preeminence, whereof it is in possession, they should consecrate Five unto Apollo, as more meet and befer ming for him. And therefore mine opinion is that this writing E1 fignifieth neither number, nor order, nor conjunction, nor any other defective particle; but is an entier falutation of it selfe. and a compellation of the God: which together with the very utterance and pronuntiation of the word induceth the speaker to think of the greatnesse & power of him, who seemeth to salute and greet every one of us when we come hither, with these words Transition, Know thy selfe, to which fignifieth no leffe, than if he faid wife, that is to fay, All haile or god fave you and we again to render the like, answer him E 1, that is to fay, Thou art; yeelding unto him not a falle, but a true appellation and title which onely and to him alone appertaineth, namely, that he is. For in very trueth and to speake as it is, we who are mortall men, have no part at all of being indeed, because that all humane nature being ever in the midst betweene generation and corruption, giveth but an obscure apparence, a darke shadow, a weake and uncertaine opinion of it selfe. And if paradventure you bend your minde and cogitation for to comprehend a fubstance and effence thereof, you shal doe as much good as if you would cluch water in your hand with a bent fift; for the more you feeme to gripe and prefle together that which of the owne nature is fluid andrunneth out, fo much the more shall you leese of that which you will classe and hold: and 20 even fo, all things being fubject to alteration, and to paffe from one change unto another, reafon feeking for a reall subfiftence is deceived, as not able to apprehend any thing subfiftant in trueth and permanent; for that every thing tendeth to a being before it is, or beginneth to die fosoone as it is engendred. For, as Heraelitan was wont to fay, a man cannot possibly enter twice into one and the fame river: no more is he able to finde any mortall substance twice in one and the same estate. Such is the suddenesse and celerity of change, that no sooner is it dissipated but it gathereth againe anon, or rather indeed not againe, nor anon, but at once it both subsifteth and also ceaseth to be, it commeth and goeth together; in such fort, as that which beginneth to breed, never reacheth to the perfection of being, for that in very deed this generation is never accomplished, nor resteth as being come to a ful end and persection of being, but con-30 tinually changeth and moveth from one to another : even as of humane feed, first there is gathered within the mothers wombe a fruit or maffe without forme; then an infant having some forme and shape; afterwards being out of the mothers belly it is a sucking babe, anon it proves to be alad or boy, within a while a stripling or springall, then a youth, afterwards a man growen, consequently an elderly & ancient person, & last of ala croked old man: so that the former ages & precedent generations be alwais abolifhed by the fubfequent & those that follow. But we like ridiculous fooles be affraid of one kinde of death, when as we have already died fo many deaths, and doenothing daily and hourely but die still. For not onely (as Heraclitus faith) the death of fire is the life of aire; and the end of aire, the beginning of water: but much more evidently we may observe the same in our selves. The stoure of our yeeres dieth and passeth away when old 40 age commeth: youth endeth in the floure of lufty and perfect age: childhood determineth in youth: infancy in childhood. Yesterday dieth in this day, and this day will be dead by to morow: neither continueth any man alwaies one and the fame, but we are engendred many according as the matter glideth, turneth and is driven about one image, mould or patterne common to all figures. For, were it not fo, but that we continued fill the fame, how is it that we take delight now in these things, whereas we joied before in others? how is it that we love and hate, praise and dispraise contrary things? how commeth it to passe that we use divers speeches, sal into disferent discourses, & are in fundry affections; retaine not the same visage, one countenance, one minde and one thought? For there is no likelihood at all, that without change a man should entertaine other passions; and looke who is changed, he continueth not the same; and if he be not 50 the fame, he is not at all : but together with changing from the same, he changeth also to be fimply, for that continually he is altered from one to another: and by confequence our fense is deceived mistaking that which appeareth, for that which is indeed; and all for want of knowledge, what it is to be. But what is it (intrueth) to be? Surely to be eternall, that is to fay, which never had beginning in generation, nor shall have end by corruption; and in which,

ning stable, permanent and folid, but may be compared unto a leaking vessell, conteining in it (after a fort) generations and corruptions. And to it properly belong these teames: " for and after : Hath bene, & shall be : which presently at the very first fight do evidently show. that time hath no being. For it were a great folly and manifelt abfurditie to fay, that a thing is, which as yet commeth not into effe, or hath already ceased to be. And as for these words, Present, Instant, Now, Ge. by which it seemeth that principally we ground and mainteine the intelligence of Time, reason discovereth the same, and immediatly overthroweth it; for incontinently it is thrust out & disparched, into suture, and past: so that it fareth with us in this case, as with those who would see a thing very farre distant; for of necessitie the visuall beames of his sight doe faile before they can reach thereto. Now if the same befall to nature which is measured, 10 that unto time which measurethit; there is nothing in it permanent nor subsistent, but all things therein be either breeding or dying, according as they have reference unto time. And therefore it may not be allowed to say of that which is , It hath beene , or it shall be: for these termes be certaine inclinations, passages, departures and chaunges of that which cannot endure nor continue in being. Whereupon, we are to conclude that God alone is (and that, not according to any measure of time, but respective to eternity) immutable and unmooveable, not gaged within the compaffe of time, nor fublert either to inclination or declination any way: before whom nothing ever was, nor after whom ought shall be, nothing future, nothing past, nothing elder, nothing yoonger; but being one really, by this one Prefent or Now, accomplisheth his eternitie and being alway. Neither is there any thing, that may truely be said to be, 20 but he alone, nor of him may it be verified : He hath beene, or shall be, for that he is without beginning and end. In this maner therefore we ought in our worthip and adoration, to falue and invocate him, faying, E1, that is to fay, Thou art; unlesse a man will rather, according as fome of the ancients used to doe, falve him by this title Er En, that is to fay, Thou art one: for god is not many, as every one of us, who are a confused heape and masse composed, or rather thrust together of infinit diversities and differences proceeding from all sorts of alterations: but as that which is, ought to be one; fo that which is one, ought to be: for alternative diverfittebeing the difference of that which is, departeth from it, and goeth to the engendring of that which is not. And therefore very rightly agreeth unto this god, the first of his names, as also the second and the third: for Apollo he is called, as denying and disavowing memora, that is 30 to fay, plurality & multitude: likewife, Teias, which is as much to fay, as One, or alone: thirdly, Phabus, by which name, they called in the olde time, All that was cleane and pure, without mixture and pollution. And semblably even at this day, the Thessalians (if I benot deceived) say, that their priests upon certeine vacant dayes, when they keepe forth of their temples and live apart pivatly to themselves, oo Coroquing. Now that which is one, is also pure and syncere; for pollution commeth by occasion that one thing is mingled with another : like as Homer speaking in one place of Yvorie having a tincture of red, faid it was polluted; and the word that he uleth is maire. Diers also, when they would expresse that their colours be medleies or mixed, use the word observer, that is to fay, to be corrupted; and the very mixture they tearme observ, that is to fay, Corruption. It behooved therefore, that the thing which is funcere and incorruptible, 40 should be also one and simple, without all mixture whatsoever. In which regard, they who thinke that Apollo and the Sunne be both one god, are worthy to be made much of and loved for their good conceit and pleasant wit, because they repose the notion of god in that which of all things that they know and defire, they honour and reverence most. And now, so long as we are in this life, as if we dreamed the most beautifull dreame that a man could imagine of this god Apollo, let us excite and stirre up our mindes to passe yet farther and mount higher, for to contemplate and behold that which is above our felves, in adoring principally indeed his effence: but yet honoring withall his image, to wit, the Sunne, and that generative vertue which he hath infused into it, for to produce and bring forth; representing in some fort, by his brightnesse fome obscure resemblances and darke shewes of his elemency, benignity, and blessednesse, as 50 far forth as it is possible for a sensible nature, to shew an intellectuall; and for that which is movable, to expresse that which is stable and parmanent. Moreover, as touching I wot not what extaites and leapings forth of himfelfo and his owne nature, certaine strange alterations likewife, as namely when he castleth fire and withall dismembreth and teareth himselse, as they say: as also that he stretcheth, dilateth and spreadeth forth; and contrariwise how he gathereth and draweth in himselse heere below, into the earth, the sea, the windes, the starres, and uncouth accidents of beafts and plants; they be fuch abfurdities, as are not to be named without impiety. Orelie if we admit them, he will become worfe than the little boy, whom the Poets feigne, playingupon the sea shore with an heape of fand, which he first raised, and then cast downe againe and scattered abroad: if (I say) he should continually play at this game like fast and loose, namely in framing the world first, where before it was not ; and then anon destroying it, so soone as it is made. For contrariwife, how much or how little foever of him is infufed into the world, the fame in fome fort containerth and confirmeth the fubltance thereof, maintaining the corporall nature of it which otherwife by reason of infirmity and weakenesse tendeth alwaies to corruption. In my conceit therefore, against this opinion principally hath beene directly oppo-10 fed this Mot and denomination of god, E1; that is to fay, Thou art: as giving good testimony in his behalfe, that in him there is never any change or mutation. But either to do, or fuffer this, as is before faid, belongeth to any other god or rather indeed to any other Dæmon, ordained to have the superintendance of that nature, which is subject both to generation and corruption: as may appeare immediately by the fignifications of their names, which are quite contrary and directly doe contradict one the other. For our god here is named Apollo, the other Plato: as if one would fay, Not Many; and Many. The one is clepted Delius that is, cleere and evident: the other Aidoneus, that is to fay, obscure blinde and unseene. Againe the former, is named Phabus, which is as much as Shining or resplendent: but the latter Scotius, which is all one with Darke. About him are feated the Muses and Mnemosyne, that is to say, Memory: but neere 20 to this are Lethe, that is to fay, Oblivion and filence. Our Apollo, is furnamed Theorius and Phanaus, of Seeing and shewing : but Pluto is

To gods and men most odiow, And to them as maliciow.

Of whom Pindarus faid not unpleafantly:

Condemn'd of all he was, for that He never any childe begat.

30 And therefore Euripides to this purpose spake right well:

Soule-fongs, dirges, libations funerall Faire Phoebus please not, he likes them not at all.

And before him, Stefichorus:

But Pluto takes delight in sighs,

But Pluto takes delight in Jighs, in groanes and plaints alwaies.

And Sophoeles feemeth evidently to attribute unto either of them their muficall instruments, by these verses:

The Pfalterie and pleasant Lute,

For very late it was, and but the other day to speake of, that the pipe and hauthoies durst presume to sound, and be heard in matters of mirth and delight: but in former times it drew solke to nourning and forrow, to heavie sunerals & convoies of the dead, and in such cases and services emploied it was, as it were not very honourable nor jocund and delectable; how soever after, it came to be intermingled in all occasions one with another. Mary they especially, who considedly have hudled the worship of the gods with the service of Dæmons, brought those instruments in request and reputation.

But to conclude, it feemeth that this Mot E1, is somewhat contrary unto the precept FireBit 50 staurs, and yet after a sort to accord and agree therewith. For as the one is a word of devout admittation and reverent worship directed to God, as eternall and everlasting; so the other is an advertisement given unto men mortall, to put them in minde of their straile and weake nature.

obscure, in this translation of Plutareb, in favour of the unlearned Reader; after the order of the Alphaber.

Ulm, A forename among the Romans. Abyrtuce, A deintic kinde of meat, with the Medes & other Barbarous nations, fharpe & quicke of tafte to provoke and please the appetite, composed of Leeks, Garlike, Cresses, Senvie, Pomgranate kirnels, and such sike.

Academic, A shadowy place full of groves, a mile distant from Athens, where Plate the Philosopher was borne, and wherein hee taught. Of it, the Academicke Philosophers tooke their name; whose manget was to discourse and dispute of all questions, but to determine and resolve of nothing. And for the great frequence and concourse of scholars to that place, our Universities and great schooles of learning, be named Academies.

Mediles, Certeine magistrates or officers in Rome: who were of two forts; Pleben and Curales. Pleben, of the Commons oncly, two in number, more ancient than the other; chosen by the people alone, to second and affift the Tribunes of the Commons, as their right hands. This name they tooke of the charge which they had to mainteine temples and chapels: albeit they registred the Sanctions and Acts of the people, called Plebiseita, and kept the same in their owne custodie; were Clerks of the Marker, and looked to weights and measures, &c. yea, and exhibited the games and playes named Plebey. Curules were likewise twain, elected out of the order and degree of the Patrity: fo called of the Yvorie chaire wherein they were allowed to fit, as officers of greater flate; and by vertue whereof, in fome cases, and at certein times they might exercife civill jurisdiction. It belonged unto these to set forth the solemnities, called Ludi Magni or Romani : overleers they were likewife of the buildings thorowout the city, aswell publike as private, in maner of the Astynomi in Athens: they had regard unto the publike vaults, finks, conveiances, and conduits of the waters that ferved the city, as also to the Arcenall, &c. Moreover, they had power to attach the bodies of great persons: and were charged to see unto the provision of corne and victuals. At the first, none but of noble families or Patricians were advanced to this place: but in processe of time, Commoners also atteined thereto, More of them; &how in Iulius Cafars time there were elected fix Aediles. whereof two were named Cereals; See Alexander at Alexander, lib. A.cap. A. Genial. dieth.

Aegineticke, Mnaor Mina, Seemeth to be the ancient coine or money of Greece: for they were the first that coined money: and of them came voqua anywarv, Calius Rhodig.

Acolius Modus, In Musicke a certeine simple, plaine and mild tune, apt to procure sleepe and bring folke to bed.

Aegainox, That time of the yeere, when the daies and nights be of equall length; which hapneth twice in the yeere, to wit, in March and September.

Aefivall, that is to fay, Of the Summer: as the Aefivall Sollitice or Tropicke of the Sunne, when he is come neerest unto us, and returneth Southward from us.

Aloide or Aloiade, were Othus and Ephialtes, two giants, to named of Aloins the giant their supposed father: for of his wife Iphimedia, Nepture begatthem. It is faid, that every moneth they grewnine singers.

Alphabet, The order or rew of Greeke letters as they stand; so called of Alpha and Beta, the two formost letters: and it answereth to our A, B. C.

Zzzzz

Alternative,

Alternative, By course or turnes, one after another; going and comming, &c.

Amphictyones, Were a certein folemne counfell of State in Greece, who held twice in the yeere a meeting, in the Spring and Autunne, at Thermopple; being affembled from the 12 flourithing cities of Greece: there to confult of most important affaires. Amphitheatre, A spacious shew-place; in forme round, and made as it were of two Theaters. See Theater.

Amphora, A meafure in Rome of liquors only.

It feemeth to take that name of the two cares it had, of either fide one it conteined eight Compins, which are fornewhat under as many of our wine galloas.

Annets, Prefervatives hung about the necke, or otherwife worne, against witcherast, poifon, eichting, sicknesse, or any other evils. Anarchie, The state of a city or countrey without government.

Andria, A focietie of men, meeting together in fome publicke hall for to eat and drinke: Instituted first among the Thebans, like to the Phiditia in Lacedamon.

Annales, Hiftories, Records, or Chronicles, contening things done from yere to yeere. Anniverfarie, Comming once enery yeere, at a certeine time: as the Nativity of Chrift, and Sturbridge faire, &c.

Antaréticke, That is to fay, Opposit unto the Arcticke. See Arcticke.

Antidote, A medicine, properly taken inwardly against a poison or some pession and venumous disease. A counterpoison or prefervative.

Antipathie, A repugnance in nature, by reason of contrarie affections; whereby some can not abide the simell of roses, others may not endure the sight of a Cat, &c.

Antipariflasis, A combinion or restraint on every side; whereby either colde or heat is made stronger in it selfe by the restraining of the contrary: as the natural heat of our bodies in Vinter, through the coldnesse of the aire compassing it about: likewise, the coldnesse of the middle region of the aire in Summer, by occasion of the heat on both sides causing thunder and haile, &c.

Anuphonie, A noise of contrarie sounds.

Antipodes, Those people who inhabit under and beneath our Hemisphære, and go with their feet full against ours.

Apaturia, A feast solemnized for the space of foure daies at Athens in the honour of Bacchus. So called of Apare, that is to fay, Deceit: because Xanthus the Boeotian was in fingle fight flaine deceitfully by Thimoeles the Athenian. For the tale gooth, that whiles they were in combat, Bacehus appeared behind Xanthius, clad in a goats skinne: and when Thimoeles charged his concurrent for comming into the field with an affiftant; as he lookedbacke, he was killed by Thimoeles abovenamed.
